

Chega!

The final report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

I

Chega!

Volume I

OTHER CAVR PUBLICATIONS

CAVR report – Chega!

Indonesian version of Chega! plus summary (2010)
Comic book version of Chega! (Tetum, Portuguese)
Chega! exhibition

Public hearing books

Women and the Conflict
Massacres
Forced Displacement and Famine
Political Imprisonment
Internal Political Conflict 1974–1976
Self-Determination and the International Community
Children and the Conflict

Other titles

Hear Our Voices
The Balide Comarca Prison
History of Timor-Leste in Posters
Dalan ba Dame (dvd with sub-titles)

Website

www.cavr-timorleste.org

Chega!

The Final Report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

Volume I

JAKARTA
KPG IN COOPERATION WITH STP-CAVR

Chega!

The Final Report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

Volume I

KPG 901 13 0738
First printing, November 2013

Author:
The Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

Cover photo:
Poriaman Sitanggang

Editors:
Rani Elsanti, Mirna Adzania, Ninus D Andarnuswari,
Mariana Hasbie, Ining Isaiyas, Pat Walsh

Design and layout:
M. Roniyadi, Rio Ardani, Dadang Kusmana,
Fernandus Antonius, Wendie Artswenda

Project management:
Rev. Agustinho de Vasconselos, Ligia Hermenegildo da Costa,
Candra Gautama, Christina M. Udiani

Library of Congress Cataloguing-in-Publication Data

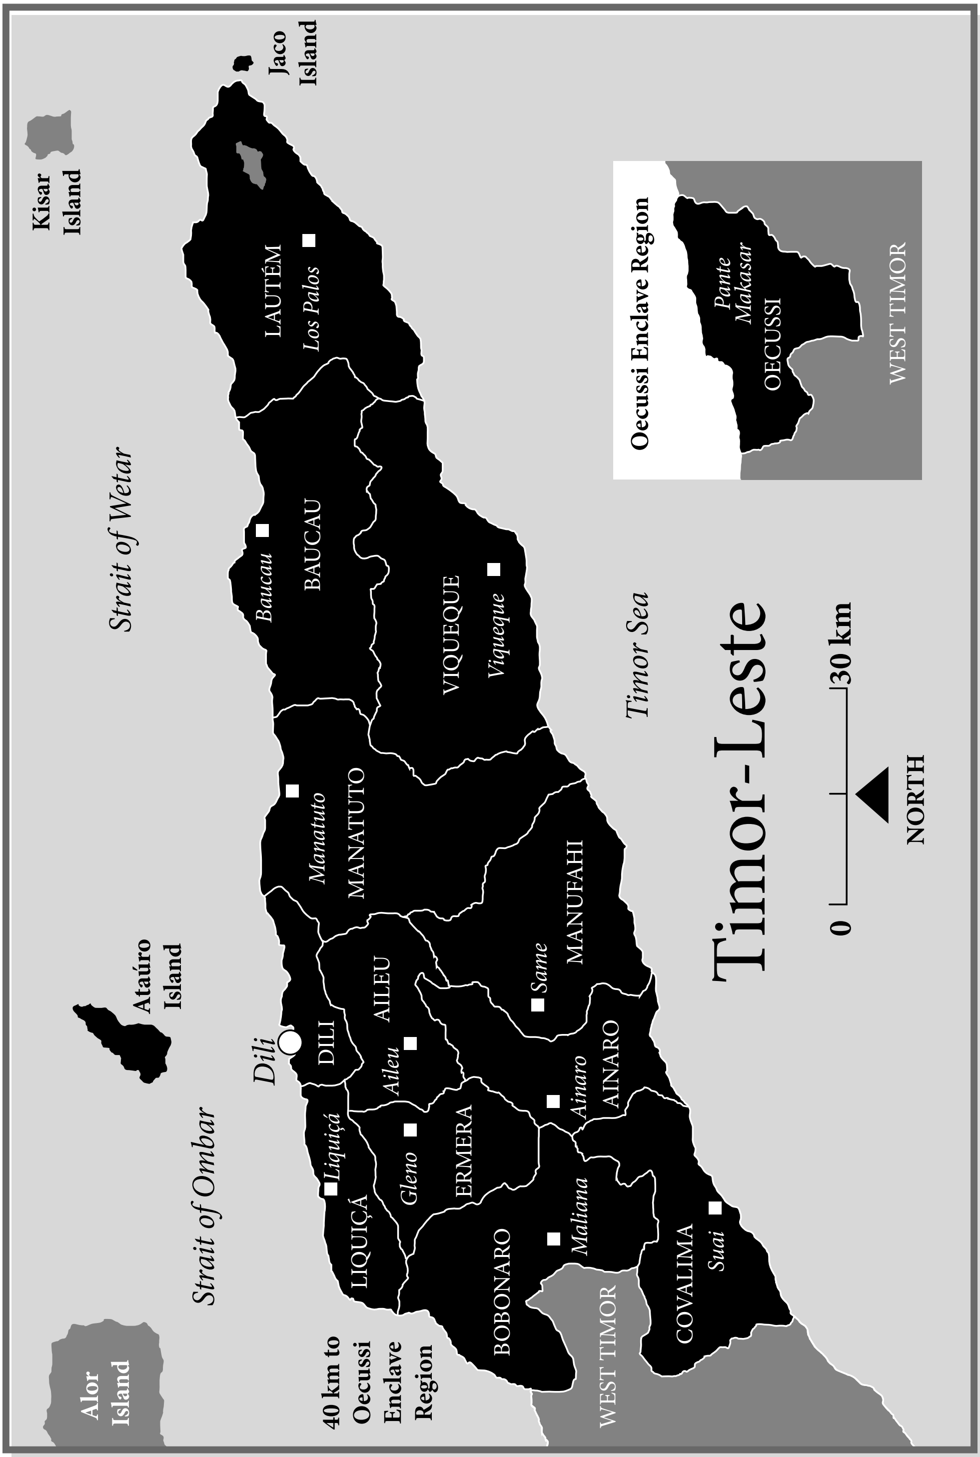
The Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)
Chega!: the final report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR): full report / author, CAVR.—Jakarta: KPG in cooperation with STP-CAVR, 2013. 5 volumes; vol. I: xxvii + 594 pages; 15 cm x 23 cm

ISBN-13: 978-979-91-0643-8

1. Timor-Leste—History—Autonomy and independence movements. 2. Human rights—Timor-Leste. 3. Crimes against humanity—Timor-Leste. 4. Truth commissions--Timor-Leste. 5. Indonesia—Politics and government—1966-1998. 6. Comissão de Acolhimento, Verdade, e Reconciliação Timor-Leste. I. Comissão de Acolhimento, Verdade, e Reconciliação Timor-Leste.

DS649.6 .C3913 2013 2013451418

Funding for this publication was provided by the Government of Timor-Leste.



Every effort has been made to ensure that the contents of this English language version are faithful to the approved Indonesian version entitled Chega! Laporan Komisi Penerimaan, Kebenaran, dan Rekonsiliasi (CAVR) di Timor-Leste (KPG, 2010).

Printed by PT Gramedia, Jakarta
The printer is not responsible for the content of this publication.

Contents

Tables:

Graphics:

Timor-Leste
0
30 km
NORTH
Strait of Wetar
Strait of Ombar
Timor Sea
Kisar Island
Jaco Island
Ataúro Island
Alor Island
40 km to Oecussi Enclave Region
LAUTÉM
Los Palos
BAUCAU
Baucau
VIQUEQUE
Viqueque
MANATUTO
Manatuto
MANUFAHI
Same
AILEU
Aileu
DILI
Dili
AINARO
Ainaro
ERMERA
Gleno
LIQUIÇÁ
Liquiçá
BOBONARO
Maliana
COVALIMA
Suai
WEST TIMOR
Oecussi Enclave Region
Pante Makasar
OECUSSI
WEST TIMOR

Appreciation to donors

The Commission has been able to fulfill its duties thanks to the generosity and assistance of the following government agencies, multilateral institutions and non-government organisations:

- Australian Business Volunteers
- Australian Volunteers International
- Australian Youth Ambassadors for Development
- Australia-East Timor Capacity Building Facility
- Benetech (Human Rights Data Analysis Group)
- Catholic Relief Services (USA) in Kupang
- Community Empowerment Program (CEP), endowed by the Trust Fund for East Timor and managed by the World Bank
- HIVOS (Netherlands)
- International Center for Transitional Justice
- The UN High Commission for Human Rights
- European Commission
- MCC (Mennonite Central Committee)
- The United Nations (through UNTAET, UNMISET, and UNOTIL)
- The Government of Australia through AusAID
- The Government of Canada through CIDA
- The Government of Denmark
- The Government of Finland
- The Government of Germany through GTZ
- The Government of Ireland
- The Government of Japan
- The Government of Norway
- The Government of Portugal
- The Government of New Zealand
- The Government of Sweden
- The Government of the United Kingdom
- The Government of the United States of America
- Pikul, West Timor
- UNDP
- UNHCR
- UN Volunteers
- United States Institute for Peace

Foreword

Archbishop Desmond Tutu
Nobel Peace Laureate, former Chair, South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission

I am deeply honoured to introduce this precious document.

Chega! is an extraordinary report about an extraordinary chapter in the history of the world's freedom struggles. It deserves to be more widely known and to take its rightful place in the international canon of human rights and conflict resolution literature.

The professionalism of the report is obvious. The CAVR Commissioners have followed their terms of reference rigorously, putting aside their strong personal feelings as Timorese who suffered great injustice, to apply the same international standards and judgement to all sides in the conflict. The result is a highly credible report. It is also a useful reference on international law, the workings (and failures) of the international system and a handy nuts and bolts introduction to the unique and effective community reconciliation process that CAVR facilitated.

What I find most compelling, however, is the human face of the suffering and sacrifice that forms the heart of the report. Chega! is above all the story of tens of thousands of ordinary Timorese, many of whom were subjected to unimaginable violence for daring to aspire to the basic freedoms that the international system says all people should enjoy. Jose Ramos-Horta, Timor-Leste's former President and my fellow Nobel Peace Laureate, said that the report moved him to tears and anger. I feel the same way. I ask God to hear the prayers of the many Timorese who are still hurting and also to remember the families of the Indonesian soldiers who died pointlessly in Timor-Leste.

I commend this English version of Chega! to the international community and its many components, including the churches.

As the tenth anniversary of the Chega! report approaches in 2015, my most earnest hope is, however, that those governments who generously funded CAVR will be the first to ensure that the report is widely disseminated in their countries and that its extensive recommendations will be implemented, for the sake of the most needy Timorese victims in particular.

This is the least we can do.

Preface

Aniceto Guterres Lopes, Chair CAVR

Your Excellencies, President Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão; President of the National Parliament, Francisco Guterres Lú-Olo; Prime Minister, Dr Mari Alkatiri; President of the Court of Appeal, Dr Claudio Ximenes; Dr Sukehiro Hasegawa, Special Representative of the Secretary-General; Members of the Parliament; Ministers of the Government; Distinguished members of the Diplomatic Corps and donor community. Representatives of the Church, faith communities and NGOs, my Commissioner colleagues and staff of CAVR, dear friends.

Today is both the end of CAVR's operational mandate and the occasion on which the Commission fulfills its last obligation – the hand over of our Report to the President of the Republic. This Report has been written pursuant to Regulation 10/2001 which requires that the Commission prepares and makes public a report of its activities, findings and recommendations regarding human rights violations committed in the context of the political conflicts during the 25 year period 1974–1999. As amended by the National Parliament, this Regulation also requires the Commission to present this Report to the President of the Republic before being dissolved. This is why we are here today.

Five years have passed since the idea of the CAVR was conceived in 2000. During these years Timor-Leste has moved on in many ways and continues to look to the future. Why, then, when Timor-Leste is focused on the future, is a Report being presented that deals with the past?

The function of history

The simple answer to this question is that the Commission did what it was asked to do, namely to inquire into and report on our tragic recent past. Because the result of this labour is a Report that touches on many difficult issues and sensitivities, it is important to remind ourselves that the CAVR was officially commissioned to do this work. The Commission's tasks were defined in law, written into the Constitution, endorsed by the current Parliament on more than one occasion and were supported by the United Nations and the international community. My Commissioner colleagues and I were required under oath to tell the truth, without fear or favour, about violations committed on all sides during Timor-Leste's tumultuous passage to independence. This included telling the truth about the role of the international community. The Report you see before you is not the outcome of a private initiative or enthusiasm. It is the product of a process officially mandated by the State.

This begs the deeper question, however, as to why Timor-Leste chose to address its difficult past. As a resource-poor nation burdened with exceptional challenges, Timor-Leste could have done nothing or opted to forgive and forget. Instead our nation chose to pursue accountability for past human rights violations, to do this comprehensively for both serious and less serious crimes, unlike some countries emerging from conflict which focused on only one or two issues, and to demonstrate the immense damage done to individuals and communities when power is used with impunity. The CAVR was established as part of this process. Like other transitional justice mechanisms in Latin America, Africa and Europe, our mission was to establish accountability in order to deepen and strengthen the prospects for peace, democracy, the rule of law and human rights in our new nation. Central to this was the recognition that victims not only had a right to justice and the truth but that justice, truth and mutual understanding are essential for the healing and reconciliation of individuals and the nation. Our mission was not motivated by revenge or a morbid or political preoccupation with the past. The CAVR was required to focus on the past for the sake of the future – both the future of Timor-Leste and the future of the international system which, the Report demonstrates, also has much to learn from the experience of Timor-Leste.

The decision of our leaders to address the past through the CAVR process was widely supported by the community. The evidence for this can be seen in the excellent cooperation extended to all of the Commission's activities by all levels of society. Thousands of East Timorese from all parts of the country gave personal statements to the CAVR and, despite the pain it often caused them, participated in and supported reconciliation events and hearings both at district and national levels. The Government, Parliament, political parties, key political figures, civil society and the Church also gave CAVR excellent cooperation at all times, both morally and practically. Such was the cooperation given to the Commission that at no point did the CAVR have to consider activating its inquiry-related search and seizure powers. Only one conclusion is possible: the people of Timor-Leste strongly identified with the CAVR principles and process as the best way to build a stable future free of the violence that marred our past.

The Report

Allow me to say a few words about some features of the Report.

The Report is very long, over 2,000 pages. There are two main reasons for this. First, the CAVR's mandate covered 25 years of protracted conflict during which numerous violations of human rights were committed. In addition, many actors, both domestic and international, were involved making for a complex and dynamic mix of factors and events. Recording all of this has required many pages. Second, the Report is a compact with victims. It is based primarily on testimony from victims and is intended to contribute to healing through the restoration of their dignity. This also required space. The CAVR hopes that victims will see their experiences and suffering clearly reflected in the Report and know that what happened to them is valued in Timor-Leste and has been preserved for posterity. In addition to its Final Report, the CAVR is also publishing the testimony of many victims given to seven of our national public hearings. The CAVR hopes that prioritising the interests and perspectives of victims and survivors in this way will contribute further to healing and a future free of violence.

Though a graphic medium for the voices of Timor-Leste's many victims, the Report is the result of impartial and painstaking inquiry and research. Our mandate required the CAVR to establish trends, patterns and factors. It also required the CAVR to establish accountability and to identify which persons, authorities, institutions and organisations were responsible for human rights violations. In carrying out these tasks, the CAVR has had no political agenda and has studiously avoided embellishment or the impulse to humiliate or take revenge. Human rights violations may have been utilised in the past to mobilise political support and score points against an adversary. The CAVR's sole objective has been to record the truth so that the shocking consequences of violence recorded in this document will serve to deter its repetition in the future and end impunity. The result is not perfect and it was beyond the CAVR's capacity to investigate every case or to establish the definitive truth on all issues. We believe, however, that the Report gives the people of Timor-Leste the big picture of what happened over the 25 years in question and that it will help the community understand our history and the forces that shaped our destiny.

In contrast to its length, the title of the Report is just one word. This is the Portuguese word "Chega!" which roughly translates to "no more, stop, enough!" We feel that this single word, which is the title in all language versions, captures the essential message of the whole report in an arresting way. We believe it is also the essential message that victims want us all to hear and commit to, namely that the individual and collective nightmares described in this Report must never be permitted to recur.

In preparing this Report, the CAVR had both to work in several languages and present this Report in several languages. This was both an official and practical imperative that placed additional heavy demands on the Commission. I want to stress, however, that the CAVR was also deeply aware that the "Question of East Timor", as it was referred to by the United Nations, was an international question and that it is important to ensure that the Report is accessible to key stakeholders in their own languages. The Report will be available in Portuguese, Indonesian, English and at least partially in Tetum. We hope that in due course an institution will offer to translate the full text into Tetum. In this context I should make it clear that Commissioners formally approved the text of the Report in Indonesian. We verified the text in the other languages but it is the Indonesian version of the Report that should be consulted if there is any misinterpretation of the Report or confusion about what we wanted to say.

Archives

In the course of its inquiry, the CAVR has amassed much documentation for the period 1974–1999. The bulk of this evidence now almost fills two large rooms in the Comarca. I want to make four points about this collection. First, these records are unique and must be preserved with great care – they are the living testimony of victims and key actors from a period that witnessed both the painful birth of this nation and a shameful chapter in international politics. Second, they are a rich resource for further research, writing, and education. They will be a valuable resource for the Education Department in the development of curriculum and materials for the classroom and lecture theatre. As such I hope they will continue to attract continuing support to ensure their long term preservation, accessibility and use. Third, this collection must be further enriched through additional contributions. I take this opportunity to appeal to all East Timorese people who have material related to 1974–1999 in their possession, whether in Timor-Leste or abroad, to consider contributing their records, either originals or copies, to this central national depository. And fourthly, every care must be taken to ensure that access to the statements entrusted to the CAVR by victims is controlled and that the confidentiality of evidence and the rights and security of statement-givers are fully respected. The CAVR has made every effort, in collaboration with the Parliament and the Ministry of Justice, to ensure that this is guaranteed following its dissolution.

The future

This brings me to a final point in relation to the content of the Report. Much of the CAVR's work has been a good start but much remains to be done – in the areas of reconciliation, truth-seeking, healing and justice.

The CAVR believes that it has contributed to stabilising many local communities through its reconciliation programme. Nevertheless, many cases were not addressed and creative ways of using the CAVR's methodology need to be developed so that this unique process can be utilised to address conflict in the future. In the area of truth-seeking, the CAVR was not able to give definitive answers to many issues. It is hoped that, based on the evidence it has collected and the uncovering of new information through further research, the process of truth-seeking can continue. It also remains for this Report to be disseminated and its recommendations acted on. This is an item of unfinished business that is essential to the healing process, the deepening of a culture of human rights and rule of law, and the learning of lessons both nationally and internationally. For this to happen, an effective follow-up institution is essential. This body is also necessary to ensure the security, professional management, and development of the CAVR archives.

Appreciation

After being very high-profile in all parts of the country and through our nationally broadcast public hearings, the CAVR has been low-profile for over 12 months. Some may have wondered if we had gone to sleep on the job! The reality is that we have been fully engaged in fulfilling the second of our mandates over the past months – truth-seeking – and this has proven extremely taxing, difficult and time-consuming.

Therefore I want to begin this list of appreciations by acknowledging the understanding and support we have had from the National Parliament, particularly by granting us extra time on three occasions to complete our work. Thank you President Francisco Guterres Lú-Olo and all your Parliamentary colleagues.

The experts say that one of the conditions for a successful truth commission is a certain level of official support or acquiescence. That condition was certainly met in the CAVR's case. As Commissioners from the relatively youthful post-1975 generation, we can now confess that we felt considerable trepidation having to address issues in which revered older leaders were key actors. We need not have worried and owe a profound debt of thanks to our political leaders whose understanding and support meant a lot to us.

Mr President, you have long been a champion of reconciliation, and the CAVR's approach owes much to the inclusive ethos that is a hallmark of your leadership. We have deeply appreciated your support on the many occasions that we have sought your advice. Thank you also for sharing your knowledge with the Commission, for giving public testimony and assisting with fund-raising. We are also indebted to you, Mr Prime Minister. You gave unambiguous public support to the CAVR from the beginning, totally respected the independence of the Commission, and on top of your numerous duties found time to assist with fund-raising, to be interviewed and to give public testimony. The same can be said for your Senior Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, Dr José Ramos-Horta, who in addition to other assistance, used his access to international fora to speak on behalf of the CAVR. Because of their support, which was widely shared by the political parties, the faith community, the Catholic Bishops and civil society, the CAVR was able to focus on its sensitive work free of controversy and distraction.

We also wish to thank the President of the Court of Appeal, Dr Claudio Ximenes, and the Prosecutor General, Dr Longuinhos Monteiro, for their personal and institutional support. Both institutions were key components in the success of the CAVR Community Reconciliation Process.

The CAVR also enjoyed generous support from the international community, particularly in the form of financial grants and human resources. Because of Timor-Leste's economic situation, all funding for the CAVR had to be found externally. Over 25 governments and funding agencies responded to our appeals and provided the funds necessary to rehabilitate and run six offices, place nearly 300 staff in the field, provide the transport, equipment and resources needed for our work and to provide expert advisors to the Commission in several areas. The names and contributions of these donors can be found in the Report. On behalf of all my colleagues at the CAVR I wish to thank each of them most sincerely both for recognising that peace-building is the basis of sustainable development and for their unstinting practical and moral support over five years.

Last but not least, I wish to thank my six National and 28 Regional Commissioner colleagues and all our wonderful staff for their contribution. Over 500 people – including Commissioners, national and international staff and short-term volunteers – have worked at or for the CAVR since 2001. The CAVR was an ambitious magnum opus and adventure into the unknown for all of us. More than once it threatened to overwhelm us emotionally and organisationally. It has been particularly intense and demanding over the past 12 months. I know that working at the CAVR has been a unique and deeply meaningful experience for all my colleagues, Commissioners and staff alike. Nevertheless, Timor-Leste owes each of them an immense debt for the contribution they have made to peace, unity and human rights in our new nation.

Conclusion

Before I present our Report, I have only one thing to say by way of conclusion. It is that the deepest wish of all at the CAVR is that the Report will be received in the spirit in which it was written – with openness, honesty, a deep compassion for those who have suffered the most, an almost fanatical commitment to non-violence, and a determination never, ever to let any of what is in this Report happen again to our beautiful country and people.

On behalf of my Commissioner colleagues and all the CAVR staff, it is now my great honour and privilege to hand over the CAVR Report to your Excellency Mr President.

Presentation of the Report by CAVR National Commissioners

O Relatorio da Comissao de Acolhimento, Verdade e Reconcilição de Timor-Leste (CAVR) foi apresentada ao S.E. Presidente da Republica, Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão, no dia 31 de Outubro de 2005.*

Aniceto Guterres Lopes, Chairperson

Fr. Jovito do Rêgo de Jesus Araújo, Vice-Chairperson

Maria Olandina Isabel Caeiro Alves

Isabel Amaral Guterres

José Estevão Soares

Rev. Agustinho de Vasconselos

Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves

* The CAVR Report was presented to H.E., The President of Timor-Leste, Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão, on 31 October 2005.

Photo/CAVR archives

Chega!

Part 1.

Introduction

Part 1. Introduction

Table:

1. Introduction

Background to the Commission

1. The people of Timor-Leste's long struggle to secure their freedom and their destiny as a nation reached a decisive moment in 1999. After hundreds of years of Portuguese colonialism and 24 years of foreign occupation, we were finally able to express our wish to live as free and independent people in a free and independent country, as the international community at last supported our fundamental right to self-determination. The oppression of the long years of colonialism and the shocking violence of the years of militarised foreign occupation culminated in one last campaign of violence against the people of Timor-Leste in September and October 1999, which left our tiny country devastated in the wake of the departing military.

2. The immediate signs of the devastation were plain for all to see. The burned-out towns and villages, the blood-stained buildings which had been the site of massacres, whole regions almost empty of people who had fled or been forced to leave their homes. As slowly people returned home to look for the living and seek to salvage what they could, and as the international community came to help with emergency relief, gradually the longer-term scars of the long political conflicts became apparent.

3. For ordinary people the legacy of 24 years of conflict and violence was profound and multi-faceted. Amid the rubble of late 1999 it was apparent that steps needed to be taken to address the many elements of this legacy, to assist people to rebuild their lives and to enshrine human rights and the rule of law as governing principles of the new nation.

4. On 25 October 1999 the United Nations Security Council created the UN Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) mission, with a mandate to provide transitional administration of the territory and prepare it for independence. As the initial demands of the humanitarian crisis diminished, the focus shifted to the establishment of essential institutions. These included the institutions responsible for administering justice, including for past violations.

5. Many East Timorese human rights activists' first preoccupation was how to help tackle the humanitarian emergency produced by the violence of September–October. As humanitarian relief programmes became established, activists turned in 2000 to the issue of past crimes and the legacy of the long conflict. There were concerns for the potential for violence to reignite, especially in the context of the virtually complete impunity enjoyed by perpetrators of crimes; and the longer term issue of developing a culture of respect for human rights and the rule of law in a society in which action on these fundamentals was long overdue.

6. In late 1999 the United Nations sent a Commission of Inquiry to investigate recent events and to recommend how those responsible for them should be held accountable. The Commission recommended an International Tribunal be established to try cases of 1999 crimes. Instead the UN established a Serious Crimes process in Timor-Leste and encouraged the Indonesian Government to show its commitment to the rule of law by using its own judicial system to try people residing in Indonesia. East Timorese human rights activists, aware that the impact of the conflict on East Timorese society was not confined to the events of 1999, sought other measures to complement this process.

7. On 7 March 2000, at a conference of its Comissão Política Nacional (National Political Commission, NPC) the Conselho Nacional da Resistência Maubere (CNRT, The National Council of East Timorese Resistance) decided to form a commission for reconciliation. In June 2000 the CNRT Reconciliation Commission conducted a workshop with support from Uppsala University (Sweden) and the Human Rights Unit of UNTAET. Participants included members of political organisations, human rights activists and members of the Catholic Church, who explored the idea of a truth and reconciliation commission. The group brought this idea to the August 2000 CNRT National Congress, a landmark gathering to help formulate the vision for the new independent Timor-Leste. The Congress endorsed the idea of a truth and reconciliation commission and established a steering committee to conduct consultations to determine whether the idea was acceptable to the broader East Timorese community. This was the beginning of the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation in Timor-Leste (CAVR, Comissão de Acolhimento, Verdade e Reconciliação).

From colonialism to militarised occupation

8. About 500 kilometres north of Australia, Timor-Leste straddles Asia and the Pacific, and this can be seen in the country's cultural and linguistic diversity. Timor was colonised by the Portuguese, just as their power in the region was diminishing in the face of the growing assertiveness of the Dutch and the British. Over the following centuries Portuguese Timor became increasingly isolated; Portugal's only foothold on the fringe of South-East Asia.

9. The Portuguese hold on Timor was tenuous until the 19th century, as it did little to assert control over the majority of East Timorese living in the mountainous interior. In the mid-19th century, Portugal introduced the forced cultivation of coffee as a cash crop, which together with the imposition of various taxes put them in much closer control of Timorese people's daily lives. Rebellions ensued into the early 20th century, when the Portuguese violently put down an uprising led by Dom Boaventura from Manufahi, which gained widespread support throughout the territory. Portugal sought to shore up its control through a system of government which favoured certain local leaders over others. The result was a society which lacked the cohesion required to forge a sense of nationhood.

10. Compounding this colonial legacy was the fact that for most of the 20th century Portugal itself was under the authoritarian regime of Salazar and his successor Marcello Caetano. From the late 1920s until the Carnation Revolution of April 1974, political freedoms in Portugal were heavily curtailed. Portugal suppressed all aspirations for independence in its colonies, characterising them as an integral part of Portugal, even after the United Nations had declared them non-self-governing territories in 1960. Portugal was the last of the European powers to decolonise, ignoring the wave of decolonisation that began after the Second World War. It was only after liberation wars in Portugal's African colonies convinced many Portuguese that the empire could not be sustained that change occurred with the Carnation Revolution of 15 April 1974.

11. The promise of decolonisation was one of the main rallying cries of this revolution in Lisbon. However, for the Portuguese decolonisation meant above all rapid disengagement from the wars it was fighting against the liberation movements in its African colonies. Their Asian colony of Timor was a special case that was easily overlooked. Over the ensuing months Portuguese policy towards Timor suffered from inadequate attention and planning, compounded by constant changes of government in Lisbon. In Timor the Carnation Revolution opened the way for aspirations for freedom among the mostly young and inexperienced politically active. Political associations quickly formed, with the two main ones, Associação Social Democráta Timorense (Timorese Social Democratic Association, ASDT), later to be renamed Frente Revolucionária de Timor Leste Independente (Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor, Fretilin), and União Democrática Timorense (Timorese Democratic Union, UDT), favouring independence for the territory.

12. This was the height of the Cold War. During 1975, the year after the Carnation Revolution, the war in Vietnam was fought to its conclusion with the victory of the communist north over the south and its US patron. Amid US and Western fears of a "domino effect" that could turn more of South-East Asia communist, the staunchly anti-communist military regime of President Soeharto came to be seen as a bulwark of stability in the region.

13. Hopes that decolonisation in Timor would be smooth were thwarted by Portuguese neglect, Indonesian interference supported by its key Western allies, the US and Australia, and the inexperience and lack of political experience of the mainly young leaders of the newly-formed parties, whose political discourse was heavily laced with the rhetoric of violence and personal attacks rather than interchange of ideas.

14. On 11 August 1975 the centre-right party UDT launched an armed movement in Dili. Its objective was to establish control of the territory, demand the removal of Portuguese and East Timorese radicals, and thus demonstrate to Indonesia that Timor was not about to become a breeding ground for communism. An already volatile state of affairs exploded into violence across the districts of Timor. Within ten days the left-wing party Fretilin responded with a general armed insurrection.

15. This brief civil war was over by early September, but it had changed the situation irreversibly. The fighting took up to 3,000 lives and left deep and enduring scars. At the end of August the Portuguese colonial administration fled the mainland for the island of Ataúro, never to return. Leaders and members of UDT, and the other three smaller parties, Associação Popular Democrática Timorense (Timorese Popular Democratic Association, Apodeti), Klibur Oan Timor Aswain (Association of Timorese Warrior Sons, KOTA) and Trabalhista (Labour), fled across the border into Indonesian West Timor, and aligned themselves with Indonesian aims.

16. The Indonesian armed forces had been conducting covert operations in Portuguese Timor since mid-1974, and had been giving members of Apodeti military training in West Timor since December 1974. From September 1975 the Indonesian military conducted cross-border operations into Portuguese Timor aimed at undermining the position of the hard-pressed Fretilin de facto administration. In October 1975 it stepped up these operations through large-scale combined air, sea and land attacks that resulted in the occupation of key towns in the western district of Bobonaro.

17. Fretilin, hoping to put the decolonisation process back on track, sought the return of the Portuguese administration. Denied support or direction from Lisbon, the governor, Mário Lemos Pires, refused to return or to enter negotiations with Fretilin on the basis of its claim that it was the sole legitimate representative of the East Timorese people. To prevent military aggression by Indonesia and to gain international recognition and assistance, Fretilin unilaterally declared independence on 28 November 1975.

18. The four other East Timorese political parties, under pressure from the Indonesian military, signed a declaration, the Balibó Declaration, in Bali the next day proclaiming Portuguese Timor's integration with Indonesia. Indonesia launched a full-scale invasion of Timor on 7 December 1975. Fretilin and its armed wing, Falintil (Forças Armadas de Libertação Nacional de Timor-Leste or Armed Forces for the Liberation of Timor-Leste), retreated to the interior with tens of thousands of civilians. Thus began the war that lasted, through several distinct military and political phases, for 24 years.

19. Indonesia sought to legitimise its annexation of Timor-Leste. The Popular Representative Assembly, consisting of hand-picked Timorese, met in Dili in May 1976 and, citing the Balibó Declaration, unanimously approved a petition calling for integration. On the basis of this purported act of self-determination, in July 1976 the Indonesian Parliament passed a law declaring Timor-Leste the 27th province of Indonesia. The United Nations never recognised this process as constituting an internationally acceptable act of self-determination by the East Timorese people. The UN Security Council condemned the invasion and called for withdrawal of Indonesia troops in December 1975 and again in April 1976. The General Assembly passed a motion supporting self-determination for Timor-Leste every year until 1982, when the matter was referred to the good offices of the Secretary-General. Timor-Leste remained on the UN agenda throughout the occupation, listed as a non-self-governing territory under Portuguese administration.

20. In reality key member states did little to challenge Indonesia's annexation of Timor-Leste or the violent means used to enforce it. Most nations were prepared to appease

Indonesia as a major power in the South-East Asian region. The situation in Timor-Leste was poorly understood. Governments friendly to Indonesia supported its version of events there. Isolated in its own region during the years of Portuguese colonialism, it was a closed territory for the first 13 years of the occupation as the Indonesian military used every means at its disposal to subdue the people of Timor-Leste. The UN was frustrated in its efforts to enter Timor-Leste to assess the situation, foreign aid was blocked and international diplomats and media were granted permission to make only occasional, tightly-controlled visits to the territory. East Timorese in exile worked vigorously with international civil society to bring attention to the plight of the East Timorese people, but with limited means compared to the powers supporting Indonesia.

21. The war reached every village of Timor-Leste and profoundly influenced the lives of all East Timorese people. Cut off from the world and without any form of institutional protection, ordinary civilians suffered massively from the merciless assaults and random cruelties of the Indonesian military, particularly in the early years of the occupation. Those perceived to be political opponents of the occupation were treated particularly brutally. Especially in the early years of the occupation, ordinary civilians could also suffer vicious treatment if they fell afoul of the Resistance's sweeping notions of ideological deviance.

22. All this time Indonesian military and political leaders claimed that, the activities of a handful of "security disruptors" apart, the war was over and that reports of human rights violations were fabrications. Foreign allies of Indonesia were complicit in supporting these falsehoods, thereby reinforcing the impunity enjoyed by the Indonesian military domestically and allowing it to continue its ferocious campaign to subdue the people of Timor-Leste unchecked.

23. During the occupation years the character of the conflict went through several changes. The 1970s were years of large-scale military operations aimed at destroying the armed Resistance led by Fretilin. Large numbers of the civilian population lived in the interior with the Resistance, and suffered directly from these military operations. By the end of the 1970s the armed Resistance was shattered, and its strategy of fixed base areas, in which the civilian population was to play a crucial role, came to an end. When the civilian population were forced out of the interior, the Indonesian military pursued a strategy of separating the civilian population from the armed Resistance by holding tens of thousands of surrendered civilians in detention camps and resettlement villages with disastrous consequences for the people of Timor-Leste, who suffered terrible famine in the late 1970s and early 1980s.

24. The Resistance reorganised in the 1980s into a guerrilla force, supported by a growing clandestine movement in towns and villages. The Indonesian military extended its territorial reach to all villages in Timor-Leste, including a smothering intelligence and paramilitary presence made up largely of East Timorese. This militarisation of East Timorese society was pervasive and had the effect of severely curtailing the rights of East Timorese across the whole internationally-recognised spectrum that extends from the political and civil to the economic, social and cultural.

25. By the late 1980s Indonesia claimed to have "normalised" the province of Timor-Leste, and partially lifted its ban on access to the territory. Earlier in the decade young people began attending universities in Indonesia, and the clandestine movement was increasingly driven by this new generation. As the Cold War ended in 1989, and as foreigners trickled into the newly opened province of Timor-Leste, this young generation were in the front line of a new Resistance strategy in which demonstrations against the occupation were a core component. The response was swift and ruthless, and in 1991 the infamous Santa Cruz Massacre of young people by the Indonesian security forces took place in Dili. Unlike previous massacres, this one was filmed by a foreign journalist and images of the carnage reached the outside world. This had a profound effect on understanding of the situation in Timor-Leste worldwide, and renewed international efforts to seek a solution to "the question of East Timor".

26. With renewed international attention on Timor-Leste, and the paradigm shift in the assumptions of global politics that the end of the Cold War produced, Indonesia came under increasing pressure to respond. However, President Soeharto remained a favoured ally of Western and regional powers alike, and it was only when he fell from power in 1998 that real change became possible. The United Nations, which had remained seized of the matter throughout the occupation, stepped up its activities and ultimately brokered the 5 May 1999 Agreements that led to the Popular Consultation of 30 August 1999, in which the people of Timor-Leste chose independence.

27. While the international community finally supported the East Timorese right to self-determination by backing the Popular Consultation, once again it failed to confront the true nature of the Indonesian occupation. Security for the Consultation was placed in the hands of the Indonesian police, well-known to be subordinate to the Indonesian military, which not only continued to be deployed in the territory but blatantly nurtured East Timorese militias as the instrument of a strategy intended to ensure the victory of pro-integration forces. The result was predictable. However, the people of Timor-Leste defied the ensuing campaign of threats, intimidation and violence and came out and voted for independence. When the result of the ballot was announced, the Indonesian military and its militia allies carried out its threatened retaliation, to devastating effect, but this time governments were unable to ignore the contrast between the extraordinary courage and quiet dignity displayed by the voters of Timor-Leste and the terrible retribution wreaked by the TNI and its East Timorese partners.

Coming together: reconciliation

28. From the earliest days of the decolonisation process in Timor-Leste, when political associations were formed and differences emerged, there were efforts to try bridge these differences and to work cooperatively in the wider national interest. As members of the main political parties attacked each other verbally over the radio, others who saw the dangers came together and negotiated a short-lived coalition between the UDT and Fretilin parties. As this coalition threatened to unravel, there were members of both parties who struggled to keep it alive. The Commission heard that even when in August–September 1975 hopes of a rapprochement appeared to have been definitively dashed by the UDT armed movement and the "civil war" that it precipitated, there were individuals prepared to try to open dialogue between the contending parties. In the early months after the invasion, when its true meaning was becoming apparent to many East Timorese who had supported it, the Commission also heard of quiet efforts at rapprochement between the enemies of the civil war. These early efforts largely failed, but they were the forerunners of the slow and persistent growth of a truly national consciousness that was forged in the long struggle for self-determination.

29. During the years of occupation the Resistance became an inclusive movement which sought ways to involve people from all East Timorese political backgrounds and those without any partisan allegiance, including members of the Catholic Church. As the Resistance moved away from hard-line ideology during the 1980s and embraced a "national unity" strategy, it reached out to all East Timorese who supported self-determination. From the early 1980s members of UDT and Fretilin in exile began working together to influence the international community. The path to rapprochement was not smooth – but a common commitment to liberty and self-determination sustained these efforts. Institutionally, the Resistance moved from the leadership of the single party Fretilin to the Conselho Revolucionário de Resistência Nacional (Revolutionary Council of National Resistance, CRRN), then the Conselho Nacional da Resistência Maubere (National Council of Maubere Resistance, CNRM) and finally the Conselho Nacional de Resistência Timorense (National Council of Timorese Resistance, CNRT) – each shift signalling the progressive broadening of the movement to include all East Timorese people sharing that commitment. The new generation of the 1980s and 1990s increasingly adopted this nationalist, non-partisan perspective on the struggle.

30. Moreover, the Resistance learned the strength of peaceful dialogue as a means of creating mutual respect and building confidence. In 1983 the Resistance promoted its first peace plan, and in the early 1990s the CNRM disseminated a peace plan that proposed unconditional dialogue to try to resolve the conflict. In the mid-1990s, under the auspices of the UN, East Timorese people from pro-independence and pro-integration backgrounds came together for a series of meetings designated the All-Inclusive Intra-East Timorese Dialogue. When change looked truly possible in Timor-Leste in 1998, but was threatened by violence, the Catholic Bishops of Timor-Leste brought together pro-independence and pro-integration East Timorese leaders in the meeting known as Dare I. A second meeting, Dare II, was convened in Jakarta in 1999, when violence put the Popular Consultation at risk.

31. It could be said that these initiatives failed because of the violence of September–October 1999. However, this misses their true significance, which is that for 25 years there were East Timorese who struggled to find a peaceful way of resolving divisions, and that ultimately, through the Popular Consultation of August 1999, the overwhelming majority of the people supported this approach. We need to learn from this, and to take inspiration from the efforts of East Timorese peacemakers. In the future, there will always be differences of view in our society and with our neighbours. We will be faced with choices, at the local, national and international levels, about how we approach these differences. The experience of the past shows that we must always choose the path of peace. That way we can secure our future, and we can become a shining light to the world. Our knowledge of our past can help us shape a peaceful future.

Organising principle of this Report

32. Parts in this Report are organised thematically. There are a number of parts which provide essential background information to an understanding of the context and causes of the human rights violations which occurred during the mandate period: for example, Vol. I Part 3: The History of the Conflict; Vol. I Part 4: The Regime of Occupation; Vol. I Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy. The main body of the Report is found in Vols. II-III Part 7, which is organised thematically into the main human rights violations committed during the mandate period. Within each of the sections in this part, violations are examined within a structure which divides the mandate period in up to seven main phases, as appropriate:

- April 1974-September 1975: the internal political and armed conflict
- September 1975-January 1976: the period of Fretilin administration, the aftermath of the internal conflict and Indonesian incursions
- December 1975, the full-scale Indonesian invasion
- 1976–1979: the period of large-scale Indonesian military operations and the armed resistance led by Fretilin
- 1980–1984: the period of Indonesian military "consolidation" and the rebuilding of the Resistance
- 1985–1998: the period of "normalisation"
- 1999: the period leading up to and following the Popular Consultation of 30 August 1999.

The truth

33. The mandate of the Commission included establishing the truth about the human rights violations which occurred in Timor-Leste throughout the 25-year mandate period. The scope of this mandate included determining the factors such as the context, causes, antecedents, motives and perspectives which led to the violence, whether they were part of a systematic pattern of abuse, the identity of persons, authorities, institutions and organisations involved in the violations, and whether the violations were a result of deliberate planning, policy or authorisation on the part of the state, political groups, militia groups, liberation movements or other groups or individuals.[1] The Commission was also mandated to examine the role of both internal and external factors, and to determine accountability for the violations (Regulation 10/2001, Section 3: see Vol. I Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission).

34. The Commission was not a court of law, and has not prepared cases or indictments against individuals or about individual cases. Nevertheless, the Commission's work to establish the truth has involved the gathering of a wide range of material that constitutes strong evidence of the human rights violations which occurred throughout the period. According to the mandate of the Commission, this truth has several purposes. For example:

- To shed light on events that have until now been largely unreported or even covered up;
- To encourage further investigation, by states, international organisations and others, that can lead to prosecutions and thus advance the fight against impunity for serious crimes;
- To assist victims regain their dignity, by sharing with the nation and the international community the truth which has until now been suppressed and so not understood or perhaps not believed;
- To understand better the forces which have shaped East Timorese society and the nation, and to draw lessons from the past which can nurture a culture of peace and respect for human rights and the rule of law;
- To foster an awareness and understanding of the past in all citizens of Timor-Leste, especially among the young and in future generations, so that by remembering and honouring the suffering of our people during these years of conflict we learn to appreciate the difficult challenges they faced, how they coped with those challenges and value in particular those who made a contribution to lasting peace and freedom in our land.

35. The truth contained in this Report comes largely from the words of those who directly experienced the years of conflict. The Commission has attached special importance to listening directly to those who suffered human rights violations throughout the 25-year period, most of whom had not spoken outside the narrow circle of their family. These many voices, from across the country, have given Timor-Leste a priceless asset. They tell us who we are, what we have been through, what we have lost, and show us the value of what we have gained. From the stories of our sisters and brothers we learn that victory is not a simple matter of heroes and villains; that history is more than the listing of major events or the biographies of those who are called leaders. The experiences of "ordinary people", both the many who died and those who survived, tell us where we have come from and help us understand who we are today. From their stories we see more clearly both the extremes of human dignity and of human degradation that were manifested in our country during these 25 years. We must learn from both sides of this human story. We must acknowledge our potential for both extremes, and strive always to bring the best of our humanity into our lives and relationships – our families, our communities and our nation – each day as we build a new future.

Origins of the Commission

The workshop and the CNRT Congress

36. In June 2000, representatives of East Timorese civil society, the Catholic Church and community leaders held a workshop to consider transitional justice mechanisms, supported by the UNTAET Human Rights Unit. The advisability of establishing a truth commission for Timor-Leste was part of its agenda. The workshop recommended that a proposal to establish an independent commission with a mandate to investigate past violations and promote reconciliation should be put to the first National Congress of the CNRT (Conselho Nacional da Resistência Timorense) in August 2000.

37. The Congress was composed of delegates from district, sub-district and village constituencies based on the CNRT networks. Most of the East Timorese factions that had supported independence discussed and put forward policies to produce a vision for the future. One result was a formal acknowledgement that colonisation and the long military occupation had seriously damaged the social fabric and cultural identity of the nation. Commission III of the Congress, whose remit included, inter alia, socio-cultural development, noted that future national policies of social and cultural development should be "directed towards the formation of a Timorese society based on universal values that lead to the formation of a modern, more dignified, more humane and just society."[2]

38. The CNRT Congress adopted the following vision of reconciliation:

> Reconciliation is a process, which acknowledges past mistakes including regret and forgiveness as a product of a path inherent in the process of achieving justice; it is also a process which must involve the People of Timor-Leste so that the cycle of accusation, denial and counter-accusation can be broken. This process must not be seen only as a conflict resolution or mere political tool which aims at pacification and reintegration of individuals or groups in the context of their acceptance of independence and sovereignty of Timor-Leste but, above all, must be seen as a process where truth must be the outcome.

39. The Congress unanimously recommended the establishment of a "Commission for Resettlement and National Reconciliation". A Steering Committee to develop the proposal was formed. It included representatives from the CNRT, East Timorese human rights NGOs, women's groups, youth organisations, the Commission for Justice and Peace of the Catholic Church, the Association of ex-Political Prisoners (Assepol), Falintil, UNTAET and UNHCR. The Committee's first task was to conduct community consultations across Timor-Leste, and with East Timorese refugees in West Timor and other parts of Indonesia. The objective of these consultations was to collect information so as to gain an understanding of the attitudes of the East Timorese people on issues relating to reconciliation.

40. Following the Congress, assistance was sought from the UNTAET mission. The Transitional Administrator, Sérgio Vieira de Mello, nominated the Human Rights Unit of the mission to act on behalf of the UN in supporting the Steering Committee.

41. The Steering Committee conducted consultations with communities across Timor-Leste from September 2000 to January 2001. It visited each of the 13 districts, holding public meetings at district, sub-district and village levels. It also consulted political parties, jurists and human rights organisations and victims' groups. It found overwhelming community support for a truth and reconciliation commission.

Results of the Steering Committee's community consultations

42. The following themes emerged from the Steering Committee's consultations.

Truth-seeking and justice:

1. There should be justice for those responsible for serious crimes.
2. It was necessary for the future of Timor-Leste to learn from the history of the conflict. Investigating the past and establishing the truth should be seen as fundamental to sound nation building. However, opening up old wounds carried risks, and probing the past had to be carried out with great sensitivity. Otherwise the airing of past grievances could simply create anger and recrimination, and even renewed violence.
3. Although the incidence of violations was greatest during the long period of occupation by the Indonesian security forces, there was a real risk that reopening the chapter of the party conflict of 1974-75 would fuel strong emotions. Investigating and reporting the truth concerning violations committed by members of UDT, Fretilin and Falintil, including individuals now holding senior positions in government, the armed forces and the police, would also be particularly challenging.
4. There was residual anger on the part of many pro-independence supporters towards those who sided with the Indonesian occupation forces and former members of militia groups. Practical steps needed to be taken to try to reduce these tensions.
5. Many pro-autonomy supporters identified a need for popular education in the principles of political tolerance. Supporting the political goal of autonomy was not a crime and individuals should not be punished in any way for taking that political position.
6. Many women survivors of rape supported the idea of a commission with a truth-seeking function.
7. Families of those who had disappeared asked for help in discovering the fate of their loved ones.

8. The Indonesian government should be held responsible for the actions of its agents, particularly members of the security forces and East Timorese auxiliaries who were under their control. Such responsibility should include the payment of compensation to victims of these government-sponsored violations.
9. Representatives of the United Nations, Portugal and Indonesia should be investigated regarding the 5 May Agreements establishing the terms and conditions in which the Popular Consultation was to be held. These gave Indonesia responsibility for security during the 1999 ballot, when members of its forces were known to have already committed widespread human rights violations.

Reconciliation:

1. The view that reconciliation is possible was widely accepted, but there had to be accountability and justice for past serious crimes, including those committed before 1999.
2. The need for reconciliation at the village level should not be overlooked. Dissatisfaction was expressed that up to that time all reconciliation initiatives had focused on the leaders. There should be an organised effort to try to resolve past differences at a grassroots level.
3. Village elders or traditional leaders and traditional system should be involved in the processes of reception and reconciliation.
4. The Catholic Church and the culture of confession and forgiveness could play an important role in reconciliation processes at the community level.
5. The Commission must engage with the refugees in West Timor. It should conduct an information programme in West Timor to correct the misinformation about conditions in Timor-Leste being fed to refugees.

Supporting victims:

1. Support for the rehabilitation of victims, such as ex-political prisoners and survivors of torture, was necessary and compensation should be provided to victims.
2. Victims indicated overwhelmingly that they sought accountability and justice and were opposed to proposals for amnesty.
3. Commissioners should be knowledgeable about human rights and be respected in the community.
4. The Commission should operate at the village level and should conduct campaigns to inform the people about the nature of its work.
5. The Commission should not be seen as displacing the formal justice system and the courts. It should work in a complementary way to support both justice and reconciliation.
6. Doubts were expressed about the capacity of any Commission to deal with the vast number of crimes and violations committed over the 24 years of conflict.

Choosing the name of the Commission

43. The Steering Committee debated at length what the name of the Commission should be. That "truth" and "reconciliation" should both be included in the title was quickly accepted. However, the Committee felt that the title should reflect East Timorese cultural and spiritual values, which would play an essential part in the Commission's function of healing divisions between individuals and groups. These values can be described, but are difficult to encapsulate in a single word. It was agreed that the Portuguese word acolhimento most accurately conveyed these values. The term acolhimento has broader connotations than its Indonesian equivalent "penerimaan" or the English "reception". These include notions of welcoming, accepting, offering hospitality and forgiveness. In East Timorese culture it refers to the formal courtesy shown to others by virtue of their status as human beings to whom respect is due by virtue of their unique dignity, destiny and spiritual identity. This enables people to receive with some graciousness even those who have harmed them. As the work of the Commission would be to help break down barriers between perpetrators and victims the word was incorporated into the Commission's title. In Steering Committee discussions it was also felt that acolhimento could be compared to the Gospel story of the Prodigal Son who was welcomed with joy and an open heart.

Regulation 10/2001, establishing the Commission

44. The Steering Committee took the results of the consultation as the basis for an intensive debate over policy issues. Over a three-month period the Committee drafted legislation to establish the Commission. UNTAET and the US-based international non-governmental organisation the International Center for Transitional Justice (ICTJ)* provided technical assistance. The results of the community consultation strongly influenced the content of the draft regulation. They also helped shape thinking about the Commission's mandate and operating methods.

45. At the time the regulation was being drafted, UNTAET still retained full administrative authority over the territory. It was mandated to supervise the transition to independence. One of its transitional measures was the creation of a National Council, in which East Timorese political parties, religious communities and civil society were represented. After receiving cabinet approval, draft legislation was referred to the National Council. The drafts were given detailed consideration in the National Council's specialised standing committees.

46. Representatives of the Steering Committee appeared before the National Council to explain the proposed legislation and answer members' questions about it. Although there was enthusiasm for the proposal and it was quickly approved in principle by the full National Council, the issues it dealt with provoked extensive and at times heated debate.

* ICTJ is a New York-based non-governmental organisation, assisting countries which are trying to establish accountability for past human rights violations (for more information on the ICTJ, see www.ictj.org).

47. A large number of members wished to be involved in the technical consideration of the Regulation so the final draft was not referred to a standing committee. Instead a new committee was formed specifically to deal with the draft regulation and to allow for detailed discussion. The full National Council approved the draft after one month of deliberations; the regulation on the establishment of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR, Comissão de Acolhimento, Verdade e Reconciliação) was approved by the National Council on 13 June 2001.* The National Council forwarded its final draft to the Transitional Administrator with a recommendation that he promulgate it as law. The Transitional Administrator, Sérgio Vieira de Mello, promulgated the law on 13 July 2001.

48. The Commission's establishment was supported by political leaders of all political persuasions, non-government organisations, the Catholic Church and other religious institutions, the UN mission, UNHCR, the UN High Commission for Human Rights, other international organisations and donor countries. The level of support for the Commission was so broad that reference to it was included in Timor-Leste National Constitution Article 162. By the time the Constitution was signed in May 2002, the Commission was already operating.

Interim office

49. An Interim Office was established in August 2001, after Regulation 10/2001 was promulgated. The tasks of the office were to support the Steering Committee in implementing a selection process for National and Regional Commissioners, to seek funds for the establishment of the Commission, and to seek premises for the national and regional offices of the Commission. The Interim Office was supported by the UNTAET Human Rights Unit and staffed by a small team, with Pat Walsh of the Human Rights Unit as Executive Director, and Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves and José Estévão Soares as senior policy advisors. The Interim Office operated out of the former teachers training centre, which had also been the UNAMET compound and later the CNRT compound, in Balide, Dili.

The CAVR Advisory Council

50. In 2002 the CAVR Advisory Council was formed to provide authoritative advice and feedback to the National Commissioners. East Timorese members were Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, SDB; Bishop Basilio do Nascimento; Madre Zulmira Osorio Soares; José Ramos-Horta; Pastor Maria de Fatima Gomes and Dr Ana Pessoa Pinto. International members were Sérgio Vieira de Mello, Ian Martin, Mrs Saparinah Sadli and Munir SH.

51. The Commission reflects with sadness that two eminent international members of the CAVR Advisory Council were apparently assassinated during the Commission's work.[*] The Commission pays tribute to the dedication and courage of Sérgio Vieira de Mello and Munir SH, two friends and supporters of the CAVR, who lived and died for their principles and commitment as defenders of human rights.

* The National Council had a total of 32 members; 30 voted in favour of the Regulation, one against, and one abstention.

Formation of the Commission

National Commissioners

52. In the Commission's formative period, consulting directly with a wide and representative cross-section of East Timorese society was important to establish and maintain the legitimacy of the Commission. It was essential to maintain this element for the successful completion of the mandate. Section 4 of Regulation 10/2001 provided for the Transitional Administrator to appoint between five and seven National Commissioners, at least 30% of whom should be women, on the advice of a Selection Panel which included representatives of the major political parties and civil society groups.[†] Following its formation the Panel travelled across Timor-Leste and to Indonesia to canvas nominations for the positions of National and Regional Commissioners. In addition to political, human rights and civil society organisations, a wide variety of community groups also participated in the nomination process.

53. The Regulation gave the Selection Panel the option to recommend the appointment of two "international persons" as National Commissioners. The panel's nominees did include a small number of foreign nationals who had a strong record in defence of human rights. However, the Selection Panel decided that East Timorese should have sole responsibility for the policies, programmes and findings of the Commission and that only persons who had gained the endorsement of members of the public during the community consultations should be appointed National Commissioners.

* Sérgio Vieira de Mello was the Transitional Administrator of East Timor from 25 October 1999 until 20 May 2002 during the period of the UNTAET administration. He was the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights when he was killed by a bomb attack in Baghdad on 19 August 2003, when he was leading the UN mission in Iraq. Munir SH was an Indonesian human rights lawyer, who was known for his struggle to challenge military-sponsored violence in Indonesia. He was a founder of Kontras (Komisi untuk Orang-Orang Hilang dan Korban Kekerasan, Commission for the Disappeared and Victims of Violence), and Chairman of Imparsial (Human Rights Watch Indonesia). He died of arsenic poisoning on a flight from Jakarta to the Netherlands on 7 September 2004.

† The members of the Selection Panel were: João Francisco Amaral, Maria Barreto, Francisco Miranda Branco, Patrick Burgess, Brigida Correia, Jacinto Alves Correia, Quiteria da Costa, Adelino Freitas, Cecilio Caminha Freitas, Jacob Martins dos Reis, Galuh Wandita Soedjatmoko dan Julião Mausiri. Section 4 of the Regulation required that the Selection Panel included one person from each of the four political parties, Trabalhista, KOTA, Fretilin and UDT, and one person from pro-autonomy supporters (to be nominated by the Transitional Administrator after consultation with pro-autonomy supporters), the NGO Forum, the Rede (Women's Network), Presidium Joventude (Youth Council), Association of Ex-Political Prisoners (Assepol), Association of Families of Disappeared Persons, a joint nomination from the Catholic Diocese of Dili and the Diocese of Baucau, and one person from the UNTAET Office of Human Rights Affairs. Section 4.3 required the Selection Panel to conduct a broad consultation for the process of selection of Commissioners, including public nominations.

54. On 21 January 2002 the Transitional Administrator, Sérgio Vieira de Mello, swore in as National Commissioners the five men and two women whom the Selection Panel had nominated. Those appointed were Aniceto Guterres Lopes, Father Jovito Rêgo de Jesus Araújo, Maria Olandina Isabel Caeiro Alves, Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves, José Estévão Soares, Reverend Agustinho de Vasconselos and Isabel Amaral Guterres. The Commission held its first official meeting on 4 February 2002, when the Chair and Deputy Chair were elected and particular portfolios were agreed, as below:

1. Chairperson: Aniceto Guterres Lopes
2. Deputy Chairperson: Father Jovito Rêgo de Jesus Araújo
3. Treasurer: Maria Olandina Isabel Caeiro Alves
4. Truth-Seeking portfolio: Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves and José Estévão Soares
5. Community Reconciliation portfolio: Reverend Agustinho de Vasconselos and Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves
6. Reception and Victim Support portfolio: Isabel Amaral Guterres

Profile of National Commissioners

Aniceto Guterres Lopes, Chairperson

Aniceto was born in Tapo, Maliana, Bobonaro District in 1967. He studied law at the Udayana University in Bali. He was a member of Renetil, a student group for national resistance, from 1989. He was Secretary General of Yayasan Etadep (East Timor Agriculture and Development Project), an early Timorese non-governmental organisation, in 1992-96. Aniceto was the co-founder and, from 1997, the Director of the foremost East Timorese human rights foundation, Yayasan HAK. He worked to promote justice in Timor-Leste in the early stages of the UN Transitional Administration, serving on the UNTAET Judicial Transitional Services Commission from January 2000 and was a founder of the Jurists' Association of Timor-Leste in April 2000. He was a member of the National Council of East Timor (October 2000-July 2001). Aniceto received the Ramon Magsaysay Award for emergent Asian leaders on 31 August 2003. After lecturing for several years at University Paz in Dili, he was appointed Dean of the Law Faculty in April 2005. The following month he was appointed by President Xanana Gusmão as a member of the Council of State. In August 2005 he was appointed by President Xanana Gusmão as a member of the Commission of Truth and Friendship (CTF).

Padre Jovito do Rêgo de Jesus Araújo, Deputy Chairperson

Fr Jovito was born in Hatolia in Ermera District in 1963. He has been a Catholic priest serving in Dili and Aileu since 1996. As President of the Catholic Youth Commission of Dili Diocese for three years prior to being appointed to the Commission, he developed strong links with the youth community. He was a member of Renetil from 1987. He has a particular interest in advocating for human rights involving youth issues. In September 2005 Fr Jovito continued his Biblical studies at the Gregorian University in Rome, Italy.

Maria Olandina Isabel Caeiro Alves

Olandina is from Ermera District, where she was born in 1956. She is a businesswoman who has also dedicated many years of work to public service and especially to the prevention of violence against women. She served as a member of the Provincial Parliament in Dili from 1997–1999, and was appointed a member of the Indonesian Commission for the Elimination of Violence Against Women in 1998. Olandina has been the Director of the NGO East Timorese Women Against Violence and for Child Care (ET-Wave) since 1998. Since 1999, Olandina has served in a number of leadership positions: as Chairperson of the Public Service Commission 2000-01; since 2003 as President of the East Timorese Women's Network (Rede Feto Timor-Leste); President of the East Timorese Scout Movement; and President of Habitat for Humanity Timor-Leste. She was a founder of the Peace and Democracy Foundation in 2002 and has served since then as a board member. Olandina manages her own restaurant, "Olandina's", in Dili. In August 2005 Olandina was appointed by President Xanana Gusmão as a member of the Commission of Truth and Friendship (CTF).

José Estévão Soares

José was born in 1955 in Laclubar, Manatuto District. Between October 1975 and May 1976 he was held as a political prisoner by Fretilin in relation to his political affiliation to the Apodeti party. José worked as a civil servant for the Indonesian administration in Timor-Leste. He was a government spokesman and Chief of Public Relations (1993-97), and later worked for the Coordination Board of Investments for East Timor (BKPMD). In 1999 he was a founding member of the pro-autonomy political organisation Forum Persatuan, Demokrasi dan Keadilan (FPDK, Forum for Unity, Democracy and Justice). He also held the position of Secretary of the Indonesian Public Servants' Organisation in East Timor (Korpri) at this time. José left Timor-Leste in September 1999, spending one year as a refugee in Denpasar, Bali (Indonesia) before returning in October 2000. Immediately on his return, he became a member of the National Council of East Timor (October 2000-July 2001). José was a senior policy advisor to the Interim Office that supported establishment of the Commission.

Isabel Amaral Guterres

Isabel was born in Luca, Viqueque District, in 1958. She has worked with a range of organisations in the field of humanitarian assistance, including the Jesuit Refugee Services (JRS) providing support to people returning to Timor-Leste in 1999. Isabel lived in Australia for 15 years where she trained at the Aquinas and Mercy Catholic University in Victoria, Australia, and practiced as a registered nurse. In March 1999, she returned briefly to Timor-Leste to conduct conflict resolution workshops. She returned permanently in November 1999 and continued to use her professional experience in the health sector in her work with Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF) and World Vision. Isabel is a board member with the Timor-Leste Red Cross, and was appointed a member of the Electoral Commission for the village head and council elections in 2004 and 2005.

Reverend Agustinho de Vasconselos

Reverend Agustinho was born in 1970 in Kaiualita, Baguia, Baucau District. Reverend Agustinho completed his study in philosophy of religion at the Indonesian Christian University (UKI) in Tomohon, in 1995. He became a Minister in the Igreja Protestante di Timor-Leste (IPTL, Protestant Church of Timor-Leste) in 1996 and served as Minister of the Maranatha Church in Oecussi District (1996-99) and of the Maranatha Church and Bethany Church in Baucau (1999–2000), and Oecussi District (1996–1999). He was a board member of the Naroman Social Foundation (1999–2000), Head of the Protestant Youth (2000-04), Editorial Secretary of the KeEsaan (Witness) magazine (2001-02), and currently serves as Executive Secretary for the Department of Justice and Peace of the Protestant Church in Timor-Leste. He has participated in workshops and courses on reconciliation in West Timor and in other parts of Indonesia and continues to be active in several local NGOs.

Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves

Jacinto was born in Manatuto District in 1957. In 1979 he worked for the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). Jacinto was a member of the Executive Committee of the Conselho Nacional da Resistência Maubere (National Council of Maubere Resistance, CNRM) that planned the Santa Cruz demonstration. Following the Santa Cruz Massacre in November 1991 he was arrested. He served seven years of his ten-year sentence until his release on 30 December 1998. Jacinto was also a founding member of the NGO Commission for Human Rights in East Timor in1999 and was active in providing emergency assistance to displaced persons in Dare during the post-ballot violence of September 1999. As Coordinator of the Assosiação dos Ex-Prisioneiros Politicos (Assepol) beginning in 1999, Jacinto was one of two Assepol representatives on the Steering Committee that founded the CAVR and from July 2001 to January 2002 a senior policy advisor to the Interim Office that supported the establishment of the Commission. In March 2005, Jacinto was appointed by President Xanana Gusmão to the Superior Council for National Defence and Security, and in August 2005 he was appointed by President Xanana Gusmão as a member of the Commission of Truth and Friendship (CTF).

Principles and mission of the Commission

55. Immediately after their appointment at a swearing-in ceremony on 21 January 2002, the National Commissioners held a five-day retreat at the Carmelite Convent in Maubara, Liquiçá District. The retreat was an important moment in the Commission's development, when Commissioners exchanged views on their understanding of the mandate and developed a set of principles on which the work of the CAVR would be based. They included the following:

1. The Commission would be committed to promoting international, universal human rights standards in Timor-Leste. It would be politically neutral and independent. It would endeavour to reach out to East Timorese of all political backgrounds inside Timor-Leste and in Indonesia. It would seek to investigate objectively human rights violations committed by all parties to the political conflict, including those committed during the internal conflict of 1974-76.
2. It would place victims of human rights violations at the centre of its work and it would create an institution that would be open and responsive to them. As such it would recognise and value their experience. It would also seek practical ways to assist them and would promote their role in nation building.
3. The Commission accepted that reconciliation could not be achieved without justice. It would respect the call for justice made by ordinary East Timorese people, especially victims of human rights violations. The Commission would strive to understand what victims meant by justice and what steps needed to be taken to help restore their sense of dignity and to repair damaged relationships.

4. It accepted that establishing the truth and accountability for past human rights violations was a necessary step towards achieving justice and restoring the dignity of victims.
5. It understood that reconciliation and healing would be difficult and lengthy processes. They would require the continuing active contribution of families, communities and other organisations engaged in similar work. It therefore aimed to create partnerships rather than to be a stand-alone institution. It would strive to work for reconciliation and to contribute to the continuation of such work beyond its own mandate.
6. It acknowledged the importance of ensuring that women played a major role in the reconciliation process. This entailed that women should be recruited to the Commission and that female community members should be able to participate in its activities. The Commission recognised the existence of practical, cultural and economic barriers to women's participation, which it would strive to overcome.
7. The Commission recognised the rich diversity of East Timorese culture as it is lived and expressed in different communities across the country. It would seek to incorporate the strengths represented by traditional values and practices in its work.
8. The Commission would strive to be accessible to East Timorese people across the country and in Indonesia and to the wider international community. This would require working in the remotest regions of the country and in local languages, as well as in English, Portuguese and Indonesian.

Regional Commissioners

56. Regional Commissioners were the representatives of CAVR and the National Commissioners in the districts. Local communities were able to directly relate to Regional Commissioners who were selected to work in their home districts, while at the same time offer support to CAVR teams in neighbouring districts. This assisted significantly in facilitating community participation in the programmes of the Commission.

57. The role of a Regional Commissioner was to lead his or her district team. They introduced the Commission to communities, especially to local leaders. Regional Commissioners chaired the panels in community reconciliation hearings. They also played a leading role in victims' hearings in sub-districts.

58. The Regulation required between 25 and 30 Regional Commissioners to be appointed by the Transitional Administrator, on the advice of the National Commissioners.[3] Following a public nomination process in each district the Transitional Administrator, Sérgio Vieira de Mello, swore in 29 Regional Commissioners on 15 May 2002. Ten of those appointed were women.

59. The following individuals were appointed as Regional Commissioners of the CAVR:

Aileu Region

- Aileu: Francisco Martins, Meta Mendonca
- Manufahi: Jaime da Costa (resigned in 2002); Saturnino Tilman

Covalima Region

- Ainaro: Filomena Barros Pereira, Alarico da Costa Reis
- Covalima: Antonio Alves Fahik, Maria Nunes

Baucau Region

- Baucau: Carolina M E do Rosario, Aleixo Ximenes
- Manatuto: Geraldo Gomes, Ildefonso Pereira
- Lautém: Albino da Silva, Justino Valentin
- Viqueque: Helena H X Gomes, Daniel Sarmento Soares

Bobonaro Region

- Bobonaro: Ana de Fatima Cunha, Francisco dos Reis Magno, Domingas dos Santos
- Ermera: Eduardo de Deus Barreto, Egidio Maia

Dili Region

- Dili: Teresinha Maria Cardoso, Pedro Correia Lebre, Joanico dos Santos
- Liquiçá: Maria Fernanda Mendes, Ana Maria J. dos Santos

Oecussi Region

- Oecussi: Antonio da Costa, José Antonio Ote, Arnold Sunny

Operational issues and challenges

Practical challenges to the Commission's work

60. The operational phase of the Commission's mandate began on 7 April 2002. The Commission was established at a time when the physical, economic and logistical infrastructure in Timor-Leste was still in the early stages of reconstruction. Following the humanitarian emergency of late 1999, UNTAET began to import and install equipment essential for its operations, including a satellite internet link and a mobile phone system in the capital, Dili. However, there were no landline telephone, email or postal links between Dili and the districts, or between the districts, and only very limited mobile telephone services when the Commission was established.

61. Roads were in a very poor condition in many rural areas and were often impassable in the rainy season. However, interaction between the national and district offices required representatives to travel between these offices. There were few commercial enterprises operating. Procurement of basic transport and office equipment was complicated, often requiring the import of goods from overseas. Very basic items, such as office paper or pens, were available only in Dili. The absence of banking facilities outside Dili made the transfer of funds to pay monthly salaries or meet operating expenses a security and logistical challenge.

62. Communication with the enclave of Oecussi was particularly difficult. It was isolated from the rest of Timor-Leste, bordered by sea and the land border with West Timor, Indonesia. Travel by land from Timor-Leste across West Timor to Oecussi was difficult after September 1999, and after the murder of three UNHCR international staff in Atambua, West Timor, in September 2000 it became less tenable. There was no regular ferry service to the enclave at the time of the establishment of the Commission. The only available air link was provided by UNTAET, which gave priority to the transport of UN staff and materials. Access to the island of Ataúro, a sub-district of Dili District, also presented logistical challenges.

63. The Commission took the view that reconciliation, comprehensive and objective truth-seeking and effective victim support could be achieved only if it established a presence across the territory. Ensuring that district teams had adequate logistical support, including transport and communications facilities, was critical to realising this goal. These problems continued to provide serious challenges to the Commission's district programmes throughout the period of operations.

The challenge of language

64. The Constitution of Timor-Leste recognises two official languages, Tetum and Portuguese, and two working languages, Indonesian and English. Many other languages and dialects are used across the country. The need to work in many languages was a major challenge for the Commission and in preparing its Final Report. Despite these challenges the Commission sought the greatest degree of participation by encouraging people to use the language they felt most comfortable speaking.

65. Throughout its operations the Commission used Indonesian, Tetum and English for written documents and Tetum as the main spoken language. Portuguese was not spoken or written by sufficient staff or community members to be used as one of the working languages. Tetum had never been officially taught in state schools before 1999. Most staff did not feel confident writing complex or formal documents in Tetum. Because of the language issue the majority of international staff who assisted with programmes and with the Final Report spoke Tetum or Indonesian or both as well as English.

66. The field activities of the Commission were carried out either in local regional languages or in Tetum. In some rural communities Tetum is not widely understood. Hiring staff locally was necessary for local understanding and acceptance. Statements and research interviews were usually conducted in Tetum or Indonesian, and were written in one of these two languages. The database coding system used Indonesian; statements taken in Tetum were summarised into Indonesian. Community Reconciliation Procedure statements were written in Indonesian or Tetum.

67. National programmes, such as thematic public hearings and workshops, were conducted in Tetum with translation provided in English. Indonesians giving evidence in public hearings spoke Indonesian. Some witnesses testified in regional languages, with interpretation into Tetum. International witnesses generally testified in English or Indonesian. The Serious Crimes Unit used English as its working language, so statements sent to the Office of the General Prosecutor were translated into English for consideration by UN international staff working as prosecutors. In compiling its Final Report the Commission used English, Indonesian, Portuguese and Tetum language materials.

68. The issue of language presented a particularly intense challenge for the process of writing the Final Report. Writers were both East Timorese, writing in Indonesian, and international, writing in English or Indonesian. Draft chapters of the Report were written in English or Indonesian, and then translated from one to the other of these languages so that they would be available to editors in both. English-language edited drafts had to be translated into Indonesian before being presented for approval to the Commissioners. Drafts were discussed by Commissioners in Indonesian, changes incorporated, and approved. The English version was modified accordingly and sent for translation into Portuguese. The Portuguese translation was reviewed by an expert provided by the Portuguese Government, and approved by a sub-committee of Portuguese-speaking National Commissioners.

69. The process of producing the Final Report in three languages was complex and time-consuming.

An integrated community-based approach

70. The regulation had provided a framework for the Commission to conduct specific activities focused on truth seeking and community reconciliation. Another core objective was to assist in restoring the dignity of victims. It was open to the Commission to develop policies and activities which best achieved these mandated goals.

71. The desires of the people expressed during the Steering Committee consultations were reflected in the establishment of the Commission and in the terms laid down in Regulation 10/2001. The needs and wishes of community members were to the highest degree possible to guide the development and implementation of these policies. This principle of community consultation continued to shape the decisions of the Commission during the operational period of its mandate.

72. Consultations on activities to be conducted took place during the start-up phase and in the early period of operations. As a result a number of pilot projects were implemented which provided additional information for the design of effective programmes. The Commission conducted three pilot projects to help determine how the mandate could be implemented most effectively (see box). Each project focused on a different area of activity in which the Commission planned to engage. The Commission continued to be responsive to additional suggestions from the public during the operational period.

Pilot projects on truth-seeking, community reconciliation and victim support

Truth-seeking

The first pilot project focused on truth-seeking work at the community level, in particular the statement-taking process. It was conducted in communities on Ataúro Island, Dili (Dili) from 28 May to 7 June and from 22 to 30 June 2002. Introduction and preparation phases were followed by statement-taking which resulted in 33 statements from victims and witnesses documenting a number of violations including killings, torture, rape and forced displacement.

This pilot project yielded valuable lessons in logistics and methodology. The Commission revised its language policy on statement-taking, to enable the statements to be written in either Tetum or Indonesian. It also decided to record all interviews to ensure accuracy. Statement-takers found that witnesses appreciated hearing a playback of their testimony. This increased their confidence in the reliability of the Commission's documentation of their statement.

Community Profiles

The Commission facilitated a community discussion on the impact of human rights violations in Metinaro in Dili District on 27 September 2003 as part of the second pilot project. Such discussions became known as Community Profile workshops. Two main tools were used to facilitate this discussion. A time-line exercise helped focus discussion on human rights violations experienced by the community between 1974 and 1999. A mapping exercise involved community members being invited to draw a map showing places which were significant as locations of human rights violations. Questions were posed to the community on the collective impact of these human rights violations, particularly as experienced by women and children. These workshops aimed to provide a community perspective on the impact of violations. They were to complement the individual focus of statement-taking and to help in assessing the overall impact of violence on the East Timorese community. This pilot project provided valuable lessons in community workshop facilitation and documentation methods, which informed subsequent staff training.

Community Reconciliation Procedures

The third pilot project was the Commission's first community reconciliation hearing. On 23 August 2002, in Maumeta in Liquiçá District, three former perpetrators ("deponents") participated in a hearing attended by about 150 community members, National Commissioners and the General Prosecutor. Introducing the mandate of the Commission and the legal basis for the hearing, Regional Commissioner Ana Maria J. dos Santos chaired the panel of local leaders. The deponents gave testimony, admitting their wrongdoing to victims and community members. They pledged never again to use violence for political ends. Victims and community members then spoke, offering their own perspectives on the events described by the perpetrators. Traditional elders cleansed the area of violent spirits, and invited the perpetrators and their victims to sit together on the biti boot (literally: large mat, the designated place on which communities have traditionally sought to resolve disputes).

The panel presiding over the hearing deliberated with victims and members of the community, and with the deponents. It was decided to accept the apologies of the perpetrators and not to impose any sanction. The hearing demonstrated the value of bringing together elements of the formal legal process with traditional customary principles. The combination of these two sources gave the procedure full legitimacy in the eyes of community members. The hearing showed the significance of local ownership in conducting the process of reconciliation. It also demonstrated the high level of organisation and logistical support needed if large numbers of community members were going to attend future hearings. The then UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Mary Robinson, and senior officials from UNMISET also attended this event.

73. The Commission believed that progress towards reconciliation depended on taking practical steps to promote healing. The requirements for this healing to take place included seeking out and publishing the historical truth, and acknowledging victims' experiences to assist in their emotional healing. This public sharing provided an opportunity for reconciliation between divided parties at the grassroots level, as well as between local and national leaders. Statement taking, public hearings and community reconciliation meetings established an accurate and accessible record of district events related to the conflict. The activities which were established and implemented in pursuance of these objectives included:

- Taking statements from witnesses and victims of violations across Timor-Leste and in West Timor
- Conducting targeted research interviews with witnesses and victims
- Conducting national public hearings on themes that were central to the mandate and giving them the widest possible publicity by broadcasting them on radio and television
- Implementing community reconciliation procedures
- Providing communities with opportunities to record the history of the conflict in their villages and sub-villages and its specific impact on them
- Conducting victims' hearings at the sub-district level, thereby enabling them to share their experiences, to be acknowledged for their courage and for the suffering they had endured
- Conducting healing workshops at the national office for victims who had been seriously affected by the conflict. They shared experiences and participated in group counselling and other activities designed to promote healing
- Providing urgent reparations to some of the victims who were in greatest need of medical or other immediate assistance
- Producing and broadcasting a weekly radio programme on issues relating to reconciliation
- Designing and promoting an information programme in the refugee camps of West Timor
- Organising visits of National Commissioners to West Timor to meet pro-autonomy leaders
- Establishing an archive and a library of documents and materials relating to human rights violations and the history of the conflict generated by the Commission's work.

The strategic plan

74. The mandate and activities of the Commission had no historical precedent in Timor-Leste. In developing the organising framework of the institution, its policies, activities and administrative support mechanisms, its creators were unable to draw on pre-existing models, institutional memory or staff with comparable experience. Commission staff devised a formal strategic plan to provide a consistent and realisable framework for achieving its goals, which was approved by the National Commissioners in May 2002.

75. It allowed a multidisciplinary team of East Timorese and internationals in the national office and in district teams to maintain a clear sense of direction throughout the operational period. It set out from the beginning how the institution would grow from a small team at the national office to an institution of over 270 personnel based in all 13 districts implementing a variety of programmes. It also provided the framework for cutting back the institution from its peak operational scale to a small team focused first on completing the Final Report and then on closing the Commission. The strategic plan was a reference point for Commissioners and staff as programmes were added or modified, and helped develop trust from donors and other stakeholders that the Commission had a clear road map for fulfilling its mandate.

76. The plan outlined an integrated approach to the Commission's field work in the three core programme areas of truth-seeking, community reconciliation and victim support. It divided the work of the Commission into 13 periods. In each period specified activities were to be undertaken according to strict timelines. The administrative and logistical implications and indicators of achieved goals were also spelt out. Local historical, cultural, political and logistical factors were taken into account in constructing the timing and nature of activities to be undertaken in each sub-district.

77. The district teams carried out broadly the same programme of work in each of the country's 65 sub-districts, concentrating its resources on one sub-district for three months before moving on to the next one. During their first six weeks in a sub-district, the teams held meetings and consultations. This intensive period of working together helped to strengthen relationships of trust and respect between local leaders and representatives of the Commission. The recruitment of district teams from the area demonstrated the Commission's commitment to a cooperative approach with local communities. It provided a deeper understanding of local conditions, and enabled direct communication in local languages and dialects. The truth-seeking, community reconciliation procedures and victim support activities were organised separately and implemented by different teams, but only one educational programme was required in each sub-district and logistical support was shared.

78. Integrated work in the sub-districts followed a standard series of steps. Regional Commissioners and district teams commenced by organising a public meeting to explain the Commission's mandate and its core programme of work. Members of the community were given an opportunity to voice their suggestions and worries. District teams often conducted informal discussions as well as formal meetings. Communities were asked to provide an overview of the major periods and incidents of violence during the 25-year mandate period. The district teams identified specific communities where demand for truth-seeking, statement-taking and community reconciliation work might be high.

79. Victim support and outreach staff facilitated group discussions on the impact of human rights violations and conducted follow-up meetings with individuals who were interested in providing statements on human rights violations or in participating in the community reconciliation process. Truth-seeking statement-takers would begin to take statements on human rights violations. When victims with urgent needs were identified during interviews they were referred to the victim support staff for follow-up. Reconciliation staff also took statements from people who wanted to participate in the Community Reconciliation Procedure. They organised hearings for cases which had been approved by the Office of the General Prosecutor.

80. The final event of the three-month sub-district programme was a Victims' Hearing organised by Regional Commissioners and the district team and attended by a National Commissioner, local administrative, traditional and church leaders and police officers. After the hearing the Regional Commissioners informed the community about the activities conducted in the sub-district during the three-month period. They explained that the information gathered in the sub-district would be kept safely in the CAVR archives and would be used in the Commission's Final Report. These sub-district hearings were thus a way of simultaneously closing the Commission's work in the area, publicly acknowledging the support and contribution of the community during the three-month period, and sharing knowledge about the human rights violations that had occurred in the area.

Core programmes

Truth-seeking

81. The goal of the truth-seeking programme was to document human rights violations committed by all parties to the political conflicts between April 1974 and October 1999. The strategies developed were systematic statement-taking in each sub-district, focused research and the holding of public hearings. Submissions, including documents and other relevant materials, were sought from sources both within Timor-Leste and from abroad.

Statement-taking and data-processing

82. The Commission collected 7,824 statements from the 13 districts and 65 sub-districts of Timor-Leste.[*] Together with a coalition of local non-governmental organisations in West Timor it worked to give East Timorese in West Timor an opportunity also to give statements. Between February and August 2003 the NGO coalition collected on behalf of the Commission a total of 91 statements from East Timorese living in the regions of the towns of Belu, Kefamenanu, Soe and Kupang in West Timor.

83. District statement-takers interviewed subjects or deponents individually, although a family member, friend or victim support team member could also be present. Deponents were usually victims of violations, although they often also provided information about violations against family members or acquaintances, many of whom had died or disappeared. Perpetrators also provided statements, although not surprisingly they were far fewer in number than those given by victims.

* Although the Timor-Leste National Development Plan mentions 67 sub-districts in the nation, at the time of the formation of the CAVR, prior to independence, there were 65 generally agreed upon sub-districts, which formed the basis of the operational strategies of the Commission. Commission teams collected a total of 7,824 statements, though some of these (155 statements) were not entered into the Human Rights Violation Database (HRVD) for quantitative analysis, because they either did not mention violations connected to the Commission's mandate or the violations which they mentioned were not within the Commission's reference period: a total of 7,669 statements were entered into the Commission's HRVD.

84. Deponents gave their statements in narrative form. They were thus able to tell their stories in their own words rather than be guided by a series of questions. This method was chosen because it encouraged deponents to provide a richness of detail and background information about violations and the circumstances surrounding them. This procedure also tended to be less intimidating for those unaccustomed to being questioned in official settings.

85. All recorded statements were gathered in the national office where they were checked and coded by statement readers, and entered into the database. The process of coding involved statement coders reading and identifying the human rights violations in each statement. It was common for a single statement to contain an account of more than one event in which violations were committed, or of several violations committed during one event. The coders would identify each one of these violations, together with important information, such as the identity of the victim and perpetrator, if known, the institutional affiliation of the perpetrator, and the date and place of the event.

86. The details of each violation contained in a statement were then entered into an electronic database, which had been designed to enable analysis of the data. For example, following the entry of all the violations identified by the coding team a search could be made to reveal the total number of violations of a particular type, how many different violations an individual perpetrator had been named as having committed, the number and proportion of violations committed by persons with particular affiliations, groups and fluctuations in the patterns of violations over time and in different regions. Other reliable secondary sources, such as the cases reported by Amnesty International between 1979 and 1999 were coded and entered into the database. The statistical methodology employed and the safeguards implemented to ensure the accuracy of the data are set out in detail in the Annexes to this Report.

87. Statement coders had received extensive training on the legal basis of specific human rights violations which it was their task to identify. This training included the elements of the violations, and how to determine whether a particular set of circumstances fulfilled the definitions. For example, the statement coders were trained on how to determine if a violation had been committed which legally amounted to torture rather than, say, the criminal offence of assault or inhuman or degrading treatment. Statement coders were also trained to determine whether a set of circumstances constituted rape or sexual slavery.

88. The coders were periodically tested for accuracy and consistency. During these tests coders were asked to read and code a hypothetical case to see whether they were identifying violations accurately, and that there was a high degree of agreement among the team about how violations should be identified. The database categories were consolidated into a smaller number of violation types early in the process to help achieve greater consistency between coders. The statistical analysis of statements allowed the Commission to comply in a professional and objective manner with several of the objectives set out in the Regulation. These included:

- Clarification of the "antecedents, circumstances, factors, context, motives and perspectives" which led to large-scale violations [Section 13.1(a)(ii)]
- Establishing the "nature" of human rights violations (that is, the types of violations which were committed) [Section 13.1(a)(i)]
- Collecting and comparing reports of violations over time and across districts to determine the extent of human rights violations (that is, the number of violations which were committed) [Section 13.1(a)(i)]
- Gathering information on patterns of violations to be able to assess whether there had been "a systematic pattern of abuse" [Section 13.1(a)(i)]
- Establishing statistical profiles of "persons, authorities, institutions, and organisations involved in human rights violations" [Section 13.1(a)(iii)]
- Collating and comparing data on patterns of violations and perpetrators involved to provide evidence of whether "human rights violations were the result of deliberate planning, policy or authorisation on the part of specific parties to the conflict [Section 13.1(a)(iv)].

Research

89. The statement-taking programme allowed any individual who wished to do so to approach the Commission and to report information relating to the political conflict. The expectation was that by throwing such a wide information net across the districts, a significant amount of information about all aspects of the 25 years of political conflict would become available. Analysis would then allow a clear picture of what had occurred to emerge. This broad, untargeted approach meant that information was received about all aspects of the political conflict, including events or circumstances that had not been previously widely known.

90. The Commission also identified ten major themes of particular importance during the mandate as topics for detailed research. These themes were:

- Famine and forced displacement
- Structure, policies and practices of the Indonesian military and police
- Structure, policies and practices of Fretilin and Falintil
- Detention and torture
- Killings and enforced disappearances
- Children
- Women
- The internal political conflict of 1974-76

- The role of international actors in the self-determination process
- Massacres.

91. The Research Unit conducted over 1,000 interviews focusing on these themes. Subjects included individuals who had played significant roles in events and who had held leadership positions at various stages of the conflict, as well as perpetrators and victims. Commissioners and staff conducted these interviews in Dili, in the districts, in Portugal and in Indonesia. The research themes broadly corresponded with those of the national public hearings, and researchers also played an important role in identifying and contacting victims and witnesses to testify during these hearings. In mid-2003 the Commission began a series of interviews with key national figures, known as VIP interviews. In addition to personal testimony of direct experience, these interviews enabled the Commission to investigate the background and details of organisations and events. The Commission conducted 15 VIP interviews, in Timor-Leste and Indonesia, including West Timor (see Annexes to this Report).

92. A considerable amount of primary and secondary documentation relating to the research themes was also gathered. Information relating to the conflict had been forcefully suppressed during the military occupation, with the result that many individuals had hidden documents or had smuggled them out of the country. The Commission issued a general request for any information related to its mandate. This resulted in the forwarding of documents, video and audiotapes, photographs and film records to the Commission. These materials were used in writing the Final Report and will become part of the permanent archives.

Public hearings

93. Public hearings were a major feature of the Commission's programme. They contributed to the fulfilment of various aspects of the mandate, including truth-seeking, promoting reconciliation and restoring the dignity of victims. The Commission conducted public hearings involving participants from the grassroots level to the national leadership, as well as key international figures and expert witnesses. Witnesses and victims of human rights violations gave testimony about their experiences at sub-district victims' hearings, at national public hearings and at village-level community reconciliation hearings.

Victims' Hearings

94. A victims' hearing was held as the final activity in each sub-district programme, following the strategic plan. Victims of human rights violations were given the opportunity to share their experiences, in their own words and language, in an open public forum. This helped to inform members of their wider community of the suffering they had endured. It assisted in restoring some of the dignity they had lost by encouraging acknowledgment of their struggle and contribution. Victims' hearings also provided an opportunity for all community members to hear about events during the conflict which had previously remained hidden to them. This fostered a feeling of solidarity among victims and their communities. It helped to clarify the local history of the conflict. It also reinforced the determination that these painful events of the past should never be repeated.

National Public Hearings

95. The Commission conducted eight national public hearings. These were broadcast on television in Dili and on radio nationally, and were covered extensively by the local press. Representatives of the international media were also present at a number of hearings.

96. The value of these thematic hearings was in presenting the views of a variety of witnesses and experts to the entire population. The national hearings were presided over by the seven National Commissioners. Although truth-seeking was one of the goals, it was also recognised that the programme should be organised in a manner which would assist national reconciliation and promote the rights of victims.

97. The Commissioners questioned witnesses following their testimonies, but the time available for clarification in this way was limited, and no determinations or findings were made at the conclusion of hearings. The Commission recognised that statement-taking and in-depth interviews were a more reliable way to collect information than public hearings. Nevertheless, the hearings did often add important information to data in the Commission's possession.

98. The public hearings provided a rare opportunity for the general population to learn about important aspects of the political conflict. The hearings also gave witnesses the chance to express their own views and recount their experiences in an official setting. The Commission took great care to ensure that evidence relating to different issues and parties to the conflict was presented in a balanced manner. Witness selection was undertaken on the principle of balance, bringing together testimonies from men and women, from different districts of Timor-Leste, about different periods of the conflict and relating to different perpetrator groups.

99. The hearings gave victims of the violence of the Indonesian security forces their first opportunity to speak openly about these events without fear of reprisal. In keeping with the objective of providing a balanced picture, the largest number of witnesses and victims gave evidence of violations by members of the Indonesian occupation forces. The statement-taking and research programmes had shown that perpetrators attached to the Indonesian occupation forces had committed the vast majority of violations during the mandate period.

100. Victims were given the opportunity to speak openly of their experiences, including by examining painful issues, the "old wounds" that had previously been hidden. The Commission believed that the risks of reopening the wounds were far outweighed by the value of publicly expressing the truth. To uncover events that had long been kept in obscurity, thereby encouraging national debate, would help to resolve outstanding differences and residual anger. The hearings were an extremely emotional experience for those who testified and for members of the public who watched and listened to their evidence.

101. The first national public hearing was held on 11–12 November 2002, to coincide with the anniversary of the Santa Cruz massacre of 1991. It was known as a Victims' Hearing, titled "Hear Our Voices" (Rona Ami Nia Lian). Unlike later national hearings, it did not focus on a particular theme or type of violation, but rather brought together victims from all districts of Timor-Leste who testified about violations which had occurred throughout the 25-year mandate period. The seven national hearings which followed this were organised according to themes.

102. Thematic public hearings were held according to the following schedule:

- 17–18 February 2003 - Political Imprisonment, Detention and Torture
- 28–29 April 2003 - Women and Conflict
- 28–29 July 2003 - Forced Displacement and Famine
- 19–21 November 2003 - Massacres
- 15–18 December 2003 - Internal Political Conflict, 1974–1976
- 15–18 March 2004 - Self-Determination and the International Community
- 29–30 March 2004 - Children and the Conflict.

Death toll research

103. In June 2003 the Commission launched a statistical inquiry into the number of East Timorese people who died as a direct result of the conflict, whether as a result of deprivation, in armed combat, in crossfire or as victims of unlawful killing or enforced disappearance. Although several attempts have been made in the past to estimate the number of fatalities from these causes, this was the first opportunity for any organisation to undertake objective research into the death toll during the conflict.

104. This project was designed and implemented in cooperation with The Human Rights Data Analysis Group (HRDAG), an international organisation which specialises in human rights statistical analysis and has done work in this area with several other truth commissions.* The analysis was based on three sets of independent data:

- Information contained in the approximately 8,000 statements which had been collected, coded and entered into the Commission's data base
- A Graveyard Census based on a count of gravestones in a total of 492 graveyards across Timor-Leste

* The HRDAG conducted statistical analysis with, among others, truth commissions in South Africa, Guatemala and Peru. See Acknowledgements section in the Annexes to this Report for more details.

- A Retrospective Mortality Survey, which was designed by the Human Rights Data Analysis Group. An intensive survey of members of 1,322 randomly selected households in 121 hamlets across the territory was undertaken. The survey included a questionnaire designed to yield information related to the death toll, such as the date, circumstances and causes of deaths of family members during the period of the conflict.

105. The application of statistical techniques to these disparate sets of data, each of which had its own strengths and weaknesses, was able to yield an estimate of the death toll that was scientifically reliable.

106. The methodology and results of this statistical analysis of the death toll project, as well as statistical analysis of the non-fatal violations investigated by the Commission, is found in the Annexes of this Report.

Submissions

107. The Commission received a number of written submissions from Timor-Leste and foreign-based individuals and organisations. These included original documents, reports and analyses that threw light on events that had taken place during the mandate period, as well as photos and film footage from that period (see below, "Sources of Information", paragraphs 110-129).

108. The United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights provided a significant submission to the Commission, in the form of a consultant's report into the human rights violations which had occurred in Timor-Leste during 1999. The author, Professor Geoffrey Robinson of the University of California, Los Angeles, had access to confidential materials held by the UNTAET and UNMISET (United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor) missions and by the Serious Crimes Investigations Unit. The report had not been made public by the Office of the High Commissioner of Human Rights (OHCHR) at the time of preparing the Commission's Report. A copy is included in the Annexes of this Report.

109. A full list of submissions received by the Commission appears in the Annexes of this Report.

Sources of Information

110. The Commission issued a call to all persons and organisations in possession of relevant records to forward these materials to the CAVR. These records could then be considered in the formulation of an accurate account of what had transpired. Consequently, it received materials and submissions from civil society and human rights activists previously involved in the international solidarity movement of Timor-Leste, from Portugal, Indonesia, Australia, the Asian region, the USA and Europe. International organisations, such as Catholic Relief Services of the USA and the Australian Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA) also provided valuable material and in some cases submissions based on their long involvement with Timor-Leste during the mandate period.

111. Materials were also gratefully received from East Timorese victims and witnesses, national and local leaders, and non-government organisations, in particular Yayasan HAK (Asosiasi HAK) and Fokupers. The collection of the late Professor Herb Feith was donated to the Commission's archive after his death in 2003.

112. A number of Indonesians testified to CAVR National Public Hearings, and provided written submissions. Members of Komnas Perempuan (the Indonesian National Commission on Violence against Women) testified at the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict. A group of NGOs from West Timor (Indonesia), The West Timor Humanitarian Team, made a submission to the Commission at this hearing. The Indonesian human rights NGO Elsam (Lembaga Advokasi Masyarakat, Public Policy Studies and Advocacy) made two submissions to the CAVR: one providing detailed research into Indonesian military structures and operations, and the other testimonies from Indonesian military officers and their families titled "Story from the Behind the Lines". In addition, the well-known Indonesian historian Dr Asvi Warman Adam of LIPI (Lembaga Ilmu Pengetahuan Indonesia, Indonesian Academy of Science) gave a paper titled "East Timorese History in the New Indonesia" to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community. A number of other human rights workers and activists also testified at hearings, and their testimonies have been used in relevant chapters of this Report.

113. The Commission was less successful in gathering material from governments, from which it received a mixed response. The Commission advised most of the governments and institutions referred to in Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination of its inquiry and sought their input. The Commission wrote to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the President of Indonesia, the Prime Ministers of Portugal and Australia, and the Governments of Japan, the United States of America, France, the People's Republic of China, and the United Kingdom. No official replies were received but the Commission received considerable assistance from a number of the representatives of these governments based in Timor-Leste. The Commission also made inquiries in Moscow and the Vatican regarding access to documentation.

114. The Commission also wrote to individuals from past administrations, including President Jimmy Carter of the United States, Australian ex-ministers and officials including the former Australian Foreign Minister Gareth Evans and the former ambassador to Indonesia Richard Woolcott, and a number of former Indonesian officials. Responses were mixed, and some materials were received as a result of these inquiries.

115. In addition to writing to President Megawati Sukarnoputri seeking information, without response, the Commission also invited the following former Indonesian leaders and officials to testify at the National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community: President B.J. Habibie; Dr Mochtar Kusumaatmadja, former Foreign Minister in the Soeharto Government; Dr Dewi Fortuna Anwar, foreign affairs advisor to President B.J. Habibie; Dr Frans Seda, former Soeharto Cabinet Minister; Mr Francisco Lopes da Cruz, former Ambassador-at-Large on Timor-Leste for President Soeharto; Dr Yusuf Wanandi, Centre for Strategic and International Studies. None was able to testify in person, but Dr Wanandi provided a statement which was delivered on his behalf.

116. A general problem faced by both the Commission and governments was the challenge of finding records dating back some 30 years. In most cases, a comprehensive search remains to be done and in cases where freedom of information legislation does not exist or access is heavily restricted, this may not succeed.

117. However, the decision of some governments to release at least some of their confidential records on Timor-Leste greatly assisted the Commission to fulfil its responsibility to establish the truth. The documentation released by the Australian Government for the period 1974–1976 was particularly valuable as was the two-volume Relatórios da Descolonização de Timor on 1974–1975 made available by the Government of Portugal. The Commission also benefited from declassified records released to The National Security Archive by the US Government and Ford and Carter Presidential Libraries, four volumes of declassified material from the Government of New Zealand, and documents released by the United Kingdom and provided to the Commission by Hugh Dowson. The Commission also drew extensively on the records of informative debates and hearings on Timor held by the UN, the US Congress and the Australian Parliament and the collection of basic documents on the Timor question edited by Heike Krieger and published by the University of Cambridge. These were enriched by written and oral testimony given to the Commission by former diplomats who served in the UN and the US and Australian Governments.

Community Reconciliation

118. All aspects of the Commission's work were designed and implemented as part of a coordinated and integrated approach aimed at promoting reconciliation.

119. Continuing disagreement about and denial of historical fact prevents different sides to a conflict from finding a common basis to begin the painful, difficult and slow process of reconciliation. The truth-seeking activities were aimed at providing a history of events which was based on objective information rather than rumour or propaganda. Such a solidly founded version of the truth could in turn open the way to the admission of responsibility, acceptance and forgiveness.

120. The victim support aspect of the Commission's work also laid the ground for reconciliation by aiming to redefine the relationship between victims, perpetrators and their communities. Restoration of the dignity that had been taken from victims reduced residual anger and enabled victims to move toward acceptance and forgiveness of those who had harmed them.

121. The main programme in support of the Commission's mandate of reconciliation was the Community Reconciliation Procedures (CRP) as set out in Part IV of the Regulation. The objectives of the programme were to offer a legal resolution of "less serious" crimes committed during the conflict, help perpetrators reintegrate into their communities, and rebuild the relationship between victims, perpetrators and their communities.

122. There was no precedent for the CRP, in Timor-Leste or anywhere else. It drew heavily on traditional justice practices as well as the principles of arbitration and mediation, and aspects of both criminal and civil law. The views expressed during the community consultations conducted by the Steering Committee strongly influenced the design of the programme. This was evident in the decision to include such elements as local spiritual practices, confession and forgiveness, and participation by local leaders. Victims were also offered the opportunity to address perpetrators directly, while perpetrators were obliged to admit and apologise to victims and their community. Finally the design established a direct formal relationship with the Office of the General Prosecutor and the District Courts of Timor-Leste.

123. The Regulation provided that perpetrators of "less serious" crimes and "harmful acts" related to the political conflict were permitted to approach the Commission and provide a statement setting out a detailed account of their actions. Acts such as burning houses, looting and beatings were appropriate cases for CRP, but "serious crimes" such as murder, rape and torture were excluded. After helping the deponent to complete his or her statement, the Commission forwarded it to the Office of the General Prosecutor which would decide whether the case could proceed by CRP rather than by prosecution.

124. A panel of between three and five local leaders chaired by a Regional Commissioner was then chosen to preside over a hearing in the deponent's community. The format was flexible enough to allow the employment of spiritual and other traditional practices that were specific to the community. The perpetrator was required to admit his wrongs in public and victims were able directly to question and to inform the perpetrators of the impact of their acts. Community members were able to ask questions about and seek clarification of the perpetrator's statement. These exchanges were often heated, but never violent. The hearings were defining community events commonly running from morning until late into the night. Some hearings that involved a large number of perpetrators were held over several days.

125. When all relevant issues had been explored the panel brokered an agreement, according to which the perpetrator undertook to complete certain "acts of reconciliation" in order for him to be reaccepted into his community. These acts could include community service and the donation of money, animals or other objects to the victims. The agreement was registered with the appropriate District Court, and on completing all the required acts the perpetrator received immunity from criminal and civil liability for the transgressions admitted to.

126. The CRP programme began slowly, in part due to uncertainty at the local level concerning the nature of the process. As news of the first hearings spread, demand increased. Ultimately 1,379 perpetrators successfully completed CRP hearings, well in excess of the initial target of 1,000. Because all cases in a given village were usually heard at the same time, the actual number of hearings totalled 216. An estimated 40,000 community members attended and participated in hearings.

127. Assessments conducted by the Commission indicate that the CRP programme made a significant contribution towards reconciliation. Perpetrators, victims and other participants stated that the hearings had provided an opportunity for the entire community to explore and to clarify local events related to the political conflict and their effect on the population. The CRP helped perpetrators be reaccepted. It enabled them to begin to work again and to interact with their neighbours rather than to hide, in fear and anticipation of hostility and possible violence.

128. Victims who responded to the survey said that the CRP helped to dissipate their anger by allowing them to express it directly to those who had harmed them. It allowed them to rise above the act and to forgive, provided there was a real expression of remorse and regret by the perpetrator. By providing a solution to individual cases that were likely to provoke payback violence in local settings, the CRP contributed significantly to maintaining peace and stability at a time when both were at their most fragile. Vol. IV, Part 9: Community Reconciliation provides a more complete description and analysis of the Community Reconciliation Procedures.

129. The Commission's weekly radio programme included coverage of many community reconciliation hearings, as well as discussion of issues arising from the national hearings and other matters relating to reconciliation.

Reception and victim support

130. The Reception (Acolhimento) and Victim Support Division was dedicated to the principle that victims of human rights violations must be at the centre of the Commission's work. It sought to develop and implement practical ways of supporting victims and increasing recognition of and respect for them.

131. The Commission implemented victim support programmes that were both public and private in nature. Public hearings and information programmes helped to repair relationships and promote understanding between victims and their communities by permitting victims to tell of their experiences. Healing workshops were more private, focusing on the personal needs of victims by working with groups of people who had experienced similar trauma.

132. Reception and Victim Support staff undertook the following activities:

- Monitoring the well-being of recent returnees to Timor-Leste. This included the identification and follow-up of cases through problem solving in liaison with refugee agencies, such as UNHCR
- Organising public meetings to inform communities of the Commission's work and to seek responses and recommendations
- Supporting victims of human rights violations who participated in the Commission's programmes whether giving statements, testifying at public hearings, attending community reconciliation processes or participating in healing workshops

- Facilitating group discussions and recording local histories focusing on the impact of human rights violations on individual communities
- Helping victims with urgent needs by assessing their cases, referring them to appropriate agencies and providing modest financial assistance, as part of the Commission's Urgent Reparations scheme.

133. Part 10 of the Report (Vol. IV) provides a more extensive account of the work of this Division.

Final Report

134. Section 13.1(c) of the Regulation provides for the "preparing [of] a comprehensive report that sets out its activities and findings, based on factual and objective information and evidence collected or received by it or placed at its disposal". Section 21 specifically details the duties of the Commission in fulfilling this function. Section 21.1 provides that the Commission "shall present a final report on the basis of the information it has gathered to the President". Section 21.2 provides that the Commission shall "summarise the findings of the Commission and make recommendations concerning the reforms and other measures, whether legal, political, administrative or otherwise, which could be taken to achieve the objectives of the Commission, prevent the repetition of human rights violations and respond to the needs of victims of human rights violations". Section 21.3 states that the report produced by the Commission shall be made immediately available to the public and shall be published in the Official Gazette, and Section 21.4 provides that the President "shall consider all recommendations made by the Commission in its final report with a view to their implementation".

135. The preparation and dissemination of a comprehensive final report was a core objective of the Commission's mandate. Planning for it began shortly after the initial National Commissioners' retreat at Maubara in January 2002. During a subsequent retreat in Dare in May 2003, the structure of the Final Report was debated and provisional approval was given.

136. The completion of the Final Report was a very demanding task for all involved. The pressures to complete the work to deadlines took a heavy toll on many of the contributors to it. The completed work is a lasting tribute to their dedication and commitment.

137. The mandate of the Commission was very broad, including a wide range of human rights violations committed over a 25-and-a-half-year period: from 25 April 1974 to 25 October 1999, as stipulated in Regulation No. 10/2001. The process of writing involved a cooperative effort across the divisions. Research teams produced thematic summaries based on interviews and secondary sources. The rich store of information in the human rights violations database yielded information to determine patterns, to identify a number of reported violations that involved particular perpetrators, to determine what institutions the perpetrators belonged to and to provide profiles of victims. It gave writers a practical means of identifying and accessing original statements relevant to the subjects on which they were writing. The death-toll survey produced information concerning the degree and manner of deaths that had occurred in the mandate period.

138. The complications of producing the Final Report in English, Indonesian and Portuguese, with popular versions in Tetum, were acute. These complications arose from the Commission policy to produce the Final Report in these languages. Because writing teams and editors worked in both English and Indonesian it was necessary to maintain current copies of draft parts and chapters in both languages. Writing teams, usually consisting of two East Timorese and one international staff member, were given responsibility for producing draft parts and chapters. These drafts were then translated and forwarded to the editorial team. Edited versions were translated again and forwarded to the National Commissioners for consideration. The parts and chapters were discussed, substantive political differences debated and changes recommended (see above, paragraphs 64-69, the challenge of languages).

139. The editorial team was then responsible for making the recommended changes. A smaller working group, which consisted of Commissioners and staff, worked on technical issues, such as whether the translation faithfully corresponded to the approved text. They also resolved inconsistencies within or between parts and chapters. A fact-checking team was responsible for checking the accuracy of factual information in the each part. A technical edit, during which the text was checked for consistency with house style and cross-references were inserted, was then undertaken across all language versions.

140. The Regulation stipulated that all decisions of the Commission should be taken by consensus or, if a consensus could not be achieved, by a simple majority of the seven National Commissioners. Achieving agreement on highly sensitive issues between seven individuals who had been chosen for their diversity of backgrounds was not straightforward. Demanding consensus on the use of particular terms could have been a block to the progress of the Report, particularly as a word or term which accurately reflects the will of the Commission in one language is often not able to be translated exactly into one of the other two languages in which the Report is published.

141. The Commission considered its mandate to deliver the Final Report in at least one of the official languages of the country. Given the lack of educational background in Tetum, Portuguese was chosen as this language. The translation of the Final Report into Portuguese required further time, and a process of review and verification by National Commissioners. The Portuguese Government assisted with a Portuguese language expert, Paula Pinto, to ensure the standard of this translation. The Commission hopes that the Final Report can be translated into the second official language, Tetum, when resources and technical capacity become available.

142. In addition to the detailed official Final Report, the Commission produced a range of more accessible related material. A two-and-a-half-hour documentary film version was produced in Tetum, with English, Portuguese and Indonesian sub-titles, as well as a Tetum radio version, a photographic exhibition and a series of books on the thematic national public hearings of the Commission in Tetum, Indonesian and English. A photographic exhibition of survivors of violations promoted their dignity and aspirations, together with the publication of a photographic book of survivors expressing their hopes for the future. The Commission believes that the report and the associated research material in the CAVR Archive provides a rich source of resources which can become the basis for the production of accessible educational materials about human rights, reconciliation and East Timorese history.

143. The Commission established a Final Report campaign team, who from mid-2004 travelled to districts sharing information about the process of writing the Final Report. The team showed videos and conducted discussion groups in all districts, as a forerunner to the dissemination of the Final Report.

Archives

144. The Commission was mandated to organise its archives and records for future reference, and to give consideration to the question of whether materials should be made available to the public of Timor-Leste, the measures necessary to provide protection for confidential information, and the measures necessary to provide for the continuing safety of individuals who had testified to the Commission (Section 43.2 of the Regulation). In April 2004, when the national office was restructured, an Archive and Comarca Division was established to order and protect the Commission's archives and library. It was also given responsibility for planning for the future use of the Comarca as a memorial centre for victims, human rights and reconciliation.

145. The Archives and Comarca team comprised four staff members assisted by volunteer librarians, with an international specialist archivist as advisor. In the absence in Timor-Leste of a trained cadre of information managers specialised in operating an archive, the Division's first priority was capacity building.

146. The archive comprises all the documentation from the truth-seeking, community reconciliation, and acolhimento and victim support programmes, as well as administrative records relating to financial, legal and strategic management. It includes 7,740 audio recordings of truth-seeking statements, over 1,000 research interviews, more than 1,541 community reconciliation statements, many hundreds of hours of digital and audio recordings of the public hearings and many thousands of research reports and related materials. An extensive collection of photographs and video recordings, as well as the full audio archive of the Commission's weekly radio programme are also stored in the archive.

147. The library comprises over 2,500 titles, mainly books and articles about Timor-Leste, Indonesia, human rights and peace studies in Tetum, Portuguese, Indonesian, English and other languages.

148. The archive is a founding member of the Library and Information Association of Timor-Leste (ABITL), whose inaugural meeting was held at the Comarca. The Government has agreed that the Commission's archive should continue to be kept at the Comarca. It has close ties with the state-run National Archives of Timor-Leste.

149. It is planned that a permanent exhibition of materials relating to the Commission's Final Report will be housed in the Comarca Archive and Documentation Centre.

The Commission's obligations to participants in its core programmes

Confidentiality

150. All individual statements were given confidentially. Each person who gave a statement was asked whether they agreed that material from the statement could be used in the Commission's Final Report. They were also asked if the people of Timor-Leste could have access to their statement after the Commission's mandate period ended. Witnesses could choose to provide information on a confidential basis; or anonymously, removing identifiers of themselves and of other persons mentioned in their statements; or in accordance with other preferences they might state concerning the statements' use. Statement givers were informed that the access that Commission staff would have to information contained in their statements would be limited, and that the Commission would take measures to ensure the security of records. The Regulation imposed a duty on all Commissioners, staff and other persons acting on behalf of the Commission to "preserve and assist" the confidentiality of all confidential matters. Those found to have disclosed confidential information in contravention of the duties specified in the Regulation could incur criminal sanctions.[4]

The rights of deponents in CRPs

151. It was the policy of the Commission to ensure that all applicants for Community Reconciliation Procedures understood the implications of supplying their statement. Accordingly, they were informed that the statement would be forwarded to the Office of the General Prosecutor and could be used in future legal proceedings. Where possible, this information was given to deponents in their local language.

Witness protection

152. All practicable steps were taken to ensure the safety of witnesses. There was a police presence at all public hearings and appropriate action was taken in cases where witnesses could have been under threat. Witnesses were informed of their right to provide information on a confidential basis. Police assistance could be requested when needed, but every witness was informed of the practical limits of this protection to enable them to decide whether or not to provide evidence either publicly or in writing. The Commission also told witnesses that in reality the CAVR could not provide them with physical protection in their homes.

National and regional offices and staffing

National Office

153. In the early days of the Commission the National Office in Dili was temporarily housed in the Teachers' Training Building in Balide, the historic former UNAMET compound of 1999 which became the CNRT headquarters in 2000. At this time negotiations had begun with the Government of Timor-Leste and international donors to rehabilitate the former Comarca prison in Balide for use as the home of the Commission. Transforming this former gaol for political prisoners into the headquarters of the Commission had clear symbolic overtones, as well as serving the practical purpose of providing the Commission with a high-profile, publicly-accessible base.

From prison to memorial centre for victims, human rights and reconciliation

The Comarca in Balide, Dili, was built in the early 1960s by the Portuguese colonial administration. In late 1975 Fretilin used the Comarca to detain prisoners from the UDT and Apodeti political parties. It was used as an Indonesian prison continuously between January 1976 until 12 September 1999. It was damaged in the violence during September 1999.

The idea of rehabilitating the Comarca was first proposed by the Association of Ex-Political Prisoners (Assepol) in 2000 and was taken up by those responsible for establishing the Commission. The Steering Committee agreed that preservation of the former prison would make a positive contribution to national healing by serving as both a memorial to the denial of human rights and a symbol of the possibility of transformation. The idea became feasible in January 2002 when during a visit to Tokyo by Xanana Gusmão, the Japanese Prime Minister pledged a grant of USD1m to the Commission. Approximately half of this grant was to be used for capital works, including the rehabilitation of the Comarca.

In March 2002 the Minister of Justice, Dr Ana Pessoa Pinto, met the Commissioners and confirmed the allocation of the Comarca to the Commission. A Memorandum of Understanding was signed in April 2002 between the Commission and Assepol. It affirmed that the heritage value of the building would be preserved and that Assepol would be consulted throughout the physical rehabilitation. The plan for the building included its use as the Commission's national office. It was also to house an archive containing documents and other materials relating to the history of human rights violations in Timor-Leste history which would be made accessible to the public after the end of the Commission's mandate.

Design work on the rehabilitation of the prison began in July 2002. Careful documentation of the use of the prison building was undertaken to preserve knowledge of its former use, including those sites of serious human rights violations. Sixty-five graffiti made by East Timorese prisoners, Indonesian prison personnel or militia members were preserved.

The company selected after public tender to carry out the construction work, P.T. Rosario, was headed by a former Comarca prisoner, Julio Alfaro. Reconstruction began in September 2002. A large traditional meeting house was built in the former exercise courtyard, for use in the Commission's national public hearings and other events. Gardens were planted by Maria José Franco Pereira, who was detained as a four-year old at the Comarca with her mother in 1976. A traditional cleansing ceremony, symbolising the removal of harmful spirits associated with the prison's history of abuse, was conducted on completion of construction work.

The National Office of the CAVR was inaugurated in a ceremony by President Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão and attended by Bishop Basilio do Nascimento. President Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão gave a speech. The ceremony was followed by the National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment in Timor-Leste. Some of those who testified had been detained in the Comarca.

During the operational period of the Commission, the Comarca was used to host public hearings, healing workshops and other activities. Singing, traditional dancing, theatre, prayer and other individual and group activities brought the spirit of healing to a place which had been a centre of torture for many years. Fr Domingos (Maubere) Soares, one of the members of the Steering Committee which helped to establish the Commission, expressed the hope that a commission in Timor-Leste would show the East Timorese people that flowers could grow in a prison. His hopes have been realised in this transformation.

154. The first Executive Director, João de Jesus Baptista, was appointed in May 2002. After his resignation at the completion of a three-month probationary period the Commission appointed Lucio dos Santos to replace him.

155. Six Divisions were formed to implement and support the programmes which had been decided upon by the National Commissioners:

- Truth-Seeking
- Reception (Acolhimento) and Victim Support
- Community Reconciliation
- Programme Support
- Administration and Logistics
- Finance

156. Late in 2003 the Commission developed its Archive and Comarca team (see box on Comarca) to preserve the Commission's archives and to prepare plans for the conversion of the National Office into a human rights and reconciliation documentation and education centre.

157. The primary focus of each division was to support the district teams. Some divisions also organised major events from the National Office. National public hearings were organised by the Truth-Seeking Division, assisted by Victim Support, and the media and logistics sections of the Programme Support Division. The Urgent Reparations Programme was organised by the National Office's Acolhimento and Victim Support Division, as were the healing workshops. Research and data-management were also run by the Truth-Seeking Division from the National Office.

158. At the peak of its operations the National Office had 124 personnel.

The CAVR as a learning institution

159. Commissioners and senior staff recognised that the Commission had embarked on an enterprise significantly different from anything in almost all staff members' previous experience. It was vital therefore that staff training strategies should be dynamic, absorbing the lessons learned as the programme was implemented. The initial designs of the truth-seeking, victim support and community reconciliation programmes in the districts had been largely theoretical in that they had not had the benefit of extensive field trials. The practical experience gained by district teams as they put the programmes into practice was a valuable resource in moulding the programmes to fit local requirements. Three-monthly reviews were carried out to ensure that the lessons staff had learned in the field could be passed on to management and appropriate adjustments made to operating methods. Approximately halfway through the operational period an extensive institutional review was undertaken. It included an opportunity for all staff to provide ideas and suggestions relevant to the programmes.

Institutional development and capacity building

160. Institutional development and capacity building therefore accounted for a large part of the Commission's work in its first year. The Commission had to meet a demanding schedule of recruitment, programme development, training, monitoring and evaluation and trouble-shooting. Developing and implementing recruitment policies and procedures for 124 national and 154 district team positions was a major challenge, the more so as by the time the Commission was established, all government departments, UN and other international agencies and non-government organisations had already recruited staff and become operational.

161. By July 2002, the Commission had recruited and trained 220 personnel, including Regional Commissioners and District Team members. Approximately 1,900 people applied for 141 positions in the Regional Offices and District Teams.

162. Because there was no institutional precedent for the work of the Commission, the planning and implementation of staff training was a major challenge. It was conducted from July to September 2002. Benefiting from lessons learned in the pilot projects completed in August 2002, the Commission modified its training programmes (see box on pilot projects, above, par. 72). As with Regional Commissioners, district staff were trained in two large groups. Following initial training, staff would return to their districts for six weeks before the final segment of the course. This allowed for the phased development of understanding of the Commission's programmes. District teams could also think about what they had learned in training, test those practices and principles in the field and suggest alterations to operational plans.

163. A small team consisting of an international advisor and three East Timorese staff coordinated institutional development. The first year was difficult and demanding, requiring long work hours, resourcefulness and faith that the Commission could develop institutionally in ways that would allow it to achieve its goals. Funding was initially inadequate, as donors were willing to offer the level of support needed only once the value of the Commission's activities became apparent. In this environment it took a "leap of faith" by a few donors, mostly notably the British Government, to provide the vitally important "seed funding".

164. The Human Rights Unit of the UNTAET mission provided personnel on a short-term basis to assist the start-up of the Commission and assisted in many other ways. It helped the institution to take its first steps and progress to the point where a temporary office was established and core personnel recruited, and the organisation could move forward on its own feet.

165. Throughout the life of the Commission the Institutional Development and Capacity Building team worked with the broader Senior Management Team in identifying where further international short and long-term support was needed, and in recruiting and training qualified personnel.

Gender and staffing

166. The Commission followed a policy of encouraging work practices that would maximise the opportunities for women to contribute as staff members of the organisation and as participants in its programmes. It formally recognised the strong barriers which prevent women from participating equally in the work-place or political activities in Timor-Leste, as well as the duty of all institutions to try to redress this situation. The Commission's mandate therefore included specific requirements for gender representation. The Regulation required a minimum of 30% of National and Regional Commissioners be women. Two of the seven National Commissioners and ten of the 29 Regional Commissioners were women. Internal recruitment staff policies provided that a minimum of 30% of positions must be filled by women.

167. For programme objectives, it was important that women and men equally filled certain types of position. Examples included statement takers and victim support staff, each of whom worked directly with victims and witnesses in communities. The recruitment of a higher than normal proportion of female programme workers in these areas was aimed at ensuring that nationally women had equal access to all aspects of the Commission's work. This policy was designed to acknowledge women's experiences during the conflict. Certain sections of the Final Report, particularly the part on sexual violations, focus closely on the experience of women.

168. Despite this commitment the Commission did not succeed in reaching its recruitment targets for women. Only two of the eight members of the Senior Management Team were women. Just one of the six Regional Coordinators was a woman and all 13 District Team Coordinators were men. Cultural norms that were particularly strong in regional and rural Timor-Leste made it difficult to recruit the desired proportion of women into district teams. The need for staff members to live away from home during the three-month period of field activities in sub-districts other than their own posed particular difficulties for women who had family responsibilities. Cultural objections to them spending such an extended time away from their homes added to these difficulties.

Regional offices and district teams

169. The Commission established six Regional Offices in the district capitals of Baucau, Suai, Maliana, Aileu, Dili and Oecussi. All but one of these offices were established in buildings rehabilitated by the Commission using funding from the Japanese Government, and were transferred to the Government of Timor-Leste for local use after the Commission completed its work. Each Regional Office supported the work of two District Teams, except Oecussi which, because of its geographical isolation, was a Regional Office covering only one district, and Baucau which supported the work of four District Teams.

170. Each District Team consisted of two to three Regional Commissioners, one Coordinator, four Truth-Seeking Statement-Takers (two women and two men), two Victim Support/Community Outreach staff (one woman and one man), and two Community Reconciliation Officers* (generally one woman and one man), with support from one Logistics Officer.

171. The Regional Offices were staffed by a Regional Coordinator, and a Finance Officer and a Logistics Officer. The main function of the Regional Offices was to act as a link between the National Office and the District Teams. As communications and banking infrastructure was limited or non-existent during the height of the Commission's operations, the Regional Coordinator was given the responsibility for ensuring that there was regular communication with the National Office. Contact occurred at least once a week between the District Teams and the National Office. Due to lack of communications, this usually required travel between the offices.

172. At the height of the Commission's work, there were 278 staff members, including Regional Commissioners, of whom 154 worked in regional or district teams.

Gender in practice in district work

173. The UNTAET Regulation required that the Commission integrate gender considerations into all aspects of its work. It specifically provided that at least one of the CRP panel members at each hearing be a woman. Without this provision it is likely that many communities would not have chosen a woman to sit on the panel, but would have followed the more traditional practice of having male community leaders preside over such events. An interesting result of the gender provisions of the Regulation was that the women chosen to participate on the panels often played a leading role and were usually fully accepted by community members in that capacity.

174. The Commission took some initiatives to encourage women's participation in its field activities. Following an internal policy requirement, there were women in all district statement-taking teams. Women were also encouraged to provide statements and thereby contribute to the Commission's truth-seeking objective. At the close of field operations only 21.4% of deponents who provided statements were women. Many men came forward to give statements about human rights violations against female family members, but many women testified about what had happened to their fathers, brothers, husbands or sons during the conflict.

175. District teams experienced difficulties engaging women in the statement-taking process for a variety of social, cultural and economic reasons. In some communities, women did not participate in the Commission's community education meetings as they were expected to stay at home. Fewer women than men were organised in formal organisations with access to information about the Commission's work. Some women were uncertain or shy about coming forward to give testimony, or felt that their experiences had already been recounted by male members of their family.

* Initially District Teams had just one Community Reconciliation Officer, who worked with a Regional Commissioner in this area of work. In late 2003 a second Community Reconciliation Officer was appointed to each team.

176. A team of six women was formed to conduct a six-month research project on the experiences of women during the conflict.* The team held interviews with more than 200 deponents, mostly women survivors of human rights violations. They were also responsible for identifying and supporting the victims who provided testimony at the National Public Hearing on Women in Conflict in April 2003. This public hearing was very important in raising further awareness among women about the need to participate in the Commission's work.

177. Healing workshops specifically for women victims were held to ensure that their specific circumstances were given due attention and to encourage confidence and open group discussions. Some Community Profile workshops involved only women. These focused on exploring and recording women's experiences and the impact of the conflict as perceived by female community members.

178. Women staff working in district teams often adopted informal ways of meeting rural women, visiting homes and gathering places to talk, hearing their concerns and together finding ways that would help them participate in the Commission's activities. Women district team members were themselves often leading members of the communities and role models for many rural women.

179. The principle of gender equality at times sat uncomfortably with other principles of the Commission such as respecting and working with community traditions and leaders, as traditional leadership and dispute resolution models in Timor-Leste tend to be male-dominated. Women Regional Commissioners, women community members sitting on panels at Community Reconciliation Hearings, and women staff members living away from home and working in rural communities provided a challenge to some of these values.

180. The Commission was careful not to implement these strategies in communities in a confrontational way. Male as well as female team members took a leading role in discussions with traditional leaders, thereby achieving at least a measure of successful gender balance.

181. The Commission would especially like to commend the work of its women district team members, who faced a number of extra challenges but who were critical in ensuring that the Commission was accessible to rural women across Timor-Leste.

The role of international staff in the Commission

182. It was decided that all international staff in the Commission, apart from the Deputy Director, would be advisors rather than line managers. International staff members were to implement capacity building within the divisions to which they were assigned by assisting and advising East Timorese counterparts to the extent possible, rather than taking charge of the work themselves. In addition to possessing the necessary technical and professional skills, international staff were expected to have an understanding of Timor-Leste and cross-cultural working skills, including Tetum or Indonesian language skills. Short-term consultants were brought in where specialised skills were needed.

* The team consisted of members of the women's human rights NGOs Fokupers and ET-Wave, East Timorese Young Women's Association (Grupo Feto Foinsae Timor-Leste, GFFTL) and staff members from the Commission. The work benefited significantly from the knowledge, skills and contacts of these organisations.

Management and administration

Management structure

183. The day-to-day management of the Commission's executive body was coordinated by the Executive Director, Lucio dos Santos, with support from the Deputy Director and Programme Manager, Galuh Wandita. Together with the six Coordinators of the divisions of the national office executive, they formed the Senior Management Team. The team members were Hugo Maria Fernandes (Truth-Seeking), Jaimito Candido da Costa (Community Reconciliation), Rosário de Araújo (Acolhimento and Victim Support), José Caetano Guterres (Programme Support), Ligia da Costa (Finance) and Francisco João Amaral (Administration). In April 2003, in a process of restructuring to fully Timorese management, Galuh Wandita ceased her role as Deputy Director but continued in her role as Programme Manager.

184. The small Regional Offices operated as bridges between the National Office and District Teams. They were led by a Regional Coordinator. District teams were led by the two or three Regional Commissioners in each team, who were responsible for the day-to-day management of staff and the programme together with the District Team Coordinator.

185. In December 2002, a three-day workshop, in which Regional Commissioners, Regional Coordinators, District Team Coordinators, senior management and National Commissioners took part, resulted in a revision of the strategic plan and clarification of the division of tasks. In May 2003 the Commission facilitated an institution-wide review, to look at the performance of every District Team, Regional Office and division of the Commission. The review produced 92 specific recommendations on ways to improve performance, coordination, outreach, information sharing, and gender equality in all aspects of the Commission's work.

Administration

186. The Administration Division was responsible for providing all administrative support to the work of the Commission. This included logistics and procurement, human resources, and information and technology support.

187. The Coordinator of the Administration Division worked closely with the Executive Director to ensure all aspects of the Commission's work were supported.

Meeting the logistical demands of the large and dispersed operations of the Commission, with minimal supporting infrastructure, was a constant challenge.

Finance

188. The Finance Division was responsible for the management of all Commission's financial matters. These included producing monthly financial reports, monitoring management of the Regional Offices, providing all the required information for audits conducted by the Government's Office of the Inspector General, and donor reporting.

189. The Commission was responsible for raising its own funds. National Commissioners, senior staff and international advisors worked hard to secure resources for the operation of the Commission, and to maintain information exchange and reporting with all donors. Maintaining close relationships with donors was essential for the success of Commission's work. It was necessary to appeal to donors for additional funding, especially as programmes expanded in response to community wishes and the Commission required extensions of its operational period to complete this Report. The fact that donors had been kept informed, that financial reporting was comprehensive and up-to-date, and that transparent information on all aspects of the Commission's operations was available was significant in securing the required additional funding.

190. Three independent financial audits of the Commission were completed by the Office of the Inspector General. The Inspector General provided a positive report on the financial management of the Commission in these audits. Some specific recommendations were made with a view to improving the management of certain administrative areas. The Commission implemented these recommendations. The first audit covered the period 1 May 2002 to 31 December 2002. The second audit covered the period from 1 January to 31 December 2003 and the third audit covered the period from 1 January 2004 to 31 December 2004. In addition to the audits by the Office of the Inspector General, a special audit related to the funding by the Government of Japan was conducted in 2005 by the international auditors Merit Partners from Australia, producing a report of prudent financial management. A final audit will be conducted after the closing of the Commission on 31 October 2005.

Downsizing and restructuring

191. On the completion of the Commission's fieldwork, the executive undertook a downsizing and restructuring process. The strategic plan had been based on a 3-month operational period in each sub-district. As the number of sub-districts per district varied, some district teams completed their work before others. This enabled them to move to assist programmes in areas where there was still work to be done. District teams and regional offices closed when all field activities were finished, at the end of March 2004. At this time the Commission reduced its staff by two-thirds, with all remaining personnel concentrated at the National Office.

192. District team staff members who had completed their work in March 2004 were transferred to Comarca to help enter into the database the large amount of information which had been collected. Further downsizing took place when data-processing was completed in July 2004.

193. The nature of the Commission's work changed radically with the end of field operations. Different management structures were required as activities focused on writing and on producing the Final Report, and on preparation of the archives. Following a two-month transition, the National Office was reorganised. The new structure comprised six divisions: the Final Report (Editorial, Writing and Production including translation), Reparations, Recommendations and Campaign, Comarca and Archives, Administration, and Finance. As the process of writing, editing, translation and production of the Final Report progressed, teams were no longer required, or needed significantly less staff. A phased downsizing process continued to the end of the mandate period.

Building relationships for the future

Direct relationships

194. The primary focus of the work of the Commission was at the grassroots level, with East Timorese communities across the country, especially with victims of human rights violations and their families. It was essential that community leaders, institutions and organisations understood the Commission and its work. The Commission coordinated with village heads and other traditional leaders, women's and youth organisations, priests, nuns and lay leaders of the Catholic Church and other religious organisations, police, local government officials and other civil society representatives. In some communities victims and survivors support groups had been formed, such as the Rate Laek group in Liquiçá. These were important partners of the Commission.

195. National institutions including the Presidency, Parliament and the Cabinet were kept informed of the Commission's work. Representatives of the Commission appeared before both the full National Parliament and relevant committees when three extensions of the mandate were under discussion. On these occasions members of Parliament asked to be updated about the progress of the Commission's work. In each instance, the general view of the National Parliament was that the Commission's task was of such importance to the nation that it should be given the time it needed to complete it.

196. President Xanana Gusmão supported the work of the Commission in a host of practical ways, including by requesting funding for the Commission from donors, by appearing at the inauguration of the Commission's headquarters at the Comarca, and by backing the sensitive National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76. The Prime Minister Dr Mari Alkatiri and his Cabinet, especially Dr José

Ramos-Horta, Senior Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, were also very supportive of the Commission. The Commission had cross-party support in the Parliament. The Minister for the Administration of State, Dr Ana Pessoa Pinto, was a member of the Advisory Council of the Commission as was Dr José Ramos-Horta.

197. The Catholic Church holds a position of esteem and influence in the everyday lives of most East Timorese, at least 90% of whom are Catholic. The church provided significant moral support for the work of the Commission. Individual priests encouraged their parishioners to assist and to participate in Commission activities. Lay Catholic leaders were frequently chosen to be Panel members for CRP hearings. The Protestant Church also supported the programmes of the Commission. One of the National Commissioners, Reverend Agustinho de Vasconselos is a Protestant minister, while the Deputy Chair, Father Jovito Rêgo de Jesus Araújo is a Catholic priest.

198. The Commission also coordinated with national NGOs whose works focused on justice and human rights issues. Many of the National and Regional Commissioners had backgrounds as human rights activists and were members of human rights organisations. The mere existence of the Commission clearly had an impact on other human rights organisations. There was some ambivalence among these organisations about the sudden emergence on the human rights scene of this relative colossus which enjoyed official backing and was able to attract a sizeable share of available funding. Understandably this was particularly true of NGOs, which had been operating during the incomparably more difficult period of the Indonesian occupation when their members ran considerable personal risk for that commitment and which will continue to work on reconciliation and human rights issues after the Commission has been dissolved.

199. Two national human rights organisations, Asosiasaun HAK (Human Rights Association) and Fokupers worked with the Commission in a range of ways, including on research projects, giving support to victims of violations and in documenting the work of the Commission national thematic hearings. The Justice System Monitoring Program (JSMP) and the NGO Lao Hamutuk (Walk Together) took a critical look at some aspects of the Commission's work.

200. The Commission sought ideas from various sectors in developing the recommendations contained in this Report. It held a series of six stakeholder workshops at the national level, which sought the opinions of prominent individuals and organisations active in fields relevant to the Commission's mandate. The topics covered were reconciliation, health, education, security, children and justice. The Commission also actively sought input from members of the Organising Committee of the Second National Women's Congress (July 2004). It wished to draw on the ideas and concerns of women delegates from across the country for the formulation of its recommendations.

Memorandum of Understanding with the Office of the Prosecutor General

On 4 June 2002 the chair of the Commission, Aniceto Guterres Lopes, and Timor-Leste's Prosecutor General Longuinhos Monteiro signed a Memorandum of Understanding on the working relationship between the Commission and Timor-Leste's Office of the General Prosecutor, whose responsibilities included the prosecution of serious crimes. The value of having such a memorandum was most evident during the operational phase of the Commission's truth-seeking and community reconciliation work.

The memorandum detailed the circumstances in which information might be exchanged between the Commission and the Office of the General Prosecutor. It noted that the Commission and the Prosecutor's office would protect the independence and integrity of both institutions. It would safeguard the confidentiality of information received by either institution. While the Commission and the Office of the General Prosecutor were independent institutions with different mandates, it acknowledged that "both organisations are committed to working together to the greatest extent possible within their mandates to assist the process of justice for past human rights abuses in Timor-Leste".

Media and information campaigns

201. The Commission's mass media strategy centred on the production of a weekly radio programme, Dalan ba Dame (The Road to Peace). Radio is the most far-reaching and effective media in Timor-Leste. Radio networks provide almost complete national coverage, and several community-based stations in the districts broadcast in local languages. Radio networks also broadcast to many East Timorese living in refugee camps and communities in West Timor. Television coverage is confined to Dili and to a lesser extent the country's second city, Baucau. The majority of the rural population are unable to read and write, which limits the impact of written materials.

202. By producing its own radio programme the Commission ensured that communities across the territory could gain a sense of the national dimension of what was taking place in their local area. National audiences were brought into contact with grassroots activities. The weekly one-hour radio programme was broadcast by the national broadcaster Radio Timor-Leste and the Catholic Church national station Radio Timor Kmanek. It broadcast its first programme on 4 December 2002 and broadcast every week thereafter throughout the life of the Commission. In October 2004 it was reduced to a 30-minute programme. Community radio stations in some districts also carried it. The Commission worked with smaller stations such as Radio Falintil and Radio Rakambia to broadcast community reconciliation hearings live in some districts. Dalan ba Dame was produced in Tetum, though coverage of local hearings and other events was often in regional languages. In addition community radio stations frequently discussed the work of the Commission in the local language.

203. The Commission developed a partnership with the national television broadcaster Television Timor-Leste (TVTL). TVTL and Radio Timor-Leste both provided full coverage of the seven national thematic hearings. The Commission also produced two videos on its work for dissemination to communities. District teams carried televisions and generators to rural communities to show the videos, which proved a very effective way of bringing people together to share information. They were also shown in West Timor as part of the Commission's outreach programme. Videos were produced using Tetum as the narrative language, with Indonesian and English language voiceover editions.

204. A number of print publications were produced with the objective of explaining the Commission's mandate and work to communities. These publications were produced in Tetum, Indonesian and English. An update bulletin, reporting on the progress of the Commission's work in Portuguese, Indonesian and English, was published every two months. Its primary audience were institutional and organisational stakeholders.

205. This team also organised media releases and press conferences. Articles and written materials were published in Cidadaun and Talitakum, respected East Timorese journals with a readership in both Timor-Leste and West Timor. Popular items to promote the Commission included posters, booklets, brochures and T-shirts.

The international community

206. The Commission recognised that its work was of both national and international importance. Consequently, it encouraged links with the international human rights community. It was perhaps of greatest interest in Timor-Leste's own region, none of the countries of which had established their own truth and reconciliation commissions.

207. As the Commission's activities developed it received a steady stream of inquiries seeking information about its work, particularly about the innovative CRP programme. National Commissioners and senior staff attended international conferences, seminars and workshops on human rights, post-conflict reconciliation and transitional justice to share the experience of the Commission and to learn from others. In addition, the Commission hosted dozens of international delegations who visited to learn from the CAVR experience. These included senior officials and representatives of organisations from countries experiencing conflict or seeking to deal with its legacy, including: Burma, Afghanistan, Bougainville, Fiji, Philippines/Mindanao, Indonesia/Aceh and West Papua, and Sri Lanka.

208. The UN gave significant support to the Commission. The Human Rights Unit of UNTAET and UNMISET, the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights and the UNDP, both in Timor-Leste and from the New York headquarters, provided technical support and advice. The UNDP in Timor-Leste managed seven permanent international advisors provided to the Commission through funding from bilateral donors. The UNTAET and later UNMISET Human Rights Unit provided two permanent senior advisors to the Commission. UNOTIL (United Nations Office in East Timor), the successor mission to UNMISET, provided one permanent senior advisor. The then UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Mary Robinson, met the National Commissioners in Dili on 23 April 2002 and attended the first community reconciliation hearing, in Liquiçá District. Ms Robinson became a member of the Advisory Council of the Commission.

209. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and the International Organisation of Migration (IOM) worked to assist returnees from West Timor as well as helping the Commission with logistics, such as by providing flights to the enclave of Oecussi. The Commission also worked closely with some international non-government organisations with offices in Timor-Leste. A number of NGOs made submissions, or provided the results of independent studies on aspects of the Commission's work. These included Catholic Relief Services and The Asia Foundation.

210. The International Center for Transitional Justice (ICTJ) in New York advised and supported the Commission from its inception to the completion of its work; it was an invaluable partner (see par. 212, Table 1 on Early milestones of the Commission). The Human Rights Data Analysis Group (HRDAG) provided technical assistance. They established and maintained the human rights database. They also conducted the death toll research and analysed the data collected. Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations (Vol. I), and the Annexe on Statistical Methodology (Vol. V), include a full account of the work of the HRDAG.

211. The Commission developed a website that gave it outreach to the international community. Documents, regular bulletins on the Commission's work and photos of events were put up on the website, which was frequently visited by members of the international media, human rights organisations, students, academics and donor agencies. This Report is published on the website (http://www.cavr-timorleste.org).

Community outreach and public information

212. The Public Information and Community Outreach Unit aimed to increase awareness among stakeholders and the public about the Commission and its work, through building direct relationships, public education and media campaigns. This involved developing mechanisms to provide information to all levels of the community, from national decision-makers and institutions and non-governmental organisations to district administrations and local community leaders and groups, as well as the wider public. It also reached a significant international audience, including UN agencies inside and outside Timor-Leste, donor and prospective donor countries and organisations, and the wider international human rights and justice community.

Table 1: Milestones of the Commission
June 2000 Workshop on transitional justice for human rights campaigners.
August 2000 CNRT Congress calls for the establishment of a truth and reconciliation commission for Timor-Leste. A Steering Committee for the establishment of the Commission is set-up.
December 2000 Nationwide consultations occur and the drafting of a regulation by members of the Steering Committee.
December 2000 Policy approval from Cabinet of the Transitional Administration.
April 2001 Cabinet of the Transitional Administration approves draft regulation.
13 June 2001 National Council approves draft regulation.
13 July 2001 Promulgation of UNTAET Regulation 10/2001 by the Transitional Administrator; establishment of an Interim Office.
23–25 August 2001 Consultation with pro-autonomy leaders by the Steering Committee, with support from the Interim Office, in Kupang and Bali.
15–16 September 2001 Second consultation meeting with pro-autonomy leaders in Bali.

20 September 2001 Selection Panel established to select National Commissioners and gather nominations for Regional Commissioners.
October 2001 Visits by the Selection Panel to 13 districts and to West Timor on nominations for National and Regional Commissioners.
21 January 2002 Swearing-in of seven National Commissioners
22–26 January 2002 Retreat of National Commissioners in Maubara; development of core principles of the Commission.
4 February 2002 First National Commissioners meeting. Election of Chairperson and Deputy Chairperson of the Commission and appointment of portfolios.
7 February 2002 Appointment of National Commissioners gazetted in the Government Gazette, formally commencing the two-month establishment period of the Commission.
April–May 2002 Recruitment of senior executive staff; recognition of the Commission in Timor-Leste's Constitution.
15 May 2002 Swearing-in of 29 Regional Commissioners by the Transitional Administrator.
June–July 2002 Development of policy documents, including the Strategic Plan, Operations Manual and Finance Manual; policies on confidentiality, children, women and rights of deponents; development of basic tools such as statement-taking forms for truth-seeking and community-reconciliation.

4 June 2002 Signing of MoU with the General Prosecutor.
June–August 2002 Recruitment and training of national, regional and district staff; start of the Commission's programme in 13 districts, including sub-district consultations; establishment of 6 divisions in the National Office; establishment of 6 Regional Offices overseeing the work of 13 District Teams.
23 August 2002 First Community Reconciliation Hearing in Maumeta Village, Liquiçá.
September 2002 Review and programme planning in Dare; Urgent Reparations Programme begins; statement-taking begins.
11–12 November 2002 First National Public Hearing, a victim's hearing titled "Hear Our Voices".
December 2002 Evaluation of first 3 monthly operational period.
January 2003 Revision of Strategic Plan and coordination mechanisms.
17–18 February 2003 Inauguration of Balide Comarca as the Commission national headquarters; Second National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment; West Timor outreach programme begins.
21 April 2003 First Sub-district Victim's Hearing, in Ainaro Vila, Ainaro.
28–29 April 2003 Third National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict.

June 2003 Institutional review of Commission and its progress; start of Graveyard Census.

June 2003
Institutional review of Commission and its progress; start of Graveyard Census.

23–27 June 2003
First Healing Workshop.

28–29 July 2003
Fourth National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine.

9–14 August 2003
Second Healing Workshop.

September 2003
Retrospective Mortality Survey begins.

19–21 November 2003
Fifth National Public Hearing on Massacres.

2–6 December 2003
Third Healing Workshop.

15–18 December 2003
Sixth National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76.

December 2003
Evaluation workshop and prioritising of remaining field work.

27–30 January 2004
Fourth Healing Workshop (for women).

9–13 February 2004
Fifth Healing Workshop.

9–11 March 2004
Sixth Healing Workshop.

15–18 March 2004
Seventh National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community.

March 2004
Closing of district operations; district closing meeting and children's drawing competition in 13 districts; national evaluation workshop; restructuring and downsizing of the executive body.

29–30 March 2004
Eighth National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict; exhibition of children's drawing competition at the National Office.

April 2004
Establishment of Writing and Editorial Teams.

October 2004
National Parliament approves extension of Commission mandate to 39 months of operation, to deliver its Final Report and close by 7 July 2005.

July 2005
The National Parliament extends Commission mandate to 29 July and provides that the President shall present the Final Report to the National Parliament in Portuguese two months later.

29 July 2005
The National Parliament extends Commission mandate to 31 October.

31 October 2005
Delivery of the Final Report to the President of Timor-Leste.

End notes

1. Regulation 10/2001 Section 13.1(a)(iv).
2. Outcomes of the CNRT National Congress, 21–30 August 2000; United to Liberate, United to Construct.
3. Regulation 10/2001 Section 11.1.
4. Regulation 10/2001 Sections 39 and 44.

Chega!

Part 2.

The Mandate of the Commission

Part 2. The Mandate of the Commission

The Mandate of the Commission

2.

Introduction

1. UNTAET Regulation 10/2001 established the Commission as an independent authority with a requirement that it "not be subject to the control or direction" of any cabinet minister or other government official.* The establishment of the Commission was recognised in the Constitution of the RDTL, Article 162. It was granted an initial operational period of 24 months. Three later amendments by the National Parliament to the Regulation extended this period first to 30 months, then to 39 months, and finally an extension to 31 October 2005, constituting just over 42 months.†

2. Under its mandate the Commission's tasks included the following:

   1. Inquiring into and establishing the truth regarding human rights violations which took place in the context of the political conflicts in Timor-Leste between 25 April 1974 and 25 October 1999.[1] The inquiries were to include:
      - the context, causes, antecedents, motives and perspectives which led to the violations;[2]
      - whether they were part of a systematic pattern of abuse;[3]
      - the identity of persons, authorities, institutions and organisations involved in them;[4]

* Regulation 10/2001 on the Establishment of a Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation in East Timor, Section 2.2.

† Although Section 2.4 of the Regulation allowed for a six-month extension without recourse to parliamentary consideration, both extensions were sanctioned by formal amendments to the Regulation. Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste National Parliament Law No. 7/2003, Section 1 extended the mandate to 30 months. Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste National Parliament Law No. 13/2004, Article 1 extended the mandate to 7 July 2005. Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste National Parliament Law No. 11/2005, Article 1 extended the mandate to 31 October 2005.

- whether they were the result of deliberate planning, policy or authorisation on the part of the state, political groups, militia groups, liberation movements or other groups or individuals;[5]
- the role of both internal and external factors;[6]
- accountability, "political or otherwise", for the violations.[7]

2. Preparing a "comprehensive report which sets out the Commission's activities and findings, based on factual and objective information and evidence collected or received by it or placed at its disposal".[8]
3. Formulating recommendations concerning reforms and initiatives designed to prevent the recurrence of human rights violations[9] and to respond to the needs of victims. The recommendations could also include proposals for legal, administrative and other measures which could contribute to the achievement of the objectives of the Commission;[10]
4. Recommending prosecutions, where appropriate, to the Office of the General Prosecutor.[11]
5. Promoting reconciliation.[12]
6. Implementing Community Reconciliation Procedures (CRPs), whose object was to support the reception and reintegration of individuals who had caused harm to their communities through the commission of minor criminal offences and other harmful acts.[13]
7. Assisting in restoring the dignity of victims.[14]
8. Promoting human rights.[15]

3. The Commission was given specific powers relating to its function of Truth-seeking and Community Reconciliation, which were set out in detail in the Regulation. In addition it was granted the broad power to conduct any activities that were consistent with its mandate.[16] It was thus empowered to implement a variety of programmes designed to promote reconciliation, restore the dignity of victims, and promote human rights.

Temporal boundaries

4. The mandate of the Commission, relating both to inquiring into the truth regarding human rights violations and also to "harmful acts" which might be dealt with by CRP, covered the 25-and-a-half-year period between 25 April 1974 and 25 October 1999. These two dates mark the beginning and end of the most intense period of the political conflict in Timor-Leste. The fall of the Marcello Caetano regime in Portugal in April 1974 gave the Portuguese colonial territories, including Timor-Leste, the opportunity to exercise their right to self-determination. In Timor-Leste the opening up of politics precipitated a struggle for political power between the main political parties, and led to the Indonesian invasion and occupation. After the descent into violence that followed the Popular Consultation of 30 August 1999, in which the overwhelming majority of East Timorese voted for independence, the UN Security Council passed Resolution 1272, on 25 October 1999, which established UNTAET as the transitional administration with powers to exercise full administrative authority over the territory of Timor-Leste as it prepared it for independence.*

Issues of particular relevance

5. The Regulation obliged the Commission to "take into particular consideration" three major aspects of the political conflict in undertaking its truth-seeking functions:

1. The events before, during and after the Popular Consultation of 30 August 1999;
2. The events and experiences of all parties immediately preceding, during and after the entry of Indonesia into Timor-Leste on 7 December 1975; and
3. The effect of the policies and practices of Indonesia and its forces present in Timor-Leste between 7 December 1975 and 25 October 1999.[17]

The meaning of "related to the political conflict"

6. According to the Regulation, "political conflicts" means "armed and non-armed struggles and discord related to the sovereignty and political status of Timor-Leste, the organisation or governance of Timor-Leste, the illegal Indonesian invasion and occupation of Timor-Leste, or any combination of the foregoing".[18]

Human rights violations

7. National laws are designed to ensure that individual citizens comply with the duties imposed on them by the state. The duties to promote and respect human rights, however, are based on international agreements and obligations, and therefore apply only to sovereign states. Accordingly, individuals may commit crimes against national, and in some cases international criminal law, but the traditional view of human rights violations is that they can be committed only by states and their agents.[19]

8. This traditional definition presents difficulty in constructing a suitable mandate for the work of truth and reconciliation commissions. Often the context of massive violations, which is the object of a commission's inquiries or investigations, involves not only state actors, such as military and police officers and government officials, but also members of opposition groups, political parties, militias, corporations and other individuals. Any account of "the truth" relating to a conflict will be incomplete if it does not include the actions of all of these parties.

* Security Council Resolution 1272 (1999) established UNTAET on 25 October 1999, granting a mandate to "exercise all legislative and executive authority, including the administration of justice".

9. One example of the manner in which this problem has been overcome is that of the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which interpreted its empowering legislation as including "modern developments within international human rights law",[20] which recognised the equal capacity of state or non-state actors to commit human rights violations.

10. The Regulation which established the Commission contained an unusually broad definition of the term "human rights violations", which included violations of human rights standards, international humanitarian law, and "criminal acts" which violated international or domestic law. The definition covered violations committed by both state and non-state actors.

The Commission's definition of "human rights violations"

11. According to Section 1(c) of the Regulation "human rights violations" means:

a. Violations of international human rights standards

b. Violations of international humanitarian law, and

c. Criminal acts; committed within the context of the political conflicts in Timor-Leste between 25 April 1974 and 25 October 1999.[21]

12. The use of the term "violations of human rights standards" rather than "violations of human rights law" and inclusion of two broad categories of laws which are not limited to violations by state actors demonstrate clearly that the Commission's mandate was not intended to be limited to examination of the conduct of state actors alone.

13. The Commission has therefore interpreted its mandate to include any act committed within the context of the political conflicts, whether by individuals, members of a group, institutions or states, which is in violation of at least one of the relevant international human rights standards, a provision of international humanitarian law, or was a crime against domestic or international law.

14. The mandate therefore includes examination of violations committed by representatives and agents of the Indonesian government (including members of its security forces, the Hansip or other civilian defence forces and militia groups), the Portuguese government and its agents, members of Fretilin, Falintil and other pro-independence groups, and members of UDT, Apodeti, KOTA, Trabalhista and other political parties, members of other sovereign states, institutions, groups and individuals who played a role in the context of the political conflicts.

15. According to the definition in the Regulation the Commission must inquire into:

- Violations of a broad range of "human rights standards". These include, but are not limited to the fundamental rights and freedoms referred to in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (and its Protocols), the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Racial Discrimination, the Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women, the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment, and the International Convention on the Rights of the Child.*

- Violations of international humanitarian law, which regulates conduct in situations of armed conflict. According to the Regulation, the standards to be considered in this regard include the major relevant international conventions, including the Geneva Conventions, and "the laws and customs of war".[22]
- Violations of Portuguese or Indonesian criminal law, and international criminal law, such as crimes against humanity, war crimes and genocide.

Priority given to particular categories of violation

16. It was, of course, impossible for the Commission to inquire into and report on all violations of human rights that occurred during the mandate period. The Commission has chosen to examine the most serious violations of fundamental rights relevant to the mandate. In summary form, the categories of human rights standards on which the Commission focused its attention were the following:

1. The right to self determination
2. The right to life (unlawful killings and disappearances)
3. The range of rights relevant to displacement, resettlement and famine (the right to adequate food, freedom from hunger, water and adequate housing, freedom of movement, freedom to choose a residence)
4. The right not to be arbitrarily detained, and to satisfactory conditions of imprisonment
5. The right not to be subjected to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment
6. The right to a fair trial
7. The right to freedom of opinion, expression and association
8. Rights violated by acts of rape and other forms of sexual assault/harassment (in particular the prohibition on torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment)
9. Rights violated by the practice of sexual slavery (including the prohibition on torture, the right to enter marriage through full and free consent, and the prohibition on slavery)

* Section 1(e) of the Regulation states that "International human rights standards" means the internationally recognised human rights standards outlined under Section 2 of UNTAET Regulation No. 1/1999. The relevant section of UNTAET Regulation 1/1999 refers to these international human rights instruments.

10. Children's rights (a range of rights, including entitlement to "special care")
11. Social and economic rights
12. Reproductive rights (right to found a family and to decide freely on the number and spacing of children).

17. In determining whether particular acts constituted human rights violations, and whether individuals or institutions were responsible and/or accountable for such violations the Commission has used definitions of the relevant violations, which are drawn from international law. Annexe A (Relevant legal principles) at the end of this part sets out the definitions in detail.

18. The Annexe includes definitions of the human rights standards listed above, and a brief summary of the relevant provisions of international humanitarian law, international criminal law, and Portuguese and Indonesian law.

Inquiry-related powers

19. The Regulation provided the Commission with substantial powers to make inquiries. These included the power to:

- Order individuals to attend hearings and answer questions,
- Order the production of specified documents or objects relevant to inquiries,
- Request an Investigating Judge of the District court to issue a search warrant which would enable police to search particular premises,
- Request information from government authorities both within and outside Timor-Leste,
- Gather information and hold meetings in other countries,
- Hold public and private hearings and protect the identity of certain witnesses in these hearings.[23]

20. The Regulation created criminal offences of knowingly misleading the Commission, failing to comply with an order of the Commission without reasonable excuse, hindering the Commission in its activities, attempting to influence the Commission improperly, threatening or intimidating witnesses, and disclosing confidential information.[24]

Liability of Commissioners and staff

21. In accordance with principles that generally apply to similar commissions, those working on behalf of the Commission, including the Commissioners, were granted immunity from legal liability "in respect of any finding, point of view or recommendation made in good faith in the course of the Commission's work or reflected in the Commission's final report."[25]

Confidential information provided to the Commission

22. Information could be provided on a confidential basis if considered necessary. The Commission could not be compelled to release information to anybody or individual, including government officials, with the sole exception of specific requests made by the Office of the General Prosecutor (OGP).[27]

23. The right of the OGP to access all information provided to the Commission meant that no guarantee could be given to potential witnesses that their evidence and confessions would not be used against them in future legal proceedings.

24. This provision may have prevented the Commission from gaining some important information that would have assisted its truth-seeking function. However the Commission also recognises that it was established as an institution whose work was in some respects to complement the Serious Crimes process. The provisions of the Regulation reflect a policy decision that the work of the prosecution service should not be compromised by the truth-seeking function of the Commission. This policy is based on recognition of the importance of establishing strong and clear mechanisms to achieve justice and promote respect for the rule of law in the context of a fragile new nation with a history dominated by injustice. The Commission is satisfied that, notwithstanding this limitation, the robust powers it was granted were sufficient to enable it to compile a Report that contains a strong, objective and comprehensive account of the violations that occurred during the period of the political conflicts.

25. In seeking to achieve its objectives the Commission was given the duty to inquire into "which persons, authorities, institutions and organisations were involved in human rights violations," whether violations were part of systematic patterns of abuse, issues of accountability arising from the violations, and to prepare a "comprehensive report which sets out its activities and findings, based on factual and objective information and evidence collected or received by it or placed at its disposal."[28]

26. The combined effect of these provisions was to establish a duty upon the Commission to publish findings in relation to the identity of persons, authorities and institutions which had been involved in human rights violations, where there was sufficient factual and objective information to support them.

27. The Commission adopted the "civil" standard of "on the balance of probabilities" to determine whether the available evidence was sufficient to establish that human rights violations had occurred, and whether particular individuals or institutions were responsible and accountable. This standard, which has also been adopted by a number of other similar commissions, requires a determination that it is more probable than not that the allegations under consideration are true.

The use of specific names in the Report

28. The CAVR was designed as part of a larger programme aimed to satisfy the needs of both justice in relation to past crimes and reconciliation in Timor-Leste. It was a created as a complementary mechanism to the United Nations sponsored "Serious Crimes" process. Prior to the formation of the Commission, the Serious Crimes Investigations Unit and the Special Panels of the Dili District Court were established, in accordance with UN Security Council Resolution 1272,[*] with a mandate to investigate and prosecute those responsible for serious crimes committed between 1 January and 25 October, 1999.[†] Because of the principle of universal jurisdiction (not limited by time or place) the Serious Crimes Unit was also given the authority to investigate and prosecute those responsible for crimes against humanity, war crimes and genocide throughout the entire period of the Commission's mandate, from April 1974 to October 1999.[‡]

29. The Commission was therefore created in a strikingly different environment to a number of other "truth and reconciliation commissions" whose mandates recognised the importance of preparing as fully as possible, individual cases, in order to facilitate prosecutions in situations where the will and ability to try those most responsible was lacking. This was not a major issue within Timor-Leste when the Commission was established, because the investigation and prosecution of those most responsible who were inside Timor-Leste was clearly the responsibility of a section of the UNTAET mission, which was provided with significant funding and staffed by international investigators and prosecutors. The United Nations Commission of Inquiry into the violations committed in Timor-Leste had also recommended the establishment of an international tribunal,[29] and the Indonesian government established the ad hoc tribunal in Jakarta to try those within its jurisdiction who were most responsible.

30. Rather than duplicate the process of the Serious Crimes Investigations Unit, the mandate of the Commission provided it with a duty to focus on the broader patterns of violations which had taken place during the relevant twenty five year period.

31. The mandate specifically included the duty to report on the context, background and historical factors which had led to the violations and whether they were committed as part of a systematic pattern of abuse.[30]

32. The relevant period included a significant political conflict involving East Timorese factions, a full-scale military invasion, almost twenty-five years of large-scale violations during the military occupation and the explosion into uncontrolled violence and destruction in 1999. It would not have been possible for the Commission to fulfil its mandate of reporting on the patterns of violations over the entire period and whether they were part of a systematic programme of abuse if it had also attempted to conduct comprehensive investigations into a limited number of major incidents, focusing on the liability of particular individuals. The mandate recognised the importance of seeking and reporting on patterns which were evident

* Security Council Resolution 1272 (1999) established UNTAET on 25 October 1999, granting a mandate to "exercise all legislative and executive authority, including the administration of justice".

† UNTAET Regulation 16/2000 provided that Panels of judges sitting on 'Serious Crimes' cases, and on the Appeal Court, would be made up of two internationals and one East Timorese judge across many thousands of serious violations, providing an explanation of how and why these violations occurred, who was responsible for them, and what can be done to ensure that they are not repeated.[31]

‡ Universal jurisdiction is explicitly granted by UNTAET Regulation 15/2000 Section 2.

33. Accordingly, the major focus of the work of the Commission's inquiries has been on establishing which states and institutions were involved in systematic patterns of violations. The Commission has focused on a goal of understanding and reporting on the totality of what occurred, as far as this could be achieved within the time and resource limits of the Commission's work.

34. The statements and interviews provided to the Commission included the names of thousands of individuals identified as perpetrators of violations. In making a decision whether to include these names in its Final Report the Commission discussed at length, over many months, the competing factors involved in the decision. Although there were many complex discussions held, they focused on a number of key issues, including the following:

- There has been only a limited degree of justice achieved in relation to the mass violations committed in Timor-Leste. The public shaming of individuals could make a contribution in this regard.
- Individuals who have committed serious violations should be named, as a contribution to the fight against impunity. This is particularly important where the perpetrator is in a position to commit further violations against future victims.
- The Commission does not have the authority to affect the freedom of individuals as does a court with criminal jurisdiction, or the authority to provide a remedy which affects their assets, as does a court with civil jurisdiction. However, the public naming of an individual as a perpetrator of a serious human rights violation has the potential to destroy their reputation, career and family life. It may also have serious consequences on the lives of spouses and children of those named. Naming must therefore be based on strong, reliable evidence which leaves relatively little room for error.
- It is a fundamental right of all persons accused of serious allegations that they be given an opportunity to respond to those allegations. This opportunity will fulfil the requirement of natural justice and ensure that the accuser's explanation in relation to the accusation is considered before a decision on his liability is reached. For example the accused may be able to explain that he was not in the same region at the time the violation was committed, that his accuser was motivated by personal reasons, and so on.
- The context of the Commission's work involved the challenge of investigating thousands of violations committed by citizens of a neighbouring country, Indonesia, in particular members of that country's military forces. The need to find and contact Indonesian military officers in order to provide them with an opportunity to respond to allegations, particularly when the allegations relate to events which took place up to 25 years ago presented a major logistical challenge for the Commission.

- Contacting alleged perpetrators inside Timor-Leste was also extremely problematic. Timor-Leste does not have a functioning postal system throughout the territory, nor landline telephones. Transport to many areas is impossible in the wet season and difficult in the dry. All public records were destroyed during the violence of 1999. There are therefore no records which could assist in identifying where alleged perpetrators might live, or even might have lived at the time of the alleged violation.
- In Timor-Leste there is an extraordinary amount of common naming. Thus, for example, there are thousands of individuals who share common names such as João, Tomás, José and surnames, such as Guterres and Alves. The potential for misidentification of an alleged perpetrator based only on the name is therefore extremely high. This was greatly increased again because in many cases the perpetrator was only known and identified by a single first name (for example, João, Tomás or Jacinto.)
- The fact that victims usually did not personally know the names of Indonesian military officers who committed violations, but more often did know the identity of East Timorese who were involved, resulted in a much greater percentage of East Timorese perpetrators being named, even though the witnesses reported many more violations committed by members of the Indonesian security forces. Witnesses were often able to identify the command level of the perpetrator, the battalion or unit to which they belonged but did not know their individual names.
- The unfortunate fact that at the fragile transitional stage of governance currently experienced by Timor-Leste it is unrealistic to believe that the safety of witnesses who have identified perpetrators can be guaranteed. In fact the Commission has experienced one situation in which a victim who named perpetrators in a public hearing held at the sub-district level suffered threats and violent attacks from the alleged perpetrator and his family, which resulted in the wounding of the victim's husband and their forced evacuation from their home. The potential that naming perpetrators would produce significant problems for victims could not simply be ignored in the East Timorese context.
- The mandate of the Commission specifically includes the power to provide names to the Prosecutor General of Timor-Leste, with a recommendation for prosecution where appropriate.[32]

35. In reaching its decision on which names are included in this Report the Commission has sought to balance all of these competing factors. The decision is based on a strong belief in the importance of naming those perpetrators who are most responsible, balanced against the fundamental requirement that the Commission, as an organisation mandated to recommend ways to ensure further human rights violations are not committed, should not in any way be involved itself in the violation of individual's fundamental rights.

36. In Vol. IV, Part 8 of this Report, Responsibility and Accountability, the Commission provides the following:

1. Findings in relation to the responsibility and accountability of the major institutions involved in human rights violations within the boundaries of the mandate – the Indonesian security forces, and the Fretilin and UDT and Apodeti political parties, as well as those States which the Commission finds most seriously violated their obligations to recognise and assist the rights of the East Timorese people to determine their own political, social and economic reality.
2. The names of those it considers to be most responsible for the most serious patterns of violations committed during the period of the mandate. These individuals were senior commanders in the Indonesian security forces and senior officials in the Indonesian government during the period of mass violations.
3. An analysis of the responsibility of various "micro-institutions" most often identified as affiliated with perpetrators of human rights violations. This includes the offices of government officials most often identified as perpetrators, particular battalions and auxiliary groups of the Indonesian security forces. Following a brief summary of the patterns of violations reported to CAVR a list of those persons who served in senior positions in these "micro-institutions" during the relevant periods has been provided.
4. A list of all those persons whom the Prosecutor General of Timor-Leste has indicted for crimes against humanity in relation to the mass violations committed during 1999. The list also identifies whether an indictee has already been tried and convicted by the Special Panels. It also identifies those suspects those who are believed to be outside Timor-Leste, within the jurisdiction of the Indonesian authorities. The Commission hopes the list will help to redress the problem of a lack of available information on the progress of legal proceedings which was a common complaint received from community members during the field operations of the Commission.

37. The Commission has also compiled a list of individual perpetrators who were identified by witnesses and victims as being involved in multiple serious human rights violations. As the Commission did not have sufficient time and resources to complete in-depth investigations into each of these matters, nor to provide notice to each of the individuals concerned, it has not included the list in this Report. However, it has, in accordance with its powers under Section 3(1)(e) of Regulation 10/2001,* provided the entire list to the Prosecutor General of Timor-Leste, with a recommendation that each individual named should be further investigated and, if warranted, prosecuted. The list has also been forwarded to the Office of the President of the Republic with a recommendation that all of those persons named should be prohibited from holding public office.

* Regulation 10/2001 Section 3.1: "The objectives of the Commission shall include:…(e) the referral of human rights violations to the Office of the General Prosecutor with recommendations for the prosecution of offences where appropriate."

38. The thousands of names of perpetrators which were identified to the Commission by victims and witnesses have been replaced in the text of the Report by a code which does not bear any relationship to the identified name of the perpetrator.

39. The Commission's decision to provide the list to the Prosecutor General and President and to replace names in the text is based on the existence of a well-funded and relatively effective system of prosecution of individuals in Timor-Leste, the impossibility of contacting each of the persons identified in order to provide their right of reply, the very common duplication of names in Timor-Leste and the potential this provides for erroneous identification of individuals, the inability of the Commission to guarantee the safety of victims who identified perpetrators, and the fact that because of the scale of its inquiries and the long period of its mandate the Commission was not able to conduct in-depth investigations into each case. In addition, for protection of the victims the Commission has not included the names of victims of sexual violations which were reported to the Commission.

Standards used in determining issues of responsibility and accountability

40. Although it is clearly not a court and is not competent to make findings at law, the Commission is required to make findings on responsibility and accountability for human rights violations. In fulfilling these duties the Commission accepts that there are many levels of responsibility relevant to the violations that were committed. These include political, historical, moral and legal responsibility.

41. In relation to its obligation to make findings on issues of accountability, the Commission has, as far as possible, assessed the conduct of individuals, states and institutions against rules of domestic and international law that were in existence and binding at the time of the conduct in question.

The Indonesian invasion of Timor-Leste

42. As already noted, the mandate of the Commission imposed on it a specific duty to examine the events and experiences of all parties around the time that Indonesia security forces entered Timor-Leste on 7 December 1975. The use of force to enter into another state's territory is governed by the obligations and duties of member states of the United Nations and the fundamental rules of international law.

43. Indonesia became a member of the United Nations on 28 September 1950.*
Portugal became a member state on 14 December 1955. All member states of the United Nations are bound by the UN Charter and the following obligations:

* Indonesia purported to withdraw its membership of the UN on 20 January 1965 but rejoined in September 1966.

1. They must comply with decisions of the UN Security Council.
   Under the UN Charter all member states agree to accept and carry out decisions of the Security Council.[33] On two occasions the Security Council adopted resolutions calling on Indonesia to withdraw its forces from the territory of Timor-Leste.[34]
2. They must not use force against any other state.
   The prohibition on the use of force is the most fundamental rule of the UN Charter.[35] It is also one of the most important rules of customary international law.[36] Force may only be used in self-defence or where authorised by the Security Council.[37] Using force to intervene in a civil war that is occurring in another state's territory is also prohibited, even if it is said to be at the invitation of one of the armed groups involved in the conflict.[38]

44. The United Nations Charter also imposes obligations on states that administer non-self-governing territories.[39] Under the UN system Portugal was the state responsible for the administration of the territory of Timor-Leste. Administering states have obligations to promote the well-being of the inhabitants of the non-self-governing territories they administer, including by ensuring their just treatment and their protection against abuses.[40]

Justice of war and justice in war

45. The mandate of the Commission spans a number of different periods of political conflict. It includes the low-level violence leading to the full-scale conflict known as "the civil war" between East Timorese factions, which was followed soon after by the Indonesian invasion and occupation of the territory, the resistance to this occupation, and the widespread destruction and violence surrounding the Popular Consultation in 1999. The Annexe at the end of this part sets out in detail the legal principles, in particular those drawn from international humanitarian law, which the Commission used in its consideration of violations committed during each of these periods.

46. The material before the Commission includes the claim made by various parties to the conflict that they were justified in deciding to wage war. This argument relies on a mistaken belief that if a party has a justified reason for waging war, it may use any means necessary to fight that war.

47. A related argument, which is also not supported by international law, is that because the invasion and subsequent occupation were illegal, all subsequent actions of the Indonesian government and its agents in the territory were also illegal, and that human rights violations committed while resisting this illegal situation were justified.

48. The principles of international humanitarian law have guided the Commission in its examination of these issues.* According to this body of law even those who are fighting a just war may only use just means to achieve their aims. The same set of rules on how war may be waged applies equally to all parties to a conflict. Combatants who decide to take up arms to wage war become legitimate targets in that war. All non-combatants, including civilians and prisoners of war, are entitled to be protected. Although combatants from all sides may, for example, be killed legitimately in combat, they may not be killed if they are no longer taking an active part in the conflict, and may never be tortured or treated in an inhuman manner.*

* Annexe A to this part has a more thorough analysis of international humanitarian law.

49. Although a large, well-armed and professional force, fighting to extend its territorial boundaries illegally cannot be seen to hold the same degree of moral legitimacy as those forced to take up arms to defend their homes and families from invaders, the rules governing conduct during hostilities apply equally to both. The political goal, no matter how just, does not justify the means. The methods of warfare employed by all parties who have taken up arms in a conflict must comply with the provisions of international humanitarian law. The Commission has applied the relevant standards objectively and equally to all parties in determining whether human rights violations were committed, and in making findings on issues of responsibility and accountability.

Community Reconciliation Procedures

50. Part IV of the Regulation provided the Commission with a mandate to implement Community Reconciliation Procedures (CRPs). Part 9 of this Report details the Commission's CRP programme.

51. The broad objective of the CRPs was:

> "to assist the reception and reintegration of persons into their communities…in relation to criminal or non-criminal acts committed within the context of the political conflicts in Timor-Leste between 25 April 1974 and 25 October 1999."[41]

52. The Regulation set out in broad terms the procedures for CRPs, but it also allowed for some flexibility according to local conditions. The basic procedure was as follows:

53. Any person who has committed a "less serious" act or crime that harmed their community and was related to the political conflict could provide the Commission with a statement which set out the details of their actions.[42] The statement was then considered by a Committee within the Commission before being forwarded to the Office of the General Prosecutor (OGP) with an accompanying recommendation as to whether it was a suitable matter to be dealt with by CRP. Within two weeks the OGP had to provide written notification of whether it intended to exercise its exclusive jurisdiction over "serious criminal offences" in relation to the matter. If the OGP decided not to exercise jurisdiction, the case would be returned to the Commission to be processed.[43]

* Annexe A explains the rules governing conduct in armed conflicts.

54. Authority over the case was then delegated to a Regional Commissioner, who had to form a panel of between three to five local leaders from the community in which the relevant acts took place. The Regional Commissioner acted as chair of the panel. A hearing was arranged at which the deponent gave evidence and was questioned by the panel. Victims and community members were given an opportunity to speak at the hearing.[44]

55. At the completion of the hearing the panel deliberated and decided on "acts of reconciliation", such as community service, public apology or reparations, which the panel deemed appropriate for the deponent to complete in order to be accepted back into the community.[45] If the deponent agreed to undertake these acts, the panel would draft a Community Reconciliation Agreement that was signed by the Deponent and the Panel.[46] The agreement was then registered as an order of the appropriate District Court.[47] On completion of the required "Acts of Reconciliation" the deponent received immunity from future criminal prosecution or civil liability arising from the actions disclosed.[48]

56. The Regulation provided examples of cases which could appropriately be dealt with by CRP, among them theft, minor assault, arson and the killing of livestock or destruction of crops.[49] Authority to conduct Community Reconciliation Procedures did not extend to any action which would affect the exclusive authority of the Office of the General Prosecutor and the Special Panels of the Dili District Court over the "serious criminal offences" of murder, sexual offences, torture, crimes against humanity, genocide and war crimes.[50]

The community-based approach of the Commission

57. Most other truth commissions have been mandated to focus primarily on the task of establishing and reporting the truth in relation to human rights violations. A notable exception was the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission, whose programme included amnesty hearings. In addition to the collection, evaluation and reporting of information, a number of more recent commissions have also held public hearings on themes relevant to their work.

58. In addition to seeking and reporting on historical violations and holding major thematic public hearings, the Commission also implemented a range of grassroots, community-based programmes whose objectives were reconciliation, restoration of the dignity of victims and the promotion of human rights.

59. These programmes included Community Reconciliation Procedures (CRPs), local public hearings for victims, participatory workshops on the history of human rights violations in communities, victims' healing workshops, a special reparations scheme for victims with urgent needs, radio programmes focusing on local reconciliation issues, and information programmes aimed at East Timorese people in West Timor, Indonesia.

60. The Commission attributes much of the widespread support and recognition it has received from the population of Timor-Leste to the community-based approach it followed in implementing its mandate. Formulating, organising and completing such a range of programmes were extremely demanding of staff and resources. However, it provided incalculable benefits by encouraging small communities across the territory to enter into partnerships with the Commission in the quest for local solutions to the challenge of reconciliation and of healing the wounds caused by historical violations.

Annexe A: relevant legal principles

Introduction – international law relevant to the mandate

61. Two types of law need to be considered in establishing the meaning of "human rights violations", according to the definition in the mandate. One is the domestic law that was applied in Timor-Leste at a particular time, whether Portuguese or Indonesian. The other is international law, which contains principles relating to human rights and the conduct of armed conflicts.

62. The two main sources of international law are treaties and "customary law".[*] Treaties bind only those states that are parties to them.

63. Customary international law is a more general body of law, made up of rules that have been accepted and practiced by a significant portion of the international community. Rules of customary international law are generally binding on all states.[†]

64. Resolutions of UN bodies are also relevant to international law. Members of the UN (including Indonesia and Portugal) are bound to accept and carry out decisions of the Security Council.[51] Although resolutions of the UN General Assembly are not binding on states, they are relevant to the creation of customary international law,[52] and they represent the views of the UN community, of which Indonesia is a member.

65. In considering which parts of international law are relevant to its mandate, the Commission has sometimes needed to consider the status of the territory of Timor-Leste during the mandate period. For this purpose, the Commission has adopted the view maintained by the United Nations[53] that Timor-Leste remained a non-self-governing territory under the administration of Portugal throughout that period. It is clear that Indonesia did not acquire sovereignty over the territory. Under international law territory cannot be acquired by the unlawful use of force.[54] The purported integration by Indonesia did not meet any of the requirements laid down by the General Assembly for the voluntary integration of a non-self-governing territory into another state.*

* See Article 38(1) Statute of the International Court of Justice. Other sources include general principles that are recognised in the legal systems of many nations, the writings of respected legal writers, and the decisions of international tribunals.

† The only exception is where a state persistently objects to a non-fundamental customary rule: Fisheries Case (United Kingdom v Norway) (1951) ICJ Reports 116 at p131.

International human rights standards

66. The Commission is mandated to consider violations of "international human rights standards".[55] These are defined as "the internationally recognised human rights standards outlined under Section 2 of UNTAET Regulation No. 1/1999".[56] That section refers to "internationally recognised human rights standards", as reflected, in particular, in:

- The Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 10 December 1948;
- The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 16 December 1996 and its Protocols;
- The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of 16 December 1966;
- The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination of 12 December 1965;
- The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women of 17 December 1979;
- The Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment of 17 December 1984;
- The International Convention on the Rights of the Child of 20 November 1989.

67. UNTAET Regulation 1/1999 refers to internationally recognised standards "as reflected in particular in" the above international instruments. As this reference is inclusive of, but not limited to, these instruments, the Commission's mandate includes other "internationally recognised standards" in international instruments that are not included in the above list.

68. During the mandate period Indonesia had ratified the following instruments:

- The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (on 13 September 1984)
- The Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (on 28 October 1998)
- The Convention on the Rights of the Child (on 5 September 1990) (However, the ratification of this treaty was qualified by a reservation to the effect that it would apply to Indonesia only to the extent consistent with the Indonesian Constitution and that it would not grant rights not granted under the Constitution).

* General Assembly Resolution 1541 (XV), 15 December 1960 recognises that this can happen when: 1) the integrating territory has attained an advanced stage of self-government with free political institutions, so that its peoples would have the capacity to make a responsible choice through informed and democratic processes; and 2) the integration is the result of the freely expressed wishes of the territory's peoples acting with full knowledge of the change in their status, their wishes having been expressed through informed and democratic processes, impartially conducted and based on universal adult suffrage.

69. During the mandate period Portugal had ratified or acceded to the following instruments:

- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (on 15 June 1978)
- Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights aimed at the abolition of the death penalty (on 17 October 1990)
- International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (on 31 July 1978)
- International Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Racial Discrimination (on 24 August 1982)
- Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (on 9 February 1989)
- Convention on the Elimination of All forms of Discrimination against Women (on 30 July 1980)
- Convention on the Rights of the Child (on 21 September 1990).

70. It is important to note also that international human rights standards continue to be relevant even during an armed conflict. These standards run concurrently with international humanitarian law.[57] In addition, a state's human rights responsibilities apply to its conduct outside its own territory, including in any foreign territories it occupies.[58]

The right to self-determination

71. It is beyond doubt that a right of peoples to self-determination exists in international law. The right is guaranteed by Article 1 common to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) and has been reaffirmed by the UN General Assembly.[59] It has been recognised repeatedly by the International Court of Justice as existing under customary law.[*] The obligation of states to respect this right is of such importance that it is said to be owed to the international community as a whole, or to all states (it is owed erga omnes).[60] The Human Rights Committee has said that:

* See, most recently, Advisory Opinion on the legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (2004) ICJ where 14 of 15 judges referred to the right to self-determination: see judgment of the court at paragraphs 88 and 155-156; separate opinion of Judge Koroma at paragraph 5; separate opinion of Judge Higgins at paragraphs 18 and 28-31; separate opinion of Judge Kooijmans at paragraphs 6 and 31-33; separate opinion of Judge Al-Khasawneh at paragraph 9; separate opinion of Judge Buergenthal at paragraph 4; and the separate opinion of Judge Elaraby at paragraph 3.4; also in Case Concerning East Timor (Portugal v Australia) (1995) ICJ Reports 90 at 102, paragraph 29; and Advisory Opinion of 16 October 1975 ("Western Sahara") (1975) ICJ Reports 12 at paragraphs 55-59; see also Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970) (1971) I.C.J. Reports 16, at paragraphs 52-53.

> The right of self-determination is of particular importance because its realisation is an essential condition for the effective guarantee and observance of individual human rights and for the promotion and strengthening of those rights.[61]

72. The right is said to be held by "all peoples". It applies not only to the inhabitants of non-self-governing territories (that is, peoples under colonial rule) but also to those living under alien occupation.[62] The East Timorese are, and were throughout the mandate period, a people with a right to self-determination. Between December 1975 and 1982 the General Assembly passed eight resolutions,[63] and the Security Council a further two,[64] recognising the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination.

73. The essence of the right is the entitlement of a people to freely express its will. This involves, at a minimum, two central entitlements as set out in Article 1 common to the ICCPR and ICESCR. These are:

1. the right of a people to participate freely in a process whereby it is possible freely to determine its political status; and
2. the right of a people to partake in the pursuit of economic, social and cultural development and deal with its own natural wealth and resources.

74. Common Article 1(2) of the ICCPR and ICESCR provides:

> All peoples may, for their own ends, freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources without prejudice to any obligations arising out of international economic co-operation, based upon the principle of mutual benefit, and international law. In no case may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence.

75. States are required to respect and promote the right of peoples to self-determination[65] and to take positive action to facilitate its realisation.[66] The Human Rights Committee has said:

> [I]n particular, States must refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of other States and thereby adversely affecting the exercise of the right to self-determination.[67]

76. Although there may be difficulties in some cases in determining whether a specific act impeding self-determination breaches that obligation,[68] there is no doubt that a breach occurs in the case of a military invasion and occupation. That position has been made clear by the International Court of Justice, which, citing a General Assembly resolution, observed that:

> Every State has the duty to refrain from any forcible action which deprives people...of their right to self-determination.[69]

77. Where a denial of the right to self-determination occurs, all other states in the international community are obliged to recognise the illegality of that situation (or obliged not to recognise it as lawful) and must not take any action that aids or assists in its maintenance.[70]

Unlawful killings

78. The right to life is protected under Article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) and Article 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR). It is binding on all states as a rule of customary international law.[71] Even where an emergency threatens the life of a nation, obligations in respect of the right to life may not be limited in any way ("derogated from").[72]

79. Article 6(1) of the ICCPR provides that:

> Every human being has the inherent right to life. This right shall be protected by law. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life.

80. State authorities are permitted to take a life only in states where the death penalty is in force, where it has been imposed after a fair trial by a competent court according to law,[73] and where it is carried out in such a way as to minimise physical and mental suffering.[*]

81. Extrajudicial killings are a clear breach of the right to life. The Human Rights Committee, which oversees the implementation of the ICCPR, has commented:

> The protection against arbitrary deprivation of life which is explicitly required by the third sentence of Article 6 (1) is of paramount importance. The Committee considers that State parties should take measures not only to prevent and punish deprivation of life by criminal acts, but also to prevent arbitrary killing by their own security forces. The deprivation of life by the authorities of the State is a matter of the utmost gravity. Therefore, the law must strictly control and limit the circumstances in which a person may be deprived of his life by such authorities.[74]

82. One circumstance in which a death will not violate the right to life is where it occurs in an armed conflict and in accordance with international humanitarian law. However this exception extends only to the killing of combatants and incidental deaths of civilians that result from proportionate and necessary military action. The intentional killing of civilians or prisoners remains a violation of international law. Furthermore, the Human Rights Committee has indicated in the context of the right to life that states have a "supreme duty to prevent wars, acts of genocide and other acts of mass violence causing arbitrary loss of life."[75]

---

* Death sentences may otherwise infringe the prohibition on torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment: see for example Human Rights Committee, General Comment 20, para 61; Ng v Canada (1994) HRC Comm No. 469/1991, at para 16.2.

Disappearances

83. Causing the disappearance of individuals is a violation of a number of basic human rights. The Human Rights Committee has stated that states are required to take specific and effective measures to prevent the disappearance of individuals and should establish procedures to investigate cases of disappeared persons.[76] It has said that:

> Any act of such disappearance constitutes a violation of many of the rights enshrined in the Covenant, including the right to liberty and security of person (Article 9), the right not to be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (Article 7), and the right of all persons deprived of their liberty to be treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person (Article 10). It also violates or constitutes a grave threat to the right to life (Article 6).[77]

84. Other rights, such as the right to recognition as a person before the law (Article 16 ICCPR), may also be violated.[78] In addition to violating the human rights of the victim, disappearances may cause mental anguish in the victim's relatives sufficient to amount to a violation of the prohibition on torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[79] From the perspective of surviving relatives, a disappearance also constitutes a violation of the right to a family life, and where a family was dependent economically on a disappeared person may also violate various economic and social rights such as the right to an adequate standard of living (Article 11 ICESCR) and the right to education (Article 13 ICESCR).[80]

Displacement, resettlement and famine

85. Under the UDHR and ICCPR all persons have the right to liberty of movement and freedom to choose his or her residence.[81] Restrictions on these rights are only permitted when it is necessary in a democratic country to protect national security, public order, public health or morals, or the rights of others, and any restrictions must be provided by law and not be inconsistent with other human rights.[82]

86. Everyone has the right to adequate food[83] and to be free from hunger.[84] This right means that there should be food available of sufficient quality and quantity to satisfy the dietary needs of individuals.[85] States are obliged not only to take steps to achieve the full realisation of this right,[86] but also to ensure that everyone under its control has access to the minimum essential food to ensure their freedom from hunger.[87] States may violate this obligation either directly or indirectly, for example by pursuing policies that are manifestly incompatible with the right of people to food.[88]

87. All persons also have a right to water[89] and to adequate housing.[90] Most importantly, all persons have a right to life.[91] The Human Rights Committee has indicated that this right should not be interpreted narrowly, and that it involves an obligation on states to take measures, for example, to reduce malnutrition.[92]

88. In addition to these principles of human rights law, international humanitarian law also includes important provisions relating to displacement and famine (see below).

Arbitrary detention

89. The right to liberty of person is protected under Article 3 of the UDHR and Article 9(1) of the ICCPR. That right is intended to ensure that a person's physical liberty is not restricted arbitrarily.[93] Article 9 of the UDHR and Article 9 of the ICCPR, more specifically, prohibit arbitrary arrest and detention. That prohibition is also contained in customary international law,[94] and is therefore binding on all states.

90. Article 9 of the ICCPR contains the following specific rights which apply to all deprivations of liberty:

1. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. No one shall be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by law.
2. Anyone who is arrested shall be informed, at the time of arrest, of the reasons for his arrest and shall be promptly informed of any charges against him.
3. Anyone arrested or detained on a criminal charge shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release. It shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody, but release may be subject to guarantees to appear for trial, at any other stage of the judicial proceedings, and, should occasion arise, for execution of the judgment.
4. Anyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings before a court, in order that a court may decide without delay on the lawfulness of his detention and order his release if the detention is not lawful.
5. Anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention shall have an enforceable right to compensation.

91. Detention will be arbitrary, and therefore in breach of human rights standard in a number of circumstances. The clearest case is where the detention is not in conformity with national law. In addition, the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention has indicated that detention which violates other human rights standards is also arbitrary. It treats a detention as arbitrary:

1. Where there is no legal basis justifying the detention
2. Where the detention arises from the legitimate exercise of fundamental rights (for example, freedom of expression or opinion)

3. When the situation involves human rights violations of such severity that the detention may be regarded as arbitrary (for example, where due process or a fair trial is lacking).[95]

92. More generally still, the Human Rights Committee has indicated that an otherwise lawful detention may still be arbitrary and in breach of Article 9 of the ICCPR if it is not reasonable or necessary in all the circumstances.[96] Detention might also become arbitrary, if it continues past the point at which it is reasonable or necessary in the circumstances.[97]

93. In cases where a person is arrested or detained on a criminal charge that person must be brought promptly (within a few days)[98] before a judge, and must either be tried within a reasonable time or released.[99]

94. Pre-trial detention should be an exception and as short as possible.[100] Importantly, the Human Rights Committee also stressed that:

> [I]f so-called preventive detention is used, for reasons of public security, it must be controlled by these same provisions, i.e. it must not be arbitrary, and must be based on grounds and procedures established by law (Para 1), information of the reasons must be given (Para 2) and court control of the detention must be available (Para 4) as well as compensation in the case of a breach (Para 5). And if, in addition, criminal charges are brought in such cases, the full protection of Article 9 (2) and (3), as well as Article 14 [which covers the right to a fair trial], must also be granted.[101]

Conditions of imprisonment

95. Article 10(1) of the ICCPR provides that:

> All persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person.[102]

96. The Human Rights Committee has said that this provision reflects "a norm of general international law"[103] and that it is "not subject to derogation".[104] It has interpreted the provision as meaning, among other things, that persons in detention must not be subjected to any hardship or constraint other than that resulting from the deprivation of liberty and must be allowed to enjoy all human rights subject to the restrictions that are unavoidable in a closed environment.[105]

97. Where treatment in detention fails to meet minimum standards, it may also amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[*] In particular, prolonged periods of solitary confinement or incommunicado detention may violate these standards.[106] The Human Rights Committed has also observed that:

* In violation of Article 5 UDHR; Article 7 ICCPR, Article 16 CAT.

> [C]ertain minimum standards regarding the conditions of detention must be observed regardless of a State party's level of development. These include, in accordance with Rules 10, 12, 17, 19 and 20 of the U.N. Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, minimum floor space and cubic content of air for each prisoner, adequate sanitary facilities, clothing which shall be in no manner degrading or humiliating, provision of a separate bed, and provision of food of nutritional value adequate for health and strength. It should be noted that these are minimum requirements which the Committee considers should always be observed, even if economic or budgetary considerations may make compliance with these obligations difficult.[107]

Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment

98. Article 5 of the UDHR and Article 7 of the ICCPR provide that no one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Torture is also prohibited under customary international law, which binds all states.[108] The prohibition is so significant that it "enjoys a higher rank in the international hierarchy than treaty law and even 'ordinary' customary rules" (that is, it is a "norm of jus cogens") and may not be circumvented ("derogated from") under any circumstances.[109]

99. The Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT) (ratified by Indonesia on 28 October 1998) sets out a more detailed regime for the prevention and punishment of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, including the following:

- States must take measures to prevent torture in any territory under their jurisdiction;[110]
- States must also prevent cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment from being carried out with the involvement or acquiescence of officials;[111]
- No circumstances, such as a war or public emergency, are a justification for torture;[112]
- States must make torture an offence under their criminal laws;[113]
- Cases of alleged torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment must be promptly and impartially investigated;[114]
- States must educate all civil and military law enforcement personnel and public officials about the prohibition on torture, and must systematically review rules and practices relating to the interrogation and custody of prisoners in order to prevent torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment;[115]
- Statements made as a result of torture must not be used as evidence;[116]

100. The CAT defines torture as occurring where each of the following elements is present:

- An act is committed which, intentionally, inflicts severe pain or suffering
- The act is committed for the purpose of punishment, intimidation, coercion, or of obtaining information or a confession or on any discriminatory basis
- The act is committed by or at the instigation of a public official, or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official.*

101. This definition does not treat an act as torture if it is carried out by a non-governmental actor, such as a member of an opposition party or militia, unless it is done with the consent or acquiescence of the government.[117] However in cases where a country has no functioning government, factions or organisations that in fact exercise government-like functions may be treated as public officials.[118] (This exception may allow the definition to apply to acts committed by Fretilin/Falintil at least in areas and at times where they exercised governmental functions in the absence of other authorities). The CAT definition has been said to reflect customary international law.[119]

102. The definition of torture is similar under other human rights instruments. The Human Rights Committee has said that whether conduct amounts to torture depends on "the nature, purpose and severity of the treatment applied".[120] However, one distinction is that the concept of torture under the ICCPR does not require the involvement or acquiescence of a public official. According to the Human Rights Committee:

> It is the duty of the State party to afford everyone protection through legislative and other measures as may be necessary against the acts prohibited by article 7, whether inflicted by people acting in their official capacity, outside their official capacity or in a private capacity.[121]

103. Although no treaty defines cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, it is understood to include acts which fall short of torture because they are not carried out for a particular purpose or are not severe enough. It includes, for example, solitary confinement,[122] sleep deprivation,[123] restraining a person in painful positions,[124] keeping a person's head hooded,[125] and subjecting a person to death threats.[126]

* Article 1(1) CAT provides that torture means "any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions." The definition is without prejudice to any definition in international instruments or national legislation that is of wider application: Article 1(2) CAT.

104. Under the CAT states are required to take steps to prevent cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment only where it involves or is acquiesced to by a public official.[127] Obligations under the ICCPR are wider, requiring states to take steps against such treatment even when carried out by non-government groups or private individuals.[128]

Unfair trials

105. Rights to due process and a fair trial under international human rights law are guaranteed by Articles 10 and 11 of the UDHR and Articles 14 and 15 of ICCPR.

106. Some provisions are also relevant to pre-trial procedures. A person who is arrested on a criminal charge must be informed promptly, in a language that he or she understands, of the criminal charges being brought,[129] and must as soon as possible be given access to a lawyer of his or her choosing.* He or she must be brought, within a few days,† before a judge, and must be either tried within a reasonable time or released.[130] Adequate time and facilities must be provided to the accused person for the preparation of his or her defence before the trial.[131] This includes allowing access by the accused person to the documents and other evidence which are needed for the preparation of his or her case, as well as opportunities to communicate with his or her lawyer.[132]

107. The accused person must be tried without undue delay.[133] The trial must be before a "competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law".‡ The hearing must be fair.[134] According to the Human Rights Committee, "an indispensable aspect of the fair trial principle is the equality of arms between the prosecution and the defence".[135] This means that the defence must be allowed as many resources as the prosecution, and an equal opportunity to present its case. This principle will be violated, for example, where the prosecution detains witnesses without special circumstances justifying such action.[136] Prosecutors should also not be permitted to rely on evidence obtained through torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.[137]

108. The hearing must be public, except in very special circumstances.[138] The right to a public hearing may be violated even when a hearing is technically "public", if it is not in practice accessible to the public.[139] This may extend to situations where the public is effectively scared away from attendance at a hearing.

* Article 14(3)(b) ICCPR; see e.g. Kelly v Jamaica (1996) HRC Comm No. 537/1993, at para 9.2, where a 5 day delay in receiving access to a lawyer after being taken into custody was held to have breached Article 14(3)(b).

† Human Rights Committee General Comment 8 paragraph 2; See also Jijon v Ecuador (1992) HRC Comm. No. 227/88 where a delay of five days in bringing a prisoner before a judge was held to have breached Article 9(3).

‡ Article 14(1) ICCPR; see also Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, adopted by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders held at Milan from 26 August to 6 September 1985 and endorsed by General Assembly resolutions 40/32 of 29 November 1985 and 40/146 of 13 December 1985; see also Guidelines on the Role of Prosecutors, adopted by the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, Havana, Cuba, 27 August to 7 September 1990.

109. An accused person also has the following specific rights at trial:

- to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law;[140]
- to defend him or herself in person or through legal assistance of his or her choosing;[141]
- to examine (him or herself or through a lawyer) the prosecution witnesses and to call witnesses for him or herself;[142]
- to have assistance from an interpreter if he or she cannot understand or speak the language used in the court;[143]
- not to be compelled to testify against him or herself or to confess guilt.[144] The Human Rights Committee has said that compliance with this right involves:

> the absence of any direct or indirect physical or psychological pressure from the investigating authorities on the accused with a view to obtaining a confession of guilt. A fortiori, it is unacceptable to treat an accused person in a manner contrary to Article 7 of the Covenant in order to extract a confession.[145]

110. If found guilty, a person has the right to appeal his or her conviction and sentence to a higher court.[146] Written reasons for decisions must be provided within a reasonable time by appeal courts in order to facilitate further appeals.[147]

111. No person may be found guilty of a crime in relation to acts which were not illegal at the time they were committed.[148]

Rights to freedom of opinion, expression, assembly and association

112. In addition to these procedural rights, political trials often violate other human rights. These include, for example:

1. The right to freedom of opinion and expression.[149]
2. The right to peaceful assembly and association.[150]

113. No restrictions on or exceptions to the right to freedom of opinion are permitted.[151] Restrictions on the rights to freedom of expression, peaceful assembly and association are permitted only in narrowly defined circumstances. These are:

- the restriction must be provided by law;
- the restriction must be for a permissible purpose (to uphold the rights of others, or to protect national security, public order, public health or public morals);
- the restriction must be necessary in order to achieve the permissible purpose (and in the case of freedom of assembly and association, the measures are only permissible if they are necessary to achieve the purpose "in a democratic society").[152]

114. A mere assertion that measures are necessary for national security is insufficient unless it is shown why that is the case.[153] These requirements must be strictly complied with. For example the Human Rights Committee has said that:

> [Freedom of expression] is of paramount importance in any democratic society, and any restrictions to the exercise thereof must meet a strict test of justification."[154]

Rape and other forms of sexual assault/harassment

115. Although there is no human rights instrument that refers specifically to rape and sexual assault, these abuses amount to violations of a number of human rights standards. Most significantly, cases of rape or sexual assault will usually amount to torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment.[155] The ICTY Appeals Chamber has stated that:

> Sexual violence necessarily gives rise to severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, and in this way justifies its characterisation as an act of torture.[156]

116. In all cases rape violates the right to physical integrity, which is protected under customary international law.[157]

117. In addition, rape and sexual assaults violate the right to privacy.[158] When carried out against women, they violate the rights of women to be free from and protected against gender-based discrimination,[159] of which sexual crimes against women are one form. The Human Rights Committee has said that "women are particularly vulnerable in times of internal or international armed conflicts" and that states should take steps "to protect women from rape, abduction and other forms of gender-based violence".[160]

118. Many of these rights are protected under the Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women, which Indonesia became a party too on 13 September 1984.

Sexual slavery

119. Incidents of sexual slavery are repetitive violations of all of the rights discussed above.

120. The UDHR and ICCPR both prohibit all forms of slavery,[161] reflecting a fundamental rule of customary international law.[162] The Human Rights Committee has discussed questions of sexual slavery in the context of that prohibition.[163] In the context of international humanitarian law, the crime against humanity of enslavement has been said to consist of the exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership over a person,[164] and this can include cases where women are detained for long periods of time and repeatedly sexually assaulted.[*]

121. In addition, under the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, states are obliged to take measures to suppress all forms of traffic in women.[165]

Children's rights

122. As well as being protected by general human rights standards such as those relating to the rights to life, food, freedom from torture and arbitrary detention, and social and economic rights, children are protected by specific additional rules of international human rights law which reflect the requirement in Article 25 of the UDHR that childhood is "entitled to special care".[166] Most of these are contained in the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), although some are also found in other international instruments. Indonesia ratified the CRC on 5 September 1990.[†]

123. An overarching obligation is to treat the best interests of the child as a primary consideration when taking any action concerning children.[167]

124. The CRC provides that children are entitled to many of the rights granted more generally under other instruments, including the right to life,[168] the right to be free from torture,[169] the right to be free from arbitrary detention,[170] and the right to enjoy the highest attainable standard of health and to have access to medical facilities.[171]

125. More specifically, the CRC requires states to protect children from all forms of physical or mental harm,[172] all forms of sexual exploitation and abuse,[173] and all other forms of exploitation.[174] It also provides that children have a right to a standard of living adequate for their physical, mental, spiritual and social development.[175] Capital punishment may not be imposed for offences committed by a person under the age of 18.[176]

126. In respect of the recruitment of children into military or paramilitary organisations the following standards are relevant:

- States must refrain from recruiting children under the age of 15 into their armed forces, and must take measures to prevent children under the age of 15 from directly participating in hostilities.[177]
- If recruiting children between the ages of 15 and 18 into their armed forces, states must give priority to older children.[178]

* In Prosecutor v Kunarac women were detained and were repeatedly raped and sexually assaulted and were forced to carry out work around the accused's home. This was held to constitute the crime against humanity of enslavement.

† Indonesia entered a reservation in respect of the CRC that it would implement the Convention in conformity with its Constitution and did not accept obligations going beyond those imposed by its Constitution.

- Children have a right to protection from economic exploitation and from performing work that is likely to be harmful or dangerous to the child.[179]

127. A number of further standards contained in the CRC are specifically relevant to the transfer of East Timorese children to Indonesia. For example:

- A child must not be separated from his or her parents against his or her will except where proper procedures establish that it is in the best interests of the child.[180]
- States are required to combat the illicit transfer of children abroad, and the abduction, sale or traffic of children.[181]
- States must regulate adoption processes and ensure that adoption is undertaken by competent authorities according to the law.[182]
- Where a child is separated from his or her family the state must provide special protection, the nature of which shall be determined with due regard to the desirability of continuity in a child's upbringing, and the child's ethnic, religious, cultural and linguistic background.[183]
- A child has the right to preserve his or her identity, including nationality, name and family relations.[184]

Social and economic rights

128. Economic, social and cultural rights are set out in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR). Some are also contained in the UDHR.

129. The most relevant of these to the Commission's mandate are the following rights granted to all individuals:

- The right to undertake work freely chosen[185] and to just and favourable conditions of work,[186] including a fair wage and safe and healthy working conditions.[187]
- The right to an adequate standard of living for every person and his or her family, including adequate food, clothing and housing, and the continuous improvement of living conditions.[188]
- The right to the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health.[189]
- The right to an education, including free and compulsory primary education.[190]

130. It is recognised that economic, social and cultural rights are different from political and cultural rights because their attainment is more dependent on the resources available to a state. For this reason states' obligations in respect of the rights listed above are not obligations to guarantee those rights absolutely, but rather to take steps towards the maximisation of resources so as to achieve the rights set out.[191] However this should not be interpreted by states as an excuse for non-compliance with their obligations. The Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESC) has emphasised that the ICESCR does impose two specific obligations on states. These are:

1. The requirement that social and economic rights be exercised without discrimination (as to race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status)
2. The duty to take "deliberate, concrete and targeted" steps towards realising the rights in the Covenant.[192]

131. The Committee has also indicated that the Covenant imposes "a minimum core obligation to ensure the satisfaction of, at the very least, minimum essential levels of each of the rights",[193] including for example the provision of "essential foodstuffs, of essential primary health care, of basic shelter and housing, or of the most basic forms of education".[194]

132. It is also important to recognise the link between economic and social rights and the right of a people to self-determination. Both the ICESCR and the ICCPR, in setting out the right to self-determination, provide that a people has the right to freely dispose of its natural wealth and resources for its own ends, and that "in no case may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence."[195]

Reproductive rights

133. Several human rights provisions may be relevant to the Indonesian control of fertility and incidents of coerced birth control. The ICCPR guarantees the rights of men and women to found a family.[196] In respect of that right the Human Rights Committee has indicated that:

> When State parties adopt family planning policies, they should be compatible with the provisions of the Covenant and should, in particular, not be discriminatory or compulsory.[197]

134. CEDAW grants women the same rights as men in deciding freely on the number and spacing of their children.[198] This is said to involve a prohibition on compulsory sterilisation or abortion, and requires states to take measures to prevent the coercion of women in respect of their fertility.[199]

Human rights during national emergencies

135. Some international human rights instruments allow states to suspend or temporarily limit ("derogate from") their human rights obligations when a national emergency occurs.[200] However this may only occur in the most severe emergencies, and there are restrictions on the extent to which states may take measures in derogation.

136. Most significantly, some human rights may never be derogated from, even in the most serious emergency. These include:

- the right to life[201]
- the right to freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment and punishment[202]

- the right to freedom from slavery and servitude[203]
- the right of those in detention to be treated with humanity[204]
- the right to a fair trial[205]
- the right to bring legal proceedings to challenge the lawfulness of any detention.[206]

137. Even in areas were derogation is permitted, this should only happen temporarily and the special measures taken must be strictly necessary in the circumstances.[207]

International humanitarian law

Introduction

138. Under the Commission mandate, "human rights violations" are defined as including "violations of international humanitarian law".[208] International humanitarian law is the body of law setting out the rules applicable during an armed conflict. These rules apply to states, to armed groups,[209] and also to individuals.

139. International humanitarian law applies only where there is an "armed conflict". In addition, the rules that apply will differ depending on whether the conflict is "international" or "internal" in nature.

The existence of an armed conflict

Conclusion:

140. The Commission considers that there was an armed conflict in existence in Timor-Leste from 11 August 1975 until at least the end of the mandate on 25 October 1999. International humanitarian law therefore applied throughout this period.

Reasoning:

141. The existence of an armed conflict does not require a declaration of war or even recognition by parties themselves formally that a state of armed conflict exists. The test is whether there are actual hostilities on a level that goes beyond a mere "internal disturbance".[210] An armed conflict exists:

> Whenever there is a resort to armed force between States or protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organised armed groups or between such groups within a State. International humanitarian law applies from the initiation of such armed conflicts and extends beyond the cessation of hostilities until a general conclusion of peace is reached; or, in the case of internal conflicts, a peaceful settlement is achieved. Until that moment, international humanitarian law continues to apply in the whole territory of the warring States or, in the case of internal conflicts, the whole territory under the control of a party, whether or not actual combat takes place there.[211]

142. Between April 1974 and August 1975 the sporadic, low level violence in Timor-Leste was not of sufficient intensity to trigger the application of international law. During August–September 1975 the hostility between Fretilin and UDT went beyond minor disturbances and tensions, and was more organised than riots or sporadic acts of violence. The Commission is satisfied that from 11 August, when UDT launched its attempted coup, the two parties and the armed forces under their control engaged in open armed confrontations. During September–November 1975 groups of armed combatants under the control of the Indonesian security forces entered the territory of Timor-Leste and engaged the armed forces under the control of Fretilin almost up until the full-scale invasion on 7 December 1975. The situation of international armed conflict which began when these armed groups crossed the border continued at least until the end of the Commission's mandate on 25 October 1999. Although the main body of Indonesian security forces and militias had left the territory by this date there was continued armed conflict between Indonesian-controlled militia groups and international peacekeepers after UNTAET's administration of the territory commenced on 25 October 1999.[212]

Status of the conflict in Timor-Leste: international or internal armed conflict?

Conclusions:

1. During the period from approximately 11 August 1975 until approximately 1 October 1975 the laws relating to internal armed conflicts were applicable in Timor-Leste.
2. The laws relating to international armed conflicts applied from approximately 1 October 1975 until 25 October 1999.

Reasoning:

143. An internal or non-international armed conflict occurs where an armed conflict takes place in the territory of one state, without the involvement of any other state.[213]

144. An international armed conflict occurs where:

- a conflict takes place between two or more states or;
- an internal armed conflict exists in one state and a second state intervenes in that conflict with its troops, or;
- an internal armed conflict exists in one state and some of the participants in that conflict, such as militia groups, in fact act on behalf of a second state.[214]

145. According to the theory of international humanitarian law, whenever an armed conflict exists it is either an international armed conflict or a non-international (internal) armed conflict. There is no third category. In practice, however, it is sometimes more difficult to categorise a conflict.

146. In the case of Timor-Leste the "civil war" between Fretilin and UDT amounted to an internal armed conflict, which took place in the territory of one state (Portugal). Although Indonesia began interfering in the affairs of Timor-Leste while it was still under Portuguese control, by supporting members of Apodeti, and even providing military training and weaponry to its members[215] this could not "internationalise" the conflict unless Indonesia exercised "effective control" of Apodeti's actions,[*] or had at least "overall control" of Apodeti.[†] The Commission is therefore of the view that the "civil war" had the status of an internal armed conflict.

147. However, from mid-September 1975 and possibly earlier, cross-border attacks were carried out by Indonesian forces, who were in command (and therefore held effective and overall control) of East Timorese groups known as Partisans. These cross-border attacks roughly overlapped with the end of the most intense period of the "civil war". The initial attacks were followed by the full-scale invasion by Indonesia on 7 December 1975.

148. The nature of the conflict in Timor-Leste is different from most international armed conflicts in which the armed forces of at least two states are clearly involved. The forces that resisted the Indonesian attack were not under the command and control of the Portuguese army (it had withdrawn to Ataúro). They included local Portuguese soldiers and reservists (Segunda Linha) acting independently, members of Falintil and Fretilin militia. During the occupation, Indonesian troops were not at war with the Portuguese army but against armed Falintil and organised resistance to the occupation.

149. The Commission considers that the conflict in Timor-Leste had the status of an international armed conflict from October 1975 for the following reasons:

1. There was an armed conflict sufficient to trigger the application of international humanitarian law. This conflict was clearly not internal, as it did not take place in the territory of one state without the involvement of any other state. Although different to the more common situations involving the armed forces of two sovereign states, the armed forces of one such state (Indonesia) were fighting in the territory of another (Portugal).
2. Indonesia's invasion constituted foreign interference in an existing internal armed conflict, which had the effect of "internationalising" that conflict.[216]
3. The Geneva Conventions of 1949 (which, aside from Common Article 3, deal with international armed conflicts) apply to "all cases of partial or total occupation of the territory of a High Contracting Party, even if the said occupation meets with no armed resistance."[217] Since Portugal was a party

* Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v United States of America) (1986) ICJ Reports 4 at p.65. The ICJ indicated that the supply of weaponry and training was insufficient without more for effective control by the state to be demonstrated: see at 64.

† Prosecutor v Dusko Tadic, ICTY Case Number IT-94-1, Appeals Chamber Judgment, 15 July 1999, paragraph 120. The ICTY in this decision rejected the "effective control" test that the ICJ had adopted in the Nicaragua case. Disagreement continues as to which the appropriate test is.

to the Geneva Conventions, they applied, on this basis, to any part of Timor-Leste that was occupied by Indonesia (see sections of this Annexe dealing with the law of belligerent occupation).

Relevant treaties

150. International humanitarian law, like other areas of international law, is made up primarily of treaties and rules of customary international law.* Customary law that applies to situations of armed conflict is referred to as "the laws and customs of war". While treaties bind only those states that are party to them, customary law binds all states.

151. The Commission's mandate defined "international humanitarian law" as including:

- the four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949;
- the two Protocols Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and relating to the Protection of Victims of International and non-International Armed Conflict of 8 June 1977;
- the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May be Deemed to be Excessively Injurious or to have Indiscriminate Effects of 10 October 1980, and
- the laws and customs of war.[218]

152. The provisions included in these sources are relevant to the Commission's mandate to examine violations of the standards recognised by the international community that relate to the conduct of warfare, irrespective of whether they may have been legally binding on particular parties at the time of their actions.

153. However, it is also useful to consider which provisions were legally binding on parties to the conflict. These include the treaty obligations of each party and the provisions of customary international law known as the "laws and customs of war".

Indonesia's treaty obligations

154. From the beginning of the mandate period, Indonesia was a party to the following humanitarian law treaties:

- The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (which Indonesia became a party to on 30 September 1958)
- The Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict of 14 May 1954 (which Indonesia became a party to on 10 January 1967)

* Which includes, amongst other things, the content of the Hague Regulations of 1907: see Advisory Opinion on the Treat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at pp257-258 (citing the judgment of the Nuremberg IMT); Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Palestinian Occupied Territories (2004) ICJ in paragraph 89.

- The First Protocol to the Hague Convention of 1954 for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict of 14 May 1954 (which Indonesia became a party to on 26 July 1967) and
- The Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and Warfare of 17 June 1925 (which Indonesia became a party to on 21 January 1971).

155. Indonesia also became a party to the following conventions during the mandate period:

- The Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction of 10 April 1972 (which Indonesia became a party to on 19 February 1992), and
- The Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May be Deemed to be Excessively Injurious or to have Indiscriminate Effects of 10 October 1980 (which Indonesia became a party to on 12 November 1998).

Portugal's treaty obligations

156. At the beginning of the mandate period Portugal was a party to the following relevant treaties:

- The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (which Portugal became a party to on 14 March 1961), and
- The Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and Warfare of 17 June 1925 (which Portugal became a party to on 1 July 1930).

157. During the mandate period Portugal became a party to a number of further humanitarian law treaties, including:

- The First Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions of 8 June 1977 (which Portugal became a party to on 27 May 1992)
- Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction of 10 April 1972 (which Portugal became a party to on 15 May 1975)
- Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons which may be deemed to be Excessively Injurious (CCW) of 10 October 1980 (which Portugal became a party to on 4 April 1997)
- Protocol I to the CCW on Non-Detectable Fragments (which Portugal became a party to on 4 April 1997)
- Protocol II to the CCW on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby Traps and other Devices (which Portugal became a party to on 4 April 1997)

- Protocol III to the CCW on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Incendiary Weapons (which Portugal became a party to on 4 April 1997)
- Convention on the Prohibitions of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction of 13 January 1993 (which Portugal became a party to on 10 September 1996)
- Convention on the Prohibition of the Use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines and on their Destruction of 18 September 1997 (which Portugal became a party to on 19 February 1999)
- Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide of 9 December 1948 (which Portugal became a party to on 9 February 1999).

158. However, as Portugal was not a party to the conflict for most, if not all, of its duration, and as Indonesia was not also a party to most of these conventions, they are of only minimal relevance to the conflict.

Obligations on states and armed groups

International armed conflict: the Indonesian invasion and occupation

159. The Geneva Conventions of 1949 apply to "all cases of total or partial occupation of the territory of a High Contracting Party, even if the said occupation meets with no armed resistance".

160. The Conventions therefore applied to the international armed conflict involving Indonesian forces in the legal territory of Portugal, from the beginning of the international armed conflict and throughout the Indonesian occupation.*

161. In addition, the full range of the laws and customs of war applied to the conflict.

162. Some of the main principles contained in these sources are as follows:

1. Attacks on civilians and civilian objects are prohibited

163. One of the fundamental rules of international armed conflict is the principle of distinction. This states that a distinction must be drawn between civilians and civilian objects on the one hand, and combatants and military objectives on the other. Parties to the conflict must only attack other combatants and military objectives. The International Court of Justice has called this a cardinal principle of international humanitarian law.[219]

164. This principle involves a number of more specific rules:

* Article 2 common to the Geneva Conventions states that the conventions apply to "all cases of total or partial occupation of the territory of a High Contracting Party, even if the said occupation meets with no armed resistance." Portugal, which was the administering power for Timor-Leste, was a party to the Geneva Conventions throughout the mandate period.

165. Attacks must not be made directly on civilians, civilian objects or undefended towns or buildings.[220] It is not permitted to carry out acts for the purpose of intimidating or terrorising the civilian population, or to take civilian hostages.[221] Attacks on cultural objects, places of worship or objects necessary for the survival of the civilian population (such as those used in food production) are prohibited.[222] Even if one party to a conflict breaches these rules, the other side may not respond by targeting civilians.[223] The collective punishment of civilians is prohibited, meaning that where a person is suspected of criminal acts or of fighting for the opposing side in a conflict, it is not permitted to punish that person's friends, family or community.[224]

166. Using the starvation of civilians as a means of warfare is prohibited, as is the destruction or removal of objects necessary for the survival of the civilian population, such as food, crops, livestock, drinking water installations, or means of producing food.[225] Parties to a conflict must allow the free passage of aid, including medical supplies and food and clothing for children and expectant mothers.[226]

167. Attacks must not be carried out using methods or weapons that make it impossible to distinguish between civilian and military targets.[227]

168. Civilian casualties and damage to civilian objects resulting from an attack on a military objective are permissible only so long as they are not excessive in relation to the military necessity of the attack.[228] Attacks should be carried out in such a way as to minimise civilian casualties and damage to civilian objects.[229] Wherever possible, advance warning should be given to civilians of attacks that may harm the civilian population.[230]

169. Customary law also prohibits "perfidy". This means that combatants are prohibited from feigning civilian status (or the status of other protected persons, such as wounded combatants) in order to carry out attacks.[231]

170. Geneva Protocol I defines civilians and civilian objects as follows:[*]

171. A civilian includes all persons in the relevant area except members of:

- the armed forces, including militias and volunteer units forming part of the armed forces,
- militias or resistance movements, and
- the inhabitants of a territory who spontaneously take up arms to resist an invasion.[232]

172. Where it is not clear whether a person is a civilian, he or she must be treated as a civilian.[233] The presence within a civilian population of some individuals who are not civilians does not change the civilian nature of that population.[234] This means that even if a town contains some enemy combatants, it should not become a military target.

* Although this treaty did not itself apply to the conflict in Timor-Leste as Indonesia was not a party to it, the provisions dealing with the principle of distinction have been said to reflect customary law: see for example Christopher Greenwood, "The Customary Law Status of the 1977 Geneva Protocols" in Astrid J.M. Delissen and Gerrard J. Tanja (eds) Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict: Challenges Ahead. Dordrecht, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, 1991 in p.109.

173. All objects and buildings except "military objectives" are classed as civilian and therefore protected.[235] Military objectives are objects which make an effective contribution to military action and the destruction or capture of which provides a military advantage.[236]

174. Where guerrilla fighters take part in a conflict, they must distinguish themselves from civilians. Under the laws and customs of war and the Third Geneva Convention of 1949, the requirements are that such fighters must:

- be part of an organisation commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates;
- wear a fixed distinctive sign recognisable at a distance or otherwise distinguish themselves clearly from civilians;*
- carry weapons openly, and
- generally conduct their operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war.†

175. A more relaxed standard applies to persons who take up arms spontaneously against an invading army without sufficient time to organise into formal organised units. They are required only to carry arms openly and comply generally with the laws and customs of war.[237]

176. Those who do not comply with these requirements while participating in fighting are not entitled Prisoner of War status if captured,[238] and also forfeit their civilian status as a result of their participation, becoming a legitimate target. They are sometimes referred to as "unlawful" or "unprivileged combatants". They may be tried and punished for their participation in the fighting. However, importantly, although civilians are not permitted to join in the fighting without complying with these requirements, they are always permitted to act in self-defence.

177. The Commission has taken the view that, in general, the members of Falintil sufficiently complied with the above requirements. Falintil had relatively strict and enforced command structures and discipline, carried arms openly and generally conducted their operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war. From the commencement of the conflict members of Falintil wore the uniforms of the Portuguese army. By 1980 many of these uniforms had become worn and were at various times replaced with other military fatigues. However the combination of the available uniforms and insignias and other very distinctive features, such as Falintil members

* The purpose of the requirement in Article 1 of the Hague Regulations and Article 4A(2) of Geneva Convention III that combatants wear a fixed distinctive sign recognisable at a distance is to enable the enemy to distinguish members of the group (who are legitimate military targets) from civilians (who are not legitimate targets). For this reason it seems likely that under customary law it has been subsumed by the more liberal requirement under Article 43(3) First Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions 1977 that members of the group must distinguish themselves from civilians in some way. It seems likely that this broader requirement either reflected pre-existing custom in 1977 or became customary soon thereafter: see Christopher Greenwood, "Customary Law Status of the 1977 Geneva Protocols", in Astrid J.M. Delissen and Gerard J. Tanja (eds), Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict: Challenges Ahead, Dordrecht, Martinus Nijhoff, 1991, at p.107.

† Article 1 Hague Regulations 1907 and Article 4A (2) Geneva Convention III. Although less onerous requirements are set down in Article 44(3) of the First Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions, that treaty was not applicable to the conflict in Timor-Leste, and in this respect does not reflect customary law.

adopting an exclusive and uniform policy of wearing extremely long hair, made them easily distinguishable from a distance.[239]

2. The mistreatment of enemy combatants is prohibited

178. Under the laws of war, special rules apply to combatants who have fallen into enemy hands.

179. Most combatants in enemy hands are entitled to Prisoner of War (POW) status. These include:

- members of the armed forces, including militias forming part of the armed forces,
- people who accompany the armed forces in support or logistical roles,
- members of militias or resistance movements who have complied with the requirement to distinguish themselves from civilians (including by wearing a distinctive uniform and carrying weapons openly), and
- inhabitants of a territory who spontaneously take up arms to resist an invasion, without having had time to organise themselves into a military structure, but who carry arms openly and obey the laws and customs of war.*

180. Where it is unclear whether a person is entitled to POW status, he must be treated as a POW until a competent tribunal determines his status.[240] Prisoners of war must be treated humanely.[241] They must not be tortured, killed or subjected to intimidation or insults.[242] They must be provided with food and water and any necessary medical treatment.[243] They must be held away from areas in danger of attack during military activities.[244]

181. Combatants who fall into enemy hands but are not entitled to POW status, such as resistance fighters who have not complied with the requirement to distinguish themselves from civilians, are still entitled to certain standards of treatment. Under Geneva Convention IV, persons in occupied territories who are suspected of acts hostile to the occupying power must be treated with humanity and are entitled to a fair trial.[245] In all cases unlawful combatants are entitled to humane treatment under general international law,† and the protection of human rights law which forbids extra-judicial killing, torture and arbitrary detention, and which guarantees rights to a fair trial (see sections of this Annexe on Unlawful Killings, Disappearance, Arbitrary Detention, Torture and Other Cruel and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment, and Unfair Trials, above).

* Article 4 Geneva Convention III; article 44 (1), (3) and (4) Geneva Protocol I. (This includes sick or wounded combatants: Article 14 Geneva Convention I).

† More specifically, by application of the Martens Clause (set out in the Hague Convention IV of 1907 and a number of other conventions), include "principles of humanity": see Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-sixth Session, 2 May–22 July 1994, GAOR A/49/10, at p.317; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at pp257 and 259 and the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen at pp.406-408.

3. Unlawful means of warfare

182. Under the laws of armed conflict, the weapons and techniques ("means of warfare") that may be used to cause harm to opposing forces are limited.[246] Two general principles apply:

1. It is forbidden to use means of warfare which cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering;[247]
2. It is forbidden to use means of warfare that do not allow the attacker to distinguish between military targets and civilians ("indiscriminate means").[248] This prohibition covers tactics such as poisoning of water supplies, and attempts to starve a population.[249]

4. Forced recruitment into military activities

183. Under the laws and customs of war it is prohibited to compel enemy nationals to take part in operations of war that are directed at their own country.[250] Geneva Convention IV also prohibits an occupying power from compelling civilians to serve in its armed or auxiliary forces.[251] This prohibition also covers pressure or propaganda directed at encouraging enlistment.[252]

5. Duties of an occupying power

184. It is important to note that an occupying power does not acquire sovereignty over the occupied area. Rather, occupation should be a temporary state, during which the occupying power has certain obligations towards the local population. These obligations are in addition to those set out above in respect of hostilities. Some of the most important and relevant rules are:

- Civilians are entitled to respect for their person, honour, family rights, religious convictions, customs and property, and to humane treatment generally[253]
- The occupying power must not cause physical suffering to civilians[254]
- The occupying power must ensure that the population receives adequate food, water and medical treatment, including by importing resources or accepting aid if local supplies are inadequate[255]
- The occupying power must protect children by ensuring that institutions for their care and education are functioning; and by refraining from enlisting them in its services.[256]

185. Although the occupying power is permitted,[257] and in fact obliged,[258] to restore public order, the means by which they may do this are not unlimited. It may not:

- require inhabitants in the occupied areas to swear allegiance to it,[259]
- deprive people of any rights to a fair trial[260]
- carry out individual or mass forcible transfers or deportations of the local population, or transfer its own citizens into the occupied territory,[261] or

- override the existing laws and legal institutions of the occupied territory, except as necessary to maintain government and security;[262] or carry out criminal trials outside the occupied territory.[263]

186. The occupying power may compel civilians to work (for a fair wage), but only where it is necessary for the needs of the occupying army, or to ensure the functioning of public utilities or the provision of food, shelter and medical services.[264] However the occupying power may not:

- Compel civilians to serve in the armed or auxiliary forces of the occupying power or subject them to pressure or propaganda encouraging enlistment[265]
- Compel children under the age of 18 years to do work,[266] or
- Force civilians to provide information about the resistance forces or its means of defence.[267]

187. The occupying power may use the resources of the occupied territory, but only to the extent necessary to cover the cost of the occupation. It may not use local resources to enrich its own population or support its general military operations.[268]

188. The occupying power is prohibited from confiscating private property,* except for the needs of the occupying army where the requisitions are in proportion to the resources of the country, and in return for compensation.[269]

Was Timor-Leste an occupied territory?

Territory is considered occupied when it comes under the actual authority of the invading army.[270] This may be seen to occur where:

- The occupying power is in a position to substitute its own authority for that of the occupied authorities who have become incapable of functioning properly;
- The enemy forces have been defeated or have withdrawn, although sporadic local resistance may continue;
- The occupying power has a sufficient force present to make its authority felt;
- A temporary administration has been established over the territory;
- The occupying power has issued and enforced directions to the civilian population.[271]

* Article 46 Hague Regulations; contrast the public property of the state, which may be used by the occupying army.

Indonesia's control over the territory of Timor-Leste increased gradually after the invasion in 1975. The Commission considers that from approximately December 1978 until September 1999 the above indicia were present in Timor-Leste and that Indonesia was in sufficient actual control of the territory to be considered an occupying power. Although resistance continued, it was not sufficient to nullify the state of occupation.

Internal armed conflicts: the civil war of August–September 1975

189. The main sources of humanitarian law applicable during an internal armed conflict are:

- common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, and
- parts of the laws and customs of war.

190. Common Article 3 requires parties to the conflict to provide humane treatment to persons who are taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of armed forces who have laid down their arms or are hors de combat due to sickness, wounds, detention or other cause. In respect of those persons it is prohibited to carry out the following acts:

- violence, especially murder, mutilation, cruel treatment, and torture
- the taking of hostages
- outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment
- the passing of sentences or the carrying out of executions without a fair trial.

191. Further general principles have become part of the laws and customs of war and are applicable during an internal armed conflict. Many of these rules are directed at the protection of civilians:[*]

- attacks must never be launched at civilians as such;[272]
- in conducting military operations, all possible precautions must be taken to protect civilians;[273]
- it is prohibited to attack civilian dwellings or other buildings, or to attack places or areas for the protection of civilians such as hospitals;[274]

* See UN General Assembly Resolution 2444 (XXIII), 19 December 1968 and UN General Assembly Resolution 2675 (XXV), 9 December 1970, both recognised as declaratory of customary law by the ICTY in Prosecutor v Tadic Appeals Chamber decision on Jurisdiction, paragraph 110-112; and see more generally Prosecutor v Tadic Appeals Chamber decision on Jurisdiction, paragraph 100-119.

- it is prohibited to make civilians the target of forcible transfers or of reprisals (acts of retribution for violations of humanitarian law carried out by opposing forces);[275]
- a distinction must always be maintained between civilians and those taking part in the conflict ("combatants").[276] This means that combatants must distinguish themselves visually from civilians, in order to make it possible for enemy combatants to restrict their attacks to combatants and military targets. "Perfidy" is also prohibited.*

192. The other fundamental rules of the laws and customs of war applicable during an internal armed conflict are those that limit the methods and weapons that it is permissible to use.[277] The basic rules governing permissible means of warfare are the same as those that apply to international armed conflicts.[278] These principles prohibit methods and weapons which:

- cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering,[279] or
- by their nature are incapable of distinguishing between civilian and military targets ("indiscriminate means").[280]

Obligations on individuals (individual criminal responsibility)

193. The mandate of the Commission specifically includes "criminal acts" committed in Timor-Leste during the relevant period.

194. Customary international law prohibits individuals from committing the following crimes:

Genocide

195. Genocide occurs where a person commits any of the following prohibited acts against a national, ethnic, racial or religious group with the specific intention of destroying the group in whole or in part:

1. Killing members of the group;
2. Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;
3. Inflicting certain conditions of life upon the group which are intended to bring about the destruction of the group in whole or in part;
4. Inflicting measures to prevent births;
5. Forcibly transferring children from one group to another.[281]

* Prosecutor v Dusko Tadic, ICTY Case Number IT-94-1, Appeals Chamber Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 October 1995, paragraph 125. See section on International law: obligations on states and armed groups, above.

Crimes against humanity

196. A crime against humanity occurs where any of the following prohibited acts are committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population:

1. Murder
2. Extermination (including by deprivation of food)[282]
3. Enslavement
4. Deportation or forcible transfer of population
5. Forced labour
6. Imprisonment
7. Torture
8. Rape
9. Persecutions on political, racial, or religious grounds
10. Other inhuman acts.[283]

Aggression

197. The crime of aggression was originally said to occur where a person plans, prepares, initiates or wages a war of aggression, or a war in violation of international treaties, agreements or assurances, or participates in a common plan for the accomplishment of those acts.[284]

198. However, recently the international community has been unable to agree on a current definition for this crime.[285]

War crimes

199. Two categories of war crimes exist in the context of an international armed conflict. The first are referred to as "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions. A "grave breach" occurs where any of the following acts is committed against vulnerable persons, namely those who are shipwrecked, sick or wounded, prisoners of war, and civilians:

1. Wilful killing
2. Torture or inhuman treatment, including biological experiments
3. Wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health
4. Extensive destruction and appropriation of property, not justified by military necessity and carried out unlawfully and wantonly
5. Compelling a prisoner of war or a civilian to serve in the forces of a hostile power
6. Wilfully depriving a prisoner of war or a civilian of the rights of fair and regular trial

7. Unlawful deportation or transfer or unlawful confinement of a civilian
8. Taking civilians as hostages.[286]

200. The second category consists of serious breaches of the laws and customs of war including, among others, the following:

1. Murder, ill-treatment or deportation of the civilian population of an occupied territory
2. Murder or ill-treatment of prisoners of war
3. Plunder of public or private property
4. Wanton destruction of towns or villages or devastation not justified by military necessity[287]
5. Employment of poisonous weapons or weapons calculated to cause unnecessary suffering
6. Attack, or bombardment of undefended towns, villages, dwellings, or buildings
7. Seizure, destruction or damage of institutions dedicated to religion, charity and education, the arts and sciences, historic monuments and works of art and science[288]
8. Intentionally directing attacks against the civilians or civilian objects[289]
9. Taking hostages[290]
10. Rape[291]
11. Torture (whether involving a public official or purely private individuals)[292]
12. Killing or wounding a combatant who has surrendered
13. Transfer by the Occupying Power of parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies, or the deportation or transfer of the population of the occupied territory
14. Compelling nationals of the hostile party to take part in operations of war directed against their own country
15. Using the presence of civilians or other protected persons to render areas immune from military operations
16. Employing weapons, or methods of warfare which cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering or which are inherently indiscriminate
17. Intentionally using starvation of civilians as a method of warfare by depriving them of objects indispensable to their survival, including wilfully impeding relief supplies.*

201. In an internal armed conflict, war crimes consist only of the most serious violations of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions or the laws and customs of war.[293] Serious violations of Common Article 3 include the following acts when committed against persons taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of armed forces who have laid down their arms or who are sick, wounded or in detention:

* Paragraphs (12) to (17) are examples from Article 8 of the ICC Statute which the Commission considers to reflect war crimes under customary law.

1. Violence to life and person, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture
2. Committing outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment
3. Taking of hostages, and
4. The passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all judicial guarantees which are generally recognised as indispensable.[294]

202. Other violations of the laws and customs of war amounting to war crimes in internal armed conflict include:

1. Launching attacks on the civilian population;
2. Committing rape or other sexual violations.*

Command responsibility

203. Under international law it is not only the person who directly carries out a crime that is responsible, but also that person's superiors, especially in the military or government. A superior will be directly responsible where a crime is committed by a subordinate that was ordered by the superior. In addition, a person who is in the position of a superior (either in law or in fact) and who has effective control over his or her subordinates[295] will have command responsibility where a crime is committed by a subordinate and the superior knew or should have known of the crime but did nothing to prevent or punish it.[296]

"Criminal Acts": domestic law of Portugal and Indonesia

Introduction

204. The Commission's mandate includes reference to "criminal acts" which occurred in Timor-Leste during the relevant period. That term is not defined in the UNTAET regulations establishing the Commission. The Commission considers that it is intended to cover violations of domestic and international criminal laws that were applicable to the territory of Timor-Leste at the relevant times.

* See for example Article 8(2)(e)(i) and (vi) which the Commission considers to reflect customary international law.

Which laws applied in Timor-Leste?

There is no doubt that at the beginning of the Commission's mandate period the law in force in Timor-Leste was Portuguese law. This law remained in force at least until the Indonesian invasion.

It is more difficult to say which law applied during the Indonesian occupation. Although Indonesia may have been prohibited under international law from applying its laws in occupied Timor-Leste, it is clear that as a matter of fact it was Indonesian law that was applied and enforced.

The East Timorese Court of Appeal has held that because the Indonesian annexation was in violation of international law, Indonesian law was never in force in Timor-Leste and Portuguese law continued to apply.[297]

Conversely, the Special Panel for Serious Crimes has since held that the Court of Appeal was wrong to apply Portuguese law and that Indonesian law in fact applied.[298] The East Timorese Parliament has also legislated to indicate its understanding that the law that was in force before 25 October 1999, and which has been continued by legislation since then, is Indonesian law.[299]

An occupying power must leave in place all penal laws in existence in the occupied territory, the only exception being for those that constitute a threat to the security of the occupying power or an obstacle to the application of Geneva Conventions.[300] The wholesale importation of the occupying power's own domestic law and legal system is therefore prohibited.[301] Where this does occur the occupying power is in breach of its obligations under humanitarian law. However it is unclear whether the new or imported laws are invalid within the occupied territory.

It may therefore be that under international law Portuguese law remained applicable as a question of law. However Indonesian law was certainly applied in fact. For this reason the Commission considers that both bodies of law are relevant to its mandate in respect of the period of the Indonesian occupation.

Portuguese law

205. On 25 April 1974, at the beginning of the Commission mandate period, Portuguese law was the applicable domestic law in Timor-Leste. It is Portuguese law that governed the actions of those who participated in acts of violence leading up to and during the civil war of 1975.

206. The Portuguese Criminal Code as it existed in 1975 included prohibitions on the following conduct:

207. Crimes against personal liberty, including:

- detaining a free person[302]
- using physical violence to compel another person to do something[303]
- illegally detaining, arresting, imprisoning or restraining a person,[304] especially where violence or threats of death, torture or assault are used,[305] or where a person is held hostage[306]
- using violence against a person who is lawfully detained.[307]

208. Crimes against the person, including:

- murder and attempted murder, especially where the acts are premeditated or are accompanied by torture or acts of cruelty[308]
- assault, especially where it results in illness, injury, psychological harm, or death[309]
- using or threatening to use a firearm or projectile weapons.[310]

209. In cases involving provocation or self-defence, self-defence could reduce or excuse responsibility for these crimes.[311]

210. Crimes involving damage to property, including:

- housebreaking[312]
- arson[313]
- destroying part of or all of a building that belongs to another person or the state[314]
- damaging or destroying a public utility[315]
- damaging crops or livestock[316]
- damaging property by rioting.[317]

Indonesian law

211. Indonesian law was applied in Timor-Leste after it was annexed as Indonesia's 27th province pursuant to Indonesian Law 7/76 of 17 July 1976.[318] Although the Indonesian annexation of Timor-Leste was in breach of international law, the Commission considers that Indonesian law is relevant in any event because it regulated the actions of Indonesians in Timor-Leste, who in many cases violated not only international law, but Indonesian law as well. In addition, whether validly or not, Indonesian law was in fact used to regulate the actions of East Timorese people.

212. The Commission has not included in its inquiries acts that were technically violations of Indonesian laws where the laws themselves constituted violations of human rights standards, such as the right to freedom of expression and opinion, and the right to self-determination. Indonesian law contained extensive provisions prohibiting political activities which were perceived to threaten the authority of the state. These were contained for example in the1963 Law on Eradication of Subversive Activities,[319] the Law on Political Activity,[320] as well as some of the provisions of the Indonesian criminal code.

213. Indonesia's Criminal Code (Kitab Undang-Undang Hukum Pidana, KUHP) governs criminal acts committed by civilians and officials, including the armed forces. The following types of conduct constitute crimes under the KUHP:

214. Crimes against the general security of persons, including:

- deliberately setting a fire, causing an explosion, damaging electrical works, or damaging or destroying buildings, especially if it endangers property or life or results in death;[321]
- poisoning public water sources.[322]

215. Sexual and related crimes, including:

- rape;[*]
- carnal knowledge of a girl under 15 years of age;[323]
- using force or the threat of force to compel someone to commit or tolerate an obscene act, or committing an obscene act with someone who is unconscious or helpless or a girl under 15 years of age;[324]
- trading in women or boys.[325]

216. Crimes against personal liberty, including:

- Participating in slavery;[326]
- Kidnapping;[327]
- Abducting a minor, especially if done with tricks, force, or the threat of force;[328]
- Depriving a person of his or her liberty, especially if serious physical injury or death results.[329]

217. Crimes against life and the person, including:

- manslaughter;[330]
- murder;[331]

* Article 285 KUHP (Rape is defined so as to only include sexual intercourse with a woman out of marriage by using force or the threat of force. Under Article 286 KUHP having carnal knowledge of a woman out of marriage who is unconscious or helpless is also prohibited).

- maltreatment, especially if it causes serious physical injury or death, or if done with premeditation;[332]
- deliberately causing serious physical injury to another person ("serious maltreatment"), especially if done with premeditation.[333]

218. Crimes against property, including:

- theft, especially if carried out during a fire, explosion, or distress caused by war, or if accompanied by force or the threat of force;[334]
- deliberately destroying or damaging property belonging to another, electricity or water works, or buildings.[335]

219. Crimes against public order and similar crimes, including:

- hindering a person from freely voting in an election by violence or the threat of violence;[336]
- hindering a lawful public meeting by violence or the threat of violence;[337]
- hindering a lawful public religious meeting or funeral ceremony by violence or the threat of violence;[338]
- burying or hiding a dead body with intent to conceal the death.[339]

220. The KUHP provides that where an official (including a member of the armed forces[340]) commits a crime by employing the power, opportunity or means conferred on him by his office, the punishment for that offence is to be increased by a third.[341] In addition, certain specific crimes by officials are prohibited, including:

- The misuse of power by an official to force someone to do, not to do, or to tolerate something;[342]
- The use of coercion by an official to procure a confession or statement in a criminal case.[343]

Indonesian military law

221. In addition to the general criminal provisions of the KUHP, Indonesian military personnel are regulated by the Indonesian Military Criminal Code (Kitab Undang-undang Hukum Pidana Militer, KUHPM) and other legislation specific to the military.[344]

222. Although Indonesia is a party to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, it has not incorporated the substance of those conventions into its military law. This means that the war crimes set out in the Geneva Conventions do not constitute crimes under Indonesian law. Similarly, during the CAVR's mandate period Indonesian law did not recognise the crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes or torture (although it has since done so).*

* As part of Law 26/2000 on the Ad Hoc Human Rights Courts

End notes

1. Regulation 10/2001 Section 3.1(b)
2. Regulation 10/2001 Section 13.1(a)(ii)
3. Regulation 10/2001 Section 13.1(a)(i)
4. Regulation 10/2001 Section 13.1(a)(iii)
5. Regulation 10/2001 Section 13.1(a)(iv)
6. Regulation 10/2001 Section 13.1(a)(v)
7. Regulation 10/2001 Section 13.1(a)(vi)
8. Regulation 10/2001 Section 13.1(c)
9. Regulation 10/2001 Section 13.1(d)
10. Regulation 10/2001 Section 21
11. Regulation 10/2001 Section 3.1(e)
12. Regulation 10/2001 Section 3.1(g)
13. Regulation 10/2001 Section 3.1(h)
14. Regulation 10/2001 Section 3.1(f)
15. Regulation 10/2001 Section 3.1(i)
16. Regulation 10/2001 Section 3.3
17. Regulation 10/2001 Section 13.2
18. Regulation 10/2001 Section 1(j)
19. Report of the Meeting of Special Rapporteurs/Representatives Experts and Chairpersons of Working Groups of the Special Procedures of the Commission on Human Rights and the Advisory Services Programme, UN Commission on Human Rights, E/CN.4/1997/3, 30 September 1996, paragraph 46; Analytical report of the Secretary-General on Minimum Humanitarian Standards submitted pursuant to Commission on Human Rights Resolution 1997/21, E/CN.4/1998/87, 5 January 1998, paragraph 59-61.
20. Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report, Vol. 1, Ch. 4 paras 77-81.
21. Regulation 10/2001 Section 1(c)
22. Regulation 10/2001 Section 1(d)
23. Regulation 10/2001 Section 14
24. Regulation 10/2001 Sections 20.1 and 39
25. Regulation 10/2001 Section 45
26. Regulation 10/2001 Section 44.2
27. Regulation 10/2001 Section 44.2
28. Regulation 10/2001 Sections 13.1(a)(i), (iii)and (iv) and 13.1(c).
29. International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor to the Secretary-General, UN Document A/54/726 – S/2000/59, 31 January 20
30. Regulation 10/2001 Sections 3 (c), 13 (1)
31. Regulation 10/2001 Section 3(1)(d)
32. Regulation 10/2001 Section 3(1)(e)
33. Article 25 UN Charter.
34. Security Council Resolution 384 (1975) of 22 December 1975, paragraph 2; SC Resolution 389 (1976) of 22 April 1976, paragraph 2.
35. Article 2(4) UN Charter.
36. Military and Paramilitary Activities in and Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v United States of America) (1986) ICJ Reports 4 at p100.
37. Articles 51, 42 UN Charter.
38. Christine Gray, International Law and the Use of Force, Oxford, Oxford University Press, 2000, at p.52.
39. Article 73 UN Charter.
40. Article 73(a) UN Charter
41. Regulation 10/2001 Section 22.1
42. Regulation 10/2001 Section 23

43. Regulation 10/2001 Section 24
44. Regulation 10/2001 Sections 25, 26, and 27
45. Regulation 10/2001 Sub-section 27.7
46. Regulation 10/2001 Sub-section 27.8
47. Regulation 10/2001 Section 28
48. Regulation 10/2001 Section 32
49. Regulation 10/2001 Schedule 1, paragraph 1
50. Regulation 10/2001 Sub-section 22.2
51. Article 25 UN Charter.
52. Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at pp. 254-255.
53. Security Council Resolution 384, 22 December 1975; Security Council Resolution 389, 22 April 1976; General Assembly Resolution 3485 (XXX), 12 December 1975; General Assembly Resolution 36/50, 24 November 1981; General Assembly Resolution 37/30, 23 November 1982.
54. Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, (2004) ICJ at para 87.
55. Regulation 10/2001 Sections 3 and 1(c).
56. Regulation 10/2001 Section 1(e).
57. Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, (2004) ICJ at paragraph 102-106; see also Concluding Observations of the Human Rights Committee on Israel, of 18 August 1998 (CCPR/C/79/Add.93 at paragraph10), and of 21 August (2003CCPR/CO/78/ISR at paragraph 11); and Concluding Observations of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights on Israel, of 23 May 2003, (E/C.12/1/Add.90 at paragraph 15 and 31).
58. Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, (2004) ICJ at paragraph 107-113.
59. Most importantly in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, GA Res 1514 (XV) 14 December 1960; the Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in Accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, GA Res 2625 (XXV) 24 October 1970; and the Definition of Aggression, GA Res 3314 (XXIX) 14 December 1974.
60. Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (2004) ICJ at paragraph 88 and 155-156; Case Concerning East Timor (Portugal v Australia) (1995) ICJ Reports 90 at paragraph 29.
61. Human Rights Committee General Comment 12, paragraph 1.
62. Antonio Cassesse, Self-Determination of Peoples, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1995, p.90; Yearbook of the International Law Commission (1988) Vol II, pt.2, at p.64; see also Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, (2004) ICJ, Separate opinion of Judge Higgins at paragraph 29-30.
63. GA Res 3485 (XXX) 12 December 1975; GA Res 31/53, 1 December 1976; GA Res 32/34, 28 November 1977; GA Res 33/39, 13 December 1978; GA Res 34/40, 21 November 1979; GA Res 35/27, 11 November 1980; GA Res 36/50, 24 November 1981; GA Res 37/30, 23 November 1982.
64. SC Res 384, 22 December 1975; SC Res 389, 22 April 1976.
65. Article 1(3) ICCPR and art 1(3) ICESCR.
66. Human Rights Committee General Comment 12, paragraph 6.
67. Human Rights Committee General Comment 12, paragraph 6.
68. See for example the separate opinions of Judge Higgins (at paragraph 30) and Judge Kooijmans (at paragraph 32) in the Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (2004) ICJ Reports.
69. Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, (2004) ICJ Reports at paragraph 88.
70. Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South-West Africa) Notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970) (1971) ICJ Reports 16 at paragraph 119; Separate opinion of Judge Weeramantry in the Case Concerning East Timor (Portugal v Australia) (1995) ICJ Reports 90, especially at 204; Article 41(2), ILC Draft Articles on the Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, International Law Commission, Commentaries on the Draft Articles on the Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, at pp.287-291 especially p.290.

71. Human Rights Committee General Comment 24, para 8.
72. Article.4(2) of the ICCPR; Human Rights Committee, General Comment 6, para.1.
73. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 6, para 7.
74. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 6, para 3
75. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 6, para 2; Human Rights Committee, General Comment 14, para 2.
76. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 6, para.4.
77. Jegatheeswara Sarma v Sri Lanka (2003) HRC Communication No. 950/2000 at para 9.3.
78. See Article 1(2), Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearances, General Assembly Resolution 47/133 of 18 December 1992.
79. Quinteros v. Uruguay (1983) HRC Comm. No. 107/1981 at para 14; Jegatheeswara Sarma v Sri Lanka (2003) HRC Communication No. 950/2000 at para 9.5.
80. UN Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, Fact Sheet No. 6 (Rev.2).
81. Article 13(1) UDHR and Article 12(1) ICCPR.
82. Article 12(3) ICCPR; HRC General Comment 27, para 11
83. Article 25(1) UDHR and Article 11(1) ICESCR.
84. Article 11(2) ICESCR.
85. CESCR General Comment 12 para 8.
86. Article 2 ICESCR, CESCR General Comment No. 12, para 14.
87. Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment 12, para 14.
88. Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment 12, para 19.
89. Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment 15, para 3; Article 11(1) ICESCR.
90. Article 25(1) UDHR; Article 11(1) ICESCR; CESCR General Comment 4.
91. Article 3 UDHR, Article 6 ICCPR.
92. Human Rights Committee General Comment 6, para 5.
93. See the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Engel v The Netherlands (ECHR 1976 Applic No. 5100/71) at para 58.
94. Human Rights Committee General Comment 24, para 8.
95. See UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Fact Sheet No. 26 on the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention; see also for example the 2003 Opinions adopted by the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, E/CN.4/2004/3/Add.1.
96. Van Alphen v The Netherlands (HRC Comm. No. 305/1998, 23 July 1990).
97. See for example the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Quinn v France (1995) ECHR Application No. 18580/91.
98. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 8 para 2; See also Jijon v Ecuador (1992) HRC Comm. No. 227/88 where a delay of five days in bringing a prisoner before a judge was held to breach Article 9(3).
99. Article 9(3) ICCPR.
100. Human Rights Committee General Comment 8 para 3.
101. Human Rights Committee General Comment 8 para 4.
102. See also the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners; the Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment and the Basic Principles for the Treatment of Prisoners.
103. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 29, para 13(a).
104. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 29, para 13(a).
105. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 21, para. 3.
106. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 20, para 6; Human Rights Committee, General Comment 7, para 2, El-Megreisi v Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (1990) HRC Comm. No. 440/90, para 5.4; Mukong v Cameroon (1994) HRC Comm. No. 458/91 at para 9.3-9.4.

107. Mukong v Cameroon (1994) HRC Comm. No. 458/91 at para 9.3-9.4.
108. HRC in General Comment 24, para 8; Prosecutor v Anto Furundzija (1998) ICTY Case No. IT-95-17/1, Trial Chamber Judgment, 10 December 1998, at paragraphs 144-155.
109. Prosecutor v Anto Furundzija (1998) ICTY Case No. IT-95-17/1, Trial Chamber Judgment, 10 December 1998, at paragraphs 153-155; Human Rights Committee in General Comment 24, paragraph 10.
110. Article 2(1) CAT.
111. Article 16 CAT.
112. Article 2(2) CAT.
113. Article 4 CAT.
114. Articles 12 and 13 CAT; Article 16 CAT.
115. Article 10 CAT; Article 11 CAT; Article 16 CAT.
116. Article 15 CAT.
117. GRB v Sweden (1998) CAT Comm No. 83/1997, paragraph 6.5.
118. Elmi v Australia (1999) HRC Communication No. 120/1998, at para 6.5.
119. Prosecutor v Kunarac (2002) ICTY Appeals Chamber, at paras 146-147.
120. Human Rights Committee General Comment 20, para 4.
121. Human Rights Committee General Comment 20, para 2.
122. Mukong v Cameroon (1994) HRC Comm. No. 458/91 at para 9.4.
123. Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture on Israel, A/52/44, 9/5/97 at para 257; see also Ireland v UK (1978) ECHR Applic No. 5310/71, at paras 96 and 167.
124. Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture on Israel, A/52/44, 9/5/97 at para 257.
125. Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture on Israel, A/52/44, 9/5/97 at para 257; see also Ireland v UK (1978) ECHR Applic No. 5310/71, at paras 96 and 167.
126. Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture on Israel, A/52/44, 9/5/97 at para 257.
127. Article 16 CAT.
128. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 20, para 2.
129. Article 9(2) and 14(3)(a) ICCPR.
130. Article 9(3) ICCPR.
131. Article 14(3)(b) ICCPR.
132. Human Rights Committee General Comment 13, para 9.
133. Article 14(3)(c) ICCPR.
134. Article 14(1) ICCPR.
135. Campbell v Jamaica (1993) HRC Communication No. 307/1988, para 6.4.
136. Campbell v Jamaica (1993) HRC Communication No. 307/1988, para 6.4.
137. HRC General Comment No. 20, para 12; Article 15 CAT.
138. Article 14(1) ICCPR.
139. Van Meurs v The Netherlands (1990) Comm No. 215/1986, at para 6.2; see Riepan v Austria (2000) ECHR, Application No. 35115/97, at paras 28-31.
140. Article 14(2) ICCPR.
141. Article 14(3)(d) ICCPR.
142. Article 14(3)(e) ICCPR.
143. Article 14(3)(f) ICCPR.
144. Article 14(3)(g) ICCPR.
145. Berry v Jamaica (1994) HRC Communication No. 330/1988, para 11.7.
146. Article 14(5) ICCPR.
147. Henry v Jamaica (1991) HRC Communication No. 230/1987, para 8.4; Little v Jamaica (1991) HRC Communication No. 283/1988, para 8.5.
148. Article 15 ICCPR.
149. Article 19 UDHR; Article 19 ICCPR.
150. Article 20 UDHR; Articles 21 and 22 ICCPR.
151. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 10, para 1.

152. Article 19(3) ICCPR; Article 21 ICCPR; Article 22(2) ICCPR; Human Rights Committee, General Comment 10, para 4; Kim v Republic of Korea, (1999) HRC Communication No. 574/1994, para 12.2.

153. Kim v Republic of Korea, (1999) HRC Communication No. 574/1994, para 12.5; Park v Korea (1998) HRC Communication No. 628/1995, para 10.3.

154. Park v Korea (1998) HRC Communication No. 628/1995, para 10.3.

155. Prosecutor v Anto Furundzija, ICTY Case No. IT-95-17/1, Trial Chamber Judgment, 10 December 1998, at para 170-171; 1995 Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, E/CN.4/1995/34 Para 15-24; Mejia v. Peru (1996) Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, Report No. 5/96; Aydin v. Turkey (1997) ECHR Application No. 23178/94 at paras. 83 and 86.

156. Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kovac and Zoran Vukovic, ICTY Case No. IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1, Appeals Chamber Judgment, 12 June 2002, para 150.

157. Prosecutor v Anto Furundzija, ICTY Case No. IT-95-17/1, Trial Chamber Judgment, 10 December 1998, at para 170.

158. Article 12 UDHR and article 17 ICCPR; see for example Mejia v. Peru (1996) Inter-American Commission on HR, Report No. 5/96.

159. Under Article 2 CEDAW; Article 2(1) ICCPR, Article 2(2) ICESCR; See for example CEDAW General Recommendations 12 and 19.

160. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 28, para 8.

161. Article 4 UDHR, Article 8 ICCPR.

162. Barcelona Traction, Light and Power Co Ltd (Belgium v Spain) (1970) ICJ Reports 4 at p32.

163. See Summary record of the 1359th meeting: Nepal, 21/10/94, CCPR/C/SR.1359 at para 41.

164. Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kovac and Zoran Vukovic, ICTY Case No. IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1, Trial Chamber Judgment, 22 February 2001, at para 539; Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kovac and Zoran Vukovic, ICTY Case No. IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1, Appeals Chamber Judgment, 12 June 2002, at para 124.

165. Article 6 CEDAW.

166. See also Article 24 ICCPR.

167. Article 3(1) CRC.

168. Article 6 CRC.

169. Article 37(a) CRC.

170. Article 37(b) CRC.

171. Article 24 CRC; see also ICESCR Article 12(2)(a).

172. Article 19 CRC.

173. Article 34 CRC.

174. Article 36 CRC.

175. Article 27 CRC.

176. Article 37 CRC; see also ICCPR Article 6.

177. Articles 38(2)-(3) CRC.

178. Article 38(3) CRC.

179. Article 32; See also Article 10(3) ICESCR.

180. Article 9 CRC.

181. Articles 11 and 35 CRC.

182. Article 21 CRC.

183. Article 20 CRC.

184. Article 8 CRC.

185. Article 6 ICESCR and Article 23 UDHR, See also the prohibitions on forced labour in Article 8(3) of the ICCPR.

186. Article 7 ICESCR and Article 23 UDHR.

187. Article 7 ICESCR.

188. Article 11 ICESCR and Article 25(1) UDHR.

189. Article 12 ICESCR.

190. Article 13 ICESCR, Article 26 UDHR, Article 28 CRC. See also Article 29 CRC.

191. Article 2(1) ICESCR.
192. Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment 3, paras 1-2.
193. Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment 3 para 10.
194. Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment 3, para 10.
195. Article 1(2) ICESCR, Article 1(2) ICCPR.
196. Article 23 ICCPR.
197. Human Rights Committee, General Comment No. 19, para 5.
198. Article 16(e) CEDAW.
199. Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, General Comment 19, paras 22 and 24(m); see also Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, General Recommendation 21, para 22.
200. For example Article 4 ICCPR.
201. Article 4(2) ICCPR.
202. Article 4(2) ICCPR.
203. Article 4(2) ICCPR.
204. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 29, para 15(a),
205. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 29, para 16.
206. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 29, para 16.
207. Human Rights Committee, General Comment 29, paras 4-5.
208. Regulation 10/2001 Section 1(c.)
209. See Liesbeth Zegveld, The Accountability of Armed Opposition Groups in International Law, Cambridge University Press, 2002, at pp. 9-38.
210. Prosecutor v Akayesu, ICTR Trial Chamber, Case number ICTR-96-4-T, decision of 2 September 1998, para 601.
211. Prosecutor v Dusko Tadic, ICTY Case Number IT-94-1, Appeals Chamber Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 October 1995, paragraph 70.
212. See for example, references to continued fighting between militia groups and Interfet in Report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor, S/2000/53, 26 January 2000, para 18; Report of the Security Council Mission to East Timor and Indonesia (9-17 November 2000), S/2000/1105, 21 November 2000, para 9.
213. See for example Article 1(1) Second Protocol to the Geneva Conventions 1977.
214. Prosecutor v Dusko Tadic, ICTY Case Number IT-94-1, Appeals Chamber Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 October 1995, para 84.
215. Tomás Gonçalves, SCU Interview, 8 August 2000.
216. Prosecutor v Dusko Tadic, ICTY Case Number IT-94-1, Appeals Chamber Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 October 1995, para 84.
217. Common Article 2, Geneva Conventions 1949.
218. Regulation 10/2001 Section 1(d).
219. Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at p257.
220. Article 25 Hague Regs; Article 27 Geneva Convention IV; Articles 51(2) and 57(1) and (2)(a) Geneva Protocol I; Article 52(1) Geneva Protocol I.
221. Articles 33-34 Geneva Convention IV; Article 51(2) Geneva Protocol I.
222. Articles 53 and 54(2) Geneva Protocol I.
223. Article 33 Geneva Convention IV; Articles 51(6) and 52(1) Geneva Protocol I.
224. Article 33 Geneva Convention IV;
225. Article 54 First Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions, which reflects customary international law.
226. Article 23 Geneva Convention IV.
227. Article 51(4) and (5) Geneva Protocol I; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at p257.
228. Articles 51(5)(b) and Article 57(2)(a)(iii) and (b) Geneva Protocol I.
229. Article 57(3) Geneva Protocol I

230. Article 26 Hague Regulations; Article 57(2)(c) Geneva Protocol I.
231. Prosecutor v Tadic, Appeals Chamber decision on Jurisdiction, para 125.
232. Article 50(1) and 43 Geneva Protocol I and Article 4A Geneva Convention III.
233. Article 50(1) Geneva Protocol I.
234. Article 50(3) Geneva Protocol I.
235. Article 52(1) Geneva Protocol I.
236. Article 52(2) Geneva Protocol I.
237. Article 4A(6) Geneva Convention III.
238. Article 4A Geneva Convention III.
239. CAVR Interview with Jacinto Alves, former assistant to the Falintil Chief of Staff, Dili, 3 May 2005.
240. Article 5 Geneva Convention III; Article 45(1) Geneva Protocol I.
241. Article 4, Hague Regulations, Article 13 Geneva Convention III.
242. Articles 13 and 17 Geneva Convention III;
243. Articles 15, 26, 30 Geneva Convention III;
244. Articles 19 and 23 Geneva Convention III;
245. Article 5 Geneva Convention IV.
246. Article.22 Hague Regulations; Article.35(1) Geneva Protocol I; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at p.256.
247. St Petersburg Declaration 1868; Article 23 Hague Regulations; art 35(2) Geneva Protocol I; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at p.257.
248. Article 51(4) Geneva Protocol I; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at p257.
249. See also Article 54(1)-(2) Geneva Protocol I.
250. Article 23 Hague Regulations.
251. Article 51 Geneva Convention IV.
252. Article 51 Geneva Convention IV.
253. Article 46 Hague Regulations, Article 27(1) and 53 of Geneva Convention IV.
254. Article 32, Geneva Convention IV.
255. Article 55, Geneva Convention IV; see also Article 56 Geneva Convention IV re medical treatment and Articles 59-62 regarding accepting aid.
256. Article 50 Geneva Convention IV.
257. Article 27 Geneva Convention IV.
258. Article 43 Hague Regulations.
259. Article 45 Hague Regulations.
260. Articles 65-75 Geneva Convention IV; see also Article 23(h) Hague Regulations.
261. Article 49 Geneva Convention IV.
262. Article 43 Hague Regulations and Article 64 Geneva Convention IV.
263. Article 66 Geneva Convention IV.
264. Article 51 Geneva Convention IV.
265. Article 51 Geneva Convention IV; see also generally Article 23 Hague Regulations.
266. Article 51 Geneva Convention IV
267. Article 44 Hague Regulations.
268. In re Krupp and Others (1948) 15 Annual Digest 620 at pp.622-623, NV De Bataafsche Petroleum Maatschappij and others v The War Damage Commission (1956) 23 ILR 810 at p.822.
269. Article 52 Hague Regulations; see also Article 55 Geneva Convention IV.
270. Article 42 Hague Regulations 1907; Prosecutor v Naletilic and Martinovic Trial Chamber Judgment, 31 March 2003, at para 216.
271. Prosecutor v Naletilic and Martinovic, Trial Chamber Judgement, 31 March 2003, at para 217.
272. UN General Assembly Resolution 2444 (XXIII), 19 December 1968, para 1(b) and UN General Assembly Resolution 2675 (XXV), 9 December 1970, para 4
273. UN General Assembly Resolution 2675 (XXV), 9 December 1970, para 3.

274. UN General Assembly Resolution 2675 (XXV), 9 December 1970, paras 5 and 6.

275. UN General Assembly Resolution 2675 (XXV), 9 December 1970, para 7.

276. UN General Assembly Resolution 2444 (XXIII), 19 December 1968, para 1(c) and UN General Assembly Resolution 2675 (XXV), 9 December 1970, para 4.

277. UN General Assembly Resolution 2444 (XXIII), 19 December 1968, para 1(a); Prosecutor v Tadic, Appeals Chamber decision on Jurisdiction, para 119.

278. Prosecutor v Dusko Tadic, ICTY Case Number IT-94-1, Appeals Chamber Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 October 1995, para 119.

279. See for example Article 23 Hague Regulations 1907; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at p257.

280. See for example Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at p.257.

281. Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide 1948, Article 2.

282. See Article 7(2)(b) Rome Statute of the ICC.

283. Article 6(c) London Charter for the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, Article 5 Statute of the ICTY, Article 3 Statute of the ICTR, Article 7(1) Rome Statute of the ICC.

284. London Charter for the Nuremberg IMT.

285. Giorgio Gaja, "The Long Journey towards Repressing Aggression" in Antonio Cassese et al (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Oxford, Oxford University Press, 2002, at pp435-438; Yoram Dinstein, War, Aggression and Self-Defence (Third edition), Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 2001 at pp.114-116.

286. See Article 50 Geneva Convention I; Article 51 Geneva Convention II; Article 130 Geneva Convention III; and Article 147 Geneva Convention IV.

287. Paras (1)-(4) were contained in the London Charter for the Nuremberg IMT, Article 6(b).

288. Paras (5)-(7) are contained in the Statute of the ICTY, Article 3.

289. Prosecutor v Tihomir Blaskic, ICTY Case No. IT-95-14-T, Trial Chamber Judgment, 3 March 2000, paras 170, 180.

290. Prosecutor v Tihomir Blaskic, ICTY Case No. IT-95-14-T, Trial Chamber Judgment, 3 March 2000, para 187.

291. Prosecutor v Anto Furundzija, ICTY Case No. IT-95-17/1-T, Trial Chamber Judgment, 10 December 1998, para 168.

292. Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunurac and others, ICTY Case No. IT-96-23&23/1, Appeals Chamber Judgement, 12 June 2002, para 148.

293. Prosecutor v Dusko Tadic, ICTY Case Number IT-94-1, Appeals Chamber Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 October 1995, para 134.

294. Common Article 3, Geneva Conventions 1949.

295. See Prosecutor v Zejnil Delalic, Zdravko Mucic, Hazim Delic and Esad Landzo, ICTY Case No. IT-96-21, Appeals Chamber Judgment, 20 February 2001, paras 196-198.

296. See for example Article 7(3) Statute of the ICTY; Article 6(3) Statute of the ICTR; and Article 28 Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court 1998.

297. Armando dos Santos v The Prosecutor General, Case No. 16/2001, 15 July 2003; Agustinho da Costa v The Prosecutor General, Case No. 07/2000, 18 July 2003.

298. The Public Prosecutor v Joao Sarmento and Domingos Mendonca, Case No. 18a/2001, pp.10-13.

299. Article 1 Law 10/2003, 10 December 2003.

300. Article 64 Geneva Convention IV.

301. Myres S. McDougal and Florentino P. Feliciano, The International Law of War, New Haven, New Haven Press, 1994, at p.760.

302. Article 328 Portuguese Criminal Code ("Detainment").

303. Article 329 Portuguese Criminal Code ("Physical Coercion").

304. Article 330 Portuguese Criminal Code ("Private Detention").

305. Article 331 Portuguese Criminal Code ("Special enhancement in crimes of Private Detention").

306. Article 332 Portuguese Criminal Code.

307. Article 335 Portuguese Criminal Code ("Violence of persons against detainees").

308. Article 349 ("Simple wilful murder"), Article 350 ("Attempted murder and failed murder") and Article 351 ("Qualified murder").
309. Portuguese Criminal Code Article 359 ("Simple wilful corporal offences"), Article 360 ("Wilful corporal offences which result in illness or incapacity to work"), Article 361 ("Wilful corporal offences which result in loss of mental sanity, permanent incapacity to work or death") and Article 362 ("Corporal offences that result in death due to accidental circumstances").
310. Article 363 Portuguese Criminal Code ("Use and threats with firearms or projectile weapons").
311. Articles 370-375, 377, 378 Portuguese Criminal Code.
312. Article 380 Portuguese Criminal Code ("Intrusion into an alien house").
313. Articles 463-470 Portuguese Criminal Code.
314. Articles 472-473 Portuguese Criminal Code.
315. Articles 474 Portuguese Criminal Code.
316. Articles 477, 479 and 480 Portuguese Criminal Code.
317. Article 478 Portuguese Criminal Code.
318. Regulation No. 7 1976 on Ratification of East Timor's Unification into the Republic of Indonesia and the Formation of the Province Regional Level 1, of East Timor (LN No. 35/1976); PP No. 19 of 1976 on Legislation on the Unification of East Timor into the Republic of Indonesia (LN No. 39/1976); supplemented in 1978 with TAP MPR-RI No. VI/MPR/1978.
319. Presidential Decree No. 11/PNPS/1963, incorporated in 1969 as Law No. 5/1969.
320. Law No. 5/1963, incorporated into Law No. 5/1969.
321. Articles 187, 191 bis, 191 ter, 200 KUHP.
322. Article 202 KUHP.
323. Article 187 KUHP.
324. Article 289 and Article 290 KUHP.
325. Article 297 KUHP.
326. Article 324 KUHP.
327. Article 328 KUHP.
328. Article 330 KUHP.
329. Article 333 KUHP.
330. Article 338 and Article 339 KUHP.
331. Article 340 KUHP.
332. Articles 351-353 KUHP.
333. Articles 354 and355 KUHP.
334. Articles 362, 363 and 365 KUHP.
335. Articles 406, 407, 408 and 409 KUHP.
336. Article 148 KUHP.
337. Article 173 KUHP.
338. Article 175 KUHP.
339. Article 181 KUHP.
340. Article 92(3) KUHP.
341. Article 52 KUHP.
342. Article 421 KUHP.
343. Article 422 KUHP.
344. For example Law No. 40/1947 on Military Discipline Law; and Law No. 6/1950 on Criminal Procedure for the Military Judicial System and later Law No. 1/Drt/1958.

Photo/CAVR archives

Chega!

Part 3.

History of the Conflict

Part 3. History of the Conflict

3. History of the Conflict

Introduction

1. This part provides an historical context to events covered in the violations sections of the Report. It is based on primary sources of the Commission itself, from statements, interviews and testimonies delivered at public hearings; on documentary evidence available to the Commission; and on an analysis of relevant secondary sources. It is generally limited to a quick overview of the key events, moments and turning points in the period of the Commission's mandate relevant to the political conflicts, the efforts to resolve those conflicts and the human rights violations which occurred in those conflicts. Within the scope of this Report, it has not been possible to provide definitive accounts of some of the key issues which remain points of historical conjecture about this period and these events. Nor is it the role of the Commission to make such definitive judgements. The part does attempt at least to identify what some of these issues are, and the Commission encourages further research, writing and analysis of these important aspects of East Timorese history.

2. This analysis and writing of East Timorese history is a critical step in nation building, and how it is done will reflect what kind of society our new nation fosters. The Commission's Report is based largely upon the statements and interviews provided by ordinary East Timorese people from across the country, and seeks to bring their voice into the continuing dialogue for building our new nation. It does not seek to be an exclusive history, recording only the perspectives or achievements of national leaders, or of people from only one side or the other of the political divide. It is based on the idea that the recording and analysis of history must be open to new information and ideas, and to information and perspectives that are not necessarily politically popular. While history is critical for nation building, a simplistic history that seeks to sweep under the carpet unpleasant realities or to make invisible the contributions of people from all walks of life cannot help build a resilient and sustainable nation. History telling that acknowledges complexity, that makes space for the voice of those often silenced, and that opens the way for open-minded reflection can make a contribution to building a nation where the idea of strength is based on respect for others, pluralism and democracy based upon the equality of all citizens.

3. The telling of East Timorese history is critical for the foundations of our relationship with our international neighbours, especially Indonesia. As the Indonesian historian Dr Asvi Warman Adam told the Commission at its hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community:

> The collective memory of both nations will determine the nature and the strength or weakness of the relationship. This will be reflected in the writing of history of both countries.[1]

4. This part begins with a brief overview of the colonial history of Timor-Leste under Portuguese control. It deliberately places the emphasis upon the period leading up to the internal conflict of August–September 1975 and the subsequent Indonesian invasion. This looks at events and relationships surrounding the decolonisation process in Portuguese Timor, within the territory, in Indonesia and in the regional and wider geopolitical context. They are vital to an understanding of the causes of the political conflicts in Timor-Leste, the lost opportunities to avoid war and seek peaceful solutions to political concerns based on the principles of international law, and involved Timorese, Indonesian and international actors.

5. Later sections deal with the major military campaigns by Indonesia in the 1970s and 1980s, and its political efforts to achieve international recognition for its takeover of Timor-Leste. They also deal with the plight of the people of Timor-Leste in the years of intense war, in the mountains and camps in the years of bombing and the famine that devastated the population. They trace the shift in strategy by Fretilin/Falintil after it was nearly destroyed in the campaigns of 1978, of the growth of a clandestine network in towns and villages across the country and of the Indonesian military territorial expansion and intensive surveillance network. The years of consolidation of both the Indonesian administration and the Resistance, through the 1980s, are described with a focus on efforts at developing a sense of national unity and the rise of the new generation of youth in resistance to the occupation.

6. Events such as the Santa Cruz Massacre, the capture of Xanana Gusmão and the Nobel Peace Prize in the 1990s are described as key turning points in the struggle of the East Timorese people to have their right to self-determination recognised. The later sections deal with the impact of the Asian financial crisis in Indonesia and in Timor-Leste, and the intensification of international efforts under new United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan to reach a solution to the question of Timor-Leste. With the fall of President Soeharto, the section traces the push inside Timor-Leste and internationally for a solution, and the rise of the militias in Timor-Leste when it became apparent that this could include a choice for the people of Timor-Leste for independence. It describes the rapid developments of 1999 leading to the 5

May Agreements, and the militia-TNI violence against civilian populations in the lead-up to their announcement. The UNAMET period and the conduct of the ballot are described. The part goes into some detail about the failure of Indonesia to guarantee security during and after the ballot, and the role of the TNI and the militia groups in the escalation of violence across the territory after the announcement of the results rejecting the special autonomy package. East Timorese and international efforts to ensure intervention to halt the violence and ensure the results of the ballot were respected by Indonesia are described. The part ends with the arrival of Interfet and the gradual return to Timor-Leste of East Timorese people from West Timor and other parts of Indonesia, Portugal, Australia and the many other countries of the world where they had been scattered by the years of conflict.

7. It is the hope of the Commission that this brief history will both assist the reader to understand the contents of other parts and sections of this Report, and that it will inspire current and future generations of East Timorese historians to work further on understanding our past as part of our constant efforts to build a future based on respect for each other, human rights and the love of peace.

Portuguese colonialism in Timor-Leste

Overview

8. Portuguese involvement in Timor began in the 1500s when it sought sandalwood. In the late 16th century the first Catholic Church was built in Lifau, Oecussi, which became the base for the first Portuguese administration of Timor. Portugal and the Netherlands had tense relations as the two main colonising powers of the archipelago, and in the 1700s Dutch military power gave it the balance of power over Portugal. Portugal moved its base to Dili in 1771 and increasingly focused its colonising efforts on the eastern half of the island. In the latter half of the 19th century, Portugal forcibly introduced cash crops such as coffee to Timor and sought to consolidate its colonial administration through the imposition of taxes and forced labour, resulting in a series of revolts by Timorese. The colonial tactic of divide and rule was used to divide and weaken the traditional leadership of the Timorese.

9. In 1913 the colonial boundaries between Portuguese and Dutch Timor were fixed in a decision at the international court in The Hague, known as a Sentenca Arbitral, with Portugal taking the eastern half of the island and the enclave of Oecussi. The 20th century saw Portugal dominated by the authoritarian regime of Prime Minister Salazar. Timor was the most remote of Portugal's colonies, and development, physical or political, was largely neglected.

10. The Second World War brought terrible violence to Timor, as Allied Forces landed in neutral Portuguese Timor followed by Japanese occupation forces. The death-toll of Timorese was between 40,000 to 60,000 people. After the War, the Portuguese colonial administration returned. Timor remained a poor though relatively peaceful island until the Carnation Revolution of 25 April 1974 at last opened the way for decolonisation in Timor-Leste.

11. The Commission identified three important impacts of the Portuguese colonisation of Timor-Leste. First, the colonisers' tactics of playing off social groups against each other kept indigenous political alliances weak. This restricted development of the unity that is required for nation building. Second, no self-governing tradition was developed. Most East Timorese existed in subjugation to a feudal system. Third, the Portuguese colonial regime did not develop or institutionalise democratic and human rights values, though traditional cultural values already existed and the Church inculcated religious values. Thus the political activity that emerged in 1974-75 was subject to extensive distortion and manipulation. These factors all contributed to the disorder and internal conflict that emerged during the decolonisation process in 1975. During the civil war in August 1975 Portugal withdrew. The Fretilin political party emerged victorious from the civil war, and began a partially functional interim government. These factors all contributed to Indonesia being able to invade Timor-Leste in 1975 with minimal international protest.

The arrival of the Portuguese

12. The Portuguese first visited Timor in search of white sandalwood in the early 16th century. Following their conquest of Malacca in 1511, Portuguese missionaries built the first church on the island in 1590. This began a period of settlement in Lifau (Oecussi) on the north coast of the western part of Timor by Franciscan monks, sandalwood traders and Topasses, a mixed race group fathered by Portuguese sailors, traders and soldiers whose descendants remain in Timor to this day. Portugal had established colonies on other islands in the region, however these were not secure. The Dutch soon dislodged the Portuguese from Malacca, Makassar in Sulawesi, and in 1652, from their newly built fort in Kupang, western Timor, only five years after its completion.*

13. In 1702 the Portuguese government formally established a presence at Lifau, administering Timor from its colony at Goa. The governor's approach of conferring military rank on local kings (liurai) established a precedent for the governance of Timor that was to continue into the 20th century. However the Portuguese faced challenges from itinerant liurai as well as from the powerful Topasses, who by that time dominated the sandalwood trade and, despite their Portuguese heritage, only occasionally cooperated. Unable to establish a firm hold in Lifau, the Portuguese moved to Dili in 1769. This brought them into contact with the Belu people who inhabited the eastern part of the island.

* The battle of Penfui between the Portuguese and Netherlands colonial powers took part in the mid-17th century, and was a turning point for Portugal. Penfui is north of the town of Kupang, near the site of the modern-day airport. Portugal's defeat at the hands of Dutch military power meant that the Topasses backed by the Portuguese were effectively evicted from the major port of the island in Kupang, in what was a clear signal of Dutch military superiority. The site of the battle is also near the prison where 69 East Timorese political prisoners were taken in 1983 in the crackdown after the Kraras Massacre [see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment].

Colonial consolidation

14. From their new base at Dili, the Portuguese had limited influence and geographic control over Timor-Leste. Local resistance and limited military capacity restricted Portugal to the north coast for some time. In 1851 Governor Lopes da Lima opened a series of complex land negotiations with the Dutch colonial authorities, involving liurai and patrimonies in the border areas such as Maucata, further inside Timor-Leste in Maubara, and over the Portuguese-controlled island of Flores. These negotiations established the principle of the exchange of territories between Portugal and the Netherlands with a view to a settled border on the basis of an east-west divide of the island between the rival colonial powers. This relieved Portugal of colonial wars with the Netherlands, allowing it to consolidate its power throughout the eastern part of the island. In 1895 Portugal established military/administrative units throughout Timor-Leste's ten districts. Oecussi was added to become the 11th district.[3] Portugal built military barracks, offices, some schools, hospitals and prisons in the districts before the end of the 19th century. The Catholic Church, which had been banned for 20 years since 1834, was rehabilitated and Bishop Medeiros was welcomed.

15. The territorial negotiations commenced by Governor Lopes da Lima in 1851 culminated in Portugal and the Netherlands agreeing to take the matter to the International Court in The Hague, where the final decision on the colonial boundaries was fixed in a Sentenca Arbitral in 1913. The final territorial exchange between the Netherlands and Portugal pursuant to this decision took place in 1917.[4] The result was that Timor-Leste remained Portugal's only colonial possession in the archipelago, leaving the Netherlands as the ascendant colonial power.

16. This formal finalisation of international boundaries between the Netherlands and Portugal became a critical reference point for the political future of Timor-Leste. When Indonesia struggled for and won independence after the Second World War, it based its national claim at the United Nations upon the former Dutch colonial boundaries. It was upon this principle that it continued to struggle and ultimately went to war for Irian/West Papua in the 1960s. While there had been some rhetoric expressed on the concept of a "greater Indonesia" during the nationalist struggle, taking in areas of British Malaya and Borneo, this was never seriously put forward to the United Nations. In submissions to the United Nations over its claim to Irian in the late 1950s, Indonesia explicitly denied any claim to Portuguese Timor.[5] Later, in 1974-75, and in the years that followed, the Indonesian government never seriously tried to claim that Indonesia had a territorial claim over the former Portuguese Timor.

17. Of equal importance and flowing from this colonial relationship, the Portuguese government never rescinded its position as the legal administering power of Timor-Leste throughout the mandate period of the Commission. This enabled the question of Timor-Leste to remain alive on the agenda of the United Nations as a non-self-governing territory, and a factor that fundamentally distinguished it from other nationalist or separatist struggles within the Indonesian archipelago in the 20th century.

Portuguese governance and Timorese resistance

18. The Portuguese exerted indirect rule through the liurai, whose cooperation they obtained by permitting them to retain autonomy in their home territories. The Portuguese exploited existing rivalries between liurai. In so doing they gained access to the resource of their small armies or militia groups* which they used to augment their own limited military resources.[6] The colonists first used the militias of loyal liurai in 1642 during the campaign against the kingdom of Wehale,[7] and continued to do so until crushing the Viqueque rebellion in 1959. For the Portuguese, the price of this policy of divide and rule was persistent localised resistance to Portuguese authority. For the East Timorese, the price was perpetual weakness and disunity.

19. Portuguese power and prosperity declined over the 17th and 18th centuries. Of its colonies, Portuguese Timor was the most remote and least important. Portugal provided it with limited economic and political investment. The declining value of sandalwood prompted Portugal to introduce new crops in the 19th century in order to develop an export sector. However, Portuguese Timor's subsistence agriculture economy had little surplus labour, which such crops required. Around 1859 Governor Alfonso de Castro introduced forced-cultivation of new cash crops, predominately coffee but also wheat and other non-native species. Portugal still ruled Timor indirectly, which made governing difficult, particularly given resistance to its coercive economic policies. Governor Celestino da Silva extended this system of forced labour in the 1890s and 1900s, a special feature of which was road building. Heavy taxation and coercive labour policies, both of which were a consequence of Portugal's under-investment in the colony, were deeply unpopular.

20. Liurai resistance began shortly after the installation of a governor in Lifau. The imposition of an in-kind tribute, the finta, around 1710, provoked on-going rebellion and resentment that contributed to Portugal's relocation to Dili in 1769.[8] Portugal then faced limited resistance until Governor Castro used military force to impose coffee cultivation. The unpopular move provoked a revolt in 1861 that was succeeded by a series of localised liurai-led rebellions against colonial excesses. In response, the Portuguese administration imposed direct control of Timor-Leste in 1895 when Governor da Silva established an administrative and military presence throughout Timor-Leste, dividing the territory into eleven districts, including the enclave of Oecussi.[9]

21. Consequently, Portugal separated Timor from Goa, making it a separate administrative district in 1896. However the rebellions continued. The last and largest of these was led by Manufahi liurai Dom Boaventura who rebelled against the 1908 head tax. Dom Boaventura's resistance stemmed from his father's rebellion; the liurai Dom Duarte led rebellions at the end of the 19th century until Governor da Silva attacked the Same kingdom in 1895 and Dom Duarte was forced to surrender in 1900. After Governor da Silva replaced the finta with a head tax in 1908 Dom Duarte's son Dom Boaventura rebelled in 1911. The Portuguese assembled a vast liurai army of 12,000, and brought in troops from Mozambique, bloodily defeating the uprising in 1912. This action established stability, but at the cost of extensive loss of life and suffering. It is thought up to 25,000 died during this campaign.[10] Dom Boaventura was captured and exiled to Ataúro Island where he died. Subsequently the Portuguese directly empowered villages (suco) as the local government, thereby bypassing the liurai, reducing some of their influence and bringing more direct Portuguese control over the interior of the territory.

* In Portuguese these were called moradores or arraias.

Portuguese Timor in the 20th century

22. During much of the 20th century Portugal itself faced domestic instability. In 1910 the kingdom was replaced by a republic, which was in turn replaced by a one-party state in 1928. During this period many Chinese entered the colony of Portuguese Timor, and developed their role as business intermediaries, exporters and traders. Complementing the Chinese economic activity, despite its preoccupations at home, Portugal established the SAPT (Sociedade Agricola Pátria e Trabalho), a trading conglomerate that brought new infrastructure to production and export.* Nonetheless Portuguese Timor remained a distant colonial outpost that functioned with minimal input of Portuguese personnel or investment. In 1929 Portuguese nationals numbered only 200, with a further 300 soldiers.[11] Lisbon continued to rule through local intermediaries. In 1930 Prime Minister Salazar's Colonial Act created representative but largely powerless local councils, and enabled some limited indigenous eligibility for Portuguese national status.

World War II

23. After Japan attacked Pearl Harbour in December 1941, Australia anticipated that Japan would occupy Timor and use it as a base to launch attacks against Australia. Australian, British and Dutch troops landed in Dili on 17 December 1941 in what was claimed as a pre-emptive action. Governor de Carvalho protested about the violation of Portuguese neutrality. Japan invaded Timor on 19 February 1942. It remains an issue of historical conjecture whether the Allied violation of Portuguese neutrality was necessary to counter an imminent Japanese attack, or whether the Australian presence in Portuguese Timor drew the Japanese military to an area it would otherwise not have invaded.[12]

24. The impact upon East Timorese society was devastating. Between 40,000 and 60,000 East Timorese are reported to have died.[13] Many were tortured and killed by Japanese troops on suspicion of assisting Australian guerrilla fighters. Sexual slavery of East Timorese women by Japanese troops was widespread. In addition the territory was impoverished by the war, and divisions were sown between those seen to have supported the Japanese and those who supported the small Australian guerrilla force. The Commission heard testimony of the long-lasting effects of this conflict on East Timorese society in its national public hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76.[14] No international investigation was conducted for war crimes committed by either occupying country, and no war reparations have been paid to the East Timorese people.[15]

* SAPT was operated by a Brazilian contracting company named Moniz da Maia Serra e Fortunato.

The international movement for decolonisation and Portugal's position

25. Article 73 of the 1945 UN Charter demanded that colonising countries heed the aspirations of colonised countries and gradually introduce autonomy. This international consensus continued to develop as most colonisers granted independence to their colonies after the Second World War, and was expressed through mechanisms such as the UN General Assembly that in 1960 recognised colonialism as a denial of human rights. In 1960 Portuguese Timor was listed as a Non-Self-Governing Territory with the United Nations Decolonisation Committee, affirming its people's right to self-determination, a listing which remained relevant up until the 1999 United Nations-organised Popular Consultation.

26. In response to this growing international consensus on the need for decolonisation, Portugal re-designated its colonies as "overseas provinces" in 1951. It was a paternalistic move designed to "civilise" its colonial subjects and placate its critics, but it changed little. This was particularly the case in Portuguese Timor, which remained extremely isolated. No independence movement developed along the lines of those in Portugal's African colonies. On the contrary, life for the East Timorese in the 1950s was far from civilised. Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes reflected that during 400 years of Portuguese colonisation not one lawyer, engineer or doctor had been born in Timor-Leste.[16] Few East Timorese enjoyed any significant equality with the colonists, and continued to be routinely maltreated and their rights to property abused by the Portuguese.[17] Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo once addressed the issue:

> I often saw some of the Portuguese taking palm wine that was for sale by the indigenous people and not give them any money, although the people had walked for a long time to the market in the hope that they will return with some money. They were oppressed, and could not defend themselves. Every time I saw these things, my heart ached and I cried inside. But I could not do anything.[18]

27. Although the use of whips and of the cane was banned by the Portuguese in 1956, the practice of whipping continued.[19] Xanana Gusmão later recalled:

> I saw prisoners whipped in [government] posts. They groaned because they were forced to stand on coral stone, hot from the scorching sun, > with their feet shackled. Sometimes during my adventures with school friends – liurai children – I also saw officials or locals being sent out in groups or returning with people covered in blood all over, because they had not turned up for their corvee work building roads, or for their work as asu-lear [sic] [indentured workers] on the properties of colonists, Chinese or assimilated Timorese. [20]

28. In 1959 a group of exiled Indonesians were involved in an uprising in Viqueque against the Portuguese colonial administration. The Portuguese discovered this plot and crushed it violently, resulting in significant bloodshed. The background to these events remains largely unexplained. A Portuguese official report of the time blamed this uprising on Indonesia but it is unclear whether this was the case. After these events, in 1959, the government opened a branch of the secret police (Polícia Internacional e de Defesa do Estado, PIDE) in Dili to monitor Indonesian movements and anti-Portuguese sentiment.

Portuguese development plans and growing anti-colonial sentiments

29. In 1953 the Portuguese central government began a series of development plans* aimed at invigorating its stagnant domestic economy. In Portuguese Timor this included increased coffee production and export, mining exploration, and tourism development. Infrastructural improvements included road construction, repair of the Dili port and Baucau airport, and electricity and a municipal water system in Dili.[22] By 1975, 17 or 18 doctors were working in the Dili hospital and regional clinics.[23]

30. East Timorese access to education, however, remained limited throughout the Portuguese era. The children of liurai gained some access to primary education from about 1860, and in 1904 the Jesuits opened a missionary school in Soibada that became an important place of learning for East Timorese from across the territory.† However, Western learning remained the almost exclusive preserve of Portuguese nationals. In 1964, only 10 East Timorese held degrees.[24] According to Portuguese statistics, between 1950 and 1970 primary enrolment increased tenfold, from 3,249 to 32,937. [25] The 1970 census indicated around 10% literacy in the colony,‡ by which time the administration had established a secondary school in Dili, the Liceu Dr Francisco Machado, with 767 students.[26] A reflection of this limited access to state education is the fact that prominent proponents of Timor-Leste's independence movement were mostly seminary-educated.

* Plano de Fomento.

† The school, Colégio Nuno Alveres Pereira (for boys) and Imaculada da Conceição (for girls), held its centenary celebrations in 2004.

‡ The percentage of illiteracy in Dili was 14% and it was 45% in the District towns.

31. Increasingly aware of inequality, an emerging generation of politicised East Timorese was also frustrated at the absence of political vehicles to channel East Timorese aspirations. East Timorese had little role in governing the affairs of the colony. The province's governor represented the Portuguese government, not the East Timorese people, and wielded broad executive powers. Although an 11-member Legislative Council existed, it had only three elected representatives. It could not possibly represent popular aspirations, and only had limited authority.[27] Despite UN resolutions urging Portugal to grant political freedom to its colonies,[28] the Salazar and later Caetano regime denied democracy to its own citizens, let alone its colonial peoples. This only changed with the accession of General Spínola after the 25 April 1974 Carnation Revolution.

Changes in Portugal and the decolonisation process

Overview

32. The 1960s national liberation movements in Portugal's African colonies turned to armed struggle to achieve their independence. Forced to engage simultaneously in separate wars on several far-flung fronts, the small, relatively poor nation of Portugal came under tremendous political and economic pressure at a time when it was increasingly looking to Europe for its economic future. In 1968, after 40 years in power, the authoritarian Prime Minister Salazar was replaced by Marcello Caetano, who failed to find a solution to these increasingly costly armed conflicts. Frustrated with these failures, an Armed Forces Movement (Movimento das Forças Armadas, MFA) emerged within the military and on 25 April 1974 led a successful but bloodless coup against the Caetano regime, known as the Carnation Revolution. While the MFA opened the way for decolonisation, it also ushered in several years of political turbulence in Portugal. This turmoil, coupled with Portugal's preoccupation with its larger African colonies, were critical factors in Portugal's failure to give adequate attention to the decolonisation of its remotest colony, Timor.

The MFA and the Carnation Revolution

33. In the early 1960s independence movements in Portugal's African colonies began to wage armed struggles. The MPLA (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola) in Angola took up arms in 1961, to be followed by PAIGC (Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde) in Guinea Bissau in 1963 and Frelimo (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique) in Mozambique in 1964. The Portuguese colony of Goa was "liberated" by the Indian armed forces in 1961.[29] Fighting three wars simultaneously placed a heavy financial and military burden on Portugal. At the same time, after joining the European Free Trade Association (EFTA) in 1961, Portugal was becoming increasingly intertwined economically with Europe at the expense of its African colonies. By the early 1970s the protectionist economic policies designed to foster trade with and investment in the colonies no longer matched the interests of the Portuguese conglomerates whose focus was increasingly European.

34. Having lost faith in the ability first of Salazar and then of Caetano to find a political solution to the African wars, the armed forces turned to General António Spínola, who had been a close associate of Caetano's. Spínola had advocated a programme of reforms, which Caetano rejected. To disseminate his ideas Spínola published a book entitled Portugal and its Future, proposing a solution to the colonial wars through referenda on a federal relationship with Portugal. When the MFA established itself on 5 March 1974, it elected General Spínola as its leader, and when it launched the Carnation Revolution on 25 April 1974, Spínola became the Movement's choice for president.

Rapid decolonisation, turmoil in Portugal

35. While the Carnation Revolution initially went smoothly in Portugal, the months and years that followed saw a period of significant political instability, with successive minority governments formed, and falling, until the Socialist Party came to power in 1982. This instability limited Portugal's capacity to deal effectively with events occurring in Timor. Combined with the active destabilisation by Indonesia, they were unable to implement a decolonisation process.

36. In April 1974 the MFA immediately formed the National Salvation Council (Junta de Salvação Nacional, JSN), and appointed Spínola as its leader. The JSN manifesto advocated democratisation within Portugal, including dismantling the secret police, PIDE, and releasing political prisoners. On colonial issues it vaguely suggested a political solution[30] through a national debate leading to a peaceful solution, but avoided mention of self-determination and autonomy.[31] President Spínola installed a new provisional government on 15 May 1974, with Adelino de Palma Carlos as prime minister. On the same day it issued Decree No. 203/1974, setting out a policy for decolonisation. The decree committed the government to a political solution based on the principle of self-determination.[32]

37. Spínola's federal solution failed to gain significant support. In Portugal public opinion was increasingly in favour of withdrawal from the colonies. Aware of their military superiority against the beleaguered Portuguese, the colonies of Guinea-Bissau and Mozambique were in no mood to compromise on their demand for independence. Some influential members of the cabinet, including the minister of foreign affairs and leader of the Socialist Party, Mário Soares, also preferred independence as a solution.

38. By mid-1974 even within the MFA support for federation was waning, and a quick exit became the preferred military option. These pressures led to the resignation of Palma Carlos as prime minister, and his replacement by Vasco Gonçalves. On 27 July the new government issued Law No. 7/1974 recognising independence as an acceptable outcome of the process of self-determination in the colonies.[33] This policy shift led to the resignation of Spínola in September 1974. Within a year Portugal's five African colonies had all achieved independence.

39. After coming to power in April 1974, the MFA had conducted a purge of what it considered reactionary elements in the Portuguese civil administration. It immediately replaced all the governors in the African colonies, but was slower to take similar action in Portuguese Timor. Even though he had made a speech criticising the MFA for its radicalism, just two days before 25 April, the governor of Portuguese Timor, Alves Aldeia, retained his position for another three months. Portugal's preoccupations at the time and the consequent neglect of Timor were summed up by the last Portuguese governor of Timor, Major-General Mário Lemos Pires, in testimony he presented to the Commission:

> The Portuguese nation that emerged from the revolution was very weak, without cohesion, with a lot of difficulties and with no credibility among its previous [Western] allies. The nation was very worried about its revolution and attempting to gain some political stability, caring for the citizens who were arriving from Africa and firmly deciding to finish the war in the African countries…What did the Portuguese people think about Timor-Leste in 1974, after the revolution? Nothing, not much, little. Nothing. Their thoughts were about the revolution and their relatives in the African territories.[34]

The impact of the Carnation Revolution in Portuguese Timor

40. In Timor news of the Carnation Revolution was welcomed with a mixture of euphoria and concern. The Commission heard testimony from a range of leading East Timorese figures in its hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76. They spoke of the excitement events in Lisbon and the other colonies generated among the mostly young people who had an interest in politics. But they also generally agreed that East Timorese society was ill-prepared by its history to engage in political activity.[35]

41. In early May 1974, when Governor Alves Aldeia asked the JSN in Lisbon for an explanation of the new colonial policy, he was instructed to act according to the principles of the MFA programme and, taking into account local conditions, to seek to avoid any deterioration of relations with Indonesia.

42. On 13 May Governor Alves Aldeia formed the Timor Commission for Self-Determination which, among other things, encouraged the establishment of civil associations.[36] At the end of May, Major Arnão Metello, chief-of-staff of the local military command, was named the MFA's delegate in the colony.[37]

43. In contrast to its attitude to its African colonies, the Portuguese government tended to view Portuguese Timor's independence as unrealistic. On 3 August 1974 Minister of Inter-Territory Co-ordination, António de Almeida Santos, objected to Portuguese Timor's full independence, and stated federation as the most realistic option.[38] This provoked a strong reaction from the newly formed East Timorese political associations, UDT and Fretilin.* Yet on the same day the Portuguese government submitted a memorandum to the UN Secretary-General recognising the right to self-determination and independence of all territories under its administration, a position that was reaffirmed two months later before the UN General Assembly by the Portuguese foreign minister, Mário Soares.[39] The right to self-determination for all colonies was subsequently enshrined as an obligation of the Portuguese state in the constitution of 1975. This provision proved critical to sustaining official Portuguese commitment to the self-determination of the people of Timor-Leste in the difficult years that followed.

The formation of political parties in Portuguese Timor

44. The Commission heard testimony describing how the Carnation Revolution quickly galvanised East Timorese interest in the political future of the territory. Domingos Oliveira, who became the Secretary General of UDT, described the phenomenon:

> Before 25 April in Timor, we used to talk about our girlfriends, football and things like that at the café and restaurant where we would go to drink a beer and meet friends. After 25 April, we only talked about the consequences of 25 April. What should we Timorese do? What is the right thing to do now in this new situation?[40]

45. In Dili politically-inclined East Timorese started to consider forming political associations, and held meetings to discuss what their principles and platforms should be. Once formed, the associations effectively functioned as political parties, even though political parties were still technically barred from operating.[41]

46. The first association to be formed was the Timorese Democratic Union (União Democratica Timorense, UDT), founded on 11 May 1974. Its founders tended to be politically conservative and many had links to the Portuguese colonial administration, reflecting their privileged social status and function as intermediaries between East Timorese and the Portuguese colonists. UDT's first president was Francisco Lopes da Cruz. Its other founders included César Augusto da Costa Mouzinho who was vice-president, the brothers Manuel, Mário and João Carrascalão, and Domingos Oliveira, the association's secretary general. UDT's original manifesto advocated "progressive autonomy" under Portugal, although it also supported the right to self-determination. It announced a modification of its position on 1 August 1974 when it declared that its goal was eventual independence after a period of federation with Portugal. It also specifically rejected integration with other countries.[42] UDT's shift showed it to be malleable, on this occasion in response to changes in the political landscape in Portugal and to evidence that nationalism was a growing force in Timor itself.

* Domingos Oliveira, former Secretary General of UDT, testified to the offence taken by East Timorese at this statement, at the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

47. Nine days after UDT's founding, on 20 May, the Timorese Social Democratic Association (Associação Social Democrata Timorense, ASDT) was established. ASDT's founders were mostly young intellectual East Timorese, from a range of backgrounds; some from within the Portuguese administration, others from the clandestine anti-colonial group of the early 1970s. Older and better known than the association's youthful founders, Francisco Xavier do Amaral was appointed president. Other key figures included Mari Alkatiri, José Ramos-Horta, Nicolau Lobato and Justino Mota. ASDT published its manifesto on 22 May, affirming the right to independence and an anti-colonial and nationalist stance. It also stated the association's commitment to a "good neighbour" policy towards the countries of the region without compromising the interests of the East Timorese people.

48. The third association to be established was the Timorese Popular Democratic Association (Associação Popular Democrática Timorense, Apodeti), founded on 27 May. The original plan had been to name the organisation the Association for the Integration of Timor into Indonesia, but although this name would have succinctly described Apodeti's chief goal, it was apparently regarded as too transparent. Its founding President was Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, but its strategist was José Fernando Osorio Soares, who had quit ASDT to become Apodeti's Secretary General. Another key figure was plantation owner Hermenegildo Martins. The liurai of Atsabe, Guilherme Maria Gonçalves, joined Apodeti soon after its formation, bringing with him a degree of support from his regional power base. Indonesia's consul in Dili, Elias Tomodok, was an important conduit for advice and financial support to Apodeti during the 1974-75 period. [43] Apodeti's manifesto declared its goal of autonomous integration with Indonesia, in accordance with international law, although this was incompatible with Indonesia's Constitution. In common with the other two major parties it rejected a number of the perceived evils of the Portuguese administration such as corruption and discrimination, as well as pledging respect for human rights and individual freedoms.

49. Three smaller political parties were established some time after the initial three. José Martins defected from Apodeti, of which he had been one of the founders, and established a monarchist (liurai) party, the Association of Timorese Warrior Sons (Klibur Oan Timor Aswain, KOTA) on 20 November 1974.[44] Martins had a brief career as a propagandist for the Indonesian occupation, and was a key collaborator with Indonesian intelligence (Bakin) in 1975. The Labour Party (Trabalhista) was established in September 1974 and had the goal of independence through a transitional federation with Portugal.[45] A third party, Democratic Association for the Integration of East Timor into Australia (Aditla), proposed joining Australia but disappeared once Australia ruled it out in March 1975.[46]

50. It quickly became clear that UDT and ASDT were the only two parties with popular support across the country.

The international climate and Indonesia's policy on Portuguese Timor

Overview

51. Portuguese Timor's opportunity for decolonisation came at a crucial moment in the Cold War. The North Vietnamese victory in Vietnam in April 1975 and the almost simultaneous collapse of pro-US governments in the other Indo-Chinese states of Cambodia and Laos fuelled fears among Western policymakers and their Asian allies that other countries in South-East Asia were also vulnerable and that the line must be held at all costs against the spread of communism. In this setting the US and its allies looked to Indonesia as a vital component of its post-Vietnam strategy for preventing further communist advances. At this time the Carnation Revolution created a highly fluid political situation in Portugal, where the possible outcomes seemed to include another victory for the left and a defeat for the West.

52. Aside from the support it enjoyed as a result of its anti-communist credentials Indonesia was also in a position to capitalise on its status as a founding member of the Non-Aligned Movement, its links to other Muslim countries through the Organisation of Islamic Conference and as the largest nation in the Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN). Indonesia's broad-based support, Portugal's reluctance to internationalise the issue and widespread indifference about the fate of what many saw as an obscure remnant of a minor colonial power, all weighed against an active UN role over the question of Timor-Leste. All of these factors worked to Indonesia's advantage in its campaign to win support for its policy on Timor-Leste.

The United Nations and Portuguese Timor

53. During 1975 the Cold War between East and West reached a critical juncture, largely because of developments in South-East Asia. In April 1975, two years after the withdrawal of US troops from Vietnam, Saigon fell to the communist North. This shift in the balance of power affected both large and small nations, and it had a profound impact on what occurred in Portuguese Timor. [47] The Cold War had a stifling effect on the United Nations during this period. The world's major power blocks often paralysed its key institutions, such as the Security Council. Partly as a result of this, a feature of the growing crisis of Portuguese Timor in 1974-75 was the failure to internationalise the issue within the framework of the United Nations. Portugal conducted a series of bilateral negotiations with Indonesia, and although in these negotiations it did use the threat of "internationalisation" as a bargaining chip, in practice it pursued this option only when it was too late and when it was in effect powerless to affect the situation. [48]

54. The United Nations body charged with overseeing decolonisation, the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation, was preoccupied by the situation in Portugal's African colonies and paid little attention to Timor. In June 1975 the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation considered Portuguese Timor, and urged the attainment of the goals of the UN Charter on the Declaration of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Despite having been asked to assess the situation on the ground, the Committee did not do so.[49] This lack of attention to Portuguese Timor in 1974-75 meant that when the civil war broke out in August 1975, and when Indonesian covert activities evolved into major military operations in October–November 1975, the United Nations was relatively ignorant of the situation in the territory. This lack of United Nations involvement was a lost opportunity to avert violence and the ultimate military takeover of Portuguese Timor by Indonesia (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination).

Indonesia and the international community

55. With nearly 165 million people in the mid-1970s Indonesia was the most populous country in South-East Asia. Under President Soeharto Indonesia was committed to the development of its resource-rich economy. After the turmoil of the last years of President Sukarno both the Western powers and its immediate neighbours viewed this transformed Indonesia positively. In addition, Indonesia's status as a founding member of the Non-Aligned Movement* meant that it could rely on significant support from this group of nations. At the same time Indonesia was the largest country in the Organisation of the Islamic Conference (OIC), and could count on the support of most Islamic countries. This broad support for Indonesia contributed to the lack of serious effort to curb its aggressive actions in Portuguese Timor, including within United Nations fora.

56. Though formally non-aligned, the Soeharto regime's anti-communism meant that it gravitated to the Western camp, offering rich opportunities for trade and investment.[50] President Soeharto's New Order regime had proved its anti-communist credentials to the US through its eradication of the Communist Party of Indonesia (Partai Komunis Indonesia, PKI) during the turbulence of 1965–1966. In those years the Indonesian military led the repression of the PKI, killing up to one million of its members and followers, and imprisoning another million or more people.[51] The New Order banned communism, froze diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China and placed itself firmly in the Western camp. It sought investment and economic assistance from its Western friends.

57. Aside from aligning itself with the Western Bloc, Indonesia also mended fences with the anti-Communist countries of South-East Asia like Thailand, Malaysia, Singapore and the Philippines. In 1967, it joined these four South-East Asian countries in forming the Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN) with the aim of fighting against the spread of Communism in the region, particularly from North Vietnam and the People's

* The Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) is composed of over 100 states that consider themselves not aligned to a major power bloc, which in the cold war context of its inception meant the capitalist and communist blocs. Indonesia hosted its inaugural meeting in 1955.

Republic of China. Indonesia feared that communism would infiltrate the country and awaken dormant communist elements. For that reason, even in the face of mounting international pressure, Soeharto was not ready to free the hundreds of thousands of prisoners arrested in the wake of the 1965 coup.

58. In the decade since 1965 the New Order had not relented in its anti-communist fervour at home. During 1965–1966 between 250 thousand and one million Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) members and followers were killed, and another million or more were imprisoned. However, anti-communism was an important but not the only touchstone of loyalty to the regime. Under Soeharto's New Order the bounds of acceptable political debate became extremely narrow, being defined not just by the regime's anti-communism but by its distaste for pluralist politics in general. New rules were imposed by the military-dominated authoritarian structures.[52] At a time when Western perceptions of South-East Asia were characterised by the fear that other states in the region were a row of dominoes that were in danger of following the example of Indochina and falling into the Communist camp, the West was willing to overlook the repression on which the New Order relied, provided that Indonesia continued to be a bulwark against the spread of communism.

59. Many Western states and their Asian allies shared Soeharto's view that Portuguese Timor should be absorbed into Indonesia, either because they shared his strategic assumptions and the anti-communist mind-set that underlay it, or simply because they did not wish to alienate Jakarta. This frame of mind was summed up in the advice of the British ambassador, Sir John Archibald Ford, to London:

> Even without Soviet or Chinese intervention that territory could become the "problem child" [of the region]…Britain's interest is that Indonesia integrates that territory…If there is a crisis and a debate in the UN we shall all keep our heads down and avoid taking a position against Indonesia.[53]

60. Indonesia could also rely on the support of non-communist Asia. Although there were differences in the degree of support they were prepared to offer, as the largest nation in South-East Asia Indonesia had the broad support of the members of the Association of South-East Asian Nations, (ASEAN). Within ASEAN there was a spectrum of views on Indonesian policy towards Portuguese Timor, ranging from Singapore which as a small and culturally distinct island nation, saw itself as the Israel of South-east Asia and had reservations about Indonesia's intentions, to Malaysia, which was Jakarta's staunchest backer.

61. Cold War alignments were not the only reason why countries in the region supported Indonesia. Japan had a major economic interest in Indonesia, and was becoming increasingly reliant on its oil and natural gas to fuel its booming economy. Australian policy on Portuguese Timor was built on a desire to redefine its foreign policy in general by giving it a more regional slant and to improve its relations with Indonesia in particular. The Australian Prime Minister, Gough Whitlam, shared Indonesia's view that an independent Timor-Leste would not be viable and was advised that the annexation of Portuguese Timor was "settled" Indonesian policy. Whatever his true intentions, in his two meetings with President Soeharto in 1974-75 Whitlam gave President Soeharto the firm impression that he saw merit in an Indonesian takeover, even while recognising that it was necessary to affirm the principle of self-determination.

Indonesian policy on Portuguese Timor

62. During the formative years of the Indonesian state some Indonesian nationalists dreamed of creating a Greater Indonesia based on a supposed golden age when the empires of Sriwijaya and Majapahit held sway over the archipelago. Though not grounded in historical reality, Greater Indonesia would have encompassed parts of Malaysia and the Philippines as well as Portuguese Timor. The Republic of Indonesia never sought to make Greater Indonesia a reality. Instead when seeking international recognition in the late 1940s and later in the 1950s and 1960s, when it was advancing its claim to West Irian (later Irian Jaya, now Papua), it stressed that its boundaries were those of the Dutch East Indies. Its reasons were pragmatic: claiming sovereignty over a Greater Indonesia would have smacked of expansionism in a world in which it was recognised that independent states should inherit the boundaries established by their colonisers.

63. Specifically with regard to Portuguese Timor, before 1975, at no point did Indonesia claim that it had the right to incorporate the territory. In 1961, when Indonesia was pursuing its claim to Irian Jaya the then foreign minister, Dr Subandrio, explicitly stated that Indonesia had no claims to Portuguese Timor because it was a Portuguese territory and therefore it did not belong to Indonesia.[54] In 1974, after meeting the ASDT foreign affairs representative, José Ramos-Horta, the then Indonesian foreign minister, Adam Malik, wrote to Ramos-Horta:

> The Government as well as the people of Indonesia have no intention to increase or expand their territory, or to occupy other territories other than what is stipulated in their Constitution. This reiteration is to give you a clear idea, so that there may be no doubt in the minds of the people of Timor in expressing their own wishes…For this reason, whoever will govern in Timor in the future after independence, can be assured that the Government of Indonesia will always strive to maintain good relations, friendship and cooperation for the benefit of both countries. [55]

64. While never part of mainstream thinking, the notion that Portuguese Timor belonged in Indonesia for historical, geographic and ethnic reasons existed as an undercurrent in Indonesian political discourse that could be invoked when occasion demanded. The spectre of Portuguese Timor's integration and unification also haunted relations between Indonesia and Portuguese Timor. Successive post-war governors of Portuguese Timor were suspicious of Indonesian motives, and persistently sought to limit contact between the two halves of the island. Although the extent of official Indonesian involvement in the 1959 rebellion is still disputed (see 3.1 above), the heavy repression that followed it and the government of Portuguese Timor's analysis of its roots both indicate how seriously the Portuguese believed that Indonesia had designs on the territory. Indonesia was not above playing on those fears. In July 1961, for example, in a speech warning Portugal not to ignore international support for Angolan independence, the then Indonesian foreign minister, Dr Subandrio, reminded his audience ominously of Indonesia's proximity to Portuguese Timor.[56] In 1962 a report (of the UN Decolonisation Committee) noted that a "Republic of Timor Liberation Bureau" had been established in Jakarta. Around May–June 1963 the Bureau announced that it had formed a government with 12 ministers in Batugade.[57] In September 1963, the Indonesian information minister, Roeslan Abdulgani, declared:

> although we are not an expansionistic nation, we cannot allow people whose ancestors are the same as ours to be oppressed and imprisoned just because they wish to join the motherland of their ancestors.*

65. Nonetheless, the integration of Portuguese Timor never became an objective of official policy under President Sukarno. The occasional statements and infiltrations did not amount to a serious commitment to absorb Portuguese Timor because Indonesia never saw the colony as posing a threat to it. Indonesia maintained stable relations with the Salazar government: it opened a consulate in Dili and Sukarno himself visited Portugal in 1959.

66. Until 1974 Sukarno's successor, Soeharto, did not diverge from this position. However, in the wake of the Carnation Revolution, "irredentist" arguments for taking over Portuguese Timor began to surface. East Timorese political figures recalled to the Commission their alarm at a speech by John Naro, the deputy speaker of the Indonesian parliament, asserting that Indonesia had a historical claim to Portuguese Timor.[58] People whose approach to the question was fundamentally strategic noted the importance of these views. In interviews with the Commission, Yusuf Wanandi and Harry Tjan Silalahi, of the Centre for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), who were deeply implicated in developing policy towards Portuguese Timor in 1974-75 on behalf of their mentor General Ali Moertopo, both mentioned the strength of such sentiments.†

* James Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, Longueville, 2003, p. 87. Also note that CSIS researcher, Harry Tjan Silalahi mentioned that Indonesia conducted clandestine operations in Portuguese Timor during the time of the "confrontation", in a conversation with staff of the Australian Embassy in Jakarta on 2 July 1974. [Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (DFAT), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor 1974–1976, 2000, p. 62, document 12].

† Yusuf Wanandi noted that "in certain circles" Timor-Leste was viewed as an "irredentist territory". Irredentism is a movement that strives to reunite territories that had been separated. [CAVR Interview with Yusuf Wanandi, Jakarta, CSIS, Jakarta, 24 July 2003]. Harry Tjan Silalahi observed: "I think the theory that Timor-Leste is an [integral] part of Nusantara has existed, without being explicitly articulated, since the times of Soekarno, following the liberation of Irian." [CAVR Interview with Harry Tjan Silalahi, Jakarta].

Colonel Aloysius Sugianto, an operative in General Ali Moertopo's special operations [Opsus] section of the intelligence agency, Bakin, who played a key role in early covert activities in Portuguese Timor in 1974-75, told the Commission that he saw himself as working to reunite people divided by colonialism:

> The basis of Apodeti has always been, we are one people, one island. We were divided, we became two, Timor Dili and Timor Kupang. That's because of the colonisers. It's them, if we look at it, it's true, right? Because of colonialism, we were divided. Over there it became Portuguese territory, and here Dutch. In truth there is only one solution. That logic is right, the people's rationale is right.[59]

67. After the invasion of Timor-Leste, Indonesian officials revived the historical (and ethnic) argument for integration. In an address to the United Nations General Assembly on 13 December 1975, six days after the invasion of Dili and 10 days after he had denied that Indonesia had any territorial ambitions in Portuguese Timor, the Indonesian representative to the UN, Anwar Sani stated:

> Let me first explain why Indonesia is so vitally interested in what happens in Portuguese Timor. Portuguese Timor is part of the island of Timor, the other part is Indonesian territory. Timor is situated at the heart of the Indonesian archipelago, one of the thousands of islands which constitute the archipelago. The population of Portuguese Timor…is of the same ethnic origin as the population in the Indonesian part. The 450 years of division because of colonial domination has not diminished the close ties of blood and culture between the population of the territory and their kin in Indonesian Timor. This geographical nearness and ethnical kinship are important reasons why Indonesia is vitally concerned about peace and stability in Portuguese Timor, not only in its own interest but also in the interest of the entire region of South East Asia.[60]

68. More powerful in Indonesian thinking than the historical case were the strategic arguments for incorporation. According to James Dunn, citing Indonesian sources, "a Bakin/OPSUS (Special Operations) group took a look at the position in late 1972 or 1973 and came out strongly against the idea of supporting independence of East Timor", which could "add a new dimension to Indonesia's security problems".[61] The semi-official book, Integrasi, claims that Indonesian interest in Portuguese Timor had long predated the Portuguese commitment to decolonisation. The book also asserts that Indonesia adopted an evolutionary approach, which in its early stages would arouse the East Timorese people's desire to be independent. Underlying Indonesian policy was the need to ensure that "that East Timor not become a potential 'trouble spot' and would therefore not be used as a bargaining chip against Indonesia."[62]

69. After the Portuguese Revolution of April 1974, the strategic approach, shaped by the deep anti-communism of the New Order regime, rapidly came to dominate thinking on the question of Portuguese Timor among the Indonesian elite. The approach was grounded in fears that an independent Timor-Leste would become a base for the infiltration of Indonesia by communist countries. The view was expressed as early as 22 May 1974, when a Bakin operative outlined this view to the Australian Embassy staff in Jakarta: "Indonesia has taken care of China at its front door and may now need to take care of a threat at its back door."[63]

70. Soeharto himself adopted this strategic view. At his meeting with the Australian prime minister, Gough Whitlam, in Wonosobo near Yogyakarta in September 1974, he named China and the Soviet Union as countries that might attempt to intervene in Portuguese Timor.[64] In their second meeting in Townsville, Queensland, in April 1975, Soeharto told Whitlam that Indonesian intelligence had received information that communists from China were attempting to enter Portuguese Timor through Australia with the assistance of the Chinese Embassy in Canberra.[*] Indonesian officials were not unanimous about the nature of the communist threat. The chief of intelligence in the Ministry of Defence and Security and deputy chief of Bakin, Lieutenant-General Benny Moerdani, believed that the Soviet fleet was the main danger. He predicted that an independent Timor would give the Soviet Union a naval base that would enable the latter to divide Indonesian waters into two zones.[65] The CSIS executive director, Yusuf Wanandi, told the Commission that others were worried about Vietnamese intentions: they argued that if Cuba could dispatch its troops to Angola which was about 2,000 km away from its home base, why should Vietnam not send troops to Portuguese Timor which was only 1,500 km away?[66] Perhaps the variations in these assessments of the communist threat should have caused foreign governments to question their overall validity.

The decolonisation process and political parties

Overview

71. The Carnation Revolution immediately transformed the political landscape of Portuguese Timor, which until that time did not have active political parties and only a low level of organised anti-colonial activity. With new laws for political association, parties were quick to form. Two parties emerged as the dominant groups, ASDT and UDT. The platforms of both parties called for independence as the ultimate outcome of decolonisation. They differed over the pace of decolonisation, ASDT wanting immediate independence, the more conservative UDT a more gradual process. What really divided these two centrist parties, however, were the militant ideologues on their extremes who accused each other, and by extension each other's parties, of being "fascist" or "communist". A third party, Apodeti, had pockets of localised support, but its following was much less than that of the two leading parties, and it owed its significance to its pro-integrationist stance and the Indonesian backing that this attracted.

* See Document 123 in DFAT, Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of East Timor, p. 248. Whitlam said that Indonesia had no evidence of it.

72. Political campaigning quickly descended into verbal and sometimes physical attacks, and the two main parties did too little to control this. Both parties used radio broadcasts to make propaganda and personal attacks on each other which heightened social tensions. This lack of political experience was manipulated by agents of the Indonesian state, including members of the intelligence services undertaking covert operations inside Portuguese Timor. They sought to divide the East Timorese with the aim of achieving integration with Indonesia. This played into the hands of militants of both major parties, and culminated in the failure of the parties to find a way to work together for the national interest. The result was the breakdown of the four-month-old coalition between UDT and Fretilin at the end of May 1975. From that point on tensions between the parties rose until UDT launched a coordinated armed action throughout the territory, which spiralled into a bloody internal armed conflict. Fretilin responded with force.

The dawning of political consciousness

73. The Portuguese colonial system denied the East Timorese a voice in their own affairs. However, the gradual spread of education after the Second World War began to foster critical thinking about a colonial system whose defining characteristics were economic underdevelopment, corruption, high unemployment, racial discrimination and brutality. The grievances of the East Timorese began to find expression among the educated.

74. Denied an institutional voice and having learned from the Viqueque uprising of 1959 the likely price of a direct confrontation with the colonial system, in the early 1970s the politically aware adopted an approach to politics that was tentative and secretive. In 1970 members of the young educated generation started an anti-colonial discussion group that included Mari Alkatiri, José Ramos-Horta, Nicolau Lobato, Justino Mota and Francisco Borja da Costa. A small anti-colonial political group founded around 1967 and functioning at the time of the Carnation Revolution was organised in small cells which largely operated in ignorance of each other. The group seems to have had little political impact.[67]

75. In the early 1970s East Timorese also began to be allowed to write on a restricted range of topics and with limited freedom of expression. Seara, a magazine published by the Dili Diocese, became an important outlet for their views after Father Martinho da Costa Lopes took over the editorship in September 1972. Mari Alkatiri, José Ramos-Horta, Nicolau Lobato, Abilio Araújo and Francisco Xavier do Amaral all wrote articles for Seara on social issues under Father da Costa Lopes's editorship.

76. The government did not hesitate to repress any sign of dissent. In 1970 José Ramos-Horta was exiled to Mozambique for two years after the DGS[*] reported that he had suggested to an American tourist that if Portugal was incapable of developing Timor, it would be better for America to take over the colony.[68] The articles of Amaral and

* The PIDE changed its name to DGS (Direcção Geral de Segurança) in 1968.

Ramos-Horta – in the latter's case an essay entitled "Maubere Meu Irmão" ("Maubere My Brother") was regarded as particularly inflammatory – attracted the government's attention. Under government pressure, Seara announced, with no explanation, in its issue of 24 March 1973 that it was closing.*

77. In 1973, in Dili, clashes broke out between young people and the Portuguese military.[69] There was tension, and soon the young generation's frustrations would be able to take a more tangible shape.

The composition of the political parties

78. Once the Carnation Revolution lifted the lid on political expression, educated East Timorese quickly took the opportunity to get involved in political activity. While the class, ethnic and regional make-up often defied simple generalisations, there were some patterns to the background of who joined which party. East Timorese leaders of the different parties tended to know each other well and were sometimes related. Domingos Oliveira, the UDT secretary general at the time, told the Commission of his close friendship with the Fretilin vice-president, Nicolau Lobato, and of how he talked regularly about politics with his cousin José Osorio Soares, the secretary general of Apodeti. Timor-Leste in 1975 was a very small world of political networks and alliances. [70]

79. A privileged background was common to leaders across the parties. To be privileged in late colonial Portuguese Timor could mean a number of things, for example: a liurai background, mixed-race (mestizo) ancestry, a family with landholdings, secondary education in church or state schools. Often those who had these marks of privilege gravitated to employment in the civil service. These characteristics united many of the leaders across parties. They were often distinguishable only by finer social gradations. Not surprisingly, in view of its federalist political platform, several UDT leaders were well-entrenched in the colonial system, whether through holding relatively senior positions in the civil service, through membership of the Salazarist Acção Nacional Popular (ANP), or through their closeness to the Portuguese Church.[71] Though often from similar backgrounds, Fretilin leaders did not have an emotional attachment to the Portuguese colonial regime. Apodeti attracted its leadership from specific areas that had ties with Indonesia that could be geographic (based on proximity to the Indonesian border) or political (linked to their involvement in the 1959 Viqueque rebellion).

80. Timor-Leste's traditional rulers provided an important channel for gathering support locally for all the parties. The small KOTA party sought to make the traditional system the basis of its programme. Apodeti also sought support from these traditional and regional leaders, with some success. Guilherme Gonçalves, the liurai

* Ramos-Horta wrote that he was called again by the governor because of "Maubere My Brother", but it wasn't clear what the Portuguese rulers thought of Xavier do Amaral's writing at the time. But it was widely accepted among nationalists that Seara was closed due to Xavier do Amaral's writing. [See Abílio Araújo, Timor-Leste: Os Loricos Voltaram a Cantar, 1977, Lisbon, p. 187].

of Atsabe, provided a significant regional power base for the party near the border with Indonesia. However, the liurai did not provide a single, solid base for any one party. Francisco Xavier do Amaral described to the Commission the different ways Fretilin and UDT sought popular support:

> *The ASDT party had this method. We could see that the first party to form was UDT, and I saw their tactics. UDT campaigned focussing on the Administrators, and went down to the Sub-district Administrators and the traditional kings (liurai). They did not go directly to the people. So I thought, we need the people, I don't need the* liurai, they are with the Portuguese. I need the people. So they would go from the top down, and I would start at the bottom. I would start at the grassroots and go up. We would sometimes meet in the middle. [72]

81. Political participation in the individualistic Western democratic tradition remained the privilege of the elite groups who developed the parties. The political process following the Carnation Revolution was rapid, and without civic or political education many ordinary East Timorese people made choices about party membership or affiliation based on local allegiance and conformity rather than party principles or policies.[73] Particular villages or regions often gave political allegiance to one party. Mario Carrascalão of UDT described how communities' political loyalties became fixed:

> People in Maubisse, because they were close to the Portuguese soldiers, all of Maubisse was UDT. Virtually all of Maubisse was UDT. But if you looked at Uatolari, everyone was Fretilin, and in Uato Carbau everyone was Apodeti. This was the reality that emerged as we prepared for [village] elections [in 1975]. [74]

Internal developments and tensions

Competition between UDT and Fretilin

82. The two largest parties were without question UDT and ASDT. Apodeti was especially significant due to its links with and support from the Indonesian government. While UDT and ASDT had their differences, in their ultimate goal of independence they were united. Indeed during 1974-75 on the question of independence, UDT and Fretilin moved closer with both eventually accepting the timetable proposed by the Portuguese that was set out in Law 7/75 on 17 July 1975.[75] ASDT began talking about creating a broad-based front as early as July 1974, but rejected the idea of forming a coalition with UDT.[76] In August, UDT and ASDT supporters organised a series of meetings to form a coalition, but again failed to agree on a common platform.[77] The two parties quickly descended into public verbal attacks on each other and aggressive rhetoric which was socially divisive and helped prepare the ground for the violence that followed.[78]

Apodeti military training in West Timor

83. In the meantime Apodeti established contact with the Indonesian military with a view to securing weapons and military training. An Apodeti representative, Tomas Gonçalves, the son of the liurai of Atsabe, Guilherme Gonçalves, went to West Timor in August 1974 for military training. In September he went to Jakarta, where he met the Indonesian commander-in-chief of the armed forces, General Maraden Panggabean, who at that time perceived Apodeti to be a suitable vehicle for achieving the result of integration. These visits occurred with the involvement and help of the Indonesian consulate in Dili.[79]

The political parties prepare for armed confrontation

84. Apodeti was the first, but not the only party, to develop a paramilitary capacity. This was a strong tendency on the part of these three parties. UDT and Fretilin both actively competed for support among the East Timorese members of the Portuguese colonial army.[80] Beyond the question of their loyalty to Portugal, Governor Mário Lemos Pires was also concerned about the growing prospect of divisions among the East Timorese troops based on political party allegiance. The former middle-ranking officer (aspirante), Rogério Lobato, told the Commission:

> I can say that UDT made a point of trying to get support from the non-commissioned officers, especially sergeants. But Fretilin also campaigned openly…among the forces to mobilise the soldiers.[81]

85. This was a concern to the colonial administration. When Fretilin declared the East Timorese armed forces part of the UDT-Fretilin coalition, Major Francisco Mota, head of the governor's Political Affairs Office, forbade military involvement in politics, in keeping with the Portuguese military principle of standing apart from politics (apartidarismo).[82] However, in April 1974 the Portuguese army itself had provided a very recent example of a military becoming involved in politics. Many East Timorese soldiers in the Portuguese colonial army and police were also bemused by what they saw as a lack of discipline and attention to duty shown by Portuguese in the colonial army after the Carnation Revolution.[83] Although there were already rumblings before 11 August, East Timorese soldiers generally remained loyal to the principle of apartidarismo until the outbreak of civil war. Some refused to take sides even then.

Students from Portugal

86. A further source of tension at the time, and of historical conjecture ever since, was the role of seven East Timorese students who returned from Portugal in September 1974, days before ASDT renamed itself Fretilin. They brought experience of radical politics from their Lisbon student groups* and a strong anti-colonial stance.[84] While some East Timorese politicians of the time believe the students were responsible for pushing the ASDT party into a more revolutionary stance,[85] the Commission heard from Fretilin Central Committee member Mari Alkatiri that when they arrived back in Timor, the students, unlike the Central Committee members, saw Portuguese colonialism as a greater threat than Indonesian neo-colonialism.[86] The students joined Fretilin, which calmed some of their more radical ideas,[87] and the party was in turn influenced by their enthusiasm and fresh ideas. These students became prominent members of Fretilin. While their role in the creation of Fretilin and the radicalisation of its policies remains disputed, UDT members remember their inflammatory influence through graffiti ("Death to the Fascists!")[88] and insults about UDT's alleged conservatism.[89] Such behaviour often led to the students being exclusively blamed for Fretilin's more radical policies.

ASDT becomes Fretilin

87. On 11 September 1974, ASDT renamed itself the Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor, Fretilin (Frente Revolucionário de Timor Leste Independente). From then on the party adopted a more radical stance. Its manifesto (Manual e Programa Politicos da Fretilin) referred to Fretilin as "a front that united nationalist and anti-colonial groups under one vision – the liberation of Timorese from colonialism".[90] It also asserted that Fretilin was the "sole legitimate representative" of the East Timorese people. There was no electoral legitimacy to this claim, which Fretilin based on its belief of the allegiance of Timor-Leste's indigenous-agrarian majority. Nonetheless on the basis of values that it claimed were common to "all East Timorese" Fretilin demanded Timor-Leste's de jure independence from Portugal. On the one hand, Fretilin was aiming to achieve independence from its colonial master Portugal. On the other, some of its leaders by this time were looking to what they saw as the greater threat of a neo-colonial power in Indonesia and aimed to build a broad national front to meet this challenge.[91]

88. Fretilin's self-proclaimed role as the sole legitimate representative of the people of Timor-Leste alarmed the leaders of other parties, who saw this as promoting political intolerance.

> They did not accept other parties. Why?…They wanted to be the sole legitimate representative of the Timorese people. They did not recognise people in other parties...[92]

* The five main students were Abilio Araújo, Guilhermina Araújo, António Carvarinho, Vicente Manuel Reis and Venâncio Gomes da Silva. See Relatório da CAEPDT, p. 54.

* These included MLTD or Movimento Libertação Timor Dili and FULINTIDI or Frente Unica de Libertação de Timor Dili.

The term maubere

89. Although it aspired to be the sole representative of the nation of Timor-Leste, Fretilin did not achieve this. What it did achieve was the development of an East Timorese nationalism through its use of ideas such as turning the name maubere into a symbol of the East Timorese common man, and the Tetum slogan ukun rasik an, meaning independence or self-government. When first used in 1974-75, the term maubere was considered by East Timorese linked to UDT as racially divisive, marking "pure-blooded" East Timorese against mixed-race mestizos. The Commission heard testimony from senior former members of the UDT party, who described the term maubere as a source of serious division in society.[93] José Ramos-Horta explained the genesis of the term as a political slogan at the Commission's National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76:

> *I wrote an article in a journal in Timor [Seara], not in 1975 or in 1974, but in 1973…When we began ASDT, in a meeting of ASDT/Fretilin I explained that all political parties needed an image. That if we wanted to convince the electorate we could not do this with complicated philosophy…So I said it would be good if we could identify Fretilin with* maubere like a slogan, a symbol of Fretilin's identity. It is clear that 90% of Timorese are barefoot, no papers, but they all called themselves maubere…It is important [to understand] that there was no other philosophy to this term, it was a party identity.[94]

90. In later years, during the Indonesian occupation, these symbols grew to become a powerful assertion of the Timorese people's aspiration for independence, while at the same time continuing to divide Fretilin and UDT.

Fretilin and the spectre of communism

91. There has been much debate about the extent to which Fretilin was influenced by communism in 1974-75, and whether this was the real reason for UDT's armed action and Indonesia's intervention. The Commission heard much testimony on this issue at its national public hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76. It is clear that some members of Fretilin were communists, but it would be incorrect to conclude on that basis that the party itself was communist in 1974-75. A more accurate summation would be that the mainstream of the Fretilin leadership was centre-left, although the party contained a spectrum of opinion that ranged from far-left to more conservative elements.

92. This was the view of João Carrascalão, the UDT leader who was one of the founders of the anti-communist movement after 11 August:

> In Fretilin some leaders were communist, but Fretilin was not a communist party. In UDT some leaders were socialist, but UDT was not a socialist party. It was a social democrat party...[95]

93. José Ramos-Horta, the only political figure to be present at the founding of both UDT and ASDT, also commented on the charge that Fretilin was a communist party:

> When people say that Fretilin was communist in 1974-75 it is not true. It was a political front. Alarico Fernandes was a communist. [Sebastião] Montalvão was communist and there were some others whose names I forget. Nicolau Lobato was not a communist. You could call Nicolau Lobato a secular Christian Marxist, like the theology of Latin American priests. Priests in Brazil, the Bishop in Brazil, in Nicaragua, in El Salvador, they are Marxist and Catholic without contradiction…I can say that Nicolau Lobato was someone who believed in Marxism but was 100% Catholic. Xavier Amaral, you might try to call him communist or a social democrat, but I think don't think so, he is a little conservative.[96]

94. During the period before the internal armed conflict, Fretilin's programme and rhetoric included elements that suggested communism. Its language, starting with its name, was social-revolutionary. Fretilin's maubere ideology aimed at a popular social revolution, working to build a grassroots national identity. Its policies were firmly left-wing, focusing on the radical overhaul of education, health and agricultural production. Its manifesto claimed that it was the "sole representative" of the East Timorese people. This rhetoric echoed that of many other Marxist social-revolutionary movements, particularly that of the liberation movements in the Portuguese African colonies.[97]

95. Members of Portugal's MFA were not immune to the political debate of the day, and the UDT party considered some Portuguese members of the MFA [Movimento das Forcas Armadas] to be propagating communist ideas in Timor. Mario Carrascalão testified to the Commission that right and left wing elements within the Portuguese administration had for some time been seeking to spread their views in Timor-Leste:

> When the MFA came to Timor they had leftists who wanted to create conditions in Timor so that Timor could become, I'm not sure how to put it, communist or Marxist or Marxist-Leninist or Maoist... [Meanwhile] the Portuguese secret police [DGS] told UDT that Fretilin had organised military training in two places. Who were the trainers? [They said] these trainers were from [Communist] Vietnam.[98]

96. Some leaders of UDT were especially susceptible to suggestions that Fretilin was communist. The Commission heard testimony that the UDT President, Francisco Lopes da Cruz, and its Vice-President, César da Costa Mouzinho, became increasingly extreme in their anti-communism during 1975 after visits to Australia and Jakarta.[99]

97. It was often difficult to tell whether Indonesia's anti-communist propaganda was the sincere, if misguided, expression of the regime's fervent anti-communism or an attempt to manipulate the issue to justify intervention. Once the coalition was dissolved in late May, the Indonesian radio broadcasts from Kupang began labelling both UDT and Fretilin as communist, saying UDT leader João Carrascalão was a pro-Soviet communist and Fretilin pro-China. But, during this period, Indonesian officials were also meeting with UDT leaders and telling them that Fretilin represented the communist threat.[100] This indicated to some East Timorese political leaders that the issue of communism was used by Indonesia as an excuse to pressure UDT and later to intervene directly in Portuguese Timor.[101] In the context of the Cold War, as José Ramos-Horta told the Commission, communism was an easy allegation to make without necessarily holding substance.[102]

Lack of political tolerance

98. Although at a national level multiple parties existed, in many cases the political patterns that emerged at local levels were not pluralistic. Party militants aggressively defended political territory. Tomás Gonçalves of Apodeti told the Commission about his experiences trying to campaign in district communities:

> UDT was already in Ermera, people were going to beat me…so I went to Letefoho and it was also full of UDT. My cousin was the sub-district head there, and he said to me: "It's better that you go back, there is no need to talk or campaign here." [103]

99. The Commission heard many testimonies and statements about political intolerance at the community level in 1974-75. It manifested itself in many ways, and often turned to violence. A common practice referred to was that of political parties issuing identity cards to members, or simply forcing people to carry such cards even though they did not chose to be a member of the party. Party militants would randomly require people to produce their cards, and if they showed the card of the "wrong" party, detention or a beating could ensue.[104] The Commission also heard of teachers pressuring students to give their allegiance to a party, under threat of expulsion from school.[105]

100. Xanana Gusmão told the Commission how this intolerance resulted in violence:

> Each party presented their views as the national interest, but didn't take into consideration that we are all people of Timor, nor what the nation as a whole was striving for. And because of this we noticed a lack of will on the part of the party leaders to reduce the level of violence, to address what was going on. Sometimes we noticed that the parties were quite happy when their supporters would come and say: "We beat up this person" or "We killed that person". It was regarded as a small victory…If a party had the most number of people in a sub-district, they didn't let other parties campaign in that area. And so when other parties would go to those places people would attack, block their way, boycott, throw rocks at each other and beat each other.[106]

Governor Lemos Pires's "mission impossible"

101. A new phase of Timor's decolonisation began with the appointment of Colonel Mário Lemos Pires as governor in November 1974. He was to be the last governor of Portuguese Timor. Lemos Pires has written that before taking up his position, he had asked the Portuguese President, General Francisco da Costa Gomes, if the government intended to hand over Portuguese Timor to Indonesia. He told the President if rather than allowing the East Timorese to determine their own future, that was the policy, he would not accept the position of governor.[107] The President is reported to have replied that there was no such policy, although Indonesia was part of the reality in which they were operating.[108] In an interview with the Commission, Lemos Pires recalled his concerns as he left Portugal to take up his post as governor:

> I left for Timor-Leste with the belief that the support that I would eventually receive from the Portuguese government would be very limited, and worse than that, the focus of the Portuguese politics on the East Timorese process would be minimal. I was right.[109]

102. In the absence of a clear brief from his superiors in Lisbon, on his arrival in Timor Governor Lemos Pires hoped to carry through a programme to tackle what he saw as the most urgent problems facing the colony. These he defined as: the demoralised state of the military; the need for a decolonisation policy; the need to kick-start the stalled civil administration; and the need to prepare the East Timorese to administer the country themselves. He was able to address some of these issues, such as educational reform, speedily. Tackling the most urgent ones, such as military reform and finding a formula for decolonisation, proved less easy. Part of the problem was that he had little support from Lisbon. His requests for clear guidance were ignored. His own views on decolonisation were not shared by such key figures as the Minister for Inter-territorial Coordination, Antonio de Almeida Santos. Before his arrival in Timor, communication with Lisbon had been complicated by competition between the representative of the MFA in the colony, Major Arnão Metello, and the Governor for the government's attention. Mário Lemos Pires sought to create clearer lines of communication, but the team he assembled in the Governor's Office replicated the divisions on policy that existed in Lisbon. He could do little to raise the flagging morale of the Portuguese forces, most of whom wanted to go home to Portugal as soon as possible.[110]

103. Local conditions were not favourable either. The Governor's early efforts at creating mechanisms through which he could consult with the parties on decolonisation were continually frustrated. By the time such a mechanism, the Comissão de Descolonização de Timor (Decolonisation Commission in Timor, CDT), came into being in late April 1975, political differences between the parties were so entrenched that it was probably too late. This, as well as other initiatives such as the planned implementation of educational reforms that sought to better serve the East Timorese community, were interrupted by the civil war of August 1975.[111] From the beginning UDT and Fretilin refused to sit down with Apodeti; Apodeti refused to accept independence as an option and insisted on a short transitional decolonisation period. The breakdown of the Fretilin/UDT coalition in late May destroyed the common ground between those two parties. It was telling that Governor Lemos Pires was in Lospalos for the announcement of the results of local elections, one of his reforms, on 10 August 1975, the day before UDT launched its armed movement.

104. Among East Timorese soldiers who formed the bulk of the army there was a growing perception that Portugal was in the process of turning its back on Timor.[112] Many East Timorese members of the armed forces were drawn to political involvement at what they saw as a critical moment in their country's history. Mário Lemos Pires recalled to the Commission:

> All of them wanted to take a political side, but worse was that the political parties, mainly UDT and Fretilin, each tried to convince them to help and support their own parties. That being so, what I found was that the Army could not fulfil its mission.[113]

105. Lisbon denied Lemos Pires's request for additional Portuguese troops, providing instead only two companies of elite paratroopers. As a result Portuguese control was reduced at a time of rising tensions inside the colony and when external pressure from Indonesia began. Lemos Pires was aware that his policy of Timorisation could easily lead to conflict that he would not be able to control. Mario Carrascalão told the Commission of a warning from Lemos Pires:

> You need to be very careful with your politics. The parachutists that we have here in Timor are not here to protect you…They are here to take care of the foreigners here in Timor, the Portuguese.[114]

The coalition between UDT and Fretilin

106. On 21 January 1975, encouraged and supported by the Governor, and after many attempts, Fretilin and UDT formed a coalition. The two parties united on the basis of their joint commitment to full independence, the rejection of Apodeti and of integration with Indonesia, and the establishment of a transitional government in which the two parties would take part. While Fretilin and UDT had much in common, the relationship was an uncomfortable one, and UDT in particular felt increasingly threatened by Fretilin's mass following and its continuing claim to be the sole representative of the people of Timor-Leste.[115] Both parties continued their verbal attacks on each other, and this discord reverberated in the districts. The coalition lacked political mechanisms to deal with these differences and to bring the parties together.[116]

107. While some elements of Fretilin continued to label UDT an ultra-conservative reactionary group, some members of UDT became increasingly concerned by what they saw as the radical influence in Fretilin. From late 1974 the Indonesians stepped up their anti-communist propaganda. Their broadcasts from Kupang included commentary on daily events, suggesting that they had a very effective intelligence gathering network inside Portuguese Timor.[117] The Commission heard from the former governor, Lemos Pires, that the Indonesian government was alarmed at the evidence of East Timorese unity represented by the coalition, and took action to undermine it.[118]

108. Indonesian military representatives involved in Operasi Komodo visited Portuguese Timor during these months. In early April 1975 a delegation consisting of Colonel Sugianto, Colonel Soeharto and others met Governor Lemos Pires and the leaders of the three main political parties. In April 1975 General Ali Moertopo invited both Fretilin and UDT representatives for simultaneous but separate visits to Jakarta.[119] According to José Ramos-Horta, who, with Alarico Fernandes, represented Fretilin at the April Jakarta meetings:

> This visit…was perceived differently by us and by the Indonesians. We saw the visit as a chance to clear the air, they saw it as a chance to further divide us.[120]

109. Shortly after the return of its representatives from a visit to Jakarta, UDT convened a Central Committee meeting and voted in favour of withdrawing from the coalition. The Commission heard testimony that UDT came to this decision after a long, hard meeting, indicating that the party was deeply divided on the matter.[121] Domingos Oliveira told the Commission:

> An absolute majority decided to cut from the coalition, to end the coalition. They said "This coalition was meant to help us, to help bring calm with peace, unite us as we moved towards independence, but we just attacked each other even more. So it is better to finish the coalition." But this was a mistake…because when we ended the coalition the situation got worse and worse.[122]

110. The Commission was told that once the coalition broke apart, tensions and the threat of violence increased.[123]

111. One immediate result of the breakdown of the coalition was that the way was opened for Indonesia to play on UDT leaders' fears about the supposed communist threat. A long-term political outcome was that the two main East Timorese political parties were estranged from each other for many years.

Indonesia's growing involvement in Portuguese Timor: destabilisation and diplomacy

Overview

112. While the Portuguese administration in Timor-Leste began to implement a programme of decolonisation, and East Timorese political parties vied for support, Indonesia was active on two fronts in pursuit of an outcome that would satisfy its interests in the territory.

113. Shortly after the Carnation Revolution in Portugal, Indonesia intensified its intelligence-gathering operations inside Portuguese Timor. It also sought to influence East Timorese politicians to support the integration option. From early 1975 it began to plan for a military solution. The increasingly militaristic cast that Indonesian policy towards Portuguese Timor took is traceable to its growing conviction that it would not be able to attain its goal of incorporation non-violently. Having initially sought assurances from Portugal that Timor would be no threat to its security, Indonesia soon concluded that its security needs would be met only if Timor did not become an independent state. Underlying this policy transformation was a perception of Indonesia's security interests that was heavily conditioned by the Cold War anti-communism of the time. Indonesia was able to find a receptive audience for its views on Timor among its Western and Asian allies, and to an extent in Portugal.

Operasi Komodo and increased covert military operations

114. By early 1975 Indonesia's interference in Portuguese Timor had reached a level where it could not really still be called covert. The Bakin agent, Luis Taolin, was a regular visitor to Dili from his base in West Timor. Indonesian Special Forces were known to be training Apodeti sympathisers in West Timor. Operasi Komodo's disinformation campaign was being stepped up, through strident radio broadcasts into Portuguese Timor from Kupang and through the planting of stories in the Indonesian and foreign media. The radio broadcasts claimed that Portugal was about to withdraw from its colony, spread unfounded stories of Vietnamese and Chinese infiltration into the territory and argued that integration was the only option. They fuelled distrust between the parties, and caused apprehension among East Timorese not committed to a particular political party.[124]

115. After UDT and Fretilin formed their coalition in late January 1975 the Indonesians increased military activity. There was a major inter-service military exercise in southern Sumatra in February, effectively a rehearsal for full-scale invasion,[125] as well as small troop increases along the border with Portuguese Timor.[126]

116. Some time between December 1974 and February 1975 an eight-man Special Forces (Kopassandha) team, led by Colonel Dading Kalbuadi, arrived in Atambua. The team prepared the ground for what was to become Operasi Flamboyan.[*] A tactical intelligence operation, Operasi Flamboyan was masterminded by Major-General Benny Moerdani on the orders of the Department of Defence and Security. It noted the modest cross-border agent network Komodo had been established,[127] and took over training of the 216 East Timorese recruits, known as Partisans, in

* According to Korps Marinir TNI AL, 1970–2000, p. 285, Operasi Flamboyan was conducted from 5 October to 5 December, 1975

Atambua, led by Tomás Gonçalves of Apodeti. The Commission heard testimony that the training of the Apodeti Partisans was stepped up with the arrival of the Kopassandha team led by Colonel Kalbuadi. According to Tomás Gonçalves, the Indonesians were also interested in gathering military and other intelligence about Portuguese Timor.[128]

> There, they [the Indonesians] did not communicate with us. They called us the "Partisans", and the Partisans did not communicate with them…When they called me over they asked me, "More or less how many guns do they have in Timor? How many companies are there? Over there do many people know how to use guns? Do they know how to be guerrilla fighters?"[129]

117. In January 1975 the Portuguese administration sent a delegation to Atambua to try to convince the Apodeti Partisans to return to Portuguese Timor, but they were unsuccessful.[130] Meanwhile Captain Yunus Yosfiah began recruiting and training more Kopassandha troops in West Java. In late April an 80-man Kopassandha team arrived in Atambua.[131]

Indonesian diplomacy

118. The Indonesian decision to step up its military activity through training, exercises and intelligence-gathering took place against a background of contacts with countries with a stake in the future of Portuguese Timor, primarily Portugal and Australia but also the US.

Lisbon meetings between Portugal and Indonesia, 14–15 October 1974

119. Before the resignation of President Spínola in September 1974, Indonesia had requested a meeting with the Portuguese government to discuss Timor. In mid-October 1974 President Soeharto sent an Indonesian delegation led by his close confidant, General Ali Moertopo, to Lisbon to discuss Portuguese Timor. They met President Costa Gomes, Prime Minister Vasco Gonçalves, Foreign Minister Mário Soares, and a senior official in the foreign ministry, the state secretary Jorgé Campinos.

120. The birth of Fretilin and the fall of the conservative Spínola in September 1974 had alarmed the Indonesians and convinced them of the need to sound out the new Portuguese government's thinking on the future of the territory. According to the Indonesian delegation's reports, there was a consensus among the Portuguese leadership that integration with Indonesia would be the best outcome. According to published versions of these reports, President Costa Gomes told the delegation that the only realistic options were a continued relationship with Portugal or integration with Indonesia. He is said to have intimated that Portugal was not in favour of maintaining its ties to the colony. Again according to the Indonesian side, the state secretary and the prime minister were less guarded in stating their support for integration, though they too referred to the need to defer to the wishes of the East Timorese people.[132]

121. The Indonesian delegation told President Soeharto that the Portuguese leadership viewed integration with Indonesia as the best available option. Mário Lemos Pires wrote in his book:

> It could be that the Indonesian delegation found itself in a better position than it had bargained for - that Portugal did not oppose integration with Indonesia and Portugal also did not consider independence as an option. However, General Ali Moertopo forgot that, although no policy to that effect yet existed, nonetheless the Portuguese government supported the principle of self-determination for the Timorese people. He [Moertopo] jumped to conclusions, possibly because he was fascinated or because the tone of the conversation at the time made it possible for him to draw the conclusion that Portugal liked the idea of integration with Indonesia and would facilitate Indonesia's steps in that direction.[133]

122. This analysis of the meeting may give too much credit to the Portuguese government. The report of the Portuguese military commission of inquiry into the decolonisation of Timor took a less charitable view, concluding that "the Lisbon meeting did not pass a test set by Indonesia on the determination of Portugal to oppose the integration of Timor with Indonesia, from which it can be deduced that the Portuguese attitude did to some extent encourage the Indonesians in their intentions".[134]

123. This conclusion is partly confirmed by the actions of the Portuguese government after the meeting. The secretary of state for administration sent a telegram to the minister of inter-territorial co-ordination, Antonio de Almeida Santos, who was then visiting Timor. The telegram requested that in view of the outcome of the talks with General Moertopo, during his visit the minister not give equal weight to the independence option in his public statements. The minister duly complied with this request. In a speech at a reception at the Palácio das Repartições (now the Palácio do Governo), Almeida Santos, while stressing that the East Timorese should be free to choose their own destiny, spoke much more enthusiastically of the possibilities of continued association with Portugal or integration with Indonesia than of independence, which he suggested would not be realistic given that Timor was far from "economic independence".[135]

London meeting between Portugal and Indonesia, 9 March 1975

124. Disturbed by increasing Indonesian covert activity, Portugal asked Indonesia for a second meeting.[136] The meeting was held in London on 9 March 1975 with General Ali Moertopo again leading the Indonesian delegation. The Indonesians took a firm line, ruling out the Portuguese plan for a transitional government and any moves to internationalise the problem, claiming that integration was the only solution and proposing that it have an advisory role in the government of the colony. Portugal reiterated the principle that the people of Timor-Leste should be consulted about the future status of the colony. Again, however, its stance did appear to concede some ground to Indonesia, when, for example, it said that Indonesia was entitled to give active support to Apodeti. Portugal thereby extended to Indonesia a privileged status beyond that of "interested observer".

125. As at the Lisbon talks five months earlier, Indonesia took the concessions as an indication that Portugal shared its view that integration with Indonesia was the most desirable outcome. President Soeharto gave his interpretation of what had transpired at the London meeting to the Australian Prime Minister Gough Whitlam, a month later at a meeting in Townsville. He depicted a very different Portuguese position from the one given in the official record of the Portuguese themselves, and a summary of Soeharto's version of the meeting, as told to Whitlam, reads as follows:

> At the London meeting the Portuguese had said that they believed that integration with Indonesia was the best outcome, provided, of course, that this was what the people of the territory wanted. The Portuguese had also agreed that there should be no "international interference" in Portuguese policy towards decolonisation in Timor. It would be for Indonesia to achieve the integration of the territory. To this end Indonesia had the approval of the Portuguese government to assist and to develop…Apodeti, and to make approaches to, and to influence the line of policy of the UDT and Fretilin parties.[137] *

The meetings between Soeharto and Whitlam, in Wonosobo, 6 September 1974, and Townsville, 4 April 1975

126. Soeharto met the Australian Prime Minister Gough Whitlam twice during the period 1974-75. First in Wonosobo, near Yogyakarta on 6 September 1974 and later in Townsville, Queensland on 4 April 1975. Portuguese Timor was discussed at both meetings, and at both Whitlam is believed to have given Soeharto the green light to take over the territory, as indicated by the Australian minutes which are now on the public record (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination). On both occasions Whitlam told Soeharto that his government believed that Portuguese Timor should become part of Indonesia for almost identical reasons to those stated by Soeharto, that it would be unviable as an independent state and would therefore become "the focus of attention" of more powerful countries.[138] At their Wonosobo meeting Soeharto explicitly

* The Portuguese delegation consisted of the minister for inter-territorial coordination Antonio de Almeida Santos, the minister without portfolio Vitor Alves, the secretary of state for foreign affairs Jorgé Campinos and the chief of the Office for Political Affairs in the Timor government Major Francisco Mota. The Indonesian delegation consisted of Ali Moertopo, the Indonesian ambassadors to the UK and France, and Captain Suharto of the intelligence agency Bakin.

suggested that Indonesia and Australia had identical strategic interests in Portuguese Timor - an independent Timor-Leste would be prey to China or the Soviet Union and thus "a thorn in the eye of Australia and a thorn in the back of Indonesia".[139]

127. At the same time they agreed that integration should take place through a process that recognised the people of Timor-Leste's right to self-determination, with the added caveat from Whitlam that it should be done "in a way that would not upset the Australian people" as he put it at Townsville.[140] Neither made it clear which objective would be the overriding one if it proved impossible to reconcile the East Timorese desire for self-determination with the Indonesian desire for integration. At Townsville in April 1975, though still abjuring the use of force, Soeharto seemed to be close to making up his mind on this question by implying that an act of self-determination could not be relied on to reflect the true wishes of the East Timorese people. Whitlam was sympathetic, expressing the view that the ordinary East Timorese "had no sense of politics" and would need time "to recognise their ethnic kinship with their Indonesian neighbours".[141]

128. For all his reservations, there is evidence that the views Whitlam expressed at the Wonosobo meeting do seem to have strongly influenced the Indonesian decision that there was no alternative to incorporation. On 14 October 1974 the Australian ambassador to Portugal reported to Canberra a conversation with Ali Moertopo during the latter's visit to Lisbon: "Ali (Moertopo) said that until Mr Whitlam's visit to Djakarta (sic) they had been undecided about Timor. However, the prime minister's support for the idea of incorporation into Indonesia had helped them to crystallise their own thinking and they were now firmly convinced of the wisdom of this course".[142]

129. There is also evidence that in resolving the dilemma between incorporation and self-determination, Whitlam was inclined to favour the former. He expressed his views on this matter frankly in a secret cable that he sent to his foreign minister on 24 September 1974, two weeks after the Wonosobo meeting: "I am in favour of incorporation but obeisance has to be made to self-determination."[143] Whitlam's ambassador in Jakarta, Richard Woolcott, also believed that it was the prime minister's view that incorporation was the overriding objective. It also seems to have been Woolcott's view that it should be the overriding objective of Australian policy simply because it was the overriding objective of Indonesian policy. In a cable to his foreign minister, Don Willesee, on 17 April 1975, shortly after the Townsville meeting, Woolcott contrasted his minister's thinking on the matter with the prime minister's:

> [You] tend to place the main emphasis on a proper act of self-determination for Portuguese Timor…[I]t was clear in Townsville that the prime minister continues to believe that the logic of the situation is that Timor should become part of Indonesia and we would "welcome" such an outcome to an act of choice. While we support the principle of self-determination and while we certainly could not condone the use of force, the prime minister still does not want to encourage the emergence of an independent East Timor and > he believes that continuing public emphasis on self-determination, at this stage, is likely to strengthen pressures for independence.[144]

130. In his autobiography, Woolcott quotes from another cable to explain the thinking behind this position:

> Indonesia will proceed to incorporate Timor. While President Soeharto will want incorporation to be achieved in as presentionally [sic] acceptable a manner as possible, Indonesia will not be deterred from this fundamental policy objective. Indonesia regards this outcome as essential to its longer-term national interest and, indeed, as being in the interests of the region as a whole. Indonesia has held this attitude consistently since some months before I arrived at this post last March.[145]

The Macau Meeting, 26–28 June 1975

131. In April 1975, Governor Mário Lemos Pires formed the Commission for the Decolonisation of Timor (Comissão de Descolonização de Timor, CDT). Its May meetings with the UDT-Fretilin coalition, boycotted by Apodeti, discussed a decolonisation programme based on the right to independence, a transitional government and a local consultative assembly. However, on 27 May UDT broke its coalition with Fretilin, causing the talks to founder.[146] In response, Portugal planned higher-level talks on decolonisation in Macau.

132. On 26–28 June, Antonio de Almeida Santos, Portugal's minister for inter-territorial coordination, met UDT and Apodeti members and Indonesian diplomatic observers in Macau. Fretilin objected to the participation of Apodeti and Indonesia, and boycotted the meeting. Fretilin suspected that the meeting was part of a Portuguese strategy to hand Timor-Leste over to Indonesia:

> They ruled us for 450 years and they were tired already, so they would give us to someone else saying "You go and govern there now." So how long would we be slaves? This is why I did not accept that we go there. The conference in Macau was a tactic of Portugal and Indonesia to integrate Timor into Indonesia.[147]

133. Senior members of Fretilin attended Mozambique's independence ceremony instead.[148] The Macau summit advanced Indonesia's interests only to the extent that it recognised that both Apodeti and Jakarta had standing in the process. The result of the meeting was Decree 7/75, which set out: a structure for a provisional government with participation by all parties; a timetable for elections in 1976; and an end to Portuguese sovereignty in 1978. It also formed a legislative basis that blocked Indonesian efforts to secure integration as a directly agreed outcome of decolonisation. However, in a retreat from the CDT's May recognition of the right to independence, Decree 7/75 only recognised the right to self-determination.

The meeting designed a decolonisation process that would establish a transitional government, composed of both elected East Timorese and appointed Portuguese, and a government consultative council. These national institutions would be supported at the district level through local councils.

134. The political parties reacted differently to the decolonisation programme decided at Macau. Fretilin took an ambiguous position, neither stating its readiness to participate in the proposed transitional government, nor totally rejecting it, but saying that it would take part in the proposed 1976 elections.[149] UDT accepted the outcome. Apodeti, like Indonesia, rejected it on the grounds that independence was the only option and the proposed timeframe was too long. Following the meeting inter-party tensions increased - UDT angered by Fretilin's boycott, and Fretilin angered by Apodeti's involvement. Both major East Timorese parties also felt Portugal was being deceptive, and were aware of the bilateral meetings between Portugal and Indonesia. Mario Carrascalão recalled the impact of these bilateral meetings:

> Indonesia…accompanied Apodeti to Macau and held a meeting in Hong Kong with the Portuguese Government delegation there. What did they put together? Until today they have not said what they did at this meeting. We don't know…What did they do? This was not Indonesia's problem. This was Timor's problem, but they [Indonesia] are the ones who had meetings. Secret meetings with them [the Portuguese]. Why? People took advantage of this, [and] because of this people became divided.[150]

Meeting between President Soeharto and President Gerald Ford, 5 July 1975

135. On 5 July, in a meeting at Camp David with President Gerald Ford during his state visit to the US, President Soeharto outlined Indonesia's policy towards Timor-Leste. He concluded his remarks with the sentence:

> So the only way is to integrate into Indonesia.

136. Soeharto argued that an independent Portuguese Timor would not be viable and that it would be difficult for Portugal to continue to run the country because of its remoteness from the region.[151]

137. Earlier he had assured President Ford that Indonesia would not use force against the territory of another country. As in his meeting with Whitlam at Townsville, Soeharto made much of the argument that because of "heavy pressure" from the pro-independence party it would be difficult to ascertain the true wishes of the East Timorese people. Indonesia faced the problem of "how to manage the self-determination process with a majority wanting unity with Indonesia". During their exchange President Ford did not express a view on the US position on the issue.

138. Ford's silence was perhaps a fair reflection of US policy on Portuguese Timor. According to the former Australian ambassador, Richard Woolcott:

> The United States, involved in the Middle East, mired in the aftermath of Watergate and exhausted by its failure in Vietnam, was simply not interested in the fate of East Timor. The American ambassador in Jakarta was actually asked in 1975 to reduce the embassy's reporting on the subject.[152]

The armed movement of 11 August and the internal armed conflict

Overview

139. Less than two weeks after returning from Jakarta, UDT leaders launched the 11 August movement. Variously named a coup, an "attempted coup", a movement and an uprising, this armed action began in the capital Dili and quickly spread across the country. UDT captured some key installations, and delivered a list of demands to the Portuguese administration. They claimed that the armed movement was aimed at removing extremist elements from the territory to prevent Indonesian intervention.[153] Fretilin withdrew to its stronghold in the hills of Aileu, south of Dili. Because he could not guarantee security, the Portuguese governor's efforts to bring both parties to the negotiating table were ineffective. On 20 August Fretilin responded, with the backing of most East Timorese members of the Portuguese military. The conflict reached most parts of the country. Leaders of both major parties told the Commission that they lost control of the situation. The armed conflict was relatively short-lived and by early September a group of around 20,000, drawn mostly from UDT but also including members of other parties, had been driven towards the border with West Timor. They crossed into West Timor before the end of the month.

140. The Portuguese administration tried to bring the parties to the negotiating table. The Governor concluded that he was not in a position to bring the situation under control by military means.[154] Powerless to affect events and confined to a neutral zone in Farol, the Portuguese administration withdrew to the island of Ataúro on the night of 26 August.

141. In September 1975, Indonesia required UDT and its allies who had fled across the border to sign a pro-integration petition to President Soeharto. In exchange Indonesia offered them material and logistical support. Indonesia stepped up its own military operations by launching first a series of cross-border incursions and then, from early October, larger-scale military operations which gave it control of a number of strategic towns close to the border.[155]

UDT launches its 11 August armed movement

142. Since the breakdown of their coalition in May, tensions between UDT and Fretilin had been rising, both in Dili and in the districts.* In early August UDT decided to send its secretary general, Domingos Oliveira, and the Central Committee member with responsibility for foreign relations, João Carrascalão, to Jakarta. They hoped to meet President Soeharto. Instead they were received by General Ali Moertopo. Domingos Oliveira told the Commission that the decision to send the delegation to Jakarta was prompted by the need "to destroy all Indonesian pretexts for invading Timor". The mission of the two UDT envoys was therefore to assure Moertopo that Fretilin was essentially a nationalist movement and that UDT was capable of "cleaning up our own backyard" through the expulsion of those Portuguese officers and Fretilin leaders with communist sympathies. According to João Carrascalão's account of the meeting, Moertopo said that if they did clean up their backyard, Indonesian would respect the East Timorese right to self-determination. With the benefit of hindsight, João Carrascalão now considers that the two UDT envoys were naïve to believe Moertopo's assurances and that in fact "everything was already planned for the takeover of Timor-Leste", as he was told in a private conversation in Kupang with the governor of East Nusa Tenggara, El Tari, while en route back to Dili.[156]

143. Certainly it was the view of probably the best-informed diplomat in Jakarta, the Australian ambassador Richard Woolcott, that well before then it had become "settled Indonesia policy to incorporate Timor".[157] During the meeting Ali Moertopo also told the UDT leaders that Indonesia had received intelligence that Fretilin was planning a coup for 15 August.[158]

144. Members of UDT had been considering an anti-communist action for some weeks before 11 August.[159] The overriding objectives of the UDT armed movement were, its leaders now stress, not to take power but to redirect the decolonisation process which UDT believed had been hijacked by "ambitious, irresponsible and ill-intentioned" elements, and to pre-empt a coup by Fretilin, allegedly planned for 15 August.[160] However, there are many unanswered questions, in particular about the role of Indonesia in these events and precisely what the true objectives of the "attempted coup" leaders were. Some of the testimony received by the Commission throws some light on these questions, but it is not sufficient to provide definitive answers.

145. Although their list of targets was much longer and included all the main military facilities, the armed movement captured the police headquarters, along with its commander Lieutenant Colonel Rui Maggiolo Gouveia and its stock of weapons, and took control of key installations, including the port, the airport and the radio and telephone facilities in Dili.[161] Leader of the armed movement, João Carrascalão, met with Governor Lemos Pires at around 1.00am on 11 August, and expressed

* In his submission to CAVR the former UDT secretary general, Domingos Oliveira, presents a list of incidents that took place between June and early August indicating the breakdown in relations between the two parties. [Submission delivered in writing after testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003. CAVR Archive].

UDT's intention to remove communist elements from the colonial government and from Fretilin. The former governor wrote in later years that Carrascalão told him that the movement did not intend to replace the Portuguese government, and that it hoped for no military intervention. The following day UDT formally submitted its demands to Governor Lemos Pires. These included: replacement of certain military personnel, a faster decolonisation process, the handover of power to UDT, and acknowledgment of UDT's extra-judicial power as a liberation movement.[162]

146. UDT's show of force was purportedly not directed at Fretilin as such, but at "communist elements" within Fretilin. Any hopes UDT may have had that Fretilin would disavow its "extremists" and unite with UDT to jointly pursue independence were quickly dashed. Fretilin remained united and demanded that the Portuguese colonial government crack down on UDT.[163] UDT detained hundreds of Fretilin members, including several of the party's leaders at its headquarters in Palapaço, Dili, where ill-treatment was routine and where some died in circumstances that are disputed.[164]

147. The early momentum belonged to UDT. In the days immediately after the 11 August "attempted coup", UDT supporters detained hundreds of Fretilin leaders and supporters throughout the territory. Governor Lemos Pires decided not to oppose UDT with force. Several considerations persuaded him against such a course of action. He was uncertain whether the loyalty of the East Timorese troops to the colonial administration would outweigh their sympathies to one or the other of the contending parties. If they did not, there was a real risk that Portuguese soldiers would end up fighting East Timorese. A confrontation in which the battle lines pitted Portuguese against East Timorese would not only be politically disastrous; it might also end in military defeat for the Portuguese. The run-down of Portuguese troop strength in the previous months had not been offset by the recent arrival of 75 paratroops to reinforce the colonial army.[164]

148. Meanwhile, Fretilin leaders withdrew to Aileu, a Fretilin stronghold and the headquarters of the army training centre (Centro de Instrução). On 13 August in Dili, UDT and its sympathisers in the armed forces established a front, the Movement for the Unity and Independence of the Timorese People (Movimento para Unidade e Independência de Timor-Dili, MUITD), based on the principles of "unity, independence and anti-communism". They envisaged the self-liquidation of all pro-independence parties and the adherence of their members to the MUITD.[166] Over the following two days UDT won over the police chief, Maggiolo Gouveia, who was in UDT custody, and many of the East Timorese under his command, as well as sections of the military, including the companies based in Baucau and Lospalos.[167] On 16 August UDT issued a written statement calling for the expulsion of all communists from the territory, including those in the "Portuguese governor's office", the banning of Fretilin, the cancellation of Law 7/75 and the resumption of negotiations on Timor-Leste's independence. On 17 August, in an apparent concession to UDT, the two MFA delegates, Major Mota, the chief of the Office of Political Affairs and Major Jónatas, both of whom had been accused by UDT (and the Indonesians) of representing "the communist wing" of the government, were sent to Lisbon, ostensibly to keep the central government abreast of developments in Timor-Leste.[168]

The failure to negotiate: internal armed conflict

149. On 11 August, from their base in Aileu, Fretilin submitted a list of 13 conditions for their participation in negotiations to the Portuguese administration. They included the disarming of UDT and entrusting security to East Timorese soldiers, on the grounds that the police had proved themselves to be unreliable.[169] The Portuguese then sent Rogério Lobato, one of the highest-ranking East Timorese soldiers in the Portuguese army, as an emissary to the Fretilin leadership. However this backfired, and he played a pivotal role on his return to Dili in convincing the majority of East Timorese soldiers to join the Fretilin side. Although supposedly pledged to political neutrality (apartidarismo),[170] the East Timorese troops were in fact as swept up by the new political freedoms as their civilian counterparts.[171] On 15 August the Fretilin Central Committee in Aileu announced what they called "the resumption of general armed struggle against all traitors and enemies of the people".[172] On 20 August, Fretilin attacked UDT.

150. By 18 August, the remaining Portuguese government personnel working in the administration had withdrawn to the neighbourhood of Farol where many of them lived and which formed the core of a zone in Dili that had been declared neutral. The Portuguese paratroops were deployed to the neutral zone to protect them.

151. At 1.00am on 20 August, Rogério Lobato and Hermenegildo Alves launched Fretilin's armed insurrection by taking control of the Quartel Geral (army headquarters) in Taibessi and detaining the Portuguese troops who were there, including the deputy chief of staff.[173] On 22 August Fretilin leaders returned to Dili. The front line of the conflict in Dili was initially in Colmera, but the fighting spread throughout the city during the two weeks that it lasted. The Commission received testimony that there were liberal supplies of weapons in Dili, and that both sides handed them out indiscriminately.[174] In the brief armed conflict that ensued political parties allied with each other in every possible permutation. Mario Carrascalão described this phenomenon during the National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict:

> We saw a different approach there [in the districts]…In Atsabe we saw Fretilin together with UDT against Apodeti. Apodeti in Same was different, it was with UDT against Fretilin. In Dili it was Fretilin and Apodeti against UDT.[175]

152. The highest death toll was in the rural areas, where tensions based on long-standing clan feuds and personal grudges, intensified by more recent militant party ideological divisions, exploded into violence.[176] The violence was most intense in Liquiçá, Ermera, Ainaro, Manufahi and Manatuto, though it was not confined to these districts.

153. The Commission received testimonies and statements from across the country about the impact of the conflict on ordinary people. The brutality of East Timorese people against each other in this brief conflict has left deep wounds in East Timorese society which continue to be felt to this day. UDT members were responsible for the killing of Fretilin prisoners in a number of places in August, as it became clear that Fretilin forces were gaining control. 348 killings during the period of the internal conflict were reported to the Commission through its statement-taking process. Based on its research, the accounts given to it by contemporary accounts such as the ICRC who were based in Timor-Leste, the Commission estimates that between 1,500 and 3,000 were killed during the internal armed conflict (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; and Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations).[177] The Commission's data indicate that the majority of the killings were perpetrated by Fretilin, though mass killings were also committed by members of UDT (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).* A massacre occurred on around 27 August on the south coast at Wedauberek, Manufahi, where UDT members executed 11 members of the Fretilin youth organisation, Unetim.[178] On 28 August, as Fretilin forces neared the UDT stronghold of Ermera, 20 people whom UDT had taken prisoner after the armed movement were killed.[179]

154. In his testimony to the Commission Xanana Gusmão explained Fretilin's response as one of vengeance for the acts committed by UDT.[180] Rogério Lobato, who was in charge of the Fretilin armed forces at the time, told the Commission that there were various motivations for the violence:

> Sometimes this wasn't because they had a problem with them about this [political] situation, but from an old problem. I know that sometimes it was because someone had taken someone else's girlfriend and so now he used it as a chance to beat him. I know this. People took advantage of this war to beat others and to take justice into their own hands. But some did beat others because they were angry at them due to the war…I want to say that in this process of war so many died…it is true that Fretilin killed many UDT prisoners…UDT also killed Fretilin prisoners.[181]

155. In the Commission's National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict, UDT and Fretilin political leaders both testified that their parties did not have a policy of killing prisoners, or of violence against civilians, but that they could not control their cadres across the country.[182] The Commission did, however, receive testimonies implicating senior members of both parties in the killing, although it was not presented with evidence to suggest that the parties had taken an institutional decision to commit these crimes (see Vol. IV, Part 8: Responsibility and Accountability).[183]

* CAVR conducted a Retrospective Mortality Survey, based on the experiences of 1,396 randomly selected households in Timor-Leste. From this it extrapolated estimated total violations for 1974–1999.

156. East Timorese, and some Portuguese, members of the military and police did not stand outside this conflict. While UDT gained the backing of East Timorese (and a few Portuguese) members of the police and some military units, the overwhelming majority of East Timorese troops supported Fretilin.[184] This military backing allowed Fretilin to gain the upper hand quickly once it had launched its "general armed insurrection". This breach of the principle of apartidarismo also resulted in guns being released into the hands of the political parties and their supporters, increasing the impact of the violence enormously. In Dili UDT withdrew to the airport, and by early September was retreating westwards through Liquiçá towards Indonesia.

UDT retreats to the border

157. As a result of the Fretilin counter-offensive, in September members and sympathisers of the UDT, Apodeti, Klibur Oan Timor Aswain (KOTA) and Trabalhista parties fled first to the border area of Batugade, and then across the border into West Timor.[185] The defeat of UDT and their allies drove the leadership, however reluctantly, to accept Indonesian demands that they sign petitions calling for the integration of Portuguese Timor into Indonesia as the price of safe passage into West Timor. The number of East Timorese displaced to West Timor has been disputed. Indonesian officials at the time put the figure at 40,000 to 50,000 people.[186] East Timorese who joined the exodus have put the figure far lower, at between 10,000 and 30,000, attributing the discrepancy between their estimates and the Indonesian estimates to an Indonesian desire to inflate the number of refugees, either with a view to exaggerating the scale and severity of the internal conflict or simply to attract larger amounts of international assistance.[187]

Portugal's response to the internal conflict

158. Portugal responded to the internal conflict by sending an envoy to the colony from Lisbon. Indonesia blocked Colonel José Gomes, the first envoy to attempt to reach Dili on 14 August. On 22 August a message from the President's Office in Lisbon reached Governor Lemos Pires, informing him that the minister for inter-territorial coordination, Antonio de Almeida Santos, would be arriving in Darwin on 27 August. Mário Lemos Pires tried to arrange a ceasefire to permit negotiations. UDT agreed to a limited ceasefire, but Fretilin rejected the proposal out of hand.[188] On the night of 26 August what remained of the Portuguese administration departed Dili for Ataúro Island, never to return.[189]

159. Having attempted to seek support at the UN and in Australia, Almeida Santos reached Ataúro on 28 August. Unable to contact UDT, whose leaders by that time were in Indonesia, Almeida Santos contacted Fretilin to request the release of Portuguese prisoners. Fretilin complied with this request. However, on 9 September Portugal directed Almeida Santos to avoid recognising Fretilin as the sole representative of the people of Timor-Leste, one of the conditions that Fretilin had set for entering into negotiations.[190] On 22 September Almeida Santos left Ataúro for Lisbon. There, he recommended negotiations with the three main political parties. This was problematic. In control of most of Timor-Leste, Fretilin was willing to negotiate with Portugal – though not with UDT and Apodeti. Despite the pious declarations of the final bilateral meeting between the foreign ministers of Indonesia and Portugal, held in Rome on 1–2 November, that both governments would work to convince the parties of the need to resume talks with the Portuguese government, Indonesia showed no inclination to let its UDT or Apodeti clients engage in such talks. A belated attempt by Portugal to engage other nations in resolving the question of Portuguese Timor was equally fruitless. The final days before the invasion were marked by another political crisis in Lisbon, which left Portugal without a functioning government. In the end Portugal's fitful efforts were overtaken by the Indonesian decision to launch a full-scale military invasion.[191]

Indonesia's response

The East Timorese political parties come under Indonesian sway

160. As members of UDT and its allies – the Apodeti, Trabalhista and KOTA parties – fled to the border region, or across the border to West Timor, they fell more firmly under the control of the Indonesian military.

161. During the period of and shortly after the internal conflict, in early September, East Timorese groups in Maliana and Suai made two proclamations of integration with Indonesia.[192] On 7 September 1975, in Batugade, the leaders of UDT, KOTA and Trabalhista issued a joint petition addressed to President Soeharto, again asking for Portuguese Timor to be integrated into Indonesia.[193] Mario Carrascalão testified to the Commission about the background to the signing of the Batugade Petition:

> We stayed there and every day people from Indonesia came. Louis Taolin [of Bakin], [Colonel Aloysius] Sugianto [of Opsus] were always coming and asking us what help we needed…What they wanted to do was manipulate us, to sign…a petition to ask Indonesia to enter Timor…Some signed while others held guns in front of them. Some went to Atambua, and they signed over there. The conditions were good there. This petition was sent to President Soeharto, and soon Governor El Tari gave a response to Mr Francisco Lopes da Cruz. He said that he had agreed to give us material, that there was no need to worry. This was not integration; I saw this as just facilities.[194]

Operasi Flamboyan: Indonesian operations enter a new phase

162. On 31 August Indonesian operations were transferred from the intelligence agency, Bakin, to a specially-created military command called the Joint Task Force Command (Komando Tugas Gabungan, Kogasgab). The transfer marked a watershed in Indonesian operations in the territory, a shift from small-scale destabilisation to larger-scale military operations.[195]

163. In late August and September, Special Forces units recruited for the new operation, called Operasi Flamboyan, made frequent incursions into Portuguese Timor. High casualties soon forced a temporary lull in their activities.[196] The first, Tim Susi, led by Captain Yunus Yosfiah, entered through Atsabe.[197] East Timorese Partisans joined the Special Forces teams. These were troops trained by Indonesia including, for example, João Tavares's Halilintar unit (see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation). They were told to create "terror, [and] intimidation."[198] On 14 September, Fretilin forces clashed with the Indonesian military near the Atsabe border.[199] On the same day, the Indonesian military launched simultaneous attacks targeting Bobonaro, Atsabe and Suai.[200] The border town of Batugade fell on 8 October, and Fretilin troops retreated to Balibó.[201]

Portuguese Timor under Fretilin administration

Overview

164. With the end of fighting between Fretilin and UDT, by early September 1975, Fretilin found itself in de facto power in Portuguese Timor and facing an emergency. Fretilin continued to respect Portuguese sovereignty over the territory while the colonial administration remained in Ataúro. Lacking funds and administrative experience, and faced with a potential humanitarian crisis, Fretilin made a credible effort at food distribution and maintaining order in the community. However, it continued to hold large numbers of political prisoners from the brief internal armed conflict and faced difficulties restraining its own cadres from abuses. Moreover, Indonesia's response to Fretilin's victory in the internal armed conflict was to step up its military activities. Beginning in September 1975 it conducted armed incursions into Portuguese Timor. In October these incursions grew in scale and led to the Indonesian capture of several towns near the border. Aside from direct resistance to the Indonesian forces, Fretilin also tried to win support in the international community.

Fretilin fills the vacuum

165. To fill the void that had been left by the departing Portuguese, Fretilin established an interim administration. During this period Fretilin continued to recognise Portuguese sovereignty over Timor-Leste, and repeatedly called on the Portuguese administration to return from Ataúro to continue the interrupted decolonisation process. Fretilin kept the Portuguese flag flying in front of the governor's office and left the office unoccupied.[202] It made other gestures to show that it still regarded Portugal as the sovereign power, such as putting armed guards outside the Banco Nacional Ultramarino (BNU), the Portuguese-owned bank, which had functioned as the de facto central bank during Portuguese administration, and prohibiting the use of the governor's residence for official purposes.[203]

166. During September Fretilin attempted to encourage the Portuguese to return. On 13 September the Fretilin Central Committee issued a communiqué, affirming its recognition of Portuguese government authority, and calling for negotiations to put the decolonisation process back on track.[204] It stated that the negotiations should be conducted "within the national territory without foreign pressures", and should be with Fretilin alone as the victor in the internal conflict. Portugal did not accept Fretilin as the sole legitimate representative of the people of Portuguese Timor.[205] On 16 September, in response to the Indonesian incursion into Atsabe, Fretilin issued another statement, again recognising Portuguese sovereignty and calling for the resumption of talks on decolonisation.[206]

167. These statements also proposed internationalising the Timor-Leste issue by involving other countries in the region. Fretilin recommended that a fact-finding mission, comprising ASEAN countries, Australia and New Zealand together with observers from other countries, visit the country. The statement of 16 September also called for a conference to be attended by representatives of Portugal, Australia, Indonesia and Timor-Leste, to "clear rumours and misunderstandings". It also recommended a joint Indonesia-Timor-Leste peacekeeping force to conduct border patrols.

168. During October the Australian NGO ACFOA (Australian Council for Overseas Aid) sent a delegation, led by James Dunn, to attempt to bring Fretilin, UDT and the Portuguese administration together for talks. However these did not take place, partly due to Portuguese reluctance to engage with either Fretilin or UDT.[207] Fretilin's last attempt to engage the Portuguese was on 25 October, nine days after Balibó fell to Indonesian forces. Fretilin issued an invitation to the Portuguese government on Ataúro to send a delegation to Dili to observe the situation on the ground.[208] As before, the Portuguese were silent.[209]

Prisoners and political violence

Fretilin excesses in late August and into September

169. There were excesses during this early period of Fretilin control after the internal conflict, including instances of forced labour, torture and execution.[210] The majority of the killings that occurred outside combat were committed in rural areas, after Fretilin mounted its counter-offensive. Public anger often turned into lethal violence. During this period killings by people associated with Fretilin were sometimes the result of deep-seated local enmities rather than politics.[211] The then Fretilin President, Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testified to the Commission that at the time:

> There was a lot of confusion. Everybody was fired up, their blood ran hot, and because of this people beat each other. Violence occurred. The victory of one side would lead to vengeance being taken against the other side. This is what happened in 1975…For example, some people were fired from their jobs. So they took out vengeance on their bosses > when an opportunity presented itself…Each side beat and killed the other. And so the cycle of hatred continued.[212]

170. A large number of revenge killings occurred in the district of Ermera, a UDT base. One account from Ermera recalled:

> On 15 September 1975 [three] Fretilin militia commanders …arrested seven UDT people…in Katrai Kraik village, Letefoho, Ermera. The seven were taken to Germano, Katrai Leten village and killed. The village chief of Lauana witnessed the killings.[213]

171. As Fretilin leaders testified to the Commission, the fact that weapons captured during the conflict were freely available exacerbated the violence.[214]

Fretilin prisons and Commission of Inquiry

172. During the internal conflict, Fretilin had captured and detained as many as 2,000 prisoners.[215] They were mostly UDT members, but included some Fretilin members, detained for what it called excesses during the conflict.[216] The official Fretilin position was that it was holding the prisoners until the Portuguese government returned to try them. However as the prospect of Portugal's return receded, Fretilin decided to deal with the situation itself. On 30 September it announced a Commission of Inquiry (Comissão de Inquêrito) aimed at separating leaders from uninvolved party members.[217] The Commission invited people to testify to determine the guilt of the accused in public "trials". This method of justice tended to produce arbitrary results. A former prisoner held by Fretilin, Monis da Maia, described his experience:

> All the villagers were ordered to go to the military post and the prisoners were taken out one by one and "tried". Those prisoners accused of serious crimes were taken to Aileu. When it was my turn the people were quiet until H1 started provoking them. He told them to say that I had beaten them. The people refused except for one person who said: "He swore at my grandfather. " Because of this I was taken to Aileu, accused of swearing at someone's grandfather.[218]

173. Fretilin moved UDT regional leaders in Dili or Aileu to be investigated by the commission.[219] In Aileu UDT leaders were detained at the Companhia building in Aissirimou, and ordinary party members were kept in a large warehouse.[220] The public was allowed to vent their anger on the newly arrived prisoners:

> Major Lorenço was most severely beaten when he arrived in Aileu because he was a commander. They put him on the roof of the van [in which he had come] and drove him around Aileu and they yelled "Viva Fretilin". Someone stabbed him and he bled. His face was swollen and he could no longer speak.[221]

174. Captured UDT leaders, including the party's vice president, César Mouzinho, were among the most harshly treated.[222] But former detainees testified that beatings and ill-treatment were routine, one example being a case reported to the Commission in which Fretilin guards forced detainees to fight each other in public, much like fighting cocks.[223]

175. Throughout its period of administration, Fretilin allowed members of the ICRC access to its prisons. Australian observers who visited Fretilin prisons in 1975 confirmed that some detainees had been beaten, including the former police chief, Lieutenant-Colonel Maggiolo Gouveia, although they concluded that overall, the detainees they saw were in good health and well treated.[224]

176. Senior Fretilin members testified before the Commission admitting that during this time Fretilin members committed abuses against prisoners. Rogério Lobato, then head of Fretilin's armed forces, told the Commission:

> Sometimes they [Fretilin] entered the prison, called out for prisoners and beat them…People took advantage of the conflict to beat others and to take justice into their own hands. But some did beat them because they were angry with them due to the conflict.[225]

177. In October 1975, as the Indonesian incursions resumed, Fretilin detained a number of Apodeti members. Mari Alkatiri told the Commission that he ordered their detention after he had received intelligence that Apodeti was planning a coup against Fretilin, which would begin with a hand grenade being thrown into a Fretilin Central Committee meeting.[226] This may also have been provoked by suspicions created by the initial Indonesian military incursions at the border.[227] Many of the Apodeti prisoners were killed after the Indonesian invasion.

178. There is no evidence that mistreatment of prisoners between September and early December was formal Fretilin policy. Although in some cases senior Fretilin members intervened to stop mistreatment,[228] it is clear the Fretilin Central Committee was aware of the situation and took insufficient measures to discourage malpractice or bring it under control.[229]

Restoring order

179. In early September, having gained control of most of the territory, Fretilin moved to restore order.[230] It took harsh measures to achieve this. Foreigners who visited Fretilin jails witnessed Fretilin soldiers in detention for violence against civilians.[231] By early September, Fretilin controlled all of Timor-Leste with the exception of Batugade on the border with Indonesia. Two Australian parliamentarians made the following assessment after visiting a number of towns:

> Our visit around the country confirmed Fretilin's claim that the situation is under control. In the regions we visited ourselves, we received > information from aid workers and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) that they shared the same view.[232]

Administration

180. During the internal conflict 80% of the 3,000 professional East Timorese and expatriate staff of the Portuguese administration left the country. There was no chance of persuading them to return to work under a Fretilin administration. Fretilin broadened the membership of the Central Committee by appointing a larger number of regional representatives and serving members of the military, reflecting both the military's influence after the internal conflict and the need for broader geographic representation.[233] To address the administrative void outside Dili, Fretilin appointed Regional Committees to run each district. In mid-September, Fretilin formed an Executive Committee to run the caretaker administration.[234] This contained 13 departments including economics, health, and military affairs.[235] In October Fretilin established a range of commissions to facilitate the administration of the territory. A key commission was the Economic Management and Supervisory Commission, chaired by Dr José Gonçalves, perhaps the only trained economist still in the territory. Inaugurated on 11 October 1975, it acted as Fretilin's central management arm in charge of the country's economic recovery. This Commission also worked with Fretilin Regional Committees and international NGOs in the distribution of emergency food aid, using the assets of the quasi-governmental business and logistics enterprise SAPT (Sociedade Agrícola Pátria e Trabalho).[236]

181. The disruption to production and distribution systems caused by the internal conflict conspired with Timor-Leste's lack of self-sufficiency[237] to produce an urban economic crisis that Fretilin, with some support from international agencies, struggled to surmount. Although the fighting affected some larger towns in the central and western regions, and small-scale clashes were widespread, most rural areas escaped the armed conflict that engulfed Dili. Rural East Timorese generally depended on subsistence farming for their livelihood, and were thus not part of the cash economy on which urban East Timorese relied.[238] The ICRC reported the impact of the internal conflict:

> The damages from the war have affected only some regions: Maubisse, Ainaro, Ermera, Same… [food shortage] will affect essentially the population of the towns but will be without consequence for the inhabitants of the country where people…live under an economical system of auto-substance.[239]

182. One means by which Fretilin addressed food shortages was by compelling UDT detainees to perform forced labour.[240] One such location was a plantation at Aissirimou, in Aileu.[241]

183. After establishing control, Fretilin found that it did not have the means to import food. On 13 September it therefore issued an appeal for emergency food aid. The ICRC and the Australian Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA) responded with limited deliveries of food, but no government provided aid during this time. Fretilin then encouraged people who had fled from the rural areas to the towns during the internal conflict to return to their villages. In addition to boosting agricultural production, this also reduced the number of people relying on limited urban food resources. Foreseeing impending shortages, Fretilin planned to impose food rationing in December, and began conducting a census in order to be able to operate a rationing system (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

184. The closure of the BNU and the impossibility of setting up alternative banking arrangements, which Fretilin did not anyway have the expertise to run,[242] remained a problem throughout the Fretilin administration. The resulting lack of foreign exchange crippled the territory's capacity to revive the cash economy or to conduct international trade.* What remained of the Chinese business community continued to support the economy to a degree. However many had either left the countryside for Dili and other towns or had gone abroad, taking vital capital with them. The rapid run-down of currency forced Fretilin to pay the remaining civil servants and the military in kind rather than cash. Despite all these adverse factors, some degree of economic activity returned to Dili's markets and Chinese shops during October and November.[243]

185. Education was a key area of Fretilin policy. It had done a great deal of work before the internal conflict developing a literacy programme inspired by the Brazilian educationalist, Paulo Freire.† Following the internal conflict the existing education system came to a virtual standstill. As in other areas of the administration, most qualified personnel had left. Both government and Church-run schools had closed, the latter because many of the nuns and priests who taught there had also departed, prompting Francisco Xavier do Amaral to comment:

> It is deeply regrettable that "the shepherds" leave just at a time when the "lambs" need their guidance.[244]

186. Teachers that remained had been redeployed either as Falintil soldiers or as administrators, where their literacy skills were sorely needed.[245] Although there were plans to reopen the elementary schools in November, using high school students as teachers, nothing came of this and the schools remained closed.

187. The internal conflict left hundreds of people wounded, both military and civilian. Portuguese doctors had been withdrawn on 27 August, though most East Timorese health workers continued to work without disruption.[246] There were still plentiful

* The departing ACFOA aid barge took an export crop of coffee to Australia. However, the money earned had to be deposited in a bank account in Darwin.

† A system of popular education particularly aimed at addressing low literacy levels especially in rural communities, developed by Paulo Freire, a Brazilian educationalist.

supplies of medicines and drugs in Dili, and medical facilities were basic but adequate. On this foundation, helped by the arrival of doctors from the ICRC and an Australian medical NGO, ASIAT (Australian Society for Inter-Country Aid), on 1 September, Dili Hospital continued to function. Although ASIAT had planned setting up medical training schools – and during this period Fretilin opened a nursing school in Aileu in August 1975 – beyond Dili medical services were limited.[247]

188. It is clear that between September and December 1975, Fretilin undertook serious efforts to build a credible interim administration throughout Timor-Leste in the absence of Portugal, while at the same time seeking the return of Portugal to complete the decolonisation process. Hampered by a severe lack of financial and administrative capacity, and in the context of the political instability flowing from the August conflict and the intensifying cross-border military operations by the Indonesian armed forces, this fledgling administration faced insurmountable pressures.

Balibó: Indonesia increases intensity of military operations

189. On 15 October Tim Susi and battalions from the ABRI 2nd Infantry Brigade launched an attack against Balibó, in which five international journalists were killed. The journalists were covering the story of Indonesian military operation inside Portuguese Timor. Three Australians and two British journalists working for Australian television networks were shot or stabbed in circumstances that were covered up by Indonesian military officials at the time.* One possible reason for the execution of the journalists was that they had witnessed the scale of the Indonesian operations around Balibó, which were much larger than the incursions that had preceded it (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).[248]

190. On 16 October, as the Indonesian military secured Balibó and Maliana, Fretilin's frontline shifted to Atabae and Bobonaro.[249] The Commission secured film footage of these Indonesian military operations, showing the use of warships to bombard Fretilin positions and aircraft landing in Maliana, in what was clearly a major offensive.[250] Unlike the August attack on Atsabe that had used Partisan troops in support of the Special Forces units, the Balibó attack relied minimally on East Timorese.[251] Despite this, Indonesia attempted to blame their UDT/Apodeti allies for the journalists' deaths. More generally, the Indonesian authorities repeatedly denied that their troops were involved militarily in Portuguese Timor in the period from September to November. Instead they suggested that any clashes were the result of East Timorese Partisans repelling Fretilin incursions into Indonesian territory.

191. During October other Kopassandha-led forces launched an attack, hoping to strike further inland. They met heavy resistance and were repulsed. The US CIA's daily briefing, the National Intelligence Daily, reported on 20 October that the

* Though this was known to the Australian government almost immediately, there was no international protest or call for an investigation. Indeed, the Australian government does not seem to have protested even quietly to the Indonesian government over these killings. This remained a sensitive issue between Indonesia and Australia throughout the years of the Indonesian occupation.

Indonesian attack "stalled because of Jakarta's failure to secure the border town of Lebos".[252] Without the protection of naval artillery that it enjoyed nearer the coast, the Indonesian invading forces struggled in the interior where the two sides were better matched. In the words of Albino do Carmo, a Fretilin/Falintil commander, the attack took place:

> ...In Lela [Village], on the boundary with Lamaknen, called Bulubulu. It was about the middle of October. There were many people, they fired with mortars. They had machine guns, two of them. We saw many people from afar. There was information [they] were from Menpur. Over 100 [people]. We couldn't see behind [them]. They couldn't... advance because we shot at them. We also had machine guns and mortars. I had about 20 men at the time. [253]

192. Fretilin forces provided unexpectedly stiff resistance to the Indonesian troops, who were plagued by problems with their weaponry and were slowed by the start of the rainy season. After a lull, the operation resumed on 20 November with an operation directed at Atabae. For the first time the Indonesian forces had both naval and air support. On 27 November Atabae, defended by a Portuguese cavalry company of East Timorese soldiers loyal to Fretilin, fell to the invaders.[254] The Indonesian military was now poised for a full-scale invasion of Dili.

Fretilin's unilateral declaration of independence, and the response

Overview

193. With Indonesian military operations intensifying and a full-scale invasion looking increasingly inevitable, Fretilin became desperate to find a way to engage the international community.

194. At the beginning of November 1975 Portugal held bilateral talks with Indonesia in Rome. In their joint press statement after the meeting the two sides reaffirmed their commitment to the orderly decolonisation of Portuguese Timor and agreed to work to convene discussions between Portugal and all the East Timorese political parties. With Indonesian forces already occupying significant parts of the territory and its government consistently blocking all-party talks, the Rome meeting failed to address the realities of the situation.

195. Fretilin decided to declare independence unilaterally soon after Indonesian forces occupied the western town of Atabae. It did so on 28 November 1975. Fretilin formed a government, and called on the international community to prevent the imminent full-scale invasion.

196. Members of the four other East Timorese political parties gathered in Bali. Under pressure from Indonesian intelligence forces, on 29 November, to counter Fretilin's unilateral declaration, they signed the so-called Balibó Declaration, declaring "the independence and integration" of Portuguese Timor with Indonesia. Portugal recognised neither declaration. Indonesia prepared for full-scale invasion.

Background to Fretilin's unilateral declaration of independence

197. Former Fretilin President Francisco Xavier do Amaral told the Commission of the dilemma facing Fretilin as the Portuguese colonial authorities remained on island of Ataúro:

> From Fretilin's point of view, its policy of continuing to recognise Portuguese sovereignty in the absence of any sign from Portugal that it was willing to exercise that authority was a dangerous course to follow. Despite being the de facto ruler, Fretilin had no international legitimacy as a ruling power. Fretilin was not an elected government and its fear was that the political vacuum would give Indonesia a pretext to launch a full-scale invasion of Timor-Leste.[255]

198. Fretilin's 25 October invitation to the Portuguese administration on Ataúro to send a delegation to Dili to assess the political situation went unanswered. Fretilin's position hardened when it learned of the talks between the Portuguese foreign minister and his Indonesian counterpart in Rome on 1–2 November. The foreign ministers' joint press release called for the restoration of peace and order as a precondition for the process of decolonisation, but made no reference to the substantial inroads Indonesian forces had made into the territory of Portuguese Timor. By the time of the Rome talks, after the fall of Balibó and Maliana to Indonesian forces on 16 October, the Fretilin frontline had shifted to Atabae and Bobonaro.[256]

199. For some in Fretilin the unreality of the Rome talks was the final blow. Interviewed in 2004, Xavier do Amaral suggested the Portuguese government had betrayed the East Timorese people:

> Portugal and Indonesia agreed that Indonesia would not interfere in the affairs of Timor-Leste. But in the end, who interfered? Indonesia. And what did Portugal say? Nothing. It just sat there. Not even a warning to Indonesia. For a while, Fretilin waited for a chance to start negotiations with the Portuguese, but they remained silent, they did not reply. What was the real reason for these continuous delays? Was it to defend us or to betray us?[257]

200. Fretilin now had to face three painful realities: the massive external threat that its giant neighbour posed on and even within its borders, an economy without the administrative infrastructure necessary for it to carry out the day-to-day tasks of government, and Portuguese indifference. José Gonçalves, chair of Fretilin's

Economic and Supervisory Committee, had been charged with resurrecting the stalled economy. He stated in October 1975:

> Now that the Portuguese government is not here and negotiations are on-going, we must start planning for independence.[258]

201. José Gonçalves knew that domestic economic recovery and international trade would not be possible if the BNU, Portuguese Timor's only bank, did not reopen. On the other hand, if Fretilin continued to recognise the Portuguese government as the legitimate authority over Timor-Leste the bank could not reopen. Gonçalves stated:

> We can't wait forever for this bank to function. This bank has been nationalised and we intend to finish the process.[259]

202. In November Fretilin sent a delegation to Africa to sound out support for a unilateral declaration of independence.* The delegation comprised two important members of the Fretilin Central Committee, Mari Alkatiri and César Mau Laka. They returned to Dili in the third week of November and stated that 25 countries had promised recognition if Timor-Leste declared independence, among them China, the Soviet Union, Zambia, Mozambique, Tanzania, Guinea-Bissau, Angola, Cape Verde, São Tome and Principe, North Korea, North and South Vietnam, Cambodia, Romania, The Netherlands, East Germany, Sweden, Algeria, Cuba, Norway and Brazil (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination).[260]

203. Moreover the military threat posed by Indonesia was increasingly obvious, and Fretilin began storing arms and food in the interior in anticipation of a full-scale invasion.[261] It also moved to expand its armed forces. Although Falintil troops were fighting at the border and at that point successfully keeping the Indonesian army from advancing, the likelihood of being overwhelmed in the event of a full-scale invasion was great. In anticipation of this, Falintil began training and equipping militia groups (Milicia Popular de Libertação Nacional, Miplin).[262]

204. The silence from the international community and the failure of Portugal to communicate with Fretilin following the 16 October attack on Balibó began to convince Fretilin of its complete isolation. Though opinions were divided, in the third week of November 1975, shortly after Mari Alkatiri and César Mau Laka had returned from Africa, the Fretilin Central Committee decided to declare independence.[263] This decision scheduled the declaration for 1 December, the day Portugal celebrated its independence from Spanish occupation.[264]

* Previously, at the end of September a conference of African and Asian countries held in Maputo, the capital city of Mozambique. resolved to "fully support the national independence struggle led by the pioneering Fretilin." The resolution was proposed by Mozambique President Samora Machel and gained unanimous support from the participating countries

The declaration of independence

205. On 26 November, after two weeks of intensive sea and air bombardments, Atabae fell to the Indonesian armed forces. The Central Committee concluded that a full-scale Indonesian invasion was imminent. Interviewed by the Commission in 2004, Mari Alkatiri recalled the words of the Fretilin vice-president, Nicolau Lobato, to the Central Committee:

> The Indonesian army have already entered Atabae… They have occupied Atabae! If we wait until 1 December we might not have time to declare independence in Dili. So we'd better proclaim independence today.[265]

206. Although there was some opposition to the decision to declare independence, on the afternoon of Friday 28 November 1975, Fretilin made the declaration before a crowd of 2,000 people gathered in front of the Portuguese government building.[266] Falintil troops paraded in camouflage uniforms and bandanas in the colours of their units.[267] Francisco Xavier do Amaral arrived in a black Mercedes-Benz, the official car of the Portuguese governor. At 5:55pm the Portuguese flag, which had been flying for centuries over Timor-Leste, was lowered. Fretilin raised the new flag of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste – red, black and yellow with a white star – and a minute's silence was observed to commemorate "everyone who has died during these past few months and throughout Timor-Leste's anti-colonial wars".[268] A cannon was fired 20 times as a sign of respect for the dead. The Fretilin President, Francisco Xavier do Amaral, read the proclamation of independence:

> Stating the highest wish of the people of Timor-Leste and protecting the most legitimate national sovereignty, Fretilin Central Committee has unilaterally decided to proclaim the independence of Timor-Leste. As of midnight today, [we] declare the [birth of] the anti-colonial and anti-imperialistic nation of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste.
>
> Long live the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste!
>
> Long live free and independent Timor-Leste!
>
> Long live Fretilin!

207. After the proclamation, those present sang "Pátria! Pátria!" (Fatherland! Fatherland!), and declared it the national anthem. Timor-Leste then broadcast the news of its declaration of independence to the world from the Marconi Communication Centre.[269]

208. Although Fretilin had planned the declaration of independence for 1 December, the unilateral declaration on 28 November was unexpected and sudden. Several circumstances confirm this, including the writing of the proclamation[270] and sewing of the flag[271] on the afternoon of 28 November. Nor were all Fretilin leaders present at the proclamation ceremony.[272] The Fretilin secretary general, Alarico Fernandes, and the foreign affairs secretary, José Ramos-Horta, had been in Australia since 20 November to gather political support, while Juvenal Inácio (Sera Key) and Vicente Reis (Sa'he) were fighting the Indonesian army on the border.

209. The following day, 29 November, the Fretilin Central Committee appointed Francisco Xavier do Amaral President of the new republic. In his inauguration speech, Francisco Xavier do Amaral emphasised independence as the right of the people of Timor-Leste. He said independence was inseparable from the negligence and betrayal of that right during the Portuguese government's decolonisation process. He affirmed:

> After more than 400 years of suffering, hunger, deprivation, ignorance and massacres, what are we waiting for? Friends, for good or for bad, we have to be the first and the last to resolve our problems. So, from this day on, we all, yes we all, will build our nation, Timor-Leste.[273]

210. The minister of defence, Rogério Lobato, read out the Constitution of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste (RDTL). The Constitution, consisting of 55 articles, was written a few days before 28 November 1975.[274] On 1 December the Council of Ministers was inaugurated at the Portuguese Governor's residence in Lahane. The Fretilin Central Committee appointed Fretilin's vice-president, Nicolau Lobato, as Prime Minister.

211. The Constitution included articles committing Timor-Leste to the following:

- Removal of colonial structures and the creation of a new society free of all kinds of domination and exploitation (Article 2)
- Development policies to focus on agricultural development, and industry (Article 6)
- The pursuit of a policy of planned economic development (Article 10)
- To fight illiteracy and ignorance, and protect and develop its culture (Article 12)
- To develop and run a health system (Article 13)
- Guarantee of parity of rights to men and women (Article 14)
- Guarantee of the freedom of religion (Article 15)
- To develop "friendly and cooperative relations" with "democratic and progressive world powers, considered natural allies." (Article 16)
- Guarantee of the right to participate in the process of democratic consolidation (Article 23)
- Guarantee of freedom of thought, association, union, and speech (Article 24)
- Guarantee of the right to vote and to be voted for in general elections (Article 25).

212. The Constitution established a semi-presidential system of governance. The prime minister was the head of the Council of Ministers (Article 40) who had the task of running the government. The president was the head of state (Article 42) and commander-in-chief of the armed forces (Article 4). The president was authorised to appoint and dismiss the prime minister, the chief justice of the Supreme Court and the governor of the Bank of Timor-Leste (Article 42). Nicolau Lobato, who was appointed prime minister, drew up a list of ministers and vice ministers, and submitted it to the president and Fretilin Central Committee for approval.[275]

Reactions to the declaration of independence

The Balibó Declaration

213. The day after the Fretilin unilateral declaration of independence of Timor-Leste, the four other East Timorese political parties – UDT, Apodeti, KOTA and Trabalhista – issued their "Proclamation of Integration" to counteract the move. The proclamation accused Fretilin of obstructing a peaceful solution to the conflict and the right of the people of Portuguese Timor to self-determination. It stated that "the whole former Portuguese Timor colony" would be integrated with Indonesia, and described this as "the strongest avowal of the feelings of the people of Portuguese Timor". It asked the Indonesian government and people to "take the necessary steps to protect the lives of the people who now considered themselves Indonesian but lived under Fretilin's reign of terror and fascist practices with the acquiescence of the Portuguese government".[276]

214. At the bottom of the declaration are the words "Done at Balibó" and the signatures of representatives of the four parties. The circumstances in which the so-called Balibó Declaration came to be made have been the subject of controversy for many years.[277] The Commission heard testimony from East Timorese political leaders present at the signing who said that it was drafted in Jakarta and signed in a hotel in Bali by the party leaders who, in the words of one of the signatories, were "under tight surveillance", but still argued strenuously for many hours against signing the document.[278] They testified to the pressure placed upon East Timorese politicians by members of the intelligence agency Bakin in the drafting of and decision to vote on the declaration.* The declaration was read from a powerful radio transmitter in Balibó.[279]

Portugal

215. Portugal rejected both Fretilin's unilateral declaration of independence and the "Balibó Declaration". The communiqué of Portugal's National Board for Decolonisation stated on 29 November that Portugal still considered itself the "administering power" of Timor.[280] The communiqué also condemned military intervention in the territory, clearly referring to Indonesian military attacks. The Portuguese government

* Three other documents, signed by East Timorese either declaring or petitioning for integration, the Suai and Bobonaro Declarations and the Batugade Petition, preceded the "Balibó Declaration". The Commission received testimony that in the cases of at least two of these documents, the Suai Declaration and the Batugade Petition, Indonesian agents were also involved in drafting and putting pressure on some of the signatories [see Submission of Domingos Oliveira, p.31, and CAVR Interview with Claudio Vieira, Kupang, 25 August 2004].

maintained that Timor-Leste must reach a negotiated settlement with the three political parties, agreeable to the people of Timor-Leste and with the proviso that "the legitimate interest of Indonesia's geopolitical territory" would be considered.[281]

Indonesia

216. Fretilin's declaration of independence became the trigger for President Soeharto to authorise Indonesia's full-scale invasion of Timor-Leste.[282] After meeting with President Soeharto on 29 November, Indonesia's minister of information, Mashuri, issued a statement regretting Fretilin's "unilateral action" and the Portuguese government's position that "clearly approved Fretilin's action".[283] Indonesia condemned Fretilin's unilateral action but "truly understood UDT, Apodeti, KOTA and Trabalhista's statement that, on behalf of the people of Portuguese Timor, declared their integration with Indonesia."[284]

217. When Indonesia's Foreign Minister Adam Malik accepted the Proclamation of Integration on 1 December, he said that "a hard struggle" lay ahead and that Indonesia would extend "total covert or open support". Adam Malik concluded by saying: "Diplomacy is over. Now Timor-Leste issues shall be resolved on the battlefield."[285]

Wider international response

218. Key actors in the international community had long been aware that an Indonesian military invasion of Portuguese Timor was likely. Australia had long accepted that incorporation was "settled" Indonesian policy (see Part 3.6: Indonesia's growing involvement in Portuguese Timor: destabilisation and diplomacy, paragraphs 112-138) and knew the extent of its military involvement in the territory.[286] Numerous documents also show that the US knew of Indonesia's plans to take over Timor-Leste by military means.[287] Australia refused to recognise the new nation and viewed Fretilin's action as "provocative and irresponsible".[288] The US confirmed its position of non-involvement.[289] The newly independent African nations of Angola, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique and San Tomé and Príncipe all recognised Timor-Leste's independence but these nations were too small to have an impact on international politics. China and Vietnam, Fretilin's most important supporters in Asia, extended their warm congratulations. China was the only permanent member of the UN Security Council to recognise the declaration of independence.

219. On 6 December, the day before the invasion, President Gerald Ford and his secretary of state, Henry Kissinger, were in Jakarta. CIA analysts predicted the invasion would occur after Ford's departure.[290] On 6 December Kissinger stated that the use of US weapons in such a military operation could become a problem, but added:

> [T]hat would depend on how one would construe it; whether it is in self-defence or is a foreign operation.[291]

220. Despite this knowledge, there was no attempt by any country to stop Indonesia, and no country made any approach to Fretilin, which soon realised its isolation.

Full-scale invasion imminent

221. After the declaration of independence the situation in Timor-Leste became increasingly tense. The Fretilin leadership were expecting the Indonesians to invade and every night members of the Central Committee went on patrol.[292] On 2 December the ICRC delegation in Dili received a telegram from the Australian government warning all Australians in Timor-Leste to leave the country for their own safety.[293] The ICRC's neutrality had been recognised by Fretilin but not by UDT, Apodeti and Indonesia. It was forced to move to Ataúro Island on 2 December, planning to operate a clinic from there servicing Dili. On the same day the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste's minister of defence, Rogério Lobato, issued a statement:

> Based on information from Fretilin intelligence sources, we suspect a full-scale attack on Timor-Leste, especially to the capital city Dili, will take place…We urge the world to stop this criminal aggression, as it will be the cause of an endless bloodbath. The people of Timor-Leste will resist.[294]

222. On 4 December a delegation comprising minister of economic and political affairs, Mari Alkatiri, the minister of foreign relations and information, José Ramos-Horta, and the minister of national defence, Rogério Lobato, left Timor-Leste.[295] The government of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste had entrusted the delegation with the task of launching a diplomatic campaign abroad and to seek arms to defend the new republic.[296] On 6 December the last group of ICRC workers left Dili for Ataúro. That afternoon people began to flee to the mountains. That evening Roger East, the only remaining foreign reporter in Timor-Leste, wrote:

> With the deterioration of the security situation, people started quietly to leave for the hills. Tonight Dili is quiet and almost empty, abandoned by its people. A curfew was applied on the fourth day and armed soldiers guarded the beach and the streets.[297]

Full-scale invasion

Overview

223. Indonesia's intention to conduct a full-scale invasion of Timor-Leste was clear by early December. Australian intelligence was monitoring the situation, and on 2 December the Australian government advised its citizens to leave Timor-Leste. Most of the few remaining foreigners left the territory in the following days. Fretilin dispatched a delegation to conduct an international diplomatic campaign. The invading forces included a relatively small number of UDT and Apodeti members.

The Indonesian government attempted to foster the myth that they were assisted only by a number of Indonesian "volunteers". The military went so far as removing insignia from its landing craft and used weapons especially purchased for the attack that could not be traced to their major military sponsor, the United States. Nevertheless, it was a full-scale air and sea attack, involving large numbers of troops. Fretilin provided resistance to the invading forces as its political leaders withdrew to the hills of Aileu. The day of invasion saw widespread atrocities committed by Indonesian troops against East Timorese civilians, including summary executions and massacres.

224. The United Nations debated the invasion immediately and the Security Council unanimously passed a resolution on 22 December deploring the invasion, calling for immediate withdrawal of Indonesian troops and reaffirming the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination. A UN envoy was sent to assess the situation in Timor-Leste, but his efforts were frustrated and the UN debate shifted to the General Assembly in the early months of 1976.

Indonesia's decision to invade and conduct open warfare

225. On 28 November 1975, Indonesian troops already occupied significant areas of Timor-Leste. The Indonesian government completed its final political preparations in the early days of December, making clear its intention to take over the territory. This was not news to Western powers. US and Australian intelligence had been monitoring Indonesia's troop build-up, and their governments had been in constant dialogue with Indonesia over the period of military operations under Operasi Flamboyan, particularly through Harry Tjan Silalahi and Yusuf Wanandi of CSIS, the think-tank established by intelligence chief General Ali Moertopo. With the warning from the Australian Government on 2 December, most remaining foreigners left Dili. Australian Roger East was the only remaining foreign journalist in the territory.

226. Australian Prime Minister Whitlam had already made clear in his Townsville and Wonosobo meetings with President Soeharto his preference for Indonesia to subsume Timor-Leste.[298] Aware of the upcoming visit to Jakarta of US President Ford and Secretary of State Kissinger, on 5 December Fretilin sent a desperate letter to President Ford:

> We have been charged in the UN General Assembly with being an aggressor state…We now hear that "Timor-Leste has committed acts of aggression" against Indonesia and that the people there are demanding full scale intervention. My government believes these baseless charges are a prelude to open warfare.[299]

227. The impending invasion of Timor-Leste was briefly discussed between Presidents Ford and Soeharto, and Secretary of State Kissinger. The US clearly expressed its acceptance of Indonesia's expected annexation of Timor-Leste:

> [Soeharto] We want your understanding if we deem it necessary to take rapid or drastic action.
>
> [Ford] We will understand and will not press you on the issue. We understand the problem you have and the intentions you have.[300]

228. With this key international support secured, Indonesia also sought to legitimise its decision domestically through its Parliament. On 6 December the Indonesian People's Consultative Assembly (MPR) stated that it:

> Supports the Government of Indonesia to take steps to resolve the problem of East Timor.
>
> Greatly regrets the Fretilin move to declare the independence of Portuguese Timor on 28 November 1975, that clearly contradicts… [the process of decolonisation]…in accordance with the Rome agreements.[301]

229. The MPR statement concluded by reiterating the anti-colonialist principles of Indonesia.* On the same day, the Indonesian People's Representative Council, (DPR), passed a resolution stating that:

> There is a desire from the people of Portuguese Timor to join the Republic of Indonesia that must be acknowledged by the DPR.[302]

Dili prepares its defence strategy

230. Fretilin could call on around 10,000 troops for the defence of Timor-Leste, composed of 2,500 professional East Timorese soldiers from the Portuguese army, and around 7,000 trained civilians.[303] The troops were well equipped with Mauser rifles and plentiful ammunition from Portuguese NATO stocks. Fretilin also had competent military leadership, led by Fernando do Carmo, a member of the Portuguese army. Throughout the period of Indonesian covert operations on the border from September 1975 until the December invasion of Dili, Fretilin troops maintained superiority in the areas where Indonesian forces did not have the advantage of naval artillery support and had gained valuable combat knowledge.

231. In October, Fretilin sent a telegram to the President of the United Nations Security Council, indicating its will to resist armed intervention by Indonesia:

* There were no formal agreements between Portugal and Indonesia from the Rome meeting in November 1975. At the time of the meeting Indonesian troops occupied parts of Portuguese Timor, the Portuguese colonial administration was on Ataúro and Fretilin's attempts to communicate with them went unanswered. The Commission heard a submission from CSIS member Yusuf Wanandi that the unilateral declaration of independence by Fretilin galvanised different factions within Indonesia "to support the military operation to intervene in Timor-Leste. Because of that, what previously had been characterised by intelligence operations and was secret, became combined military operations and was supported by all forces..." [See Submission to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 16 December 2003].

> We will fight back until the last man and will never give up arms while the democratic rights of our people are not respected. Indonesia is deeply involved in training of guerrilla forces in Indonesian Timor which is in violation of the principles of the UN charter and international law. We call upon your Excellency to stop Indonesian military aggression against our people.[304]

Indonesian military preparations: Operation Seroja (Lotus)

232. The resistance confronted by the Special Forces during their incursions in August and September prompted the establishment of the Operation Seroja Joint Task Force Command* in October 1975, and troop numbers were increased to 3,200.[305] These reinforcements included the Kopassandha† 2nd Combat Detachment, the Marine 5th Infantry Battalion‡ from Surabaya, the Ratulangi submarine, two air force transport planes, and three battalions from the 2nd Infantry Brigade (East Java).[306] While the border incursions continued, leading to control by the Indonesian military of the border towns of Balibó and Atsabe, the Seroja Command planned a full invasion of Timor-Leste. This was to be a two-pronged combined forces attack on Dili on 7 December. The plan called for marine and army infantry battalions brought by ship from the border town of Atabae in Bobonaro District, which the 2nd Infantry Brigade and Tim Susi already occupied. The intention was to conduct an amphibious landing in Dili at dawn, followed soon after by parachute drops of troops from the Secret Warfare Command and the Army Strategic Reserve into the centre of the town.[306]

Invasion of Dili and Baucau

The attack

233. On 7 December 1975 Indonesia mounted a full-scale attack upon Dili. This was a major military offensive involving troops with full sea and air support.[308] This attack was made without the formality of declaring war.§ The city of Dili had been on high alert for days, expecting an attack. In 1975, Dili's population was approximately 28,000. While some Fretilin armed units stayed behind to offer resistance to the invading forces, civilians and the Fretilin leadership ran to the hills toward Aileu.

---

* Brig. Gen. Chamid Soeweno, then serving as Commander of the Secret Warfare Command (Kopassandha) Intelligence Centre, was appointed commander. Col. Dading Kalbuadi was retained as the Assistant for Intelligence.

† Secretl Warfare Command.

‡ Renamed Pasmar 1.

§ Total troop numbers of the invading forces are not precisely known. However in addition to the several thousand that landed on 7 and 10 December, 10-20,000 are thought to have landed during the following weeks, including a large number on Christmas day. See Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, p. 15, 23; Dunn 2003, p. 244].

Many were unable to escape. The invading forces committed atrocities against the civilian population and made costly military errors resulting in a significant loss of life on their part.

234. On 6 December in the afternoon, several hundred East Timorese Partisans and Indonesian troops from the 1st Marine Unit boarded the naval warship Teluk Bone at Atabae and left for Dili. They were to carry out a preparatory landing under the cover of darkness in readiness for the full-scale invasion the following day.[309] At 2.00am on 7 December, five more Indonesian warships arrived off Dili. Alerted to their presence, Fretilin shut off the city's power supply at 3.00am, blanketing the city in darkness. The Indonesian command naval ships opened fire on Dili, [310] contrary to planning. Indonesian journalist Subroto accompanied the invading forces and reported:

> Because the surprise factor was lost, Task Force Commander Brig. Gen. TNI Soewono ordered KRI Ratulangi, KRI Barakuda, KRI Martadinata, and KRI Jayawijaya to open fire in the direction of the shore. This attack went well until the element of surprise was increasingly lost, which caused the 1st Marine Unit that had landed to be ineffective.[311]

235. At about 4.30am, 400 marines* together with light amphibious tanks and armed personnel carriers landed at Kampung Alor on the western outskirts of Dili.[312] Fretilin/Falintil resistance was light, and by 7.00am Indonesian Marines had secured the area. Following this the Indonesian Navy bombarded the eastern and western parts of Dili, which they wrongly understood to house Fretilin artillery, in preparation for the arrival of paratroopers.[313]

236. Earlier, just before 6.00am, nine C-130B Hercules airplanes had flown over Dili and dropped the first contingent of paratroopers from the Secret Warfare Command (Group 1) and Kostrad (Yonif 501).[314] Poor intelligence caused these to be dropped directly over the town, a landing ground full of hazards.[315] Most of these troops landed in the north-eastern part of Dili. Some of the paratroopers came under fire from Fretilin/Falintil forces while still in the air; others were injured or died as they landed among buildings and power lines. One aircraft dropped its load of paratroops into the sea, where they drowned, and another load landed behind Fretilin lines.[316] A second drop shortly before 8.00am resulted in ABRI units fighting each other in confusion. Because the morning drops had gone so badly, an afternoon sortie was cancelled by the Joint Task Force Command.[317]

237. Fretilin/Falintil forces defending the city enjoyed initial success. When two C-47 Dakota aircraft carrying 38 Special Forces troops attempted to land and take control of the Comoro airport west of Dili, Fretilin successfully repulsed one.[318] However, with its superior firepower ABRI soon gained the upper hand. In the words of Fretilin/Falintil soldier Carlos Maria Soares:

* From the 5th Landing Team Infantry Battalion (Yonif 5 Brigif 1 Pasrat Marinir, referred to as Pasmar 1).

...We were at Fretilin's post at Bidau Santana, resisting the TNI [ABRI] under commander Amandio. At the time we were 21 people... Our resistance...didn't last long because we didn't have enough soldiers or ammunition.[319]

238. By midday Indonesian troops had secured the Palácio das Repartições (now the Palácio do Governo) in the heart of Dili and posted teams along the key routes leading out of the centre of town. Fretilin/Falintil troops remained in control of Taibessi and Lahane at the base of the southern foothills of Dili, as well as the hills south of Fatuhada and those overlooking the Comoro airport.

Information control: seeking to conceal ABRI involvement

239. To maintain the fiction that none of its military personnel were involved, ABRI had removed the insignia from its landing craft.[320] Its troops used AK-47's and other non-Western light arms procured by General Benny Moerdani specifically for the invasion of Timor-Leste. The aim was to deny Indonesian military involvement, and avoid incriminating ABRI's major arms suppliers, particularly the US.[321] Most of its heavy weaponry - aircraft, ships and landing craft - as well as the training of many of its elite troops such as the airborne brigades, had been supplied by the US.[322]

240. The only foreign journalist remaining in Timor-Leste, Australian Roger East, was taken from the Hotel Turismo on the morning of the landings and executed later that day on the waterfront by Indonesian troops.[323] This brought to six the number of foreign journalists killed by the Indonesian military in less than two months, and ensured that the story of Indonesia's invasion and subsequent operations were not reported in detail by the international media.

241. The Indonesian military attempted to maintain the fiction that the invasion of Dili had been carried out by East Timorese Partisans from the four political parties that had signed the Balibó Declaration. One day after the invasion of Dili an official Indonesian press release referred to the "the fall of Dili on 7 December to the combined forces of Apodeti, UDT, KOTA and Trabalhista."[324] This statement made passing reference on the third page to Indonesian "volunteers" involved in the operation. Six days later the Indonesian minister of information stated that:

> The volunteers requested by Apodeti, UDT, Kota [sic] and Trabalhista who helped our brothers in Portuguese Timor aren't likely to be contained [any longer] by the Indonesian Government.[325]

242. Indonesian journalists repeated and disseminated this disinformation, contributing to the myth that Indonesia was not invading but rather it was the integrationist East Timorese parties who were regaining control of their territory with the assistance of a small number of Indonesian "volunteers".[326] Indonesian historian Dr Asvi Warman Adam, a Research Professor at the Indonesian Academy of Sciences

(LIPI), told the Commission that this myth had a long-lasting impact in Indonesia.[327] In assessing some of the key historical points he believes need to be reconsidered in Indonesia related to this period, Dr Adam told the Commission that:

> The term "volunteer" is obviously incorrect because it has to be admitted that they were Indonesian forces.

243. Noting the scale of the attack on Dili, Asvi Warman Adam told the Commission that it could be "compared to the attack to put down the PRRI/Permesta rebellion (in 1958), which was the biggest military operation in Indonesian war history."

Mass violence against civilians

244. In addition to arbitrary executions of civilians, a number of mass killings occurred during the first few days of the invasion. The Commission was told that members of Dili's Chinese community were targeted by Indonesian soldiers, as groups of civilians were killed in the downtown area of Colmera in the first two days.[328] On 8 December there were several group executions of civilians at Dili harbour. These included the executions of Isabel Lobato, the wife of Fretilin leader Nicolau Lobato, who was shot in the back in the morning, Fretilin member Rosa Muki Bonaparte and the Australian journalist Roger East in the afternoon.[329] The evidence suggests that Fretilin members were pointed out from the crowd of confused civilians that had assembled near the harbour. These were then taken to the harbour and executed. The Commission received evidence of an ABRI "hit list" of individuals to be targeted for execution, compiled during the months of covert intelligence operations preceding the full-scale invasion.[331]

245. On 8 December General Moerdani toured Dili in the company of Colonel Dading Kalbuadi, visiting the harbour:

> That afternoon Navy Captain R. Kasenda, Chief of Staff of the Joint Task Force Command, left the KRI Ratulangi to inspect the city of Dili. The inspection was done riding the BTR-50 amphibious APC (armoured personnel carrier). At Dili harbour, Navy Captain R. Kasenda met with Major General Benny Moerdani, then he walked with him towards the Governor's office. At that time on the roads there were still the bodies of Fretilin who had not been buried yet.[332]

246. Other groups of civilians were killed as Indonesian troops made their way towards Falintil's headquarters in the foothills south of Dili. The Commission heard a number of testimonies of the massacre of 21 civilians at the Assistência building, near a Fretilin base at the Matadouro building:

> ...[T]hey [ABRI] separated the men from the women. They took the men to the side of the building which was covered in tall grass...

Soon after that we heard shooting and the sound of a grenade. The shooting went on for a very long time…the men who had been taken to the side of the building had all been killed.[333]

247. The execution of civilians by Indonesian troops seems to have been a recurrent pattern of the day of invasion.[334] An account to the Commission of another massacre of civilians, in the area of Caicoli in central Dili, stated:

On 7 December Indonesia invaded with paratroops early in the morning, landing in Dili. At that time a [Falintil] commander Sergeant Constancio Soares was shot dead directly in front of the Sang Tai Hoo shop in Colmera. At midday TNI attacked the military police headquarters in Caicoli and arrested around 50 people. They ordered them to line up and then shot them dead.[335]

Fretilin leadership escapes to the interior

248. The Commission heard many testimonies and statements of the escape to the interior as the invasion occurred.[336] The Fretilin plan was to evacuate to the south, providing sufficient resistance to hamper the advance of Indonesian troops. Large numbers of the civilian population of Dili fled with them towards Aileu.[337]

249. Despite the parting pleas from the ICRC in the days before the full-scale invasion, Fretilin took its UDT and Apodeti prisoners with them as they fled.

Invading forces occupy Baucau

250. On 9 December four Indonesian warships carrying Indonesian marines and 1,500 East Timorese Partisans, and two Soviet-made Indonesian frigates left Dili waters headed in the direction of Baucau. At around 6.00am on 10 December, under the cover of naval artillery, a marine landing team led by Manuel Carrascalão under the command of Colonel Dading Kalbuadi landed at a beach near Laga in Baucau District. The Commission heard testimony that the attack on Baucau met with virtually no armed resistance and that Indonesian forces were quickly in control of the town.[338]

The cost of full-scale invasion

251. The widespread atrocities committed against civilians in Dili on the initial days of the invasion constituted a grave violation of human rights. There were virtually no disciplinary consequences for Indonesian forces responsible for such actions. Tragically, this set the tone for the absolute impunity for violence against civilians that was the hallmark of the conflict for years to come. On the ninth day of the invasion, Fretilin sent yet another telegram to the United Nations Security Council. Fretilin's minister of information Alarico Fernandes reported extensive looting in Dili, and the presence of 19 ships in the harbour engaged in the pillage. [339]

252. The cost in terms of loss of life to Indonesian forces was also significant. ABRI's initial invasion succeeded in the military objective of taking the cities of Dili and Baucau, but poor planning and last minute changes resulted in confusion over the amphibious landing and a high death toll for the elite Kostrad and Kopassandha paratroopers. General Benny Moerdani, who had played a leading role in planning the invasion, gave this analysis of the Indonesian invading forces:

> [Our] troops did not display discipline, they fired on one another. It is embarrassing…From a military perspective, we can't take much pride in that operation. [340]

United Nations response to the full-scale invasion

253. The Commission heard testimony of the scene at the United Nations in New York at this time from David Scott, a respected senior Australian social justice worker who had been sent by civil society organisations to New York to support the work of José Ramos-Horta immediately after the invasion:

> The Secretary of the Fourth Committee, that was debating the reported invasion by Indonesia, told me that very few people in New York and the United Nations knew anything about East Timor. The Indonesian delegation was saying that "we have gone into East Timor just as if we were putting out a fire in the kitchen of the house next door, and we will retire."
>
> The following day Ramos-Horta arrived with Araújo, and a key moment was the acceptance by the United Nations of Ramos-Horta as the representative of the East Timorese people…In the next two weeks, Ramos-Horta…campaigned strenuously to argue the case for recognition or the retention of East Timor on the United Nations agenda and supporting the resolutions, calling on Indonesia to withdraw and affirming the right of East Timor to self-determination.[341]

254. On 12 December the General Assembly passed Resolution 3485, deploring the invasion and calling for the withdrawal of Indonesian troops from Portuguese Timor. The Security Council met three times in December to discuss the situation in Timor-Leste, and on 22 December unanimously passed Resolution 384 which called on Indonesia to withdraw its troops and reaffirmed the right to self-determination of the people of Timor-Leste.

255. The Security Council resolution instructed the UN Secretary-General to send a special representative to Timor-Leste. The representative, Winspeare Guicciardi, visited Indonesian controlled areas of Timor-Leste in late January 1976. However his efforts to meet with Fretilin leaders were foiled. The Commission heard testimony of efforts to coordinate safe landing places on the south coast, through Fretilin radio broadcasts to a radio-set in Darwin. However, the potential landing sites were bombed by the Indonesian military and the Australian government shut down the Darwin radio frustrating efforts for further communication.[342] Indonesia also threatened to sink a Portuguese corvette that was to be used to land Guicciardi on the south coast of Timor-Leste for these meetings.[343]

256. The result was that the United Nations was poorly informed of the situation on the ground in Timor-Leste at this time, and it failed to hear the perspective of the Fretilin leadership inside the territory or to see for itself the conditions in Fretilin-controlled areas. After this initial response, the United Nations made no further meaningful efforts to immediately visit Timor-Leste. The debate returned to the General Assembly which, while it continued to condemn the invasion and affirm the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination, did little to place real pressure on Indonesia to reverse its actions. [344]

Timorese experience of early occupation and Indonesia's attempts to formalise integration

Overview

257. Indonesia moved to install a provisional government on 17 December 1975, comprised mostly of members of the Apodeti and UDT political parties that accompanied the full-scale invasion.[345] José Ramos-Horta was accepted at the United Nations as a spokesperson for the East Timorese people, and diplomatic activity was frantic.

258. Fretilin leadership had withdrawn to the interior, taking with them UDT and Apodeti prisoners held in their main Dili prison in Taibessi. As Indonesian forces advanced on the Fretilin headquarters in Aileu, members of Fretilin perpetrated a massacre of a large number of these prisoners. In the course of retreat from advancing troops, further massacres of prisoners took place in Maubisse and Same in late December and January 1976.

259. Large numbers of the Timorese civilian population had fled the towns and villages and lived in Fretilin-controlled areas. In May 1976, Fretilin held a national conference to consider its strategy. It decided on a national resistance strategy based on the civilian population living in the mountains with the fighters in a number of liberated zones. Civilians provided logistical support to the Fretilin fighters. Women and youth organisations conducted education and other social activities, and health networks were established. Generally, populations living in these zones were beyond the reach of the Indonesian military for most of 1976.

260. On 31 May 1976 Indonesia sought to legitimise its occupation of Timor-Leste. In a short ceremony in Dili, which it called the "Act of Integration," Indonesia formed a Popular Assembly of approximately 30 members from the districts. The Assembly endorsed a petition to President Soeharto asking for the integration of Timor-Leste into Indonesia. Members of the Assembly were flown to Jakarta to present the petition to President Soeharto, and on 17 July Soeharto signed a bill declaring Timor-Leste part of Indonesia. The United Nations rejected this attempt in Resolution 31/53 on 1 December 1976, and called for an internationally acceptable act of self-determination in the territory.

ABRI consolidates; Indonesia installs "Provisional Government"

261. In response to Indonesia's 7 December invasion of Timor-Leste, the UN General Assembly passed Resolution 3485 on 12 December. This called for the withdrawal of Indonesian troops but was ignored by Indonesia. On 17 December Indonesia installed the Provisional Government of East Timor (Pemerintah Sementara Timor Timur, PSTT), with Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, the president of Apodeti, as chairman, and Francisco Lopes da Cruz, the president of UDT, as deputy.[346] A total of 24 men were appointed to positions of responsibility in this Provisional Government and to a deliberative council. Sixteen of these were from UDT and Apodeti.[347]

262. On 18 December the Provisional Government sent a telegram to President Soeharto calling for military help:

> The Provisional Government of Eastern [sic] Timor kindly request[s] the Government of the Republic of Indonesia to render assistance in the military, social as well as economic assistance [sic] so that a condition of peace and order in the territory of Eastern Timor [sic] can be restored free from the disturbances and threats of the terrorists' [sic] remnants left by the Portuguese Government.[348]

263. The PSTT was a government in name only. It was established to expedite the process of integrating Timor-Leste with Indonesia. Mario Carrascalão confirmed the powerlessness of this government when he told the Commission that:

> I could not say that the PSTT was an actual government.[349]

264. Indonesia was fighting a diplomatic battle at the UN, where it sought to defuse international condemnation of its invasion. On 22 December 1975 Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo wrote to the Secretary-General of the United Nations rejecting on security grounds the proposed visit of a team of observers to the territory.[350] Disregarding the 22 December Security Council resolution, Indonesia landed approximately 10,000 further troops around the Christmas period.[351] While the international community made its limited overtures for peace, having established control of Dili and Baucau, ABRI combat units advanced along the major roads. Others landed at strategic points along the south coast. This was a slow process. ABRI units moved cautiously.[352] In early 1976 the first major advance was to the south of Dili in pursuit of Fretilin troops who had retreated to their bases in the interior.

Fretilin in retreat, the massacres of prisoners

265. Fretilin held large numbers* of UDT and Apodeti prisoners at its base in Aileu.[353] Under pressure from advancing Indonesian troops, it was preparing to retreat further into the interior. The Fretilin Central Committee was fragmented. In late December some were in Aileu, some in Maubisse.[354] It was in these circumstances that Fretilin members conducted several mass executions of prisoners in the Aileu area. The first took place on 26 December 1975 at Aissirimou in Aileu. The Commission was told that Fretilin members killed around 22 people. Amongst them was the former Portuguese police chief Maggiolo Gouveia, who sided with UDT during the civil war. [355] Subsequent executions occurred at Saboria and at Aituri.[356] Former Fretilin President Francisco Xavier do Amaral offered to the Commission an analysis of how these massacres occurred:

> We were in the middle of war, in this war…we ran from our enemies, we ran, we took those we had imprisoned, our enemies who we had imprisoned, with us…
>
> So we had to look at this. Do we leave them here alive? Do we run alone and leave them? Or do we kill them and then run?
>
> Therefore, some of them [Fretilin members] took a decision that we kill them, so that the enemy could not endanger us. Perhaps this opinion was commonly held, more or less commonly, by leaders at all levels.[357]

266. Indonesian troops overran Aileu on 31 December 1975.[358] Fretilin retreated further into the interior, first to Maubisse and then on to the south coast. Further massacres of prisoners took place as Fretilin retreated. The Commission heard testimony of a Fretilin massacre of five prisoners in Maubisse in late December, of 31 prisoners at the primary school in Same on the south coast on 29 January 1976,[359] and of 8 prisoners at Hat Nipah, near Holarua, on the south coast in late January or early February.[360] In addition to massacres in the central region, the Commission also received testimony about a Fretilin massacre of 37 people in the village of Kooleu in Lautém District, in early January 1976.[361]

ABRI advances, early 1976

267. Troops from Kostrad's 2nd Combat Command (Kopur II) advanced through Maubisse, and by the end of January were fighting for control of the strategic Fleixa Pass. By 23 February this force reached Ainaro where it joined with troops which had landed at Betano on the south coast, and so gained tentative control over the central north-south route. The second major front opened in the western regions near the Indonesian border. Troops of the 18th Infantry Brigade (East Java) advanced through Bobonaro in

* UDT member Antonio Serpa gave testimony to the Commission that he was held prisoner by Fretilin in a large coffee warehouse in Aileu with, he estimated, 3,000 prisoners. See testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

late January, then through Atsabe and Letefoho, reaching Ermera on 27 March 1976. Meanwhile on 5 February another force parachuted into Suai on the western south coast, and advanced east towards Zumalai. The Indonesian military did not attempt the north coast west of Dili until mid-year. In June it attacked Liquiçá and Maubara, before proceeding to the Ermera area in a series of short operations beginning in July.[*] [362]

268. Operations in the east spread out from Baucau. Four thousand new troops were flown into Baucau in late December 1975 where they joined units already operating under Kostrad's Airborne Combat Command (Linud Kopur Kostrad).[363] These forces launched offensives along three key routes. From Baucau, several battalions advanced west along the coastal road and captured Manatuto on 31 December. From Manatuto these troops turned south towards Soibada. A second offensive struck southward from Baucau towards Viqueque, where it joined a Marine force that had landed at Uatolari on the south coast. A third force attacked well established Fretilin forces south of Laga in the foothills of Mount Matebian. The final attack targeted Lautém in the east, with a parachute attack on Lospalos on 2 February 1976 supported by infantry reinforcements.[364] Having established control of most of the major towns of Timor-Leste, in August 1976 ABRI established the East Timor Defence and Security Regional Command (Kodahankam), dividing the territory into four operational sectors – West, Central and East, as well as Dili and Oecussi.[†]

East Timorese experience of the early occupation

269. A large number[‡] of the civilian population had fled to the interior, temporarily safe from the Indonesian military. Many towns were virtually abandoned by the East Timorese population as they fled the invasion.[365] Displacement was a widespread experience, and many civilians were without adequate shelter, food or health facilities.[§]

270. The violence of the Indonesian military against civilians shocked some East Timorese political leaders who had assisted in the invasion. Indicating the extremity of the situation as well as the weakness of his position, the Chairman of the PSTT, Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, wrote confidentially to President Soeharto of his concerns in June 1976:

> We concede that the looting of private businesses, government offices and the state treasury could be due to the emotions of war, but it is difficult to understand why it continues six months after, leaving

* Operasi Shinta against Fatubessi, Operasi Tulada 1 against Hatolia, Operasi Tulada 2 against Railaco and Operasi Tulada 3 against Leorema.

† Sector A (Dili and Oecussi), Sector B (West – Liquiçá, Bobonaro, Ermera and Covalima; about 10 Battalions), Sector C (Central – Aileu, Ainaro, Manufahi and Manatuto; about eight battalions), and Sector D (East – Baucau, Viqueque, and Lautém; about 12 battalions).

‡ Possibly as many as 300,000; See Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine.

§ See for example, testimonies of Manuel Carceres da Costa about the town of Laclo in Manatuto District, and Francisco Soares Pinto about the town of Illiomar in Lautém District, both at the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 December 2003.

> everybody in a cruel state of insecurity…Day and night, at my home and office, widows, orphans, children and cripples come begging for milk and clothing. I can do nothing but join my tears to theirs, because the Provisional Government owns nothing [366]

271. In Dili the Indonesian military began what became a pattern of detention and torture in this period, as they tried to control the civilian population who they suspected of having links to those in the mountains.[367] By mid-1976, the first East Timorese refugees from camps in West Timor managed to leave for Portugal. They provided the first eyewitness accounts of the extent of the violence of the invasion.

Fretilin regroups

272. From 15 May to 2 June 1976 Fretilin held a national conference at Soibada in the eastern interior to decide its strategy. Recognising the futility of continuing to fight ABRI on equal terms, the decision was made to mobilise a national resistance. The strategy involved presenting a semi-guerrilla resistance by Falintil. These would be supported logistically by the civilian population, who would remain in the mountains and forests with Fretilin.[368] Fretilin was not unanimous in reaching this decision. All were agreed on the need to fight a war of resistance, but not all supported the idea of conducting a social revolution with the civilian population. Francisco Xavier do Amaral expressed reservations about this latter policy, while others, such as members of Fretilin's military wing, took a neutral stance.[369]

273. To implement the new strategy, Fretilin established a resistance structure based on a number of "liberation zones" (zonas libertadas). Within these zones existed resistance bases (bases de apoio), in which civilians were encircled by a defensive ring composed of Falintil troops, helped by Fretilin militia companies (Miplin) and civil defence units (arma branca or força popular).[370] Behind the lines, civilians, particularly women, provided logistical support for the troops. Fretilin conducted political education for the civilian population in these bases with the aim of building widespread political commitment to national liberation (see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy).

274. In addition to operating schools and growing food, there were attempts at medicine production, although in most cases people had to rely on traditional knowledge of plant-based medicines.[371] Manuel Carceres da Costa told the Commission about life in these Fretilin-controlled areas in Laclo, Manatuto District in 1976:

> In the forest we formed two organisations: Organização Popular da Mulher Timor (OPMT) which was a women's organisation affiliated with Fretilin, and Organização Popular Juventude de Timor (OPJT) which was a youth organisation. These organisations helped us to coordinate activities among the people. For example we worked together to plant gardens and rice paddies, and we planted maize around the town of Laclo. The Indonesian military had not yet reached Laclo.[372]

275. Fretilin also ran prisons (Renal), where violations of human rights were common.[373]

Indonesia formalises the integration

276. Not long after Fretilin's Soibada meeting, Indonesia orchestrated what it called an Act of Integration. The Provisional Government convened a body called the Popular Assembly during May 1976, chaired by Guilherme Gonçalves. The Assembly purported to be a representative selection of East Timorese. Participants were selected by Indonesian-appointed administration officials. Clementino Amaral participated in the Assembly from Baucau, and told the Commission:

> What was this process? They [the Indonesian authorities] wanted two people from each district to represent the district, to make the petition to ask Indonesia to allow us to enter Indonesia. In Baucau, how did this go? Hold an election? [No.] The functionaries that were close to them chose the two people… [374]

277. The members of the Assembly endorsed a petition to President Soeharto requesting Indonesia to grant integration. Mario Carrascalão pointed out that this was the only function the Popular Assembly performed:

> The Popular Assembly...met once in May 1976, here, just to go over one point of its "charter", that is, integration without referendum…its [only] purpose was to discuss the "integration petition" that would be sent to Soeharto.[375]

278. This petition was signed by Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo as head of the PSTT, and Guilherme Gonçalves as head of the Regional Representative Assembly (DPRD), although this had yet to be established.[376] Claiming to represent the East Timorese people, and referring to the Balibó Declaration as the basis of its claim, the key point of the brief petition was that Timor-Leste be integrated into Indonesia without referendum. The entire group was then flown by a military aircraft to Jakarta to present the petition to Soeharto.[377] On 7 June Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, Guilherme Gonçalves, Francisco Xavier Lopes da Cruz and Mario Carrascalão presented the petition to President Soeharto in Jakarta.

279. On 24 June a large fact-finding mission of Indonesian officials and a group of 10 international diplomats[] visited Dili, accompanied by Indonesian and international journalists, supposedly to verify the legitimacy of the petition. The United Nations Special Decolonisation Committee Chairman had been invited, but declined to join the mission. Australia, the US and Japan also declined to participate, though New Zealand sent a representative to observe (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: Self-Determination for excerpts of the report of the New Zealand representative and analysis of this process). The mission spent one day in Timor-Leste. It attended a ceremony where the head of the PSTT, Araújo, made a speech, and groups visited towns close to Dili. Their movements were strictly controlled and free interaction with East Timorese people, including members of the Popular Assembly, was not permitted.[378] Despite this, the mission reported that an effective government was functioning and that the People's Representative Council was performing as a "tool of democracy". It also found that there was a desire for integration without referendum, which it claimed was an unfamiliar mechanism to the East Timorese people. On 17 July 1976 President Soeharto signed the law passed by the Indonesian People's Representative Council (DPR-RI) formalising Indonesia's act of integrating Timor-Leste.

* The international members of the mission were the South Korean, Malaysian, Iranian and Syrian ambassadors to Jakarta, the charge d'affaires of Afghanistan and Iraq, and officers representing Panama, South Yemen and India, and an observer from New Zealand.

280. Indonesia presented this as a legitimate act of self-determination. It was not recognised by Portugal or the United Nations, and on 1 December 1976 the United Nations General Assembly passed resolution 31/53 rejecting Indonesia's annexation of Timor-Leste and reiterated its call for an internationally acceptable act of self-determination.

Operation Seroja continues – US-supplied OV-10 Bronco aircraft introduced

281. Some time in mid- to late-1976, the first US-supplied OV-10 Bronco ground attack aircraft arrived in Indonesia.[380] Airpower became a key part of ABRI's strategy in Timor-Leste. Albino do Carmo, the Falintil commander in the mountains in the Bobonaro-Covalima area, recalled:

> In about August [1976] ABRI tried to attack Mount Lakirin again. One company together with Hansip (civilian auxiliaries) came up. I went to see and chased them off. Two of my section commanders were killed. We fired at each other, only 10 to 20 metres apart. Then ABRI tried to take another mountain. From Suai they entered the area of Mount Fohorua. They entered the area three times. Each time we chased them away…They used airplanes with bombs in Lela, where I was based. The planes only fired big rockets…Every week they fired on our position, on civilians, on the school. They were looking for locations where there were a lot of people. Sometimes they even shot cattle. They did that with a machine gun.[381]

282. Aerial strafing and bombing were primarily used to "soften up" targets prior to a ground attack by infantry troops. In Lolotoe José Pereira recalls a progression from use of helicopters to large bombers and finally to the use of the US-supplied OV-10 Bronco aircraft:

* Law No. 7, 1976, East Timor's Integration into the Republic of Indonesia and the Establishment of the East Timor Province.

In 1976 ABRI already used airplanes and bombs. In 1976–1977 often, two or three times a week. [The airplanes] flew quite low. First they used helicopters and shot. They also used large black aircraft. They used bombs. And third they used big aircraft with a hole in the back [OV-10 Bronco]. They were used since 1976, starting around about August.[382]

283. The use of aerial power placed Fretilin forces under intense pressure, as Falintil only had light arms. It was to be a key factor in bringing the civilian population in the mountains to surrender, and consequently in ABRI's military victory over Fretilin/Falintil in 1979.

Military stalemate, late 1976

284. By the end of 1976, the Indonesian military had established limited control of corridors along the major roads: running south from Dili to Ainaro and Betano; from Baucau to Viqueque; from Manatuto to Laclubar, and from Lautém to Tutuala. Although it had reasonable control of areas it could reach by road along the north coast, large areas of the interior remained beyond ABRI's control. Having expected a quick and easy campaign, ABRI met fierce and well-executed resistance from Fretilin. Progress was slow.

285. Despite added US-supplied airpower, the situation by the end of 1976 was essentially that of stalemate. An April 1976 an American embassy report suggests the difficulties faced by the Indonesian military:

> Gen Yogi [Soepardi, assistant for planning, Department of Defence]… estimated Fretilin strength to be around 3,000 with only 5,000 of 15,000 weapons so far captured by Indonesia. Indonesia is already encountering [a] serious drain on resources, with shortages of ammunition for small arms, artillery, tanks and naval guns.[383]

"Encirclement and annihilation": the final stages of Operation Seroja 1977–1979

Overview

286. Fretilin struggled with the issue of what to do with the large number of civilians with them in their bases in the interior. Some thought it was time to change strategy and allow civilians to surrender and resettle in the towns. Divisions over this issue led to a violent split in Fretilin and the overthrow of its President Francisco Xavier do Amaral in August 1977. Detention, torture and summary executions were carried out by Fretilin during this time.

287. In the second half of 1977, Indonesian military campaigns intensified, and included the destruction of food sources in the interior with the aim of separating the civilian population from the armed resistance. These operations resulted in a high civilian death toll, from direct attacks and from the starvation and sickness that resulted from the destruction of Fretilin bases and food sources.

288. As Fretilin retreated to fewer and more confined areas, ABRI launched Operation Skylight, aimed at forcing the surrender of key Fretilin leaders and with them the remaining civilian population.[384] Mount Matebian in the east, as well as parts of Ermera and Suai in the west, were the scenes of the most intense bombardments by airplane, resulting in large-scale death and ultimately the surrender of tens of thousands of civilians. Key Fretilin leaders were captured, surrendered or were killed, leaving the armed resistance in disarray. Fretilin president Nicolau Lobato was killed in combat on 31 December 1978.[385] Xanana Gusmão escaped to the east. The Indonesian military continued mopping up exercises through early 1979, and in March 1979 it declared the territory pacified.

Civilian population in the mountains

289. In late 1976 life in the Fretilin-controlled zonas libertadas was difficult for civilians, but in general they were not directly involved in combat. The Indonesian military had not yet been able to establish a permanent presence in the interior regions where these zones were located. The civilians with Fretilin were able to organise a basic functional society that could provide for the people's essential needs.[386] Their focus was farming food crops and provision of very basic health care and education to children. The Commission heard expert testimony from Gilman dos Santos, a civil servant from the Indonesian provincial government working with displaced communities in the late 1970s and later a staff member of the US non-governmental organisation Catholic Relief Services:

> According to my calculation, the food situation in the forest between 1975 and 1977 was not that bad. The people didn't experience many problems because at that time they still had the ability to move around and were free to plant according to the seasons. They could produce food. TNI had only gained control over the towns in the districts and sub-districts, though there were attacks by the TNI into the forests.[387]

290. This changed dramatically in the second half of 1977.

ABRI capacity stretched and early Fretilin confidence

291. Following the situation of military stalemate between Indonesian and Fretilin troops in late 1976, ABRI found its resources over-committed across the archipelago in early 1977. It was forced to withdraw troops from Timor-Leste in order support operations that year in Irian Jaya, West Kalimantan and Aceh. The Indonesian military also had security responsibility for the May Indonesian legislative elections, to which it committed the equivalent of 100 battalions nationwide.[388] These external influences seriously affected its ability to conduct combat operations in Timor-Leste. Indonesian military documents reported this reduction of troops:

> In the framework of implementing the 1977 elections the total strength of TNI in East Timor decreased until a third remained for duty as guards for the 1977 elections elsewhere in Indonesia.[389]

292. This evidence and Fretilin reports referred to below suggest that between March and June 1977 there was a significant reduction in ABRI presence and combat operations.

293. This provided a reprieve and opportunity for Fretilin. During the first half of 1977 Fretilin's Radio Maubere repeatedly issued announcements about low Indonesian morale and Falintil victories. On 20 May, for example, the Fretilin Minister for Information and Security Alarico Fernandes reported by radio that 1,500 Indonesian troops had been withdrawn from the territory.[390] On 4 June he reported:

> The last major Indonesian offensives occurred from last November [1975] to February [1976]. Despite deployment of thousands of troops, these attacks were all defeated at the cost of many lives to the Indonesian forces…Since February, Indonesian attacks have been small-scale, aimed with little success at eliminating Fretilin positions in mountains overlooking Indonesian-held towns.[391]

294. Although Fretilin's propaganda probably inflated its successes, the first half of 1977 was a relatively positive period for the Resistance. In May, Alarico Fernandes claimed that:

> Food production in Fretilin-controlled areas is another front to be developed along with the armed struggle. We have reached the maximum production reached in the Portuguese colonial domination [period], when there was hunger and sickness…People in Timor-Leste are working hard on national reconstruction. Hunger is less than before.[392]

US leads re-arming of the Indonesian military

295. During early 1977 a US Congressional Subcommittee delegation visited Timor-Leste. Their visit was highly orchestrated by the Indonesian military, which limited them to areas firmly under Indonesian control. They did not seek to meet with Fretilin or the large number of civilians in the interior. During the time of their visit there were only limited combat operations. The delegation drew "no firm conclusions" with regard to the war.[393] In 1978, US Secretary of State Zbigniew Brzezinski ordered that the human rights "heat" on Indonesia be turned down.[394] Subsequently during 1978 the US and other foreign governments provided extensive military support to Indonesia. In January the US announced the sale of 16 F-5 fighter aircraft, an A-4 fighter aircraft squadron, and an M-16 rifle manufacturing facility.[395] Also that year the UK announced its intention to supply Hawk ground attack jets,[396] and Australia supplied helicopters and transport aircraft.[397] This was a very clear signal to Indonesia that the West did not oppose its military operations in Timor-Leste.

296. In 1979, the US sought to justify its silence on the use of US arms in Timor-Leste on the basis that the war was virtually over. Its source for this conclusion was the Indonesian military:

> Some items of US supplied military equipment are currently present in East Timor. The status of hostilities in East Timor is, however, so reduced in scale and frequency that, according to best information the equipment is only infrequently used in combat. [398]

Fretilin: internal divisions and violent purge

297. Despite the optimism of early 1977 Fretilin faced internal problems and divisions which resulted in violence. In 1976* the party executed Aquiles Soares, the liurai of Quelicai, for the offence of putting local interests above national interests.[399] Later that year another breakaway unit, led by Francisco Hornai in Illiomar, was similarly arrested and executed.[400] These events were an early indication of the difference in views among Fretilin leaders about how to engage in the struggle, and a precursor of the violence Fretilin would use to bring its cadres into line.[401]

298. By late 1977 treating the sick and wounded and feeding the civilian population was an increasing strain on Fretilin. Then Fretilin President Francisco Xavier do Amaral told the Commission that the lack of medicines to treat even basic ailments was taking an increasing toll on civilian lives.[402]

299. Members of the Fretilin Central Committee disagreed on several issues, as political and military cadres were divided over who controlled the struggle. The basic controversy was the role of the civilian population. For Falintil leaders, the need to defend the large civilian population limited their capacity to mount effective offensives. Francisco Xavier do Amaral supported this view, and thought action was necessary to avoid annihilation, and that the bulk of the population should be allowed to surrender and continue resistance from the towns and villages. Other Central Committee members believed that the people were a vital component of a popular struggle, in particular to enable the party to undertake a social revolution based on political education of the masses.[403]

300. In August 1977 the Fretilin Central Committee met in Laline (Lacluta, Viqueque) and agreed on the principle of self-reliance. With no prospect of external support, the Resistance decided it had to stand alone against the Indonesian military. There was dissent on this matter. The minister for Information Alarico Fernandes thought independence was impossible without external support.[404] His opposition already known, Francisco Xavier do Amaral did not attend the meeting at Laline. Shortly afterwards, in September 1977, Fretilin arrested and deposed him as president. Amaral described the events to the Commission:

* Sources vary on the month; Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 95 states November, while Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar, citing Gusmão, To Resist is to Win, states March.

> So this was my idea. We should send the population to surrender. Only those men who were strong and could struggle in the war would stay with the Central Committee. Because we didn't know how many years until this war would be over…(In 1976) there began to be divergence within Fretilin…Some said that the doctrine (of Fretilin) was not right. Some said that the doctrine was right but people weren't following it properly. Some said it was good. We began to lose our trust in each other…From this they arrested me, put me in prison and accused me… that I had sent the people to surrender so that in the future when I surrendered to Indonesia they would give me a position as a general or a minister. This was the argument of those who were against me...[405]

301. An order signed by Vice-President Nicolau Lobato accused Francisco Xavier do Amaral of being a defeatist and a traitor, as well as other "crimes" such as corruption, polygamy, sabotage, iron fisted-ness, feudalism and murder.[406] He was also accused of starting a parallel movement that would undermine Fretilin. He was imprisoned in a hole, beaten and ill-treated. [407] As a result of an ABRI offensive he escaped in 1978, and was later captured by the Indonesian military.

302. On 16 October Nicolau Lobato was elected as the new president. The pressures of this period drove Fretilin to adopt a more radical ideological stance. Marxism was declared,[408] and with it came intolerance of dissent. Amaral's arrest was the start of a purge within Fretilin.[409] There were public executions,[410] and many people were detained, ill-treated and forced to inform on others.[411] Anyone thought to have close links to Amaral or to have collaborated with the Indonesian military was arrested and detained (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances, and Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).

ABRI intensifies military operations: encirclement and annihilation, August 1977 to August 1978

303. Military operations between mid-1977 and early 1979 are often referred to as a campaign of "encirclement and annihilation". The campaign had two objectives, to destroy the Fretilin leadership and to force the civilian population living in the mountainous interior to surrender into ABRI control in the lowlands.[412]

304. In August 1977 ABRI launched a major new military offensive,[413] which was preceded by a substantial troop build-up.[414] The Commission's data show an increase from between three to five battalions in July to 17 in August. The initial focus of the offensive was the western sector, where it was code-named Operation Comb (Operasi Sisir).*[415] As in previous engagements, naval artillery and air support was crucial to ABRI victory. In Fatumean, for example, aerial bombing was the primary reason for the surrender of Fretilin/Falintil troops and civilians in November.[416] In the eastern sector marines conducted Marine 77 Surgical Operation (Operasi Bedah Marinir 77) which aimed to gain control over the route between Quelicai and Uato Carbau.[417]

Destruction of food sources, Fretilin retreats higher into mountains with civilian population

305. The Indonesian military was moving beyond the towns and road corridors over which it had established control in the first part of Operation Seroja. Fretilin was forced to retreat, and rather than promote civilian surrender it decided to take the population with it. The Commission was told of the destruction of livestock and other food sources by the Indonesian military during these operations. Manuel Carceres da Costa of Laclo in Manatuto District testified:

> While we were cutting down a sago tree, soldiers came and attacked us…When the military shot a Falintil member by the name of Hermenegildo we were forced to leave the food behind and run. After that the military occupied that area so that we couldn't return any more. Our water buffalos and domestic animals were all shot dead or chased away, and our gardens and rice paddies were destroyed.[418]

306. Aerial bombardment also targeted agricultural areas, forcing Fretilin and the population further into the mountains, and making survival increasingly difficult. With food crops destroyed, and civilians no longer able to live in settled areas where they could plant crops, but forced to keep on the move, many people died. The Commission heard many testimonies of the terrible suffering and helplessness of civilians in the mountains during these campaigns. The elderly and children in particular died in great numbers.[419] The Indonesian military overpowered Fretilin's resistance bases (bases de apoio) one after another, and the remaining population retreated into increasingly confined areas. The presence of so many civilians required Falintil to focus on protecting them, reducing its ability to mount counter-offensive action against ABRI.

Attacks in the central region

307. The Indonesian military continued the offensive during the rainy season and throughout the first half of 1978. Troop presence in the central region, which had previously been low, was increased to a similar level as the west. Operating under the command of Combat Regiment Team (RTP) 11, these troops launched an attack on the Same-Kablaki-Fatuberliu area.[420] In the east, however, troop levels remained much lower, with only four to five battalions.[*] During the rainy season troops in the east attacked Fretilin strongholds on the Baucau-Viqueque border between Mount Osso-Ala and Mount Mundo Perdido, and also continued the assault on the northern foothills of Mount Matebian.[421] During this period air power[†] was used in the western and central sectors:[422]

* This involved the 131, 511, 527, 612, 621, 733, and 741 Infantry Battalions.

> After the bombing smashed Kablaki they went to Dululau and Mamelau… Four airplanes bombed Dululau, and…rockets and…cannons.[423]

308. The Commission heard first-hand testimony from survivors of these encirclement campaigns, in which many civilians lost their lives. Maria José da Costa told the Commission of her experiences in the central mountain region:

> In 1978 the enemy surrounded us in Dolok and many people died due to starvation. All the food supplies…were burnt. They surrounded us by attacking from the sea with warships, from the air with warplanes and on land by burning the dry grass and sending in the army. At that time it was August, which is the dry season. The army made big fast-burning fires by spraying gasoline over the tall grass. Many died because they could not escape the fire surrounding us.[424]

309. The pressure of encirclement and constant attacks led to a steady flow of people surrendering to the Indonesian military.

Operation (or Movement) Skylight: targeting the Fretilin leadership

310. On 6 April 1978 Lieutenant General Mohammad Yusuf was appointed Commander-in-chief of ABRI. He took personal control of the operations in Timor-Leste, outranking Moerdani and Kalbuadi.[425] In the dry season in May 1978 he prepared for Operation Skylight.[426] This new operation specifically targeted Fretilin leaders. It aimed to achieve the surrender of influential leaders in order to attain mass popular surrender and so separate the civilian population from the Falintil fighters. The Commission was told by Xanana Gusmão that Skylight was better described as a "movement", and that the Fretilin Minister for Information and Security Alarico Fernandes was a key ally of the Indonesian military after his surrender in September 1978:

> In October or November 1978 those of us who were within the encirclement heard that Alarico had already implemented Skylight… We heard on the radio that Alarico had made a movement…He could

*Including Kostrads 502 and 503 Infantry Battalions, the 408 Infantry Battalion and a single Marine Infantry Battalion.

†US-supplied OV-10 Bronco aircraft

> see that Indonesia was very strong and so he followed Indonesia and proclaimed Skylight.[427]

311. Although the geography of the conflict remained fluid in early 1978, as time passed and the Resistance was squeezed into increasingly smaller areas, it took on the nature of a siege. Under increasing pressure, the leadership of Fretilin desperately tried to maintain a unified resistance. The text of Nicolau Lobato's speech of 20 May 1978 indicates the pressures Fretilin faced:

> However, those who are not convinced of the unquestionable facts, that our struggle is fair and victorious and who, in opposition, cooperate with fanaticism with the enemy, try to put an end to our struggle, those few who have failed in their lives are those who are not members of Fretilin, who are not part of the Maubere people, who are enemies of the People, who are traitors to our Motherland. Proclaimed ideological unity will only be authentic when we put it into practice.*

Indonesian military operations against the centre and east, late 1978: the fall of Matebian

312. The major turning point in operations occurred in the middle of 1978. Between August and December 1977 combat troops had been concentrated in the western sector, and during the first half of 1978 combat troops were evenly distributed across the western and central sectors; while troop deployments in the eastern sector had been significantly lower. In mid-1978 the balance of power finally shifted eastwards, with 13 combat battalions deployed in the east under the command of Kostrad's RTP 18.[428] This deployment continued the encirclement of the population and culminated in the assault on Mount Matebian. This was carefully coordinated, involving battalions from Kostrad, non-organic (external) territorial infantry battalions, combat support battalions, marines, and the air force. A former Kostrad officer interviewed in Indonesia recalled the tactics employed during the assault on Mount Matebian:

> All units had their own routes and attacked from numerous directions. Before doing that they coordinated to avoid shooting at each other. We

* In Nicolau dos Reis Lobato, Fretilin é a Liberdade do Povo em Marcha, Discursos, Edições Comité 28 de Novembro, Lisbon, undated, (probably 1979, after official Fretilin Communiqué announcing Nicolau Lobato's death, 6 May 1979), p. 59. This speech was relayed by radio and a summary of it was sent to the US mission to the United Nations, which read: "Lobato appealed, inter alia, for the unity of the people of East Timor, of all patriots around the Fretilin Central Committee and a call for ideological unity. 'Proclaimed ideological unity will only be authentic when we (Fretilin) put it into practice.' Also, that those who don't belong to Fretilin are enemies of the people – (they are) 'traitors to our motherland [sic]'." [Telegram, US Mission UN New York to Secretary of State, Washington, East Timor Question, 7 July 1978].

> planned to attack at the same time using an L formation. [This was] all done considering security in order to avoid killing our comrades.[429]

313. This constituted the final push in the encirclement and annihilation campaign. Fretilin had prepared Matebian as a fall-back area, with reserves of food. As the campaign started, Fretilin took people onto the mountain, which was strongly defended. It finally fell on 22 November, the last zona libertada to be overrun.

314. The key to the assault on Mount Matebian was aerial bombardment by OV-10 Broncos, F-5s and Skyhawk A-4 airplanes. Most informants recall that the aerial bombing of Mount Matebian began in September or October 1978 and lasted until mid-November. Accounts describe indiscriminate bombing against civilians and devastating carnage. Tomás Soares da Silva, aged 16 at the time, described the bombing:

> On Mount Matebian, the bombing started in October and November. One (type) of bomb was gas. If the bombers dropped those bombs in the morning, many people became casualties. We could see when there was an explosion that the grass was burnt…and in the area everything was destroyed. If there was an explosion the smell was like diesel or petrol.[* 432]

Surrender: coming down from Matebian

315. By mid-November the bombing forced Fretilin leaders to order civilians to surrender to the enemy. In his autobiography Xanana Gusmão wrote:

> Soon the enemy advanced and I was sent to the west of Matebian. Explosions, death, bombardments, cries and retreats. But the people were calm: maybe resigned, maybe truly prepared for us all to die there. Our forces retreated and the enemy infiltrated. One dawn I was awakened by loudspeakers from the Indonesian forces, calling my name: "Adjunto Xanana, there is no need to continue fighting. Tell the people to surrender!" They had moved in from Uato Carbau during the night and occupied a strategic point.[433]

316. On 22 November, the decision to surrender on Matebian was taken. As civilians descended from the mountain peaks and long valley separating Matebian Mane and Matebian Feto, they were received by the waiting troops. Some were simply corralled into temporary holding camps, others were interrogated, and still others were told to return to their home areas, either under escort or on their own.

* Testimony such as this strongly suggests the use of napalm against civilian targets by the Indonesian Air Force. The Commission holds documentary footage of OV-10 Bronco aircraft being loaded with bombs labelled "Opalm" (a Soviet version of napalm) at Baucau airport sometime in the late 1970s.

317. Although some Falintil commanders such as Xanana Gusmão escaped, this left the Fretilin/Falintil resistance in disarray. The destructive impact of this loss on Fretilin was substantial, and the Skylight movement finally achieved some of its most prominent successes. After the earlier surrender of Alarico Fernandes in September, four other Central Committee members surrendered in late 1978 in the North Central Sector at Remexio. With Alarico Fernandes' surrender Fretilin lost its only radio, a crucial coordination tool. The Indonesian military's major success came on 31 December 1978 when a Kopassus team located and fatally wounded Fretilin President Nicolau Lobato by a river near Maubisse. [434]

318. The Commission heard expert testimony from Pat Walsh on the results of this intensification of military campaigns:

> From a military point of view, the offensive was extremely successful resulting in the virtual, though temporary, annihilation of the Resistance. From a humanitarian point, it was a disaster.[435]

After Matebian: ABRI attacks in central region and the east

319. With the fall of Fretilin's base on Mount Matebian and the surrender of tens of thousands of civilians, in early 1979 the Indonesian military turned its attention to the remaining Fretilin forces and civilians in Fatubessi, in Ermera District, and Mount Kablaki, straddling the Ainaro-Manufahi border, and in the Dilor river valley. The ABRI attack on Fatubessi led to a split in the local Fretilin leadership, and in early February one faction surrendered, while those who refused were hunted down. On Mount Kablaki, infantry operations forced the remaining clusters of civilians down to lower ground where they surrendered or were captured by waiting troops.[436]

320. In southern Manatuto, Marines, supported by aircraft, conducted follow up operations, named Operation Clean Up (Pembersihan).[437] Meanwhile, military units that had taken part in the assault on Mount Matebian moved from Baucau into Lautém in pursuit of the small band of Fretilin leaders and Falintil troops who had escaped encirclement.[438] In February Mau Lear, leader of the Eastern region, was captured and killed.[439] The people caught in this operation were herded into resettlement camps. On 26 March 1979 Operation Seroja was disbanded, and the Indonesian military declared Timor-Leste "pacified".

Surrender, resettlement and famine

Overview

321. The period from late 1977 to 1979 saw the greatest humanitarian tragedy in Timor-Leste's history. Widespread famine was a consequence of massive Indonesian military operations aimed at destroying the Fretilin Resistance. This military objective was allowed to override the cost in humanitarian terms. Outside observers were kept away until the crisis was full-blown and the cost in lives immense.

322. The civilian population in the mountains surrendered in large numbers from late 1978. After many months of life constantly on the move to evade attack, and with food sources destroyed by the Indonesian military, people were in a very vulnerable condition when they surrendered. They were held in transit camps, with inadequate food and medical relief. Their suffering was exacerbated by military control over Indonesian domestic relief operations, and by a ban preventing international agencies from entering the territory. International media were also banned. Following the relocation of the population to resettlement camps, the Indonesian military priority of security placed tight controls on civilians' movement and so limited their capacity to farm and to grow food, resulting in further starvation, death and misery on a large scale. The preoccupation with separating a sympathetic civilian population from Fretilin/Falintil reached its zenith with the exile of civilians to the island of Ataúro commencing in 1980. Thousands were held on this island prison, suffering illness and starvation.

323. After long delay, the International Red Cross (ICRC) and the US-based non-governmental organisation Catholic Relief Services (CRS) were allowed to enter the territory in late 1979. Working under great pressure, their efforts brought some relief to the suffering population and saved many lives.

Surrender and execution of prisoners

324. The major surrenders occurred during 1978 as the encirclement campaign closed in on Resistance positions. The intense bombing and encirclement campaigns, combined with the renewal of President Soeharto's 1977 offer of amnesty to combatants and the pressure of the Skylight movement resulted in a number of important Fretilin surrenders. Of these, many who were initially granted amnesty subsequently disappeared. Among these were prominent leaders such as Sera Key,[440] as well as cadres, such as those executed upon surrender by ABRI at Quelicai in early 1979.[441] As they came down from the mountains people were interrogated by the Indonesian military in order to identify and separate Fretilin and Falintil members. Luis da Costa was a priest in the mountains during this time. He survived, and in 1988 he testified in Lisbon about the surrender of a small group of survivors, most of whom were executed:

> People began to die of hunger, and we had many wounded people with us, as well as children and entire families. The worst memory I have is of the corpses I saw when I passed through Natarbora in December 1978 - there were bodies every ten metres, desiccated corpses of those who had died of starvation, some embracing, others propped under trees. I surrendered in Barique on 13 March 1979, with six people. For a month we'd only eaten leaves. Our surrender was negotiated through an intermediary. I was the only one who was not executed.[442]

325. In 1981 the Apostolic Administrator of Timor-Leste, Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes, challenged President Soeharto himself with evidence of these disappearances.[443]

Transit camps

326. Those not taken away by the military were interned. During the late 1970s and early to mid-1980s a variety of camps were used to accommodate the surrendered population. These went by various names. Indonesia called them resettlement camps, while some international observers and many Timorese survivors who testified to the Commission, used the term "concentration camp." All camps shared common elements of deprivation and restrictions on freedom of movement. The aim of internment was to break the linkages between those who had surrendered to ABRI and Falintil, in order to cut off civilian support to the guerrilla fighters and thus to destroy the tattered remnants of the armed resistance still in the mountains and forests.

327. In the early stages of the surrenders people were accommodated wherever possible, including in schools, old shops, military barracks or simply in the open. Initially there was no infrastructure in place to receive them. The Commission heard expert testimony from Gilman dos Santos, who in 1977 worked for the provincial government:

> The people who fled to the mountains came down in 1977, 1978 and 1979. Those who surrendered or those who were captured by the Indonesian military, everyone was placed in concentration camps, which were not suitable for any human being. People were placed in large emergency tents, made from palm leaves or grass and they held everyone, without limiting numbers. [444]

328. People were generally in poor physical condition. Often they had surrendered after harrowing experiences in the mountains during which many people had died. People arriving in the camps were already survivors not only of war, but of lack of food and medicine. The experience of hunger and starvation continued in camps that had neither facilities such as sanitation nor supplies such as adequate food and medicine to meet their urgent needs.

329. By 1978, many camps had been established. The purported objective of these camps was to process those who had surrendered before their resettlement elsewhere. Theoretically this process was to take three months. Security was high and camps were ringed by military and Hansip (civil guards) posts. People's movements were typically restricted to a radius of 300 metres, greatly limiting their ability to plant or gather food. People survived on whatever foods they could gather nearby, cassava or sago if they were lucky, or toxic roots and tubers (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

330. The time people spent in these camps varied according to how volatile an area was, and according to the individual interned and the perception by ABRI of his or her security risk.[445]

Longer-term detention camps and ABRI's security strategy

331. Some transit camps were simply maintained as longer-term holding camps. Other resettlement villages were developed in order to assist the Indonesian military aim of enforcing the separation of civilians and Fretilin and Falintil. By late 1979 the population in internment camps exceeded 300,000,[446] and if various ABRI-reported figures from the time are accurate the population possibly exceeded 370,000.[447] The military needed to control this overwhelming number of people, while staying focused on its task of eliminating the armed guerrilla resistance. In some cases these camps were constructed where previously there had been no settlement at all. Entire villages were uprooted and forced to move, particularly if they were in volatile areas. Movement was tightly controlled. An Indonesian military document from the time explained how to implement this policy:

> Every time anyone goes out of the village, he/she must have a travel pass (surat jalan), and every person who comes into the village from another village must report.
>
> There should be no gardens or fields of the people located far from the settlement or village.[448]

332. This resulted in such tight control of civilians in camps that they were not able to maintain normal farming patterns and grow sufficient food to sustain themselves and their families. These controls resulted in great hardship for the huge number of civilians held in these camps, and contributed significantly to the famine.[449]

333. The Indonesian military remained highly suspicious of links between the interned population and the Fretilin guerrilla fighters. ABRI used East Timorese members of its Hansip forces to monitor civilian behaviour. This created conditions of distrust and tension in camp communities. In Dili and towns where the civilian population had returned there were also many detention centres. Arbitrary arrest by the military was rife, and no formal trials of political prisoners were held until December 1983 (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment, and Part 7.6: Political Trials). During 1979-80 many people who had been arrested disappeared. The Indonesian military used certain places as killing grounds, such as at Quelicai after the mass surrenders from Matebian,[450] and on the outskirts of Dili at Areia Branca and Tacitolu.[451]

A closed land

334. Throughout this period Timor-Leste was closed to the outside world. While Indonesia had declared Timor-Leste pacified, it remained in many senses a war zone. Preventing the truth of this situation reaching the Indonesian public, or the wider international public, was an important component of the Indonesian strategy to bring Timor-Leste under control. Indonesian media access to Timor-Leste was tightly controlled, and international media was virtually banned. International aid agencies were not allowed to enter Timor-Leste, and official delegations were only allowed on the most tightly controlled visits.

335. The Commission heard testimony from Gilman dos Santos about this isolation:

> Timor-Leste at that time was closed off to everyone. Even Indonesian journalists were not permitted to enter here. Regarding telecommunication, no permission was given for a long-distance network or international connection. With these conditions, no information could get out. With Timor-Leste being so closed off by the Indonesian government, especially by ABRI, it was clear that the policy of Indonesia was to hinder assistance from other countries.[452]

336. The Catholic Church was the only independent organisation remaining in Timor-Leste with an extensive international network. The Church gradually leaked news of the crisis in Timor-Leste, usually through letters smuggled out of the territory.

337. In July 1979, Pat Walsh prepared a report on the humanitarian crisis in Timor-Leste for Action for World Development, an Australian Church-based NGO. He testified to the Commission that the report concluded that at this time:

> Indonesia's efforts at humanitarian relief were a much lower priority than its military operations and that independent agencies would not be permitted until Indonesia had achieved its military objectives.[453]

338. Although Australian non-governmental organisations tried to internationalise the humanitarian crisis in Timor-Leste, the Australian government has defined this period as marking the commencement of its de jure recognition of Indonesian sovereignty over the territory. This position put it out of step with most member states of the United Nations.* Meanwhile, East Timorese people outside the territory were also trying to raise international awareness about the humanitarian crisis. At the United Nations, submissions were made to the UN Decolonisation Committee in New York, and UN General Assembly resolutions at this time began to make reference to the famine and the humanitarian needs of the East Timorese people. This reinforced the work of José Ramos-Horta and his colleagues at the United Nations. [454]

339. The Indonesian civil administration and the Indonesian Red Cross (PMI) were the only agencies providing relief until 1979. Under-resourced, and moreover under the strict control of the Indonesian military in terms of how they operated, these agencies were unable to meet the urgent needs of the people. Medicine was rarely provided and aid channelled through PMI frequently found its way on to the black market, and was beyond the capacity of East Timorese people to purchase. [455]

340. After reports about the humanitarian disaster were publicised, in September 1978 eleven foreign ambassadors and some journalists visited Timor-Leste escorted

* The Australian government places 14 February 1979 as the date of the beginning of the process of Australia granting de jure recognition of Indonesian sovereignty over Timor-Leste. This date marked the commencement of negotiations between Australia and Indonesia over the Timor Sea oil reserves [see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination].

by the Indonesian Foreign Minister Dr Mochtar Kusumaatmaja.* They represented the governments of Canada, USA, Australia, Japan, New Zealand, India, South Korea, Bangladesh, Egypt, Syria and Iraq. They were told that some 125,000 people had come down from the mountains with 20-30,000 of these in appalling, desperate condition. Four ambassadors (from Australia, Canada, Japan and USA) called for the urgent implementation of an international relief operation.[456] Despite this urgency, a full year passed before the ICRC and the American non-governmental organisation CRS arrived in Timor-Leste to provide emergency relief. This was after ABRI had completed Operation Seroja, as noted above.

ICRC and CRS relief

341. The US non-governmental organisation CRS conducted its initial survey mission in May 1979. The Commission received a submission from CRS, including documents from this time, providing valuable insight into the extent of the crisis and the limited means to address it. In October 1979, CRS and the ICRC commenced emergency relief operations. One of those involved was Gilman dos Santos, who left his civil service position and joined the CRS emergency team. He testified to the Commission that their office was operating 18 to 20 hours per day, seven days a week. He told the Commission that while many in the Indonesian civil administration supported the emergency work of the CRS and ICRC, the Indonesian military and police were unsupportive and created many obstacles for aid workers.[457]

342. It is clear that Indonesia did not utilise its resources adequately to prevent or to respond to the famine. On two occasions CRS ran short of supplies and borrowed rice from the Indonesian government rice distribution agency (Bulog), which held excess stock in Dili at a time when large numbers of people were dying of starvation and related illnesses in the military-controlled camps.[458]

343. The Commission heard testimony from Pat Walsh that CRS and the ICRC worked with vigour and efficiency. He told the Commission that over the next 18 months the ICRC, with the Indonesian Red Cross, assisted 80,000 displaced people in 15 villages and saved many lives. He said that during this period, CRS spent US$4 million distributing 17,000 tons of food as well as medicine, clothing, soap, seeds, agricultural equipment and water buffalo.[459] Given the extent of the crisis, and compared to the number of international aid agencies and level of assistance provided in the emergency in Timor-Leste in late-1999, this aid package was relatively small and its delayed delivery was too late for many people. Indonesian military control over aid distribution was also a major obstacle to relief efforts. While the Commission received many testimonies about how important this limited aid was, neither CRS nor the ICRC addressed the fundamental issue of the international conflict which was the cause of the famine.

* A number of humanitarian organisations reported on the situation, including the Australia Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA); a representative of World Vision Indonesia; and the Indonesian Red Cross [see testimony of Pat Walsh to the CAVR to its National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003].

Ataúro as a prison island

344. Ataúro has had a history of being used as a prison island by successive regimes in Timor-Leste. The Portuguese colonial administration did so over a long period, as did the Japanese occupying forces in World War II. The Indonesian regime of occupation initiated a similar policy commencing in 1980. The Commission received expert testimony that this was an extension of the policy of separating civilians who were considered a possible future support base for the armed Resistance. Gilman dos Santos testified:

> In 1980, ABRI and the local government again forcibly displaced people whom they suspected had relatives who were freedom fighters in the forests, to the island of Ataúro.[460]

345. Survivors also testified to the Commission that this policy was jointly implemented by the military and the civil administration.[461]

346. Some of the first people to be sent to Ataúro were those who participated in the popular uprisings (levantamentos) during this period. Suspected supporters of the 10 June 1980 attack on the TV station in Dili were taken to Ataúro after detention and torture in Dili. Later arrivals included the families of Resistance fighters, many of whom came from the districts after the 1981 'fence of legs' operation. The Commission received testimony of the people of Mau Chiga in the central mountains being taken to exile on Ataúro in August 1982, after an attempted uprising.[464]

347. The Commission heard expert testimony from Ceu Lopes Federer, an East Timorese aid worker with the ICRC on Ataúro between 1980 and 1982. She told the Commission that boats arriving with prisoners at Ataúro were predominantly full of women, children and the elderly. She told the Commission that many had been tricked into believing that they were only leaving their homes for one or two days, and that they arrived virtually empty-handed.[465]

348. Mortality rates were high. Ceu Lopes Federer recalled an outbreak of a cholera epidemic due to the poor conditions of the camps, and of the high mortality rate amongst children.[466] Although security on Ataúro was more relaxed than on the mainland, the island is known for its limited food and water resources, and the thousands of prisoners that arrived faced great difficulties.

349. ICRC reports at the time confirm that the population transfer to Ataúro had "strained" the island's food resources, and that it implemented an emergency food programme.[467] Testimony to the Commission from survivors tells of the life-saving importance of this aid.[468] Estimates of the total prisoner population vary, and are likely to have exceeded 4,000.[469] Ceu Lopes Federer told the Commission that she had kept a list until 1982, when she left the island, which contained 6,400 names of people imprisoned on Ataúro.[470] The Commission was also told that the Indonesian military sexually abused many women held on the island.[471]

350. By the mid-1980s prisoners were removed from the island, although in many cases it appears they were transferred to mainland camps called "guidance camps" (desa binaan), rather than returned to their home areas, where they underwent a process of indoctrination in the Indonesian national ideology of Pancasila.[472]

Detention camps close

351. By 1982-83 most people were allowed to leave the detention camps. Some returned to their original villages, where this was possible. Others established new villages, often giving these the name of the original village, now abandoned. Others were settled in a new kind of village, called resettlement areas (desa pemukiman).[473]

352. The population of the capital city of Dili had grown significantly by the early 1980s. The population had been approximately 28,000 in 1975, but the Indonesian statistical office put the population of Dili district at 67,039 in 1980.[474] This new pattern of urbanisation enabled the Indonesian military apparatus to monitor the population more easily. Informer networks, identity cards and limited freedom of movement and arbitrary arrest were all features of this tightly controlled society. [475]

353. During this period, between 1978 and the early 1980s, the Indonesian military had implemented a resettlement programme that had radically and permanently altered settlement patterns in Timor-Leste. Timorese society traditionally lived in small hamlets consisting of several houses in which lived several nuclear families, known in Tetum as knua. The previous pattern of dispersed mountain settlement was forcibly changed to a predominately coastal population concentrated at towns along major roads. The strategic aim of separating the civilian population from Resistance fighters in the mountains, and to hold them in areas where they could be monitored, was a fundamental shift in the East Timorese way of life. Although this internment situation eased in the mid-1980s as people were allowed to leave their camps, these fundamental changes in the patterns of settlement remain today.

Operation Security (Operasi Keamanan)

Overview

354. With Timor-Leste declared pacified in March 1979, the Indonesian military focused on smaller mopping-up operations and clamping down on the population in all areas. Remnants of the armed Resistance existed in isolated pockets.

355. In June 1980, one of these surviving groups staged an attack on Dili, taking ABRI by surprise and demonstrating that the Resistance was still active. The Indonesian military responded with hundreds of detentions and over 100 killings. Many prisoners detained at this time were sent to Ataúro (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

356. In 1981 the Indonesian military launched a huge offensive aimed at destroying the remnant groups of the Resistance. It utilised a well-known tactic of kikis, or "fence of legs". Large numbers of civilians, still suffering from the devastation of the conflict in the mountains and the deprivation of ABRI detention camps, were pressed into service to march across the territory in "fences," with the aim of trapping the remaining members of the armed Resistance. Women, men, children and the elderly were forced into this operation. Hunger, sickness and ill-treatment by the military were common experiences. Many died. This forced service also took many people away from their fields during the planting season, increasing their vulnerability to famine, especially given the disruption to farming in the previous years of massive military operations.

357. In military terms the operation failed to crush the armed Resistance, whose members often escaped the "fence". Over 4,000 people regarded as "Fretilin sympathisers" were detained and imprisoned either on Ataúro Island or in other ABRI-controlled resettlement camps.

The situation in Dili and across Timor-Leste, 1979–1980

358. With key Resistance leaders captured or killed, the armed Resistance crushed and the majority of East Timorese civilians in the mountains captured or surrendered into their control, the Indonesian military at the beginning of 1980 were confident that major military operations were over in Timor-Leste. The Operation Seroja Joint Task Force Command was disbanded, and military operational command was passed from Dili to Bali, meaning that Timor-Leste was now within ABRI's standard regional command structure. At the same time control of the civil administration was formally transferred from the Ministry of Defence and Security (Hankam) to the Ministry of the Interior (Depdagri). Militarily, ABRI continued mopping-up operations to secure its authority, but in general the period after the closure of Operation Seroja was comparatively quiet in military operational terms.

359. The Indonesian military retained a dominant role within and over the developing civil administration. Life for most civilians was tense and fearful.[476] In a submission from the Association of Ex-Political Prisoners (Associação dos Ex-Prisoneiros e Detidos Políticos de Timor Leste, Assepol) the Commission heard that during this time, with the increased population in Dili, Indonesian intelligence agents were prevalent. Assepol told the Commission that there were no judicial processes in these late years of the 1970s and early 1980s, and that the military had unrestricted power of arbitrary arrest and torture.[477] Many individual testimonies to the Commission support this point, and report being taken away from their homes at night, or being rounded up by the military for interrogation and torture.[478] The Commission produced maps of the detention and interrogation centres in Dili and Baucau during these years, many of them unofficial but operated by the Indonesian military. The number of these centres far outweighs the reasonable needs of a democratic country governed under the rule of law (see Annexes to this Report).

360. Across Timor-Leste the Indonesian military developed its territorial structure in tandem with population movements and demographic changes consequent to the major displacements of the period. In every village in Timor-Leste ABRI posted a military Guidance Officer (Babinsa), and in areas considered particularly disruptive (rawan) there was a team of these men, called a village guidance team (Tim Pembina Desa, TPD). These military posts worked closely with East Timorese civilian defence auxiliaries (Hansip), and provided the Indonesian military with a firm hold at all levels of East Timorese society. Thus in many areas of the country, people lived in the new resettlement villages under close military scrutiny.

361. The situation of acute famine associated with the military campaigns of the 1977-78 and the detention camps of the military had been stabilised by the efforts of the international aid agencies CRS and ICRC. However, in 1980 communities had not yet had the chance to recover from these traumatic years of conflict. The painful legacy included vulnerability to hunger and sickness due to the deprivation of the conflict and the loss of years of normal crop planting and harvesting.

The first uprising: Dili, June 1980

362. On 10 June 1980 Falintil mounted an attack in Dili, on the new television transmitter at Marabia.[479] This took ABRI completely by surprise. It was the first major uprising (levantamentos), following the seemingly crushing defeat of Fretilin in late 1978. The name levantamento was used by the Resistance to lend a sense of common purpose to what were in effect militarily limited attacks achieved by small surviving groups of Falintil that had regrouped in the preceding months. The Dili attack proved the survival of the Resistance, and its continued armed opposition to Indonesian military rule. The attack went as far as Lahane and Becora, on the outskirts of Dili. One member of the attacking force told the Commission that the objective of the attack was "to show the world that Fretilin still exists." [480]

363. A US embassy communiqué noted the severe response the attack would probably generate:

> This rebel strike on the outskirts of the provincial capital has caused distress and embarrassment to security officials, and they can be expected to take steps to avoid a repeat of the attack.[481]

364. The Indonesian military was both shocked and humiliated at the boldness of this attack from a resistance it considered defeated. Hundreds were detained in a military sweep of the capital. The Commission received evidence that over 100 of these were killed, and that torture and other cruel treatment of those detained was common (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Displacement). Many of those detained were exiled to Ataúro.[482]

"Fence of legs": Operasi Kikis

365. Almost a year later, in mid-1981, ABRI mounted a massive operation combining military personnel with tens of thousands of civilians who formed a human "fence of legs". This "fence" marched across large areas of the territory to search for and capture remaining Falintil troops, with a primary goal being to capture or eliminate Xanana

Gusmão. This tactic, known as Operasi Kikis,* had been successfully used against uprisings in Indonesia, where the local population supported the military's intention to destroy rebellions. It had also been used a number of times in Timor-Leste in previous years.[483] However in Timor-Leste, unlike in Indonesia, the military lacked the crucial element of popular support. Although the fence caught many Timorese, both civilians and combatants, it did not succeed in substantially damaging Falintil.

366. Before the operation was launched the ICRC ceased operations on the mainland of Timor-Leste, and the CRS left in November 1980 after completing its emergency programme. The Indonesian military was free to implement the kikis virtually free of international scrutiny.

Mass mobilisation of civilians

367. The 1981 operation, the largest kikis ever conducted in Timor-Leste, was code-named Operasi Keamanan (Operation Security).[484] The Indonesian military deployed at least 15 territorial battalions, around 12,000 soldiers, from outside Timor-Leste and an unknown number of additional troops in a combat role.[485] East Timorese have claimed many more than 15 battalions were involved.[486] The major operations appear to have occurred in Sector D,† the area of Baucau, Lautém and Viqueque.[487] Civilians were forcibly recruited as operational support personnel (TBO). Officially ABRI recruited civilian males aged between 12 and 35, however in reality boys much younger and men much older were involved, as well as women.[488] Groups of these people were attached to a particular military unit for the operation. The total number of civilians involved was enormous. A 1982 military document states that the operation included "60,000 civilians in addition to the Wanra and Ratih".‡[489] Marine sources indicate even more were involved, mentioning eight battalions and 120,000 guided militia (milisi binaan) moving east to west, and seven battalions with 25,000 guided militia moving west to east, aiming to "overwhelm the enemy at Aitana".[490]

368. The human fence started walking in mid-1981 from Tutuala at the most eastern point of Timor-Leste. From there, military units and civilian TBOs marched westward to a line linking Com-Raca-Lospalos-Illiomar. They formed a human fence along a north-south axis, and swept the ground for Falintil. It appears the fence functioned in two ways, both as a front line advancing ahead of ABRI troops and sweeping for Falintil, as well as serving as a blocking wall into which ABRI units attempted to drive Falintil. Either way, it failed to capture sufficient Falintil groups to end the resistance, and many participants did not encounter Falintil at all. However, the Commission received

* Kikis means scraped or eroded. Budiardjo and Liem translate kikis as "chipping-away" [The War Against East Timor, p. 223].

† Although the focus of the operation was in the east, in the west, the Indonesian military recruited TBO to participate in a smaller kikis campaign in the region between Cassa and Ainaro. There is no record of any captures of Fretilin in that sector.

‡ Wanra (People's Resistance) and Ratih (Trained People) were two of the four main types of military auxiliaries used by ABRI. The other two were Hansip (Civil Defence) and Kamra (People's Security). See Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation.

testimony of captives being summarily executed. One TBO told the Commission that five people caught by the military unit he was attached to, near Cacavem in Illiomar, were executed immediately.[491]

369. In July 1981 another fence began marching from the Venilale-Ossu-Viqueque corridor toward the northeast.[492] These two fences converged on the Matebian mountain range with the aim of encircling Falintil and driving them to lower terrain. To this point in time the operation had not succeeded in making any significant captures. Following the encirclement of Mount Matebian, the final stage of the kikis began. Troops and TBOs again fanned out from the central range down to the south coast and continued the westward advance. This fence approached the area of Lacluta, Viqueque, while from the east another line advanced to meet them.

The Lacluta massacre

370. When the advance reached the area of Lacluta in September a massacre occurred that by most accounts killed hundreds of people. A definitive account does not exist. Monsignor Costa Lopes claimed 500 killed.[493] Indonesian authorities admitted 70.[494] Others place the toll somewhere in between.[495] The Commission received evidence of a large massacre of civilians, including women and children at this time.[*] It has also heard of a second massacre of at least 20 people.[†] Indonesia claimed a military victory in the area during this time, citing the capture of 450 Fretilin and 150 weapons, but not stating casualties.[496] Most other sources say this was a brutal massacre of civilians.[496] The massacre is believed to have occurred near the Rock of St Anthony on the slopes of Mt Aitana. A Falintil fighter recalled Indonesian military killings of civilians in the area:

> I witnessed with my own eyes how the Indonesian military, Battalion 744, killed civilians in front of me. They captured those unarmed people, tied them up then stabbed them to death. There was a pregnant woman captured and killed just like that. I saw it from a close distance, just 100 metres from where it happened.[498]

Consequences of the operation

Military outcomes

371. The "fence"' had much greater success in capturing people still hiding in the bush than it did in capturing Falintil fighters, although there are accounts of Falintil units being destroyed.[499] In explaining its failure to capture many Falintil, it seems likely that

* CAVR Interview with José de Jesus dos Santos, Dili, 28 June 2004. He says that contact was between 1 and 10 September 1981.

† CAVR Interviews with Anacleto Ximenes, Cairui, Manatuto, 12 March 2004 and Sebastião da Cunha, Manatuto, 12 May 2004. See also Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances.

in many cases, the "fence" allowed Falintil to pass through the lines. The Commission was told of one escape through the "fence":

> When we passed, many people knew, but they saw us not as humans but as animals passing through their post. I can still clearly remember how I stepped on an enemy (Timorese member of the fence) but they looked at me as if I was a dog then told me to go away.[500]

372. There may also have been collaboration between Falintil and East Timorese TBOs:

> ...when we arrived at [the current location of the] Telkom transmitter, there were a lot of Fretilin [members] there. But because there had already been contact [with TBOs] Fretilin passed through the troops of [ABRI] Platoon Commander Falo Chai.[501]

373. Just as likely was the possibility for Falintil to escape through the lines:

> We split into small groups, 3 to 4 people, then at night we looked for a way to pass through, behind them.[502]

Humanitarian consequences

374. The military operation had very serious humanitarian consequences at a time when the East Timorese population had not yet recovered from the traumatic famine and hardship from Operation Seroja and the conditions of detention camps. Prior to the military commencing this operation, they required the limited international aid presence to leave the territory.[503] In itself this was a bad result for a very fragile and isolated community. Forcing such huge numbers of rural civilians into military operations in the second half of 1981 subjected them to extremely harsh conditions. TBOs, many of them children, were taken into combat areas and as a result often became casualties.[504] Other civilians forced to participate were recruited as Ratih[505] rather than Wanra, which meant that they were not paid, but only received some "reward" for their participation. Nor were they well fed. Many died during the arduous march across rugged terrain.[506]

375. The operation took place over the planting season of 1981, and with large numbers of subsistence farmers forced to participate they were unable to plant their crops. In November 1981 Monsignor Lopes wrote to Australia with news of another impending famine, leading to international concern.[507] In March 1982 former Australian Prime Minister Gough Whitlam visited Timor-Leste, meeting with Monsignor Lopes. Whitlam later publicly disputed Lopes's claims.[508] A visit several months later by a delegation from the World Council of Churches found differently:

> It was clear that a large number of people have been resettled and there are still many malnourished children. Everywhere we went, people > named food and housing as their major problems…our impression is that many people would like to return to their traditional homes and land in the hills.[509]

376. Indonesia claimed to capture 4,500 "Fretilin sympathisers" during the operation, and to have sent 3,000 of these to Ataúro, and another 1,500 were relocated to other areas.[510] However, the Commission received many testimonies to the effect that these were civilians and that very few combatants were captured in the kikis operation, and that most of those exiled to Ataúro were women, children and the elderly. [511]

Rebuilding the Resistance

Overview

377. The Fretilin-led Resistance was almost crushed by the encirclement and annihilation campaigns of 1978-79. Most of the Fretilin and Falintil senior leadership were either killed, captured or surrendered during this period. The survivors, in isolated groups, undertook a desperate attempt to regroup. Three Central Committee members survived and fled to the east, among them Xanana Gusmão. Taking the lead, Xanana Gusmão conducted a National Reorganisation Conference in March 1981 which began a process of widening the Resistance to a broader front for national unity, and changed the tactical direction of armed resistance to guerrilla warfare. A secret meeting with the head of the Catholic Church in Timor-Leste, Monsignor da Costa Lopes, was an important step toward the goal of national unity between the main rivals of 1975, UDT and Fretilin.

378. In the early years of war and occupation, the Church was a unique and vital link to the outside world. In these years it had undergone a transformation from a bastion of the Portuguese colonial system to become a voice for ordinary East Timorese people.

Fretilin survivors of the 1978–1979 offensives

379. The Indonesian military offensives in 1978-79 destroyed Fretilin's strategy of "popular resistance", under which large numbers of the civilian population lived under the protection or control of Fretilin, provided logistical support to Falintil and were mobilised politically to support the Resistance. The Indonesian military's technological and numerical superiority was overwhelming in a conventional position-based war. Moreover, with tens of thousands of civilians in its bases, Fretilin was forced into a strategy of protection rather than attack against Indonesian forces. This period of combined civilian-military resistance ended with the fall of Fretilin's zonas libertadas in 1978.

380. The surviving population surrendered and came down from the mountains, devastated by the bombing and encirclement campaigns and generally in very poor condition.[512] They numbered up to 300,000 people.[513] The Indonesian military screened those surrendering and separated those they believed to be Falintil or Fretilin cadres. Many disappeared or were summarily executed (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). The remaining civilians were held under military control in transit and later longer-term detention camps, as detailed in above (see also Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

381. Fretilin had lost most of its mid-level and senior leaders. Falintil was in disarray, having lost most of its personnel, leadership and weaponry. Surviving personnel were isolated and without means to contact each other. The first phase of the Resistance was over. Organised resistance survived for two reasons. Firstly, the survival of several key Fretilin leaders who were able to rebuild the Resistance. Secondly the survival of the population who, although no longer physically separate from the Indonesian occupation forces, were eventually able to build a new form of clandestine resistance in support of what became a classic guerrilla war fought by Falintil.

Regrouping

382. Shortly before the fall of Matebian, on 22 November 1978, a number of political leaders and military commanders* managed to break through the siege and escape to the east. Leading the group was Xanana Gusmão. At the same time, other Falintil units were sent west to join up with Falintil troops in the Central Eastern (Centro Leste) Sector. Most of these units never made it through the Baucau-Viqueque cordon controlled by the Indonesian military, and only one company arrived in the Central Eastern Sector.[514]

383. The small group that escaped from Matebian regrouped in the Legumau mountain range east of Baguia, which was beyond the reach of the Indonesian military. They tried a new strategy of underground resistance, abandoning their military appearance, dressing as civilians and hiding their weapons.[515] Their goal was to find and contact surviving members of the Central Committee, Falintil members and civilians, and to assess the situation. Xanana Gusmão recalled his actions after escaping Matebian:

> We went straight [to the east]. When we got there, we started building a strategy and each one of us learned what guerrilla [warfare] was about. Because I already had contacts with the underground [from] when [we were in the] bases de apoio, I went straight to Mehara on 7 December… We searched [for resistance members]. From Dili they [clandestine members] told us that there's a small number of [Falintil] troops but they couldn't contact them, many had surrendered. I sent two groups to Centro [central region] to search, [but] they said they didn't find any troops and didn't meet any civilians there.[516]

* This small group included José Alexander Gusmão, Mau Hodu, Taur Matan Ruak and Nino Konis Santana.

384. The three surviving members of the Fretilin Central Committee in the east, Xanana Gusmão, Txay and Mau Hunu, discussed the need to regroup and develop a new resistance strategy in early 1979. A number of search parties set out to the central and western region to attempt to contact other survivors, particularly senior leaders from the Fretilin Central Committee.[517] This was a dangerous and difficult task. A number of the search parties were attacked, and some disappeared completely. The group led by Xanana Gusmão was attacked by the Indonesian military near Remexio in March, but a few members escaped and returned to Mehara in the east. In the same month, three companies of Falintil were eliminated near Lore, in the district of Lautém.[517] Xanana Gusmão described the search:

> We didn't know who [of Fretilin's Central Committee] was still alive. We looked in other places, [but] we couldn't decide, we knew that some were dead…Clandestine members looked for surviving members of the Central Committee in the forests from Centro to Fronteira Central … We decided in 1980 to cross the Baucau-Viqueque road to look, gather information, come to in villages, ask all the way to the border…From Henrique Belmiro and friends, we found out that there were no more [Central Committee members].[519]

385. Despite this, the searches had some success. They found some small pockets of the Resistance and Falintil troops that had survived. There were small groups in Laline and Uaimori, David Alex's group in Matebian, some in Manatuto, as well as others.[520] In another search in May 1980 Xanana Gusmão contacted Resistance members in the central zone, in Same and Ainaro, and found survivors near Dili.[521] In the western zone they found only one group.[522] In addition to locating surviving Resistance members, the guerrillas contacted civilians to establish clandestine groups within Indonesian military-controlled territory.

386. The Commission heard testimony from Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", who in the late 1970s was a Fretilin cadre in the mountains. He told of the relief he felt when Xanana Gusmão arrived in his camp:

> When we heard that our older brother Xanana Gusmão had come we felt our hearts at ease…when he came back we all ran up to him and embraced him…Then we heard that Mau Hunu was still alive, and in Lospalos an ajudante member of the Central Committee. Only these three were alive.
>
> How could we continue this war? Our older brother Xanana was like the architect, or the builder. He said "we can build a boat, and all of us can carry this boat and then row forward. Though it will be difficult, we can do it." We all agreed with our older brother…we believed so strongly in him…[523]

National Re-organisation Conference in March 1981

387. The surviving Resistance lacked leadership, coordination and structure.* Having failed to find other Central Committee members, and with the Indonesian military's capture of Txay, Sera Key and Solan, in 1980 Xanana Gusmão decided to take charge and organise a Fretilin national meeting:

> I decided [this] in September…because I knew that all the Central Committee were dead...none were more senior than me except for Mau Hunu. But I knew him, so I decided to take this into my hands so we could re-organise.[524]

388. Xanana Gusmão aimed to consolidate and restructure the Resistance as a guerrilla war, based on lessons learned from experience, as well as theory:

> Since 1979 we tried to learn guerrilla warfare and how to apply it in Timor. We studied in the forest, [we] studied the war in Vietnam, the war in Cuba, any kind of guerrilla [warfare]. We didn't think they would be suitable because the conditions were different. That is why in 1979 we spent a year studying how guerrilla warfare [should be done]. From here we reorganised, what we could do with small guerrilla [groups], to plan political activities, military activities, and how the two related to each other.[525]

389. Based on the contacts during 1979-80, the Resistance held a "National Re-organisation Conference" in March 1981 at Maubai in Lacluta.[526] The political and military structure and leadership of the Resistance was reorganised, and the Revolutionary Council of National Resistance (CRRN) was formed to take overall charge of the Resistance.[527] The CRRN was to be an umbrella forum for all pro-independence elements, not only Fretilin, and was a significant step away from the hard-line policies of 1977 when Fretilin had been declared a Marxist-Leninist party (Partido Marxista-Leninista Fretilin, PMLF), and toward national unity.[528]

390. Xanana Gusmão was elected to all leadership positions – National Political Commissar of the PMLF, Commander-in-Chief of Falintil, and President of the CRRN.[529] A new Central Committee was formed,† composed of leaders both inside Timor-Leste and overseas.[530] Falintil's structure was redefined and new leaders appointed.[531] A guerrilla warfare strategy was officially decided, by which Falintil's several hundred surviving troops would spread out across the country. [532] Having been defeated as a conventional military force, Falintil would work in small, mobile guerrilla groups, and no longer attempt to concentrate its forces against the Indonesian military. The guerrillas were to be supported by a clandestine structure in urban areas. The idea was that a clandestine structure under the CRRN would operate through district level national Resistance centres (cernak) and small village level cells composed of four to seven people (nurep). To administer the new Resistance the country was divided into three regions – the eastern region, Funu Sei Nafatin ("the struggle continues"); central region, Nakroma ("light"); and the border region, Haksolok ("joy").[533]

* For example, the Falintil attack on the Marabia television transmitter in June 1980, described above, was conducted by a group from the north-central region independently of the surviving eastern-based group.

† Central Committee members appointed inside Timor-Leste were Xanana Gusmão (Comissario Política Nacional), Mau Hunu, Mau Hodu, Bere Malae Laka, Kilik Wae Gae (Reinaldo Correia), Nelo (Dinis Carvalho), Sakinere, Holy Natxa, Lere Anan Timor (Tito da Costa), Harin, Mauk Moruk (Paulino Gama). Members appointed overseas were Abílio Araújo (Secretary General), Mari Alkatiri, Roque Rodrigues, José Luís Guterres, Guilhermina Araújo, José Ramos-Horta and Rogério Lobato.

Growth of the Resistance

391. After the political and military reorganisation the capacity of the Resistance slowly grew. The clandestine structure aimed to support the guerrillas, as well as build linkages with other groups, including those close to the Indonesians. A cell-based clandestine network began to develop, including inside Dili. Seeking to control this clandestine network, the Indonesian military developed extensive intelligence networks of its own to the village level. All villages had a military presence. Some had a Babinsa (village guidance non-commissioned officer), while others had a TPD, a "village guidance team", depending on how restive a village or area was.[534] Indonesian military documents from 1983 indicate extensive surveillance of the population with the goal of "protecting" the people from the influence of GPK (guerrilla) propaganda:

> Appoint reliable people such as katuas (elders) to help neighbourhood chiefs…Each katuas must be able to know exactly the activities of the families under his guidance; for example, when they go to their field, go to collect wood, get permission to go to another village, to tend flocks, go to market, and so on.
>
> Appoint an "informer" in each of these groups of 10-15 families led by one katuas. This informer should be able to follow, secretly, all the activities of these 10-15 families.[535]

392. The Commission heard testimony about the consequences of being suspected of being an active clandestine Resistance member, with arbitrary detention, torture and disappearance a constant threat. In the district of Ainaro the cliffs at Builico were known by the Indonesian military as Jakarta II. When people in Ainaro disappeared after being detained, the military explained to families and communities that they had been taken to Jakarta, when they had in fact been taken to, and thrown from, these cliffs. Unknown numbers were thrown to their deaths between 1981 and 1983.[536]

393. This military presence to the village level, accompanied by stifling surveillance presence, often resulted in tensions which led to violence. The defection to Falintil in 1983 of several hundred East Timorese members of Indonesian military auxiliary units in Viqueque was a striking example.[537] This defection was part of the larger pattern of uprisings by the Resistance that occurred in 1982 to 1983. The effectiveness of linkages between the clandestine network and the guerrillas is indicated by military documents from 1982, which show the military's focus on eliminating clandestine structures.[538] The clearest sign of Fretilin's regeneration and ABRI's failure to destroy Falintil was the ceasefire agreed in May 1983 (see section 1983 Ceasefire and its aftermath, paragraphs 411-413 below).

The Resistance under Xanana Gusmão: towards national unity

394. Since the 1975 invasion, Fretilin had defined itself as the embodiment of the Resistance. This began to change in the years following the 1981 reorganisation. In September 1982 Xanana Gusmão and Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes met secretly in the village of Mehara, in the district of Lautém.[539] At this meeting Monsignor Lopes highlighted the need for national unity between Fretilin and UDT. This meeting and the call for political unity was especially important given that during the internal conflict of 1975 UDT had claimed to be defending the principles of the Catholic Church against a communist threat.[540] For the head of the Catholic Church in Timor-Leste to meet the head of Fretilin and the Resistance was a clear sign that the Church did not see Fretilin as communist, and Monsignor Lopes's call for unity indicated his understanding of the Resistance more as a nationalist struggle than one dedicated to the ideological left.

395. In 1983 the Fretilin Central Committee declared national unity as its official political line.[541] This was a clear reference to the UDT-Fretilin enmity. In order to promote the possibility of multi-party cooperation Fretilin changed several of its earlier radical policies. For example, in 1983 Fretilin participated in a ceasefire and negotiations with the Indonesian military. This had previously been inadmissible under its avowed policy of "negotiations – no and never".[542] In 1984 it denounced the Marxist-Leninist ideology that had been declared in 1977 and incorporated into the party's name in 1981. By this action Fretilin drew back from the social-revolutionary basis of its earlier stance in favour of a more inclusive nationalist platform.

396. This process of change undertaken by Fretilin was not unopposed. Party hardliners such as Kilik Wae Gae (Falintil chief of staff) and Mauk Moruk (commander of the Red Brigade) perceived this political shift towards a more moderate stance as an unacceptable compromise.[543] An attempted coup by this faction failed, and in time opposition to the new policies faded.[543] The new direction under the umbrella of the CRRN enlarged the political platform of the Resistance and eventually led to a broader-based opposition to Indonesian occupation.

The Catholic Church

397. The Catholic Church, under the courageous leadership of Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes, had played a critical role inside Timor-Leste during the early years of the occupation. Previously an adjunct of the ultra-conservative Portuguese colonial administration, the Church's composition changed during the Indonesian era. Due to the departure of many Portuguese clergy and nuns following the Indonesian invasion and occupation it became more "Timorese". In addition to East Timorese clergy there were also Indonesian and international priests and nuns. The three groups played different roles. Many Indonesian clergy tended to support the Indonesian government, while international clergy, subject to visa approval by the Indonesian government, took a more openly apolitical position.[545] Most significantly, many of the East Timorese clergy were mobilised as a result of the enormous suffering they witnessed in these early years.[*]

398. Members of the Church in Timor-Leste were often at odds with the Vatican, which did not encourage clergy to become involved in issues such as human rights or the politics of resistance. Nonetheless because the formal policy of the Vatican did not recognise Indonesian sovereignty over Timor-Leste, the Catholic Church within the territory remained directly ruled by the Vatican rather than being subsumed within the Indonesian Church. The international Catholic network provided a unique link between Timor and the outside world in the years when the territory was virtually closed. Nuns and priests wrote letters abroad at a time when almost no international media observed events inside the territory and when, apart from the occasional presence of the ICRC, there was no other international organisation allowed in the territory. José Ramos-Horta told the Commission that between 1975 and 1979 Church sources played a unique and critical role in getting information about conditions in Timor-Leste to the outside world.[546]

399. In 1983, the Church made a decision that proved vital for the cultural survival of the Timorese people. The Church in Timor-Leste decided that the official language of the liturgy would be Tetum. As a result the Dili Diocese requested the Vatican's permission to use Tetum as the language of the Mass. The Vatican agreed, and this was implemented during Bishop Belo's administration.[547] This increased the East Timorese identity of the Catholic Church and added to the sense of sanctuary it offered to ordinary people in very difficult times.

400. This sense of sanctuary offered by the Church was a major factor in large numbers of people formally converting to Catholicism during the occupation. In 1973 approximately 28% of the population described themselves as Catholic.[548] By 1980, the Indonesian statistics office listed as many as 80% of the population as Catholic.[549] The Indonesian state ideology requiring citizens to subscribe to one of five official religions may have also been an influence on this widespread adherence to Catholicism.

401. The outspokenness of Monsignor da Costa Lopes led to his forced resignation in 1983. A year later he addressed the US Bishop's Committee for Social Development and World Peace, drawing attention to the Church's pivotal role as protector of the East Timorese people:

* Some East Timorese clergy supported and were used by the Indonesian regime, being assigned to positions of responsibility in the provincial government. See Smythe, The Heaviest Blow, p. 37.

> In the face of the cultural and psychological genocide that the Indonesian army has imposed on us the Catholic Church has emerged as the only organisation that the East Timorese people trust… Everything the people know they tell to the priests. The East Timorese church has listened intently for nearly nine years since the Indonesian invasion. With the highest authority the East Timorese church can say that it knows the plight as well as the deepest aspirations of the people.[550]

1983 Ceasefire and its aftermath

Introduction

402. In 1982, Indonesia implemented its national elections in Timor-Leste for the first time. With Operasi Keamanan completed, once again the Indonesian military judged the territory to be pacified. In Timor-Leste a huge majority, 99% of the electorate, were reported to have voted for Golkar, President Soeharto's political vehicle. The elections were followed by a shake-up of civilian and military personnel in the Indonesian administration. Former senior UDT member Mario Carrascalão was appointed Governor, and Colonel Purwanto took over as head of the military in the territory. Faced with a growing clandestine movement supporting a regrouped Falintil, the Indonesian military sought a different route to overcome the Resistance, negotiations. Falintil Commander Xanana Gusmão held talks with Colonel Purwanto, and for a short time a tentative ceasefire was in place.

403. However, when Soeharto was sworn in as President he quickly appointed General Benny Moerdani as commander-in-chief of the Indonesian military. General Moerdani was one of the architects of the Indonesian military takeover of Timor-Leste, and had less time for a peaceful solution to problems in the territory. Very soon after Moerdani's appointment, Monsignor Lopes was pressured to stand down from his position as head of the Catholic Church, and he left the territory. The ceasefire broke in the eastern town of Kraras in August 1983, after a unit of East Timorese Hansip (civilian auxiliary) members, together with Falintil fighters, killed 12 Indonesian soldiers. The Indonesian military responded with a series of massacres of local civilians and a crackdown in the eastern region with new operations.

Indonesian national elections in Timor-Leste: 1982

404. With the completion of Operasi Keamanan, the Indonesian military seem once again to have concluded that they had pacified the territory. When Indonesian national elections were held in 1982, they were conducted for the first time in Timor-Leste. The military was responsible for providing security for these elections across the archipelago, and this demand on troop numbers, combined with increased Indonesian military confidence, may have contributed to a sharp reduction in troop numbers in the territory at this time. The Indonesian press reported that the election proceeded in Timor-Leste without incident; however East Timorese informants noted that there had been a wave of arrests prior to the vote:[553]

> In Viqueque the military were constantly on patrol during the pre-election and election period. Every evening [the military was] going in and out of houses checking to see if anyone was coming or going. Also on the 4 May, the day before the elections, there were Fretilin attacks in some villages. All the election centres around Viqueque were moved into the town of Viqueque itself.[554]

405. Election results in Timor-Leste returned over 99% of the vote for Golkar, President Soeharto's ruling party. This, coupled with a very quick vote count, strongly suggests a manipulated result. A possible motive for vote manipulation was indicated the following year, when Governor Mario Carrascalão claimed that:

> [T]he people had been told that by voting for Golkar they would be indicating their views about integration with Indonesia.[555]

406. In the event, Indonesia used the vote as evidence of support for Indonesia. Xanana Gusmão did not restrain his sarcasm in his 1982 message to the UN:

> ...Suharto's party won the elections again. In Timor-Leste under the threat of weapons, all the population voted in favour of Golkar. East Timor and Irian Jaya, by a curious paradox, were the "most dear provinces" of Suharto and the best supporters of Golkar![556]

Shake-up of Indonesian civilian and military personnel, and Resistance actions

407. Following the elections there was a shake-up of key Indonesian civilian and military personnel in Timor-Leste. In September 1982 Mário Viegas Carrascalão, a former senior member of UDT who had worked for the Indonesian Ministry of Foreign Affairs in New York from 1977 until 1981, was installed as Governor. At about the same time Korem 164 Commander Colonel Adolf Sahala Radjagukguk was replaced by Colonel Purwanto.*

408. During this period the Resistance made two key moves. Firstly, in August 1982, Falintil troops carried out a major attack on an Indonesian military post in Mau Chiga, Ainaro, often referred to as the 1982 levantamento. The Commission heard testimony of the consequences of this for the civilian population of the village. Many were rounded up and exiled to Ataúro,[557] while many women were subjected to repeated and on-going sexual violation (see Vol. III, Part 7.7: Rape, Sexual Slavery and Other Forms of Sexual Violence). Secondly, in September 1982, there was the secret meeting between Xanana Gusmão and Monsignor Lopes, as described above. This was a signal to the military that Fretilin's support was indeed widespread, and which thus threatened its depiction of Fretilin as an isolated communist guerrilla force.

* The Commission cannot give exact dates of Purwanto's appointment. Radjagukguk was Commander as of 8 July 1982, and Purwanto was already Korem 164 Commander by late 1982.

New approach by the Indonesian military: negotiations

409. In 1983 the Indonesian military attempted a new tactic of negotiation with the Resistance. ABRI had resolved secessionist rebellions during the 1950s by this means, and a key player in negotiations in that period was then commander-in-chief of ABRI, General M. Yusuf, who was involved in negotiations in Sulawesi to resolve the Permesta revolt in the late 1950s.[558] It is likely that Yusuf condoned the initiative, which may have come from new East Timor Military Commander Colonel Purwanto who had the authority to initiate the local level contacts that led to a formal ceasefire. In late 1982 and early 1983 the Indonesian military began making local level agreements. Initial contacts for local ceasefires in Lautém were made at Pupuru and Pasikenu, outside Lospalos, and by February 1983 were occurring weekly.[559] Among the Fretilin leaders involved in these early contacts and tour of Jakarta, intended to convince them of the merits of Indonesia, were Falo Chai[560] (Fernando Teles) and José da Conceição, who was a key mediator in this process.[561] The Indonesian military pursued similar contacts with Fretilin/Falintil in the Venilale-Ossu corridor, in which David Alex (Daitula) was a key Falintil commander involved.[562] A former Hansip member recalls:

> My brother in-law and I went to Venilale, met with Major Iswanto, [and] conducted a peaceful contact. He wanted to meet people from the forest, to know their politics. Did they want independence or integration? I was assigned to find people in the forest and make peaceful contact. I succeeded. First I found them in Ossulari. There [I] met with platoon commander Makikit. I asked him: "Do you want independence or integration?" I asked him that. He answered: "[The people of] Timor-Leste [want] independence more than integration".[563]

410. The local meetings between Indonesian officers and Falintil paved the way for higher-level contacts. On 20 March, two Indonesian majors and several lower ranking military officers met with Xanana Gusmão in Liaruka, in the village of Buburaka, in the sub-district of Ossu (Viqueque). At this meeting Fretilin made four demands: (1) the unconditional withdrawal of Indonesian troops from Timor-Leste; (2) a United Nations peacekeeping mission; (3) a free and fair referendum; and (4) the continued presence of Fretilin/Falintil for security during this process.[564] Colonel Purwanto then flew to Bali for Kodam-level discussions. Three days later, on 23 March, Colonel Purwanto himself met with Xanana Gusmão near Larigutu, in the sub-district of Venilale (Baucau).* Governor Mario Carrascalão was also present. This apparently resulted in the signing of a ceasefire agreement between the Indonesian military and Fretilin/Falintil.[565] Others followed, and the ceasefire spread across the territory.

Ceasefire

411. The Indonesian military refused to concede it was holding "negotiations," instead calling them "talks". It did not want international publicity on the issue. However the status of the conflict during this period was in effect a ceasefire.[566] As late as July 1983 the ceasefire was still in place.[567] The cessation of hostilities allowed Resistance leaders to freely visit villages, towns, and even some of the urban centres. There were a number of local meetings between ABRI and Fretilin/Falintil including those in Lore, Beaco, Uaitame, Macadiqui, Ossu, Laissorolai, and Hato Builico. At these meetings recreational games such as volleyball were played, and supplies were even provided to Fretilin/Falintil.[568]

412. For the general population the respite was significant. According to Monsignor Lopes:

> ...in June, as part of the ceasefire agreement, Indonesian helicopters were taking food and medicines to guerrillas in the mountains and bringing their sick and wounded in to Dili hospital…The people were very happy with the respite from the war and for the first time in years were able to plant decent crops.[569]

413. Fretilin and Falintil used the ceasefire to their advantage, both for internal consolidation as well as building linkages with East Timorese working with the Indonesian regime.[570] Falintil entered the ceasefire from a perspective of distrust. Its experience was of the fraudulent "amnesties" in the late 1970s, after which many surrendered Fretilin leaders disappeared. The CRRN document released in July 1983 made clear this perspective of distrust. It detailed murders and atrocities, cited names and provided case studies of killings, and gave an account of military promotions for those responsible for atrocities.[571]

Appointment of Benny Moerdani as ABRI commander-in-chief: 1983

414. During March 1983 Indonesia's MPR (People's Consultative Assembly) appointed Soeharto to serve a fourth term as President. This led to a key change within the Indonesian military that affected the fragile ceasefire in Timor-Leste. On 28 March President Soeharto installed General Benny Moerdani as commander-in-chief (Panglima) of ABRI.* Moerdani, one of the key architects of the invasion of Timor-Leste, brought a far less conciliatory influence to the course of events.

* This meeting was also attended by Aleixo Ximenes, Verissimo Quintão, José da Conceição and Okan.

Monsignor Lopes removed

415. One of Moerdani's first actions as Commander-in-Chief was to pressure the Papal Envoy to Indonesia, Monsignor Pablo Puente, to remove Monsignor Lopes as head of the Catholic Church in Timor-Leste. Moerdani, himself a Catholic, saw Monsignor Lopes's September 1982 meeting with Xanana Gusmão as traitorous. Weeks later Lopes offered his resignation, though he subsequently stated that he had been forced to resign.[572] His replacement, the relatively young Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, was appointed directly by the Vatican rather than chosen by East Timorese clergy through election.[573]

416. On 13 May, in one of his last public appearances before leaving Timor-Leste forever, on the Catholic holy day of the Feast of Our Lady of Fatima, Monsignor Lopes condemned the abuses perpetrated by the occupying forces. This was the first time he had done so publicly.[574] He left secretly carrying detailed evidence that a general ceasefire had been agreed, in the event that Indonesia did not publicise it.

Ceasefire undermined

417. From the outset, the new Commander-in-Chief, General Benny Moerdani, was unconvinced of the merits of a ceasefire. On April 12 General Moerdani visited Baucau to meet with his staff responsible for Timor-Leste. The next day he summoned Governor Mario Carrascalão to Baucau. In an interview in 2003, Mario Carrascalão recalled this meeting:

> Actually the questions all revolved around guarantees. Moerdani asked:
>
> "If it is resolved peacefully, is it guaranteed that East Timor will remain part of Indonesia? How do the people feel? That's [what] we want to know."
>
> I [Carrascalão] said: "How would I know, sir?"
>
> It went on for about an hour, these questions, then Benny Moerdani cut short the meeting…Benny Moerdani gave three months. He said:
>
> "I will give Soetarto [Commander of Kodam Udayana] and Purwanto [time], assisted by the Governor, to help East Timor peacefully." [575]

418. Governor Mario Carrascalão played a prominent role in pushing forward the talks held during the ceasefire. In late May Xanana Gusmão sent a message asking to meet with him, which led to a private meeting at Ariana, a few kilometres from Venilale (Baucau). However Carrascalão's room for manoeuvre was limited. Jakarta released news of the ceasefire on 10 June, but did not publicise the details such as Falintil's demand for a referendum, as had been agreed. Shortly after, Moerdani sent a letter to Xanana Gusmão:

* Also in March, Commander of Kodam XVI/Udayana Brigadier General Dading Kalbuadi was replaced by Brigadier General Damianus Soetarto.

> Do not think you can receive assistance from other countries. There is no country on this globe that can help you. Our own army is prepared to destroy you if you are not willing to be co-operative with our republic. We are preparing an operation – Operasi Persatuan – which will come into force in August.[576]

419. Moerdani's three-month ceasefire deadline was to expire in July. He planned the new operation for August to allow an Australian parliamentary delegation to visit at the end of July. Moerdani's insistence on a new offensive disregarded Indonesian Foreign Ministry concerns that renewed operations would have a negative influence on the discussion of Timor-Leste scheduled at the United Nations General Assembly in September.[*] [577]

420. It is possible that the ceasefire was undermined from within the Indonesian military, with the intention of continuing the war. The military had in the past stated that it considered operations in Timor-Leste a valuable training tool for its troops.[578] One figure possibly concerned in such undermining was Captain Prabowo Subianto, who at the time was the deputy commander of Detachment 81, Kopassandha.[579] A week after Moerdani approved the ceasefire in April, Colonel Purwanto asked to meet with Governor Mario Carrascalão on the beach in Dili. According to Carrascalão, Purwanto told him:

> What I've been worried about is happening. He came back to Timor-Leste, Prabowo. Under these conditions, no one, civil or military, can enter or leave Timor-Leste without my knowledge. It turns out he came and he went into the interior – to Viqueque, around Bibileo. I don't know what he's doing, I just don't know anymore.[580]

421. The Commission received evidence that Prabowo was stationed in the eastern sector of Timor-Leste at this time. Several sources have told the Commission that he was involved in the operation to bring the civilian population down from Mount Bibileo, shortly after which several hundred were killed by ABRI. The Commission also received evidence of Kopassus being involved in these killings. (See Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

422. Both the Indonesian military and Falintil used the ceasefire for their own military advantage, as reported by US Embassy visitors to Dili in May 1983:

> Fretilin has the opportunity to organise its forces and develop its leadership. At the same time Indonesian security units know how many

* In 1983 for the first time since 1975 discussion at the UN General Assembly was postponed. It was delayed until the 39th General Assembly the following year.

> Fretilin there are, where they are and who they are, since names have been listed and photographs taken. The gathering of Fretilin also makes it possible for Indonesian forces to strike, if the talks fail...[581]

423. On 28 July an Australian parliamentary delegation arrived in Dili. It spent four days in Timor-Leste, out of a total of 10 in Indonesia. It did not seek to meet with Fretilin. However near Baucau the delegation was stopped by four Falintil members. A short discussion ensued and the Falintil members gave the Parliamentarians a letter.[582] This letter noted that:

> Even now during the [peace] talks…they [ABRI] continued [sic] to kill the FRETILIN [sic] guerrillas who wanted to come close to the camps so as to be able to get in touch with their people.

424. Commission data supports this allegation. During the period of the ceasefire the Indonesian military perpetrated a range of violations, including torture and killings, and arbitrary arrests of suspected clandestine members.[583]

The end of the ceasefire

425. After efforts to undermine the ceasefire had emerged from within the Indonesian military itself, on 8 August, East Timorese in Kraras (Lacluta, Viqueque) attacked and killed a group of ABRI combat engineers. They then fled into the forest. Indonesia explained this as an unprovoked attack on "unarmed soldiers".[584] Falintil members describe it as a levantamento, a combined Hansip-Falintil attack on the Indonesian military intended to dispel Indonesia's claim that it had defeated Falintil.[585] East Timorese people explain that Indonesian soldiers had killed a number of civilians in the area during the ceasefire.[586] Members of the engineering battalion then molested an East Timorese woman. This prompted a combined Falintil-Hansip attack that killed at least 12 soldiers.[587]

426. The Indonesian military's response was overwhelming violence against the civilian population. The Hansip involved in killing Indonesian soldiers had defected to Falintil.* Civilians from the village had fled – some, mostly able-bodied men, to the forest and others to Viqueque. Troops of Battalion 501 hunted them down. The men were gathered and shot in the area of Tahuben. A smaller group, mostly old men, women and children were arrested in Viqueque and were shot in a location near Buicaren. Reports of the death toll at the time exceeded 200.[588] The Indonesian military privately conceded 80.[589] In 1985, Bishop Belo later listed the names of 84 of the dead.[590] Survivors were forcibly resettled in Lalerek Mutin, where it is thought a greater total died of starvation and disease.[591] To this day, Kraras is known as the "village of widows".[592]

* An additional influence on the defecting Hansip may have been the military's policy at the time to downgrade Hansip/Wanra to Ratih. Ratih had both lower status and were not paid. See Korem 164 Insop/03/II/1982 tentang Perlawanan Rakyat Terlatih pp, 16-18.

427. The ceasefire was over. His "peaceful solution" having failed, Colonel Purwanto was replaced by Colonel Rudito.[593] On 17 August, Indonesia's Independence Day, General Moerdani announced his new plans for crushing the resistance:

> This time we're going to hit them without mercy.[594]

428. Operation Unity (Persatuan) began in September 1983.* It focused on the east where Falintil remained strong, and featured Kopassandha as front line troops for the first time, amply supported by air power.[595] One reason for this may have been the mass defections of Hansip to Falintil after Kraras.[596] The Indonesian military would have both lacked sufficient manpower and seriously mistrusted its East Timorese soldiers. The operation provoked large displacements of people to towns.

429. ICRC operations ceased on the mainland, restricted to the island of Ataúro. Military hardliners were once again in the ascendancy.[597] The Catholic Church was the only independent institution remaining in Timor-Leste. But the Church in Timor-Leste was very isolated from the Church in Indonesia and the Vatican, who were generally silent on the human rights situation in the territory. In 1983, for the first time the Indonesian Bishop's Conference expressed support for the suffering East Timorese and called for understanding and honesty from decision-makers.[598] Although this might have been a significant start, the Bishops' Conference subsequently distanced itself from this position of support.

Consolidation and the beginnings of change: 1984–1991

Overview

430. Throughout most of the 1980s Timor-Leste remained closed to the world. Falintil continued a guerrilla armed resistance and ABRI/TNI presence in the territory remained high. However, major military operations lessened in the latter half of the decade, and the Indonesian Government attempted to "normalise" the territory by implementing a number of key national policies and programmes, including transmigration policies and education policies.

431. The Resistance process of restructuring which had commenced in 1981 continued throughout the decade. In 1983 national unity was declared Resistance policy, and in 1988 the National Council of Maubere Resistance (Conselho Nacional da Resistência Maubere, CNRM) became the supreme body of the Resistance, with the aim of building a nationalist base. Falintil was separated from Fretilin, and its commander-in-chief Xanana Gusmão resigned from the party, in further efforts to signal this inclusive approach.

432. Dom Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo replaced Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes as Apostolic Administrator of the Diocese of Dili, and in 1988 was ordained as Bishop.

* Also known as Operasi Sapu Bersih – Operation Clean Sweep.

Throughout the decade, he became more outspoken in defence of the people of Timor-Leste, and his letter in early 1989 to the UN Secretary-General calling for the UN to fulfil decolonisation in Timor-Leste had a significant international impact.

433. The youth movement of the Resistance began to develop from the mid-1980s, particularly in a number of schools in Dili. As East Timorese went to study in Indonesia this widened to university student organisations toward the end of the decade. Youth activism was prominent during the visit of Pope John Paul II in late 1989. Both the Indonesian government and the Resistance sought to gain political mileage from the Pontiff's presence in Timor-Leste, an event of immense spiritual importance to the largely Catholic community. Students from the growing clandestine movement grasped the opportunity to make their desire for self-determination known to the Pope and the international media contingent travelling with him, in the first major public demonstration since the Indonesian invasion in 1975. This commenced what became a cycle of demonstrations and crackdowns in the 1990s.

434. The UN was largely ineffective during this period in terms of seeking a lasting political solution to the question of Timor-Leste. East Timorese in the diaspora and international civil society turned to the Decolonisation Committee and the Human Rights Commission as ways to keep the issue alive on the UN agenda. When on 9 November 1989 the Berlin Wall fell, signalling the end of the Cold War context that had prevailed throughout the invasion and occupation of Timor-Leste, it brought new hope for a peaceful and principled settlement of the conflict.

Development of the Resistance

435. By the early 1980s the majority of the civilian population was urbanised, living in towns and villages rather than with Falintil in the mountains. Towards the mid-1980s the period of mass detention passed. Indonesia embarked on a degree of normalisation in Timor-Leste. State institutions such as the provincial government, the regional parliament, and departments of public service had been established and were staffed and functioning. This provided Indonesia with the capacity to implement its national development programmes in Timor-Leste, and there is merit to the claim that Indonesia implemented programmes that led to development in the territory in this period. However, a close assessment of these programmes indicates that there was an emphasis on the infrastructure of occupation, particularly road construction and administration buildings. Another area of key government expenditure was in school construction (see Vol. III, Part 7.9: Economic and Social Rights and Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation). Indonesia had high hopes of winning the hearts and minds of younger East Timorese people.

436. The changes in 1981 and 1983 to the Resistance vision and structure took time to mature. Xanana Gusmão in the meantime sought to make practical steps for the long-term future of the Resistance. On 7 September 1985, Catholic youth wrote secretly to Xanana Gusmão, seeking clarification of the position of the Resistance on the future of the struggle and the many challenges it faced. Xanana Gusmão wrote a detailed response in a message dated 20 May 1986 to the Catholic Youth in Timor-Leste and Students in Indonesia.[599] He called on the youth to remain steadfast in their East Timorese identity and to struggle for their rights. This message showed the importance he placed on the young generation in his repositioning of the Resistance.

437. In December 1988 Xanana Gusmão made fundamental changes to the Resistance, in what was known as the Structural Readjustment of the Resistance, or RER. These changes aimed to further efforts at building the widest possible national basis for the Resistance. The CRRN was dissolved, and replaced by the National Council for Maubere Resistance (Concelho Nacional da Resistência Maubere, CNRM), which was aimed at being an umbrella organisation to accommodate all political parties supporting independence. Falintil was declared a neutral and nationalist army, no longer part of Fretilin. Xanana Gusmão himself resigned from Fretilin, to become the President of the CNRM, while he remained commander-in-chief of Falintil.[600] The formation of the CNRM was a major step toward consolidating and giving practical political mechanisms to the idea of national unity. During the 1980s clandestine groups began to proliferate, particularly in urban areas. The number of these increased in the late 1980s, but due to the dangers of clandestine activity most groups were small and isolated, with few broad-based linkages. Recognising this, the CNRM established the Comité Executivo da CNRM da Frente Clandestina (Executive Committee of the CNRM for the Clandestine Front, better known as Comité Executivo, CE) in 1990.[601] The CE's task was to coordinate, direct, and observe underground activities. It built relations with underground groups throughout Timor-Leste and abroad, including Indonesia.[602]

438. These changes to the Resistance movement also strengthened the external diplomatic front, the international diaspora of East Timorese and international civil society. In 1983, following a ban by the Australian government since the time of the Indonesian invasion, a delegation of Fretilin leaders made a successful visit to Australia and addressed a gathering of 1,500 people from all walks of life in Melbourne. This greatly encouraged East Timorese in exile in Australia, who until this time had struggled to make an impact with the Australian public without the direct support of key leaders.[603] By the 1980s, East Timorese who had escaped Timor-Leste in the 1970s were more settled and able to manage conditions in new lands such as Portugal and Australia, and became more effective in the struggle for international recognition (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination).

439. José Ramos-Horta continued to travel frequently and widely, stimulating support in each country he visited. He worked hard to mobilise international civil society support as well as through formal diplomatic channels. For example, his visit to Japan in March 1985 was at the invitation of Japanese citizen's groups and he was able to introduce the issue of Timor-Leste directly to the Japanese public.[604] Supported and sometimes mentored by civil society groups, other East Timorese also increased wider international lobbying during the 1980s.[*]

* Some examples are visits to Nuclear Free and Independent Pacific Conference in Vanuatu in 1983 by Abilío Araújo and Roque Rodrigues, and to the World Conference of Women in Nairobi by Emilia Pires and Ines de Almeida in 1985.

Repression and imprisonment

440. The Indonesian response to the growing strength of the clandestine resistance during the 1980s was to increase focus on the Resistance and on finding ways to dismantle it. One way it did this was by taking East Timorese political prisoners out of the territory. In 1983, 69 prisoners suspected of involvement in the Kraras uprising were taken from the Balide Prison to Kupang in West Timor, Indonesia. Only 14 of them returned to Timor-Leste.[605] Prisoners, usually suspected members of the clandestine resistance, were often handed from one arm of the security apparatus to another, with torture and mistreatment standard practice. In this period prisoners were sometimes taken to places such as Bali for interrogation.[606] As a concession to normalising administrative procedures during the 1980s, political prisoners were sometimes taken to court for trial. However, such trials were generally a mere shadow of justice and gave scant regard to the rights of the accused.

441. The high security Cipinang Prison in Jakarta was used to hold East Timorese prisoners in this period. The Commission received testimony from Indonesian human rights activist Ade Rostina Sitompul, who became a regular visitor to East Timorese in Cipinang prison from 1987. She told the Commission that in 1987, there were 47 East Timorese political prisoners in Cipinang, and that security conditions were far stricter for them than for other prisoners.[607] The isolation from families was a particular hardship for East Timorese prisoners taken away to prisons in Java and other parts of Indonesia (see Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials).

The rise of the clandestine youth movement

442. In the mid-1980s a number of student clandestine cells were established in middle schools in Dili. Around 1986 OJECTIL (Organização de Juventude Católica de Timor-Leste, Timor-Leste Catholic Youth Organisation)* was formed by student activists based in the Externato de São José,[608] and went on to become a national-based organisation. These students had often been children in the forest during the invasion and full-scale war period. Many had family connections to the Resistance in the interior.[609] They were forming what was to be the foundation of a new generation of resistance that would continue throughout the 1990s.

443. In 1986 the first university in Timor-Leste was opened in Dili, named Universitas Timor Timur, Untim. Previously, in 1985, Governor Mario Carrascalão had implemented an education policy to allow East Timorese students to study in the universities of Indonesia. This was an important development for the educational opportunities of East Timorese young people, and one which had a profound impact on relations between East Timorese nationalists and human rights activists and their Indonesian counterparts (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination, section on Civil Society).

* After 1991 OJECTIL changed its name to OJETIL (Organização de Juventude de Timor Leste), removing the word Católica to emphasise its nationalist nature.

444. The clandestine student group Renetil (Resistência Nacional dos Estudantes de Timor-Leste, Timor-Leste Students' National Resistance) was established in 1988 in Bali, and operated in Bali and Java.[610] In the tightly controlled student politics of the New Order regime, East Timorese students also established a more moderate organisation, Impettu (Ikatan Mahasiswa, Pemuda, dan Pelajar Timor Timur, The East Timorese Students and Youth Association), to operate as the acceptable face of East Timorese students in Indonesia. These became important vehicles for student activism throughout the 1990s.[611]

The Catholic Church

445. In 1983, Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo became the Apostolic Administrator of the Dili diocese, replacing Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes as head of the Church in Timor-Leste. Despite pressure from Indonesia, the Vatican continued its refusal to recognise Timor-Leste as part of Indonesia. On 19 June 1988 Belo was ordained as the titular bishop of Lorium, a diocese in Italy no longer functioning.[612]

446. Little was known of Monsignor Belo inside Timor-Leste when he took up the position as head of the Church. He had been out of the territory studying in Portugal from 1968 to 1974, and then again from August 1975 until 1981, when he returned to Fatumaca College in Baucau. Like his predecessor Martinho Lopes, Belo soon proved to be an independent thinker and would not remain silent about the violence he witnessed. Only 40 years old himself at the time of his ordination as Bishop, Belo centred his ministry on the youth of Timor-Leste. In the late 1980s and into the 1990s, this ministry brought him into daily contact with the rising tension between young East Timorese people seeking more freedom and the Indonesian military apparatus which cracked down on any sign of youth resistance. In the years to come Bishop Belo's residence was to become a place of refuge for many young people seeking shelter from the military and its agents.

447. In February 1984, deeply troubled by the impact of the Indonesian military's "Fence of Legs" campaign, he wrote to Lopes, telling of the abject condition of the people encircled in this campaign and others imprisoned, and of the military targeting of Catholic schools for searches and their students for interrogation.[613] In 1985 he spoke out strongly against the Indonesian government's birth control programme, which he saw as being forced on the people of Timor-Leste.[614]

448. In 1988, when security forces had undertaken a repressive crackdown prior to a brief visit to the territory by President Soeharto, Bishop Belo responded by preparing a statement to be read in churches across the territory on 5 December:

> We disagree with this barbaric system and condemn the lying propaganda according to which human rights abuses do not exist in Timor-Leste.[615]

449. This letter was picked up by the international press, and quoted in the New York Times on 22 January 1989.

450. On 6 February 1989 Bishop Belo wrote an even more significant letter, to the Secretary-General of the United Nations Javier Perez de Cuellar. In it he asked the Secretary-General "to initiate a genuine and democratic process of decolonisation in East Timor to be realised through a referendum."[616] He denied Indonesia's claim that the people of Timor-Leste had made a choice for integration, observed that Portugal saw the passing of time as the solution, and noted that "in the meantime we are dying as a people and a nation." This letter was posted from outside Timor-Leste for security reasons. Although it received no response from the United Nations for years, it had a significant impact. For Bishop Belo it brought great pressure from both Indonesian and Vatican authorities.[617]

The situation at the United Nations

451. In 1982 political events in Portugal took an important turn, which in time had an impact on the struggle for self-determination in Timor-Leste. The Socialist Party of Mário Soares was elected to government and effectively ended the period of crippling instability that had plagued Portuguese politics since the Carnation Revolution in 1974. In time, the Soares Government reactivated support for the East Timorese cause of self-determination, and its successor utilised its new position within the European Union to further this cause (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination).

452. In 1982, what had become an annual General Assembly resolution calling for self-determination for Timor-Leste came very close to being defeated; it was carried 50 in favour, 46 against, with 50 abstentions. The motion also called on the Secretary-General to initiate consultations with all concerned parties in order to "achieve a comprehensive settlement of the East Timor issue."[618]

453. This appeared to be a significant diplomatic victory for Indonesia. The Commission heard from former senior United Nations official Francesc Vendrell that this was a period when in the international community:

> No-one believed that the Timorese…could possibly resist and…everyone believed it was just a matter of time before Timor-Leste was acknowledged by everybody to be part of Indonesia.[619]

454. A number of East Timorese exiles testified to the UN during this period. This diplomatic effort was headed by José Ramos-Horta. Ian Martin, Secretary General of Amnesty International from 1986 to 1992, recalled José Ramos-Horta at the United Nations during this period:

> I remember how lonely José Ramos-Horta looked in the Delegates' Lounge of the United Nations in New York, at a time when almost all diplomats believed that it was just a matter of time before Indonesia's incorporation of East Timor was accepted by the international community as a whole.[620]

455. In 1983 the debate on Timor-Leste was deferred in order to give the Secretary-General time to show progress in his consultations for a comprehensive solution. In reality Portugal was afraid to bring it before the General Assembly after the near defeat of 1982. The Secretary-General at the time, Javier Perez de Cuellar, interpreted the parties involved in the dispute narrowly to mean only Portugal and Indonesia. East Timorese leadership was not consulted. The first of the so-called tripartite talks between Portugal, Indonesia and a UN representative was held in 1983. They made little progress during these talks, with neither side willing to compromise.

456. Although the issue of Timor-Leste passed from the agenda of the General Assembly after 1983, during the 1980s there were two main mechanisms for international consideration of the issue, the Human Rights Commission and the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonisation. In 1985 it was removed from the agenda of the Human Rights Commission. The Commission heard from Francesc Vendrell of his initiative to open the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation to submissions from non-governmental organisations as well as governments.[621] This enabled 20 to 25 international NGOs to make an annual pilgrimage to New York to petition the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation in support of self-determination for Timor-Leste. Large international NGOs often gave up their speaking time to East Timorese delegates (See Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination, section on Civil Society). This made Timor-Leste perhaps the most debated topic by the Decolonisation Committee. On 14 September 1989 United Nations Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar released a report on the state of progress, and concluded that a proposed visit to Timor-Leste by a Portuguese Parliamentary mission would contribute to the effort to seek an internationally acceptable solution.

The visit of Pope John Paul II

457. Pope John Paul II's visit to Timor-Leste on 12 October 1989 was a moment of great relief and joy for many in the beleaguered territory. It was also an historic moment, in that it was the only visit to Timor-Leste in the entire period of Indonesian occupation by a head of state. The large international media entourage which travelled with the Pope gave opportunities for publicity unprecedented in the 14 years of occupation. Expectations were high. Independence supporters expected the denunciation of Indonesia's occupation. Indonesia expected recognition of integration and incorporation of the Church in Timor-Leste into the Indonesian Bishops' Conference. The Pontiff's sympathy for the pressures faced by East Timorese clergy was demonstrated during a meeting with them attended by Indonesian authorities; the question was raised as to what language should be used for the meeting, and as a way of establishing confidentiality between the Pope and East Timorese priests, Italian was chosen. Most East Timorese clergy had spent time studying in Rome.[622]

458. The Pontiff walked a delicate diplomatic line while in Timor-Leste, providing no clear-cut position on the political status of the territory. He did openly recognise the suffering of the East Timorese people, and brought spiritual and moral comfort to many. In his homily Pope John Paul II reflected:

> What does it mean to be the salt of the earth and the light of the world in East Timor today? For many years now, you have experienced destruction and death as a result of conflict; you have known what it means to be the victims of hatred and struggle. Many innocent people have died, while others have been prey to retaliation and revenge…Respect for the rights which render life more human must be firmly ensured; the rights of individuals and the rights of families.[623]

459. Before the visit Indonesian authorities had detained a number of youth activists in order to prevent any possibility of demonstration during the Pontiff's time in the territory.[624] These efforts proved futile, and the subsequent demonstration was a watershed in the activities of the youth clandestine movement.

460. When Pope John Paul II completed his Mass at Tacitolu west of Dili, at which an estimated 100,000 were in attendance, a small group of young people unfurled banners and chanted slogans calling for independence and human rights. Scuffles broke out with Indonesian security agents and police in what was a highly embarrassing turn of events for Indonesia.

461. This was the first public demonstration at an international visit since the Indonesian invasion. It emboldened young people and led to the growth of new groups and encouraged cooperation between them. Clandestine youth leader Constancio Pinto later wrote:

> The year 1989 signalled the beginning of non-violent actions in cities and villages. Previously, even though people were organized [sic] in small groups, their awareness was limited to their own cells. Sometimes they felt, "Are we the only ones fighting for this? What about the others?" When the protest movements began, people suddenly opened their minds and perception: "We are not the only ones fighting for self-determination! There are others!" So subsequently it became easier for us. When we began to approach them, we could say we did this, so let's do it together.[625]

462. Indonesian authorities detained many people in the days following the demonstration in an attempt to break this new sign of resistance. The Commission heard many testimonies about the interrogations and torture.[626]

463. When US Ambassador John Monjo came to Timor-Leste in January 1991 on a fact-finding mission into the alleged detentions and torture following the demonstration during the Pope's visit, demonstrations took place outside the Turismo Hotel where he was staying. Dozens of young people shouted out slogans against the Indonesian occupation and handed over a written statement asking the UN to conduct a referendum on the political status of Timor-Leste. Then youth leader Gregorio Saldanha told the Commission:

> The US Ambassador demonstration went on for three days. There were only a few people on the first day, it increased on the second day, and on the third day not only young people but also the elderly, including mothers, who prayed with rosaries, were on the street.[627]

464. Further arrests and torture followed these demonstrations, as Indonesian intelligence agencies redoubled their efforts to control the youth clandestine movement.[628]

Jakarta opens Timor-Leste

465. When President Soeharto signed a decree in December 1988 allowing Timor-Leste "equal status" with the other 26 provinces of Indonesia, the territory which had been essentially closed to international visitors was opened.[629] This presented a new opportunity for East Timorese people to make contact with the world. Although far from the Asian tourist trail, between 1989 and 1991 over 3,000 international visitors came to Timor-Leste. These included journalists, NGO workers and activists traveling on tourist visas, who carried information both ways and who often became outspoken advocates after witnessing the situation inside Timor-Leste (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination).

466. In September 1990, Australian lawyer and trade unionist Robert Domm travelled into Timor-Leste and with the help of clandestine networks interviewed Xanana Gusmão in his mountain hideout. The interview was the first ever direct interview with the guerrilla leader. It was broadcast by the Australian Broadcasting Commission and significantly increased Xanana Gusmão's international profile and status.[630] Indonesian military reprisals against those suspected of helping to organise this interview were harsh.

467. The number of East Timorese studying and working in Indonesia also increased as a consequence of the opening up. This enabled East Timorese nationalists in their ranks to build links with both Indonesian civil society and with internationals whether working in or visiting Jakarta, including media representatives. This was to have a profound impact on both East Timorese and Indonesian human rights and pro-democracy activist movements in the 1990s.[631]

International developments toward the end of the decade

The Timor Gap treaty

468. On 11 December 1989, the Australian and Indonesian governments signed a treaty on the exploitation of the Timor Gap natural resources. This was not a surprise to Xanana Gusmão, who had previously been roundly critical of the Australian government in messages since 1986, when he suggested that Australia was seeking a solution to the Timor-Leste question in order to secure the resources of the Timor Sea.[632] Human Rights organisations, journalists and activists around the world criticised the treaty, and it became the source of a running dispute. The signing ceremony was conducted in an airplane over the Timor Sea, and the photo of the respective Foreign Ministers Gareth Evans and Ali Alatas became a favourite tool of the international solidarity movement in its efforts to highlight the injustices of the issue of Timor-Leste.*

End of the Cold War

469. The fall of the Berlin Wall on 9 November 1989 dramatically signalled the end of the Cold War. This also brought to an end the geopolitical context that prevailed from the time of the invasion in 1975. The social movements for freedom across the world excited many East Timorese people. The dogma adopted by many in the international community that the Indonesian occupation and integration of Timor-Leste was irreversible, despite its illegality, seemed less defensible. The world was changing.

Turning Points

Overview

470. The East Timorese independence movement was transformed in the 1990s. The focus moved from the guerrilla campaign to a diplomatic campaign, with strong support from student groups in Timor-Leste and Indonesia and growing international support. This shift was aided by three pivotal events: the Santa Cruz Massacre, the capture of Xanana Gusmão, and the award of the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Belo and José Ramos-Horta.

471. The Santa Cruz Massacre of 12 November 1991 changed permanently the way the world perceived the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste. Filmed by foreign media who were present for the planned visit by the Portuguese Parliamentary delegation, the images of the cold-blooded mass killing of young people mobilised a new era of the international solidarity movement and made it impossible for governments to simply ignore the violent oppression in Timor-Leste. It showed too the disaffection of East Timorese young people with the Indonesian regime which claimed to be winning their hearts and minds.

472. Xanana Gusmão was captured in November 1992. Tried and sentenced to life imprisonment, he continued to lead the Resistance from Cipinang Prison in Jakarta. The Resistance widened diplomatic moves based on an unconditional willingness to dialogue with Indonesia. The CNRM Peace Plan was launched in 1993 to further these efforts. Xanana Gusmão was increasingly accepted by the international community as an important figure in the search for a peaceful solution. After Santa Cruz, UN-sponsored tripartite talks between Portugal and Indonesia were revived.

* The treaty was replaced by the Timor Sea Arrangement between Australia and the newly independent Timor-Leste on 20 May 2002.

473. Throughout the 1990s, the student movement in Timor-Leste and Indonesia strengthened and became more central to the independence struggle. Inside Timor-Leste activists continued to face repression, but struggled to have their voice heard. In Indonesia, East Timorese students built lasting relationships with Indonesian human rights and pro-democracy activists and conducted a range of effective campaigns to raise international awareness of the continuing struggle for self-determination.

474. In October 1996, the Nobel Committee announced the award of the Peace Prize to Bishop Belo and José Ramos-Horta in what proved to be a huge boost for the struggle for self-determination. Kofi Annan took up his post as Secretary-General of the UN in January 1997, and brought a reinvigorated approach to resolving the issue of Timor-Leste.

The Santa Cruz Massacre, 12 November 1991

475. The massacre of East Timorese young people at the Santa Cruz cemetery by Indonesian soldiers on 12 November 1991 was a turning point in the Timorese struggle for international recognition. For the first time since the invasion of 1975, Indonesian military brutality against civilians was captured on film by international media. Smuggled out of the territory in the days after the initial massacre, this footage was shown on televisions around the world and revealed a truth about the Indonesian occupation that Jakarta had suppressed. The violent oppression by the Indonesia military of ordinary East Timorese could no longer be credibly denied.

476. The Commission heard from former senior UN official Francesc Vendrell on the impact this had at the United Nations:

> The Santa Cruz incident was a major historical event for East Timor and brought the whole issue of East Timor back to the political scene at the United Nations. Therefore we should think of those who died in the Santa Cruz Cemetery as heroes of the independence struggle for East Timor.[633]

477. Events at the Santa Cruz cemetery on 12 November 1991, and the days that followed are covered in specific parts of this report (See Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment; and Vol. III, Part 7.7: Rape, Sexual Slavery and Other Forms of Sexual Violence). José Ramos-Horta told the Commission that the film footage shot by Max Stahl of this event was critical evidence, after which people could no longer accuse him of fabricating stories of the violent suppression of East Timorese expressing their hopes for self-determination and independence.[634]

478. In the weeks before the massacre, activists in Timor-Leste were preparing for a visit from a delegation from the Portuguese Parliament.[635] There were rumours of a possible meeting between the delegation and Xanana Gusmão, and expectations were high. The clandestine movement prepared for protests. One group of young people painted banners in the grounds of the Motael Church on Dili's waterfront. The group was monitored by Indonesian intelligence and an altercation with Indonesian military took place on 28 October and one of the members, Sebastião Gomes, was shot and killed. Although the visit of the Portuguese delegation was cancelled, on 11 November the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, Pieter Kooijmans was in Dili. The clandestine movement decided to proceed with a demonstration to commemorate the killing of Sebastião Gomes following the funeral service at the Motael Church on the morning of 12 November 1991. There were strict efforts to ensure the demonstration remained peaceful and disciplined.[636]

479. Indonesian soldiers, police and intelligence agents lined the streets of Dili for the march from Motael Church, along the waterfront and south to the Santa Cruz cemetery. Some demonstrators marched all the way from Motael, others joined along the way and still more at the cemetery itself. Banners were unfurled calling for the UN's involvement in Timor-Leste, supporting Xanana Gusmão and self-determination. Tensions were high, as this outspokenness was unprecedented. Accounts differ, but along the route an Indonesian soldier was stabbed and taken away injured. The Indonesian official account of events explains that this provoked the fury of the military in the massacre that followed. However, the evidence does not support this conclusion. Shooting started once students arrived at the Santa Cruz cemetery. Soldiers opened fire with automatic weapons into the unarmed and peaceful crowd, many of whom fled into the grounds of the cemetery. The Commission heard testimony about soldiers then surrounding the cemetery, entering and killing previously unharmed or lightly injured people by bayoneting them.[637] Simplicio Celestino de Deus, a survivor of the massacre, told the Commission:

> Many were killed in the cemetery but many more were killed outside the cemetery while they were running away or were taken from their hiding places in homes and other places, and murdered.[638]

480. Many young people were taken away in trucks, to the Wirahusada military hospital in Lahane, Dili, to interrogation centres, or simply to be killed. Hundreds of young people ran to Bishop Belo's residence seeking refuge. Bishop Belo contacted Governor Mario Carrascalão and went to Santa Cruz where he saw the bodies of the killed and wounded, and later visited the Wirahusada military hospital where he saw the results of severe beatings.[639] The Commission heard testimony of what was referred to as a series of killings over the days that followed as Indonesian security forces hunted down those they suspected of involvement in the protest.[640] It was also told about disappearances not yet resolved, and of sexual violence against young women at Santa Cruz.[641]

481. After the Santa Cruz Massacre, Renetil (Resistência Nacional dos Estudantes de Timor-Leste, Timor-Leste Students' National Resistance) and Felectil (Frente Estudantil Clandestina de Timor-Leste, Clandestine Student Front of Timor-Leste) conducted a protest outside the office of the UN representative office in Jakarta. [642]

482. In the days and months that followed hundreds were detained. The Commission headquarters in the former Balide Prison was used to hold many people, and the room where this took place has been commemorated as the Santa Cruz room. Some were brought to trial and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment.[643] The Commission heard testimony from Indonesian lawyer Luhut Pangaribuan and activist Ade Rostina Sitompul, who travelled to Dili after the massacre, about the efforts of Indonesian human rights lawyers to defend these detainees and of the unfairness of these proceedings.[644]

483. Independent estimates put the number killed as high as 271, with 250 listed as missing.[645] Hundreds were arrested and detained in the aftermath. An Indonesian enquiry (Komisi Penyelidikan Nasional, KPN) established to investigate the massacre failed to meet expectations. It initially determined that 19 people were killed at Santa Cruz, and in the face of international outcry at this cover-up increased its figure to 50. Further evidence that senior members of the Indonesian military leadership condoned the massacre came on 14 November when the Indonesian Armed Forces Commander Try Sutrisno was quoted as telling graduates at the Indonesian military academy that:

> Delinquents like these have to be shot, and we will shoot them.[646]

484. The Commission conducted a survey of neighbourhoods in Dili and generally recorded information about the Santa Cruz Massacre through its statement-taking process. Through this process the Commission also received testimony about further killings and disappearances by the Indonesian military against those suspected of involvement in the demonstration, including in the districts. For example, in Sorolau (Ainaro, Ainaro) four clandestine activists were killed by soldiers identified as members of Kopassus and East Timorese Milsas.[647] On the basis of its research, while the Commission has no way of judging exactly how many people are still missing, it believes that a figure of 200 is not an unreasonable estimate. The Commission noted in its hearings and other activities that the Santa Cruz Massacre remains an unresolved matter of great significance to many individuals and families, and to the nation as a whole, and believes that a more comprehensive investigation than its own is required (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

The international impact of Santa Cruz

485. News of the massacre at Santa Cruz circulated around the world quickly, and led to a dramatic rise in solidarity action. Many foreign journalists and NGO workers had travelled to Timor-Leste expecting the Portuguese mission. A number of these had witnessed the massacre and played a critical role in telling the world in the months and years that followed, including testifying at the UN Human Rights Commission. José Ramos-Horta told the Commission that the massacre galvanised Portugal, where there were mass protests and calls for action by the United Nations (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination, section on Civil Society).

486. Some governments, notably Australia, worked to support the Indonesian explanation that this was an uncharacteristic action by "rogue elements" within the military. Despite this, the massacre and the focus it brought to the wider issue of Indonesia's occupation of Timor-Leste was a public relations disaster for Indonesia. The 12th of November became a rallying day for East Timorese in the diaspora and human rights activists in countries throughout the world right up to 1999, with anniversaries being marked by demonstrations and vigils.*

The capture of Xanana Gusmão

487. Xanana Gusmão was captured by the Indonesian military on 20 November 1992, in a house in Lahane, Dili.† News spread rapidly across Timor-Leste and throughout the world. He was initially taken to Bali, and the first concerns of supporters were for his physical safety. In Dili, those suspected of sheltering him were detained and subject to severe torture.[648] An international campaign to pressure Indonesia to secure his well-being moved into action. Xanana Gusmão was shown in an interview on Indonesian television on 25 November apparently recanting the Resistance struggle. He was returned to Dili for his trial in May 1993, and on 17 May he stood to deliver his defence. The trial judge interrupted him only minutes after he began, declaring that his defence was "irrelevant". He was sentenced to life imprisonment and taken to the high security Cipinang prison in Jakarta (see Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials). However, Xanana Gusmão's 27-page defence statement was smuggled out of the territory and disseminated internationally. He rejected Indonesia's claim over Timor-Leste and reiterated the struggle for self-determination of the East Timorese people.

488. The capture of Xanana Gusmão was a major blow to the Resistance, and Indonesian authorities were confident it would spell the end of the independence struggle. However, it ultimately created the conditions for him to emerge as a world statesman. After 17 years in the mountains and forests of Timor-Leste, he continued to lead the Resistance from his prison cell. Xanana Gusmão told the Commission that he learned much in his time in Cipinang Prison, where he was held with Indonesian political prisoners from across the archipelago. He told the Commission that this experience gave him:

> The opportunity to gain a better knowledge of the Indonesian people's struggle for democracy and freedom. This helped me start to reduce and then eliminate the hatred that had accumulated in my heart while in the jungle for 17 years. I came to understand the common objectives that unite us with the Indonesian people…This understanding enabled me even to talk with former enemies and Indonesian generals.[649]

---

* On 9 April 2005, Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono became the first Indonesian head of state to visit Santa Cruz Cemetery, in a gesture of recognition and reconciliation.

† Xanana Gusmão was captured in the house of Aliança Araújo. Over the years he had travelled secretly to Dili for meetings on many occasions.

The student clandestine network

Inside Timor-Leste and the rise of paramilitary forces

489. Throughout the 1990s the urban youth clandestine movement grew, taking great risks to deliver information and to hold demonstrations when foreign visitors were present in Timor-Leste. The Indonesian security apparatus continued its heavy-handed approach to youth resistance, and in the 1990s shifted its strategy in an effort to combat this growing movement. From the mid-1990s, a new focus was brought to paramilitary and intelligence operations in the territory. Armed groups which became known as "Ninja" squads roamed the streets of Dili after dark, creating a sense of terror among the population as people disappeared in these covert operations.[650] The riot police, Brimob, became a ubiquitous and violent presence, especially in Dili where student demonstrations were most common.

490. During these years there were a number of pressure points which could spark confrontation between East Timorese young people and the Indonesian security forces. Religion was sometimes used to provoke violence. In Remexio (Aileu) in June 1994, an Indonesian soldier attended a Mass and desecrated the Eucharist. Two weeks later at the University of East Timor (Untim), hundreds of students protested, calling for independence.[651] Rivalry between East Timorese and migrants from Indonesia could prompt violent clashes. In Baucau in January 1995, tensions between migrants from Sulawesi and local people erupted in the central market. In trying to quell the riot, the Indonesian military shot several people, and later conceded three died.[652] Days later, on 9 January 1995, students at Untim marked the day of tripartite talks in Geneva with a protest calling for the release of Xanana Gusmão and for the UN to implement its resolutions on Timor-Leste. Visiting foreigners witnessed this demonstration and the subsequent crackdown, in which 16 demonstrators were detained and later tortured.[653]

The student movement in Indonesia

491. Links between East Timorese nationalists and Indonesian human rights activists were initially fostered in the 1980s when Timorese political prisoners were held in prisons in Java.[654] The student organisations Renetil and Impettu played an increasingly important role in the 1990s in developing and widening these relationships. Initially East Timorese student activists became involved in Indonesian protest movements on such issues as the Kedungombo dam land struggle in central Java in 1990. Indonesian human rights activist Nugroho Katjasungkana told the Commission of the preoccupation of Indonesian activists with bringing down the corrupt and unjust Soeharto regime in the 1980s. He recalled East Timorese involvement in these actions, noting that:

> Timorese involvement in the fight for democracy in Indonesia preceded Indonesians' involvement in the fight for Timor-Leste's self-determination.[655]

492. Renetil developed a strategy of what it called the "Indonesianisation" of the conflict.[656] East Timorese students became active in the emerging Indonesian pro-democracy* movement,[657] and the East Timorese flag was often seen at protests for change in Indonesia during the 1990s.[658] Indonesian groups, previously preoccupied with their own pro-democracy agenda and unaware of the situation in Timor-Leste gradually came to identify the problem of Timor-Leste with the root cause of their own problems, Soeharto's New Order regime.[659]

493. Indonesian groups supporting self-determination for Timor-Leste formed in a number of cities across Java, especially after the Santa Cruz massacre.[660] In Jakarta in 1991, several non-government organisations formed the Joint Committee for the Defence of East Timor, which in 1998 was replaced by Fortilos (Forum Solidaritas Rakyat Timor Lorosae). In 1995 in Jakarta, SPRIM (Solidaritas Perjuangan Rakyat Indonesia untuk Maubere, People's Solidarity Struggle for Maubere) was formed and then in 1997 Solidamor (Solidaritas untuk Penyelesaian Damai Timor Timur, Solidarity for Peaceful Resolution for East Timor). In Kupang in 1998, university student activists and NGOs formed Forsolidareste (Forum Solidaritas Timor Leste, East Timor Solidarity Forum). Indonesian and many Timorese activists linked Indonesian democratisation as a precondition to East Timorese self-determination. Wilson B. Nurtias of the Indonesian solidarity group SPRIM said that the Indonesia and Timor-Leste people were "passengers of a ship, who were facing the same pirates."[661]

494. In the mid-1990s East Timorese students used a tactic that was to turn many foreign embassies in Jakarta into virtual fortresses. As early as 1989, young East Timorese people had sought political asylum in embassies in Jakarta in fear of violence by Indonesian security forces.[662] In the 1990s, the tactic was used as part of a strategy to bring media attention to the continuing struggle to internationalise the issue of self-determination. The most spectacular of what became known as the fence-jumping actions took place in 1994, during the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit of regional leaders. With the APEC meeting taking place in Bogor, near Jakarta, and world media assembled to cover the story, 29 East Timorese students jumped the fence into the US Embassy in Jakarta on 12 November and demanded to meet the visiting President Clinton. For days besieged East Timorese students took the front pages of the press, in Jakarta and around the world, with their calls for the release of Xanana Gusmão and for self-determination for Timor-Leste. Although they did not meet President Clinton, negotiations were completed and they were granted political asylum in Portugal. This was a stunning public relations success organised by Renetil.[663]

495. Other embassy fence-jumping actions took place in following years, until the embassies of Jakarta took security measures to prevent East Timorese students entering their premises. In November 1995, five men entered the French Embassy and were granted asylum in Portugal.[664] And on 7 December 1995, a number of young men jumped the fence into the Dutch and Russian embassies to draw attention to the anniversary of the Indonesian invasion of Timor-Leste. Interviews conducted by the Commission indicate that these were part of a well-coordinated strategy by Renetil, which was operating with direct links to the leadership of Xanana Gusmão in Cipinang Prison.[666]

* Prominent university-based pro democracy groups included FKMJ, (Forum Komunikasi Mahasiswa Jember, Jember Students Communication Forum), SMID (Solidaritas Mahasiswa Indonesia untuk Demokrasi, Indonesian Students Solidarity for Democracy), and KPRP (Komite Perjuangan Rakyat untuk Perubahan, People's Committee of Struggle for Change).

496. During the 1990s members of Renetil moved to occupy controlling positions in the state-sanctioned East Timorese student organisation Impettu, membership of which was compulsory for East Timorese students. This move enabled Renetil members to organise openly as Impettu members and by the mid-1990s Renetil members effectively controlled Impettu.[667] As the call for regime change grew louder towards the late 1990s, the Impettu branches united under a single leadership, the DPP Impettu (Dewan Pimpinan Pusat Ikatan Mahasiswa, Pemuda, dan Pelajar Timor Timur, Impettu Central Leadership Council), which was headed by the Renetil Deputy Secretary-General.[668]

CNRM Peace Plan and diplomatic initiatives

497. In the early 1990s the CNRM actively sought dialogue with Indonesia. With the support of international NGOs and civil society groups, the Timor Talks Campaign was launched (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination). In 1993 the CNRM proposed a three-phase plan for peace, based upon demilitarisation of Timor-Leste, a period of transitional autonomy, and ultimately an act of self-determination to determine the permanent political status of the territory. It presented the Peace Plan first to the European Union and then the United Nations, demonstrating the significant rise in active support by Portugal. The Indonesian government rejected the plan. Nevertheless it remained on the table throughout the 1990s as a focus of the CNRM's diplomatic efforts and as a mark of its willingness to seek a solution through dialogue.[669] Meanwhile Portugal resumed talks with Indonesia in 1992, after having broken off relations after the Santa Cruz Massacre in November 1991.

498. José Ramos-Horta continued his diplomatic campaign based on the Peace Plan. While Indonesia was under increasing pressure following the revelation of the Santa Cruz massacre, and there was some international interest in achieving a solution on Timor-Leste, it remained in a relatively strong position in the early 1990s. Portugal and Indonesia resumed the tripartite talks under the auspices of the UN Secretary-General. However, the Commission heard from former senior UN official Francesc Vendrell that these early and mid-1990s were years in which Ramos-Horta had to struggle to avoid a bad diplomatic solution for Timor-Leste.[670] With the support of East Timorese in the diaspora, and the increasingly broad-based international solidarity movement, he worked hard to increase the international profile of CNRM leader Xanana Gusmão and to convince world leaders that a political solution was possible.

The International Court of Justice case: Portugal v Australia, 1991–1995

499. In 1991 Portugal took Australia to the International Court of Justice over the so-called Timor Gap treaty signed with Indonesia in 1989. It could not take Indonesia to this court, as Indonesia had not accepted the Court's jurisdiction. The decision was handed down in 1995, and although while the case did not result in overturning of the treaty, it provided an important statement in support of Timor-Leste's continuing right to self-determination.[671]

500. Portugal argued that Australia was violating international law by contracting with Indonesia to divide up the natural wealth belonging to the people of Timor-Leste. Portugal said that this violated its right as the administering power of the non-self-governing territory, and also the right of the people of Timor-Leste.

501. Due to a technicality most judges said that they could not hear the case. The issues of the case all revolved around the legality of what Indonesia had done and was continuing to do in Timor-Leste, and so they said they could not hear the case if Indonesia was not a party. However, two judges did not agree with this view and they gave strong dissenting opinions. They examined the merits of the case and gave important findings on the obligations of States in relation to the right of self-determination in the Timor-Leste context. Judge Weeramantry and Judge Skubiszewksi both recognised the East Timorese people's continuing right to self-determination. They also cautioned that States entering such a treaty had a duty to consult the peoples of Timor-Leste and the administering power (Judge Skubiszewksi), and that such a treaty may be in breach of obligations imposed upon them by general principles of international law (Judge Weeramantry).[672]

The Nobel Peace Prize, 1996

502. The award of the 1996 Nobel Peace Prize jointly to Bishop Belo and José Ramos-Horta was a seminal moment in the struggle of the East Timorese people for international recognition. It validated the struggles of both men, whose experience in the years of Indonesian occupation was very different but who shared a vision of East Timorese identity and human dignity. It also countered years of efforts by Indonesian authorities to undermine the credibility of both men, and opened the doors of world leaders to them and to the cause of Timor-Leste.

503. The 1996 presentation speech to the two recipients spoke of the conflict:

> The conflict in East Timor has been called "the forgotten conflict"… Rarely has the cynicism of world politics been more clearly demonstrated…This year's two Peace Prize Laureates, Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo and José Ramos-Horta, have laboured tirelessly, and with great personal sacrifice, for their oppressed people. Under extremely difficult conditions, they have preserved their humanity and faith in the future.[673]

504. In his acceptance speech Bishop Belo spoke of his hopes that the prize would advance the cause of Timor-Leste:

> I firmly believe that I am here essentially as the voice of the voiceless people of East Timor who are with me today in spirit, if not in person. And what the people want is peace, an end to violence and the respect for their human rights. It is my fervent hope that the 1996 Nobel Prize for Peace will advance these goals. [674]

505. With the Nobel Peace Prize behind him, José Ramos-Horta embarked on an ambitious diplomatic campaign. In early 1997 he travelled to South Africa. In July that year when President Mandela met with President Soeharto in Jakarta, he asked to meet with the imprisoned Xanana Gusmão. President Soeharto initially refused the request, saying that Gusmão was a common criminal. When the South African President reminded Soeharto that others used to say that of him, he relented. News of the private meeting reached the world press, and raised Xanana Gusmão's international profile as a statesman for peace.

506. Inside Timor-Leste the Nobel Peace Prize demonstrated to the East Timorese people that they had not been forgotten by the international community, and raised hopes for international assistance in seeking a solution to the conflict.

The United Nations

507. In the mid-1990s there was a change of personnel working on the Timor-Leste issue at the UN New York headquarters. Francesc Vendrell became Director first for South East Asia and the Pacific and subsequently for Asia and the Pacific. The officer in charge of the Timor-Leste dossier was Tamrat Samuel. Vendrell and Samuel remained the key Secretariat officers working on Timor-Leste until the Popular Consultation in 1999. Francesc Vendrell told the Commission of the resumption of the tripartite talks and of his and Tamrat Samuel's efforts to involve the East Timorese in discussions about the future of the territory.[675] In January 1994, Tamrat Samuel met with Xanana Gusmão in Cipinang prison, as did Vendrell in December that year. In 1994, they also travelled to Timor-Leste to meet directly with East Timorese from all political backgrounds, as well as Catholic priests and nuns. Vendrell reflected:

> One of the most moving things was the enormous faith that everybody had in the United Nations…the feeling of responsibility that I think both Tamrat and I had, that we had to do our best on behalf of a people who could rely only on the UN for support.[676]

508. Francesc Vendrell told the Commission of the difficulty for the United Nations when the people of Timor-Leste themselves were outside the discussion process of the tripartite talks. This obstacle prompted the initiative for the All-Inclusive Intra-East Timorese Dialogue (AIIETD). The idea, as Vendrell explained to the Commission, was that:

[If] they [East Timorese] came together and they were left on their own, they might find that they had a great deal in common and might reach a joint proposal on East Timor.[677]

509. Indonesia agreed to this mechanism, though it insisted that the AIIETD not be allowed to discuss the political status of Timor-Leste. The first AIIETD was held in Austria in June 1995, with participants from all political backgrounds. Bishop Belo also attended the meeting, though Xanana Gusmão remained in prison in Jakarta. Three subsequent meetings of the AIIETD were held, in March 1996, October 1997 and October 1998. Although the meetings did not result in practical plans or formal outcomes, for the first time since 1975 the United Nations was involved in bringing East Timorese from all backgrounds together to discuss their differences and seek some common ground.

510. Kofi Annan took up his post as the new UN Secretary-General in January 1997, and brought renewed focus to the issue of Timor-Leste. In February 1997 he appointed Pakistani diplomat Ambassador Jamsheed Marker as his Personal Representative on East Timor (PRSG). This greatly enhanced the work of Francesc Vendrell and Tamrat Samuel in the UN Secretariat, and this team visited Portugal, Indonesia and Timor-Leste in the increasingly turbulent times of 1997 to 1998.

From Reformasi to announcement of the Popular Consultation

Overview

511. Events in 1997 moved fast. The Asian financial crisis had engulfed Indonesia by late 1997. This crisis exposed the corruption and mismanagement of the Soeharto regime. Jakarta and other cities in Indonesia were rocked with popular protests calling for his downfall and for widespread reforms in what became known as Reformasi. East Timorese students played an active part in these demonstrations. On 21 May 1998 Soeharto resigned, and his Vice-President B.J. Habibie took over as President.

512. In the meantime, diplomatic activity was hectic after the 1996 Nobel Peace Prize and Xanana Gusmão enjoyed a regular flow of visitors representing world leaders and key organisations in his Jakarta prison cell. The Resistance reorganised and held a landmark conference in Peniche, Portugal in April 1998 where the CNRM was transformed to become the Conselho Nacional da Resistência Timorense (National Council of Timorese Resistance, CNRT). This aimed to broaden the base of the movement for independence.

513. In Timor-Leste, the atmosphere of Reformasi and the apparent lightening of military control encouraged open discussion of the political status of the territory for the first time in the years of Indonesian occupation. Calls for a referendum to allow the people of Timor-Leste to determine their future gained momentum throughout the latter half of 1998. However, by end of the year the Indonesian military had repositioned themselves. Apparent troop withdrawals were shown to be bogus, and by late 1998 there was mounting evidence of a TNI strategy to form, arm and fund pro-integration militias across the country to foil any attempt at genuine self-determination.

514. With Soeharto replaced, the UN and the international community stepped up its pressure on Indonesia for a solution to the issue of Timor-Leste. Discussions between Portugal and Indonesia initially centred on a special autonomy package for Timor-Leste, with differing views as to whether this was a solution in itself or a phase in a process of genuine self-determination. In January 1999, President Habibie surprised many in his own administration when he declared that Indonesia would allow the people of Timor-Leste to choose their own future, including independence if it was their wish. Negotiations between Portugal and Indonesia were turned to finalising a mechanism to bring about this choice.

515. In the early months of 1999, while these negotiations were under way, the TNI strategy of developing the armed militia was accelerated. The relative political openness of mid-1998 had disappeared and violence was a constant threat against pro-independence supporters. Massacres in Dili and Liquiçá by the TNI-backed militia shocked the international community, as large numbers of East Timorese people became displaced due to fear of violence.

516. Negotiations between Portugal and Indonesia culminated in what were known as the 5 May Agreements, which set out the modalities for a popular consultation to allow the people of Timor-Leste to accept or reject the special autonomy package; rejection would lead to independence. Indonesia refused to hand over responsibility for security during the ballot and this responsibility was given to the Indonesian police. The international community judged that they could not push Indonesia further on this issue, despite the mounting evidence of Indonesian military and police involvement in the violence against pro-independence supporters.

517. The ballot was set for August 1999, to allow the Indonesian Parliament to ratify the results in its September sitting.

The fall of Soeharto

518. In May 1997 the electoral vehicle of the New Order government, Golkar, was re-elected in national parliamentary elections, winning 74% of the vote.[678] Shortly after this the Asian financial crisis erupted in Thailand in July 1997 and quickly engulfed Indonesia. In the wake of the Rupiah's crash to 18,000 to the US dollar by January 1998 and an IMF bailout, Soeharto was re-appointed as President by the MPR (People's Consultative Council) in March 1998. When he formed a cabinet regarded by many as dominated by cronies of the regime, popular protest was inflamed. The pro-democracy movement's calls for regime change gained some support from members of the Indonesian elite. In May, MPR leader Harmoko responded positively to reformist demands, while military chief General Wiranto expressed military support for reform. Two of Indonesia's emergent opposition leaders, Megawati Soekarnoputri and Amien Rais, indicated their readiness to assume power.

519. Popular pressure exploded during May, resulting in Soeharto's downfall. The Indonesian Human Rights Commission subsequently found the violence of this period to have been orchestrated, identifying 20 military officers and civilians as being behind the riots.[679] By 18 May, with the DPR (People's Representative Council) occupied by students, Soeharto had lost most of his support. The DPR called for his resignation. By the evening of 20 May General Wiranto also urged his resignation, and on 21 May Soeharto stepped down from the presidency.

520. These events gave Indonesia a new head of state, President B.J. Habibie, who quickly implemented a remarkable array of reforms. The pre-eminent slogan of the period was "Corruption, Collusion and Nepotism", known colloquially in Indonesia as KKN (Kolusi, Korupsi, Nepotisme), and which summed up what were perceived as the most pervasive ills of the Soeharto regime. Civil society also raised other issues such as the need to oppose militarism and for an end to impunity of the military. The agenda of reform affected Indonesia in many ways. The composition of Indonesia's political elite changed, and although many politicians with connections to Soeharto's regime survived his fall a number of new politicians came to prominence. This brought a level of pluralism to political debate that had long been suppressed during Soeharto's reign. In addition, media freedoms and a vigorous public debate ensured that a wide range of issues were openly considered and that many of these received political attention that led to change.

521. President Habibie was considered by many to be a caretaker President. As Soeharto's vice-president he was closely associated with the New Order regime, though he had no major constituency or power base within that regime. As President, he had to step carefully between the powerful military and major religious groups such as the Islamic organisations as well as negotiate the movement for reform. In his Cabinet he maintained Wiranto as both head of the military and the minister of defence.

522. Many in the international community had considered the idea of Timor-Leste's political status a closed issue as long as President Soeharto was in power. With his departure and in the climate of reform within Indonesia suddenly there was room for discussion.

523. The idea of a special autonomous status for Timor-Leste was not new, but under Soeharto was never considered seriously. Perhaps no one knew better than long-serving Foreign Minister Ali Alatas the problems Indonesia's position on and actions in Timor-Leste caused for his country in the international arena. He had previously argued for a change in Timor-Leste's status within Indonesia, proposing special autonomy for East Timor as one possible solution. Soeharto had rejected his ideas.[680] On 6 June 1998, the Cabinet's Political and Security Committee supported a proposal for "wide-ranging autonomy" for Timor-Leste, provided the international community continued to recognise Indonesia's sovereignty. Foreign Minister Alatas took this proposal to President Habibie on 8 June and to the Cabinet on 9 June. President Habibie unexpectedly announced it to international media on 9 June.

524. Within nine months, this idea of offering a special autonomy package to Timor-Leste was to be transformed into formal Indonesian acceptance of a full act of self-determination by the East Timorese people.

The CNRT and the diplomatic campaign

525. Doors opened for José Ramos-Horta around the world after he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize, and he worked hard to use this to build support for the diplomatic campaign for independence. It also lent an international dimension to Bishop Belo's outspoken defence of East Timorese human rights, and greatly raised international attention to Timor-Leste.

526. After the 1997 meeting with South African President Nelson Mandela, Xanana Gusmão's international credentials were raised and this led to a procession of high profile visitors to his Cipinang gaol cell throughout 1998 and into 1999.

527. In April 1998, the Resistance achieved a milestone in its development, when leaders from all major East Timorese political parties and non-political organisations, including the Catholic Church, met at Peniche in Portugal and formed the CNRT. Xanana Gusmão was elected President, with Ramos-Horta Vice-President and his personal representative. The formation of the CNRT completed the gradual transformation of the Resistance from a single party entity based on Fretilin into a genuinely broad-based organisation including students, NGOs and members of the Catholic Church.

528. The establishment of the CNRT positioned the Resistance well to deal with events as they rapidly unfolded in the South-East Asian region and Indonesia in particular (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination).

The impact of Reformasi in Timor-Leste

529. President Habibie's public announcement of the proposed new status for Timor-Leste, combined with the optimistic air of calls for reform, released profound public support for independence in the territory.

530. On 9 June 1998 in Dili, a public meeting to discuss the territory's future was attended by a wide range of representatives of East Timorese aspirations, including both guerrilla commanders and staunch integrationists, CNRT leaders, members of civil society and the clandestine movement. Also in attendance was the pro-integration governor, Abilio Soares, whose presentation of the proposed special status for Timor-Leste was not well received. Many perceived this to be a half-measure, and the meeting resolved to call for a referendum to allow the people to choose their future.

531. On 23 June, a large demonstration in Dili publicly called for independence. Concerned at the possible consequences of such open behaviour, Bishop Belo and the CNRT leadership quickly urged moderation, and reiterated their desire for a transitional period prior to any question of independence.

532. From June, student groups* boldly fronted the emerging public debate, leading large demonstrations in both Timor-Leste and Indonesia. In July, the newly formed East Timor Student Solidarity Council (Dewan Solidaritas Mahasiswa Timor Timur, ETSSC) directed groups of students to travel across Timor-Leste to conduct village-level dialogues, explaining recent developments and canvassing popular opinion. Defying military opposition to the process in some areas, they heard strong calls for withdrawal of the TNI and for a referendum.[681]

533. In September, Timor-Leste's two bishops convened a meeting in Dare to promote reconciliation between leading East Timorese figures who supported integration with Indonesia and those who sought independence. The CNRT openly declared itself as a public legal entity in September, moving into an office in south Dili. Student demonstrations protesting the military and demanding a referendum occurred regularly throughout this period. This openness was unprecedented in all the years of the Indonesian occupation. The TNI in Timor-Leste remained watchful, but was restrained and did not act directly against these demonstrations.

Emergence of the militias

534. Towards the end of 1998, tensions began to rise and the openness of the previous months came under pressure. In early October, a Timorese pro-autonomy group pressured the Governor to force the resignation of civil servants who had joined Forsarepetil, (Forum Sarjana Pro-Referendum dan Pembangunan Timor-Leste), a pro-referendum group of academics and civil servants. This provoked two days of huge demonstrations in Dili in opposition to the Governor's move. Basilio Araújo, a pro-integrationist spokesman, later described to the Commission the background to this decision:

> We were around 20 people, those of us from that group, and we called ourselves pro-integration…We went to Mr Abilio [Soares, the governor] and pressed him to make a decree regarding people that had already sided for independence: "Enough, take off your shirt as a freedom fighter, and don't work for the government, don't be two-faced." Mr Abilio made the decree, but was pressured by the central government and subsequently retracted it.[682]

* Renetil and Impettu in Indonesia; ETSSC in Timor-Leste.

535. On 8 August, a highly publicised troop withdrawal contributed to the perception that the situation in Timor-Leste was improving. Indonesia claimed it had fewer than 6,000 troops in the territory, and had purportedly withdrawn its special forces (Kopassus) who were widely accused of serious human rights violations.[683] But military documents leaked that month proved the opposite. Troops numbered 21,540, including Kopassus, and rather than the dramatic troop reduction presented to the media TNI's military strength was in fact being steadily increased.[684] The documents showed that the TNI maintained a network of paramilitary groups across most districts. Twelve teams were in place in 11 districts, most of them linked to Kopassus units. These groups formed the basis of the militia that were rapidly recruited in later months.[685] The military later denied that the militias were integrated into its formal structure.

536. The first sign of the future behaviour of these paramilitaries, which were to become known collectively as the militia, came in November when the Indonesian military and members of the ABLAI militia, many of whom were local government officials, responded to a Falintil attack on the Koramil in Alas, in Manufahi District. On 9 November, Falintil had killed three soldiers, abducted 13 others and stolen 36 rifles. The community sought refuge in the Alas church after the attack. On 13 November ABRI retaliated against a Falintil strike and the area was beset by violence.[686] The Indonesian military and the militia raided the church, beating those inside. The military detained civilians throughout the area in an attempt to find the Falintil. The Commission received testimony of torture and sexual violence by the Indonesian military against those held in detention.[687] At least eight people were killed by ABRI or the militia. An ICRC investigation found nine to have died in the retaliation, including the two soldiers killed by Falintil.[688] The killings, coming after months of uneasy openness, prompted angry protests in Dili. After students occupied the parliament building, a fact-finding team was quickly assembled from civil society groups, but it was denied access to the area by the military.[689] International journalists travelled to Alas and observed armed non-military personnel in control, indicating the beginning of the militias' role as the front line of the military campaign against independence.[690]

537. Militia groups had long existed in Timor-Leste. However, the militias emerging in late 1998 and early 1999 were mostly directly linked to the TNI rather than owing their allegiance to liurai[*] as had been the practice in the past.[691] Some of these new militias had their roots in the military auxiliary forces[†] fostered by the TNI since the late 1970s. Most militia leaders had extensive links to Kopassus through the various long-standing paramilitary groups in Timor-Leste.[692] An example was Joanico Césario, who became commander of the militia in the eastern area, Sector A,[‡] who had been a military operations auxiliary (TBO) in his childhood.[693] The notorious commander of Sector B, Eurico Guterres, had a background in the Gadapaksi paramilitary in the 1990s.

* Militia in some regions were formed with the influence of liurai families, such as the Carvalho family in Cassa.

† These included Hansip, Ratih, Wanra, Kamra (Police), as well as TBO- military operations auxiliaries.

‡ The sector designations (A, B and C) reflected the combat-oriented sectoral command under Kopassus that divided East Timor into three areas.

Another, Joni Marques of Team Alfa in Lautém, had long-term links to Kopassus. The TNI recruited extensively in 1998 and1999 to build on this core leadership.[694] Other militia personnel included West Timorese and East Timorese serving members of the TNI.[695] Some joined under duress. Money and prestige motivated others (see Part 9: Community Reconciliation).

538. The military's role in forming these militias was quickly apparent. A major indicator was that key military personnel in Timor-Leste attended the public inaugurations of militia groups.[696] Militia leaders themselves declared TNI had armed them.[697] Most conclusively, senior TNI officers* themselves declared that they were arming groups.[698] General Wiranto, commander-in-chief of the Armed Forces acknowledged TNI involvement in the militia.[699] This relationship was clear from late 1998 when militia groups began appearing. Military documents later provided conclusive evidence of TNI arms' supplies to militia,[700] and subsequent militia defector Tomás Gonçalves confirmed the involvement of the Kopassus intelligence unit and key military officers Suratman, Sudrajat and Damiri in recruitment.[701]

539. The rapid emergence of the militias and their consistency of behaviour show that a strong organising force stood behind them.[702] This was the TNI, which in the conditions of openness of Reformasi needed a force that could be seen to attack the well-organised East Timorese pro-independence movement. One of the reasons the militia were predominantly armed with crude home-made weapons was to create the appearance of a spontaneous people-based movement. This was a major deception, as the TNI made automatic weapons available to at least some of the militia groups as well as a range of other logistical and security support. [703]

Xanana Gusmão calls for tolerance

540. In late 1998, despite rising tensions from the violence in Alas, Dili residents continued to openly express their desire for change. On 12 November, residents mounted the first public demonstration in commemoration of the Santa Cruz Massacre. That evening people stayed home and lined the streets of Dili with thousands of candles in commemoration of the dead. Xanana Gusmão's New Year message focused on the CNRT idea of transitional autonomy, and argued restraint of the voices calling for an immediate referendum. Above all, he called for tolerance in the face of increasing pressures:

> Let us concentrate on…achieving: an end to military hostilities; a climate of greater political tolerance. This stance aims at preventing further East Timorese casualties. The occupiers are arming the East Timorese and telling them to kill their own brothers and sisters. Instead of allowing ourselves to be consumed by anger, let us make an effort to think in a balanced political manner. Otherwise we will be playing the colonists' game; we will be reinforcing the Indonesian > argument that the East Timorese are threatened with a new civil war.[704]

* District military Commander Supardi on 28 January, and Kodam IX Commander Adam Damiri on 7 February both admitted arming the militias.

Negotiations on the autonomy package

541. Indonesian Foreign Minister Ali Alatas travelled to New York to present the autonomy idea to UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan on 18 June. In August Indonesia agreed to tripartite talks on special autonomy with the UN and Portugal. The Secretary-General's Personal Representative for Timor-Leste, Ambassador Jamsheed Marker, managed the negotiation process, which aimed to reach agreement on the content of a special autonomy package by the end of the year. The major stumbling block appeared to be the question of whether the proposed autonomy would be a stage toward a full act of self-determination or an end in itself. Portugal viewed autonomy as a transition towards an ultimate act of self-determination, in broad accordance with the long-established CNRM/CNRT plan. Indonesia had a different perspective, and viewed autonomy as a final concession, one which would close the question of Timor-Leste in the international arena. The initial talks focused on the content of the package rather than on this political question.

542. Ambassador Marker also sought to bring the East Timorese leadership into the process. Since his appointment in 1997, Marker had aimed to widen the scope of UN involvement beyond the tripartite talks with Portugal and Indonesia. The AIIETD had been a result of this objective, and Marker had developed working relationships with key East Timorese leaders. The UN consulted Xanana Gusmão, José Ramos-Horta and Bishops Belo and Nascimento, among others, on the details of a blueprint for autonomy drawn up for the UN.

543. Tensions inside Timor-Leste mounted in late 1998. On the one hand there was the popular support for open political dialogue and a referendum; on the other was the military strategy of developing armed pro-integration militia groups to stifle the referendum movement. It was becoming increasingly clear to key international governments engaged on the issue that a special autonomy package itself would not resolve the issue.

544. On 19 December 1998, Australian Prime Minister John Howard wrote a letter to President Habibie, a document that has been viewed as having significant impact on the President's thinking. While Prime Minister Howard reaffirmed Australia's preference that Timor-Leste remain part of Indonesia, he drew a parallel with the Matignon Accords of French New Caledonia and suggested that Indonesia consider implementing the special autonomy with a "review mechanism" that would effectively be a referendum some years into the future:

> It might be worth considering, therefore, a means of addressing the East Timorese desire for an act of self-determination in a manner that avoids an early and final decision on the future of the province. [705]

545. This suggestion of avoiding a quick, final solution to Timor-Leste was in step with the UN, which advocated a five- to seven-year period of autonomy. However, this was seen by Indonesia as a major policy change by their most staunch international supporter, a change that recognised the East Timorese right to self-determination. When the story of Australia's letter became public, Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer explained on 12 January 1999 that "our preference would be for an arrangement where East Timor would have a high degree of autonomy but remain legally part of Indonesia.[706]

546. President Habibie and Foreign Minister Alatas were keen to see a resolution on the negotiations with Portugal before Indonesian parliamentary elections due on 7 June 1999, which could lead to the appointment of a new president.* The original of Prime Minister Howard's letter was delivered to President Habibie on 21 January. President Habibie wrote a hand-written memo in the margins which said that:

> If, after 22 years, the East Timorese people cannot feel united with the Indonesian people…it would be reasonable and wise, if by a decision of the People's consultative Assembly, the 27th province of East Timor can be honourably separated from the Unitary Republic of Indonesia.[707]

547. There has been much speculation about the causes for Habibie's shift, and perhaps too much made of the Australian letter and perceived shift of policy. However, it seems clear that President Habibie was mindful of the limited window of opportunity to make an impact on this long-running issue, and that he was more open to the influence of liberal international views than his predecessor and many of those still in powerful positions in Indonesia.

548. On 27 January 1999, before the special autonomy framework had even been finalised, Indonesia announced its policy change: it would give Timor-Leste the opportunity to reject its offer of special autonomy. If the East Timorese people rejected the autonomy package, Indonesia would revoke its June 1976 law incorporating the territory into the Republic of Indonesia. Four powerful TNI generals were members of President Habibie's Cabinet. It is remarkable that they accepted this policy, and the probable explanation is that they were confident a majority of East Timorese voters could be persuaded to favour continued integration with Indonesia.[708]

549. A definitive ballot would provide a firm answer on the Timor-Leste question, an issue that had long been an irritant to Indonesia. General Wiranto advocated that there be no period of transition, a position shared by Indonesian Foreign Minister Ali Alatas who said:

> Why should Indonesia pay, when East Timor doesn't want it? If our proposal is indeed unacceptable, I am not going to give alternatives in which they ask for 5 to 10 years and then a referendum.[709]

* At the time, the President of the Republic of Indonesia was not directly elected but was appointed by the People's Consultative Body (MPR).

550. Xanana Gusmão was removed from the high security Cipinang Prison to house arrest on 10 February 1999. While still held captive and limited in his ability to play a full role in the search for a solution inside Timor-Leste, he received a stream of East Timorese, Indonesian and high-profile international visitors at the house used as his prison in Salemba, Jakarta, and was increasingly accepted as an international statesman. Meanwhile numerous East Timorese political prisoners remained in detention across Indonesia.

Growing militia terror

551. In the weeks preceding President Habibie's 27 January announcement in Jakarta, over 4,000 people had sought refuge at the partially constructed Suai cathedral.[710] They were fleeing violence perpetrated by a militia group based in Cassa (Ainaro), which was to become known as the Mahidi militia (Mati Hidup dengan Indonesia, Life or Death with Indonesia). This group, headed by Câncio Carvalho, a son of the local liurai family, carried out a number of brutal killings targeting local CNRT leaders. In one of the worst of these, on 23 January 1999, in the small town of Galitas, a pregnant woman was killed and her baby cut from her belly. [711] Three days later, CNRT wrote to the United Nations Secretary-General:

> It is true that many of these "troops" are East Timorese. What is tragic for us is that this is being portrayed by the authorities as civil war – Timorese against Timorese. We are aware of the divisions in our society. We are also aware of why these divisions exist. We have neither the resources nor the power to control what is happening.[712]

552. Following killings in Mauboke (Maubara, Liquiçá) and on the eve of the killings in the Liquiçá Church, on 5 April Xanana Gusmão issued an angry statement authorising a "general popular insurrection" against the continuing militia violence.[713] The next day the militia killed as many as 60 refugees in the Liquiçá Church, with the presence and involvement of military and Brimob (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances, section on 1999). Senior TNI officers had been seen at the church immediately prior to the event.[714] Militia then killed seven people in Cailaco (Bobonaro) on 12 April. After a mass rally in front of the Governor's office in Dili on 17 April, at which Aitarak leader Eurico Guterres told militia to "capture and kill (independence supporters) if necessary",[715] militia rampaged through Dili. At Manuel Carrascalão's house they killed 12 people.[716] Irish Foreign Minister David Andrews was meeting in Dili with East Timor military commander Colonel Tono Suratman at this time, and observed him receive the report of the massacre and do nothing. The militia also attacked and burnt down the offices of the one newspaper in the territory, Suara Timor Timur (STT, Voice of East Timor). Though it had traditionally been a mouthpiece for Indonesian policies, in late 1998 and early 1999, STT had provided a relatively neutral coverage of the rising violence and support for a referendum, enraging staunch pro-integrationists. Amid the rising violence of April, members of the clergy and nuns of the Catholic Church conducted a candle-lit peace march through the streets of Dili in an effort to calm the situation.

553. In each of these cases the killings shared the elements of direct military support or involvement, militia perpetration, the targeting of independence supporters and systematic body disposal by the military that made total deaths difficult to ascertain. These patterns strongly suggest the involvement of the TNI in conducting operations.[717] This violence was designed to create the illusion of a conflict between armed East Timorese. The Liquiçá and Dili massacres were later explained by Colonel Suratman as having been provoked by bullets fired by the pro-independence supporters.[718] However investigations showed that in no instance were the victims found to have been armed.[719]

554. On 20 April, General Wiranto flew to Dili to oversee East Timorese independence and autonomy leaders sign a peace agreement to cease hostilities. This belied the fact that the violence had been the killing of unarmed civilians seeking refuge, and was in no way a conflict between two armed groups. The Peace and Stability Commission (KPS) was established, on which the military, police and civil administration also had seats.[720] CNRT and Falintil representation was included.

The 5 May Agreements

555. The UN tabled a proposal for an autonomy plan in February 1999, named SARET (Special Autonomous Region of East Timor). Indonesia would retain control of foreign affairs, currency, defence and finance, while an East Timorese Regional Council would have wide powers of legislation and control over the police and judiciary. The TNI would be strictly for external defence, and otherwise confined to barracks.

556. In March, Indonesia decided on a direct ballot. It wanted the decision to be irrefutable and final. The ballot was to be called a "popular consultation", avoiding the word referendum that implied self-determination and a sovereign choice for the people of Timor-Leste, which Indonesia insisted had occurred by the 1976 Provisional Government of East Timor's petition for integration and Law No. 7 1976, providing for Timor-Leste's integration into Indonesia as its 27th province.

557. In view of the deteriorating security situation the UN-sponsored talks between Portugal and Indonesia on 22 April discussed security issues for disarming the militia, reducing TNI numbers, confining Falintil to cantons and the provision of civilian police. But Foreign Minister Alatas refused to agree to specifics.[721] Both the US and Australia advised the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Jamsheed Marker, not to endanger the negotiations by too strong an emphasis on security.[722]

558. On 5 May, Indonesia and Portugal signed a set of agreements on the implementation of the ballot. Indonesia wanted a result before the September meeting of its MPR in order that it could be ratified in Indonesian law. The date agreed was 8 August. This presented a strict schedule and a limited window of opportunity. The agreed wording of the ballot asked the East Timorese people whether they would accept or reject the proposed special autonomy for Timor-Leste within the Unitary State of the Republic of Indonesia. The agreements stressed a "direct, secret and universal ballot" (article 1), and that "the Government of Indonesia's responsibility for maintaining peace and security…so that a referendum could take place in an atmosphere free of intimidation, violence or interference from either side" (Article 3). They also defined an interim period after the ballot, with an adequate UN presence in Timor-Leste. The SARET guidelines were part of the agreement, with the UN responsible for conducting an information campaign about them. Both Indonesia and Portugal were forbidden to campaign for either option.

Security arrangements under the 5 May Agreements

559. The 5 May Agreements failed to define security responsibilities adequately. The Indonesian police were formally charged with responsibility for security. The police had only recently been separated from the military and were still under overall command of General Wiranto, the minister of defence. The Agreements allocated 300 unarmed international civilian police to support the UN electoral teams, and later augmented these with 50 military liaison officers, who were considered better qualified to deal with the TNI.

560. The Agreements demanded the "absolute neutrality of the TNI", but failed to require the TNI to reduce its numbers or disarm. They stated, vaguely, that the newly formed KPS be responsible for a "laying down of arms".[723] José Ramos-Horta, aware of the shortcomings of these security arrangements, did not attend the signing of the Agreements. He had previously warned the UN, in a letter to Kofi Annan, that Timor-Leste could not feel secure "with 'protection' provided by the very same army and gang of criminals that have turned the country into a hell."[724] The UN was not unaware of the dangers of these terms, and the Secretary-General wrote to Indonesia raising a number of concerns. He indicated his willingness to cancel the ballot if security was not acceptable. However this letter was informal at best and its stipulations were not agreed to by Indonesia. This left the UN weak throughout the process. Ian Martin, Special Representative of the Secretary-General, wrote later that even with a tighter security arrangement the "UN would still have faced the dilemma that lay ahead: whether or not to proceed in security conditions that clearly breached Indonesia's agreements."[725]

561. On 5 May, Army Deputy Chief of Staff Lieutenant General Johny Lumintang sent a telegram to the Bali regional command (Kodam IX Udayana) requesting the preparation of evacuation plans for Timor-Leste.* This led to police and military post-ballot contingency plans for, among other things, evacuation of up to a quarter of a million people from Timor-Leste. The plans indicated TNI's antipathy towards a range of civil society actors, including independence leaders and students, the Church, international observers and the UN, in clear contradiction of the neutrality required by the 5 May Agreements. Neither police nor the TNI informed the UN of the existence of these plans until shortly before the ballot.[726]

* The operational plans included Operasi Cabut [Operation "is lost"]; Korem's Operasi Wira Dharma 99, and Police's Operasi Hanoin Lorosae II [Operation Remember Lorosae II] [Yayasan Hak collection].

Popular Consultation

Overview

562. UN staff began arriving in Timor-Leste in late May 1999, to establish the United Nations Mission in East Timor (UNAMET). During June UNAMET international electoral staff, civilian police and military liaison officers were deployed to all 13 districts of the territory. There was less than four months for the conduct of the Popular Consultation.

563. The level of violence, which had escalated in April, eased somewhat with the arrival of the United Nations and the growing contingent of international media and observers for the ballot. Nevertheless, those responsible for the massacres of April remained at large and tensions remained high. The militia groups across the territory continued to be supported by the Indonesian military and police, and efforts were made to legitimise them within the Indonesian military administrative system.

564. Apparent attempts at peace-building between pro-independence and pro-autonomy representatives proved fruitless, partly because they did not address the role of the TNI in the violence. Falintil unilaterally cantoned its forces. TNI troops were not cantoned, nor were the pro-autonomy militias. Apparent militia disarmament just prior to the ballot was more ceremonial than real.

565. UNAMET delayed the beginning of voter registration due to security concerns in June, and Ian Martin flew to Jakarta to raise these with the head of the Indonesian security forces, General Wiranto. Voter registration proceeded, and in 22 days 451,792 voters registered.

566. Up to 40,000 people had been displaced from their homes due to violence before UNAMET arrived, and due to militia intimidation displacement continued in the weeks leading up to the ballot. The majority of internally displaced people were in the western districts of Bobonaro, Covalima and Liquiçá. Some fled to West Timor before the ballot. In the tense and at times violent atmosphere campaigning was generally a low-key affair. The pro-autonomy groups conducted several large rallies. Pro-independence supporters conducted only one large rally, in the capital on the penultimate day of the campaign period.

567. Originally set for 8 August, the day of the ballot was delayed to 30 August. The day of the Popular Consultation dawned with voters lining up in polling centres well in advance of opening time all across the country. A remarkable 98.6 per cent of registered voters came out to vote. After voting they quickly returned home, reflecting the atmosphere of anxiety.

568. Votes were brought to Dili for counting. In some areas violence against UN staff and pro-independence supporters began toward the end of the day of the vote. In the days that followed the ballot, attacks by the pro-autonomy militia increased. Amid growing threat of violence, UNAMET announced the results of the Popular Consultation on the morning of 4 September. An emphatic 78.5% of East Timorese voters had chosen to reject the proposal for special autonomy within the Republic of Indonesia, with 21.5% voting for special autonomy.

UNAMET deployment

569. United Nations officials arrived in Timor-Leste soon after the signing of the 5 May Agreements, to assess the situation and the support needs for the electoral mission. UNAMET staff started work in late May, and on 4 June the United Nations flag was raised at its compound in Dili. UNAMET staff arrived throughout June, comprising civilian electoral officers, unarmed civilian police and unarmed military liaison officers from nations across the world.* East Timorese staff, of whom there were around 4,000 for polling day, played key support roles in interpretation, administration and logistics, and as electoral support staff in the registration and voting process. They worked under the leadership of Ian Martin, whose combined title was Special Representative of the United Nations Secretary-General for the East Timor Popular Consultation and Head of the UN Mission in East Timor (UNAMET).† The original date set for the ballot was 8 August, creating a very tight operational timetable.

Electoral Commission

570. The 5 May Agreements had made reference to an independent Electoral Commission. The UN Secretary-General appointed three eminent international experts to the Commission.‡ The Commission was fully independent of UNAMET and the UN in New York, and had responsibility for certifying each stage of the Popular Consultation. The Commission was also the final arbiter for all complaints or challenges about the process.

571. Members of the Commission arrived in Dili shortly after the beginning of the voter registration process, and observed the consultation process in each of its phases.

* UNAMET international personnel comprised an electoral team with its headquarters in Dili and eight regional officers staffed by 28 professional staff and approximately 500 UN volunteers, 275 police, 15 political officers, 9 public information officers, 271 administrative and support staff, and 16 security officers from over 70 countries. Originally not included in the mission, an additional number of approximately 50 military liaison officers was added in June, after international recognition of the key role of TNI and the importance of trying to influence them. [See Martin, Self Determination in East Timor, pp. 38-39 and pp. 41-42.]

† Ian Martin had worked for the United Nations and non-governmental organisations in a number of senior positions from 1985 to 1999. He was Secretary General of Amnesty International from 1986–1992, and before that Head of its Asia and Pacific Region Research Department. Ian Martin testified to the Commission on the UNAMET period at its National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2003.

‡ Judge Johann Kriegler (Chairperson of the Electoral Commission of South Africa) who chaired the Commission, Pat Bradley (Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland), and Bong-Suk Sohn (Commissioner of the National Electoral Commission of the Republic of South Korea).

The choice

572. The question to be put to the Timorese people in the ballot was framed in two parts, with the voter required to select one option. It was based on the acceptance or rejection of the Indonesian offer of special autonomy package, based on the proposed Special Autonomous Region and known as SARET. The ballot paper read:

> "Do you accept the proposed special autonomy for East Timor within the Unitary State of the Republic of Indonesia?" or "Do you reject the proposed special autonomy for East Timor, leading to East Timor's separation from Indonesia?"

573. Indonesia and Portugal were prohibited by the 5 May Agreements from promoting either option. UNAMET's mandate included the obligation to conduct a public information campaign to explain to the Timorese people the details of the special autonomy offer. It did so with television, radio and print publications.[728]

Indonesian government coordination for the Popular Consultation

574. Indonesia established the Task Force for the Implementation of the Popular Consultation in East Timor (Satuan Tugas Pelaksanaan Penentuan Pendapat di Timor Timur, Satgas P3TT), which reported to the minister for coordination of political affairs and security in Jakarta. Representing the military on the Task Force was Major General Zacky Anwar Makarim, the most senior TNI officer in Timor-Leste during the ballot. This Task Force was the first point of liaison for UNAMET, whose staff conducted meetings with its members on almost a daily basis.[729]

International presence in Timor-Leste

575. With the presence of the United Nations in Timor-Leste, the international community poured into what had only recently been virtually a closed territory. International media contingents covered the story of preparations for the ballot, and representatives of major international newspapers and journals were on the ground. UNAMET accredited some 600 journalists in the course of the Popular Consultation.[730]

576. A number of key foreign governments maintained a close diplomatic watch on the situation in Timor-Leste throughout the UNAMET period. The US maintained a satellite consulate from its Jakarta embassy, and a US Congressional delegation visited Timor-Leste in August. Australia in particular staffed a sizeable consulate in Dili.

577. Portugal and Indonesia each sent official observer teams totalling 50 members, which travelled across the territory throughout the registration, campaigning and final preparations for the ballot.[731] They observed the day of the ballot in polling stations throughout the territory, as well as the counting in Dili. In addition to the official Portuguese and Indonesian observers, UNAMET accredited nearly 2,300 observers, which required them to follow a code of conduct guaranteeing their neutral behaviour. Nearly 500 international observers came with government delegations, representing Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Ireland, New Zealand and Spain, as well as the European Union. There were also large numbers of people from civil society and non-governmental organisations, international, Indonesian and East Timorese. Two NGOs, the Carter Center and IFET (International Federation for East Timor), maintained district-based observer teams.[732]

578. This international presence was unprecedented in the history of Timor-Leste. In the 25-year period of Indonesian presence it had been unthinkable that the territory could have been so open to the international community. After the months of bloody violence against civilians leading to the 5 May Agreements, when there was almost no international presence in Timor-Leste, the presence of internationals across the territory provided a level of monitoring that may have contributed to the reduction in large-scale attacks by militia or TNI.

East Timorese and Indonesian observers

579. UNAMET accredited around 1,700 East Timorese and Indonesian non-governmental observers for the ballot. Many came from student and activist organisations, but all had to sign up to the UNAMET code of conduct for accredited observers stipulating neutral behaviour.[733] UNAMET allowed for CNRT and the pro-integration umbrella organisation UNIF (United Front for East Timor Autonomy) to accredit observers, known as party agents, for the day of the ballot and the count.

Security for the ballot

580. The fragile security situation across the territory remained the biggest threat to the electoral process. While major operations by the Indonesian military and militias could no longer occur openly without observation by the international community, the Indonesian military did not disarm the militias or curb their intimidating presence in communities. After the massacres in April, at the Liquiçá Church and at Manuel Carrascalão's home in Dili, there was no action to investigate and arrest those responsible. An air of impunity for the crimes of late 1998 and early 1999 prevailed, despite the presence of the United Nations and the international community.

581. The 5 May Agreements had given Indonesian police formal responsibility for security during the ballot. This arrangement turned out to be completely inadequate. A key institutional problem was their subordinate status to the TNI. Despite the institutional separation of police and military commands in April 1999, both remained under the authority of the minister of defence, General Wiranto. There was a longstanding culture of TNI domination over the police in operational matters. While the TNI remained deployed across Timor-Leste in large numbers to the community-level, this placed great pressure on the police in terms of their capacity to act independently as keepers of law and order.

582. The police consistently proved unable or unwilling to control the violence during the ballot. A further reason for this may have been the presence of large numbers of Indonesian riot police, Brimob, who had won notoriety in Timor-Leste for their violence and role in major human rights violations during the 1990s. Police numbers, particularly Brimob numbers, were increased throughout the period of the ballot to a total of around 8,000.[734] Police commonly failed to respond quickly to reported violence or to arrest known perpetrators. This continued the apparent licence enjoyed by those committing violence and intimidation across the territory. A significant example of this was when the police failed to act during a Red and White Iron militia (BMP) attack on a humanitarian convoy on 4 July, despite being specifically charged with its protection.[735] More damningly, the police were repeatedly and directly involved as support to militia violence. The clearest case of this was the killing of Bernardino Agusto Guterres on 26 August 1999, who was shot dead by Brimob in Becora, Dili, while militia rampaged nearby.[736]

583. UNAMET Military Liaison Officers (MLOs) were unable to gain accurate information from TNI as to troop numbers or deployment, though it was believed that TNI numbers in Timor-Leste were in excess of 15,000.[737] Despite efforts by Xanana Gusmão to negotiate a reduction of TNI troops and a withdrawal of the remaining troops to district barracks, the Indonesian military continued to be deployed at the village level across the territory.[738]

584. The 5 May Agreements had made no direct provision for the cantonment of the TNI, the militias or Falintil, or for their disarmament. However this matter was left to the Commission on Peace and Stability (KPS) established by General Wiranto on 21 April after the massacres in Liquiçá and Dili that month.* The KPS was responsible "in cooperation with the United Nations, (to) elaborate a code of conduct, by which all parties should abide, for the period prior to and following the consultation, ensure the laying down of arms and take the necessary steps to achieve disarmament." The KPS proved ineffective in implementing this responsibility, despite an agreement signed by Commission members on 18 June that both sides would cease all acts of violence and surrender all weapons to the authorities.[739]

TNI-militia violence: June–July

585. A great deal of evidence exists chronicling the TNI direction of both the pro-autonomy campaign and the militia violence.[740]

586. After the 5 May Agreements the TNI presented the militias as civil defence groups. The District Administrator of Dili established Pam Swakarsa (Self-initiated security group) on 17 May 1999. The decision named the governor, the provincial military commander (Danrem) and the provincial police chief as top advisors to the Pam Swakarsa, and Eurico Guterres as "Operational Commander". Among the 2,650 listed members of Pam Swakarsa in Dili were the 1521 members of Aitarak militia.[741] This afforded the militia a degree of legality it had previously not enjoyed.[742] An image invoked frequently by the militia was that a "sea of fire" would descend if the East Timorese voted for independence. Foreshadowing this well before the referendum, the head of the TNI in Timor-Leste, Colonel Tono Suratman, told the Australian television current affairs programme Sunday, in June:

* The KPS comprised two members of CNRT/Falintil and two pro-integrationists, described as parties to the conflict, together with members of the Indonesian military, police and local administration. There were no civil society representatives and the United Nations was excluded. The Indonesian Human Rights Commission, Komnas HAM, convened the KPS. [See Martin, Self-Determination, p. 30 and p. 70].

> I want to give you this message. If the pro-independence side wins, it's not going to just be the government of Indonesia that has to deal with what follows. The UN and Australia are also going to have to solve the problem and well, if this does happen, then there'll be no winners. Everything is going to be destroyed. East Timor won't exist as it does now. It'll be much worse than 23 years ago.[743]

587. The Commission heard testimony from Ian Martin about evidence gathered by UNAMET staff of the link between the TNI, the local administration and the militia groups. He noted:

> As our staff moved out into the districts and sub-districts, we learned more of the activities of the militia. We rapidly came to understand that the militia were established, armed and directed by the TNI, in conjunction with the local administration. We directly encountered militia under TNI training and direction, and we said so publicly. [744]

Dare II

588. From 25 to 30 June, Bishops Belo and Nascimento made a further effort at bringing pro-independence and pro-integration East Timorese together. This Dare II Peace and Reconciliation Meeting was held in Jakarta, enabling Xanana Gusmão to participate. It was the first time since 1975 that he had met José Ramos-Horta, who was allowed to attend together with other East Timorese pro-independence representatives in exile. While discussions were held in a cordial atmosphere, the meeting did not establish a plan of action for continuing dialogue between the parties which might have reduced animosities and violence.

589. A series of militia attacks in Timor-Leste followed soon after the Dare II meeting. On 29 June the Dadarus Merah Putih militia attacked the UNAMET office in Maliana, and on 4 July the Besi Merah Putih militia attacked a humanitarian convoy between Liquiçá and Dili.[745] Ian Martin told the Commission of regular UNAMET meetings with the civilian and military members of the Indonesian Task Force, in which he and his colleagues constantly put forward their concerns. He told the Commission that on 7 July, after these attacks, he flew to Jakarta to meet with General Wiranto to put directly the UN's evidence of the relationship between TNI and the militia.[746]

590. The violence and the delays it caused provoked a flurry of diplomatic activity that ultimately succeeded in pressuring Indonesia to improve the security situation. On 12 July, the Indonesian Task Force visited Timor-Leste, accompanied by General Wiranto. Violence decreased within days and, while making it clear that the ballot could be cancelled at any time, the UN Secretary-General gave his authority for the ballot to proceed.[747]

Voter registration

591. The 5 May Agreements set 16 July as the final day allowable for voter registration to begin. This was driven by the fact that the Indonesian People's Consultative Assembly (MPR) was to convene in September, and it alone had the power to ratify in Indonesian law the outcome of the Popular Consultation. For this to happen, the ballot had to be held by the end of August. Under increasing international pressure, voter registration did begin on 16 July.

592. On 20 July, Kofi Annan reported to the Security Council:

> Such [militia] activities, which have led to the displacement of many East Timorese and denied them basic security and freedom, with the clear intention of influencing political choice, continue to pose a fundamental challenge to a credible consultation process.[748]

593. The Secretary-General also noted that CNRT activities were restricted, that independent media access was limited, that the pro-autonomy campaign had begun before the allocated period, that public officials used their offices and funds for pro-autonomy campaigning and that there had been undue pro-autonomy pressure on civil servants.[749]

594. The climate of fear created by the militia and the pro-autonomy groups caused 40,000 people to be displaced from their homes by June.[750] Due to continuing violence, this figure increased to 60,000 by mid-July (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Displacement and Famine, section on 1999). Some of these people were pro-independence leaders who had been targeted in their home villages. Many were simply fleeing violence and intimidation. Some sought protection in Timor-Leste's larger towns, while others fled to the security of West Timor. In the face of the dismal security situation, UNAMET's voter education campaign stressed the secrecy of the ballot and the pledge that the UN would remain after the vote.

595. Despite the problems and delays UNAMET's voter registration was hardly disrupted at all, and 451,792 voters were duly registered, both in Timor-Leste and overseas.* This greatly exceeded expectations in the circumstances, and demonstrated the determination of the East Timorese people to choose their political destiny even in the face of intimidation and violence. The Electoral Commission determined that the registration process was legitimate, establishing it as a sound basis for the ballot.[751]

* External polling stations were established at five locations within Indonesia, as well as in Australia and Europe.

The campaign

Pro-independence groups

596. In the climate of fear created by continuous militia activity throughout the early part of 1999, the CNRT leadership opted for a very low-key campaign. It was also confident that the East Timorese nationalism built through 24 years of resistance to Indonesian rule made an independence campaign unnecessary. Instead they focused their efforts on reconciliation in order to help create a stable and peaceful situation in which UNAMET could hold a vote.

597. In March 1999, Xanana Gusmão had asked students to take on the role of the driving force for the campaign, since for the CNRT itself to do so would be too dangerous. In April the CNRT office in Dili was destroyed by militia and most of its leadership driven underground. Around this time 800 students returned to Timor-Leste from universities across Indonesia. Many student groups united under the banner of Presidium Juventude Loriku Ass'wain Timor Lorosa'e.* Many returned to their home villages from study in Indonesia or to the capital Dili. In Dili, students focused on coordinating an information campaign and publicising the CNRT symbol displayed on the ballot. Their activities included discussing reconciliation, carrying updates on preparations for the ballot, and conveying CNRT directives. The medium for this was photocopied bulletins, as initially printers were unwilling to take the risk of printing this material. The Presidium also established a radio service, Matebian Lian (The Voice of Matebian) which, despite being forced underground, continued to broadcast.

598. The students' role risked reprisals, and they were targeted during the campaign.[752] On 20 May Aitarak militia killed two members of the Students' Solidarity Council (ETSSC) in Hera, with alleged TNI involvement.[753] Laksaur militia killed another two students in Covalima.[754] In accordance with CNRT orders, students did not respond to the militia violence. This was critical in avoiding an escalation of conflict between East Timorese groups that the TNI could portray as civil war.

599. From 1 to 4 July, Xanana Gusmão met at his prison house in Salemba with the CNRT delegation to the Dare II gathering in Jakarta, together with other CNRT members, and formed the CNRT campaign team, the Commission for Planning and Coordination of the Campaign (Comissão de Planeamento e Coordenacão de Campanha, CPCC). The CPCC met in Dili on 9 July, and formulated its campaign plan. This focused on a low-key door-to-door campaign, primarily to publicise the CNRT symbol and to build a sense of national unity and stability. Its flag had only recently been publicly displayed in Timor-Leste and many were not yet familiar with

* The East Timor Students' Solidarity Council (ETSSC) was a notable and prominent exception; it chose not to be aligned with the CNRT, which it perceived to be tainted by the partisan politics of 1975.

it. It also published the broadsheet newspaper Vox Populi, with a circulation of 1,300 copies every second day, and produced a radio programme by the same name.[755]

Active pro-autonomy groups

600. In early 1999 a number of organisations formed what became the political wing of the pro-autonomy campaign. On 27 January the Forum for Unity, Democracy and Justice (Forum Persatuan, Demokrasi dan Keadilan, FPDK) was inaugurated, led by the District Administrator of Dili, Domingos Soares. In April, the East Timor People's Front (Barisan Rakyat Timor Timur, BRTT) was formed, with former UDT President Francisco Lopes da Cruz as its leader. A third organisation, the United Front for East Timor Autonomy (UNIF) emerged on 23 June.

601. The FPDK and its sibling pro-autonomy organisations were closely linked to and funded by the civil administration.[756] They routinely attended the tripartite military-police-government meetings (Muspida), although they had no official standing. By the time of UNAMET's arrival, the joint campaign of the militia and the pro-autonomy groups had been in operation for some time. Individuals were under pressure to declare publicly their allegiance to Indonesia, both by attending rallies and by displaying an Indonesian flag in front of their houses. One target of this coercion was civil servants. FPDK mounted a campaign to discredit UNAMET, which was given widespread publicity in Indonesia and through Indonesia's diplomatic channels.[757]

602. The formation on 23 June of UNIF aimed to bring the pro-autonomy groups under one body, led by a number of senior East Timorese pro-integrationist leaders. Basilio Araújo told the Commission:

> *UNIF…covered all of us, and had a collective leadership [presidium] including Mr Lopes [da Cruz, Indonesian Ambassador at large and leader of BRTT], Mr Armindo [Soares, leader of East Timor's provincial assembly (DPRD)], Mr Domingos [Soares, Dili District Administrator and leader of FPDK], and Mr João Tavares ["Commander-in-Chief" of the]…PPI , so the collective leadership was a single group, and I continued as its spokesman, while still spokesman for FPDK.[758]

Indonesian civil administration in Timor-Leste

603. The civilian administration in Timor-Leste conducted a campaign to "socialise" the special autonomy package in contravention of the May Agreements, which had vested sole responsibility for this with UNAMET. Its approach combined coercion and incentives, taking advantage of the administration's influence over its employees. In a letter to civil service heads (Kepala Instansi Vertikal dan Otonomi) dated 28

* PPI- the Forces of Struggle for Integration, led by João Tavares; an umbrella group that united older paramilitary groups with the new militia groups that emerged in 1999.

May 1999, the Governor directed that civil servants engaged in activities opposed to the Indonesian government must be dismissed.[759] It also funded pro-autonomy rallies around the territory, at which armed militia were active and forced local attendance.[760]

604. In addition to its campaign activities, the civil administration was deeply involved in the funding and organisation of the militias. In May Governor Abilio José Osorio Soares wrote to all District Administrators (Bupati) requesting budget proposals for Pam Swakarsa (civil defence units) and for "expenses associated…with (the) autonomy plan".[761] Each district received a part of the government Social Safety Net Program funds, which were likely to have included funds provided by the World Bank. The distribution was approved by the Governor, and included in distribution of funds to police, to be spent on socialisation of the autonomy package.[762]

The official campaign period

605. The campaign officially began on 14 August, and was brief. Across the country event schedules were drawn up in liaison with UNAMET staff in an attempt to regulate meetings and rallies to avoid clashes between pro-integration and pro-autonomy supporters. CNRT was unable to open offices in three districts due to the threat of violence,* while in others they were quickly targeted and forced to close. Among those forced to close were Dili on 17 August, Manatuto on 19 August and Ainaro on 21 August.[763] Students and civil society groups played a key role in the pro-independence campaign. Later, documentary evidence showed that the TNI listed CNRT, ETSSC and OJETIL as "enemy forces" in its operational plan for the referendum.†

606. Killings continued during the campaign period, notably between August 14 and 16, which led CNRT to end its campaign activities in the districts on 19 August. It mounted one last public campaign rally in Dili on 25 August. Thousands came out in support, and remarkably Dili was peaceful. Chaos, however, followed the final pro-autonomy rally in Dili the next day. Eight were killed, including Agusto Guterres, the student shot by Brimob in Becora. That night the offices of Renetil and the CNRT were burnt. This surge of violence by pro-autonomy supporters signalled the end of public campaign activities in Dili.

Declining security situation: August

607. An account by East Timor Military Commander Tono Suratman of the campaign period indicates both Indonesia's insistence that TNI bore responsibility for security despite the provisions of the 5 May Agreements that specifically charged the police with this task, and his maintenance of the fiction of a genuine civil war rather than an engineered conflict:

* Bobonaro, Ermera, Liquiçá.

† Operasi Wira Dharma 1999.

> Security had to be made conducive before the referendum… Indonesia, in this case the police and TNI, implemented this and were responsible for the problems of security and its derivative, the problem of legal enforcement…I privately feel, TNI's security responsibility was very heavy. The time to settle the situation was so short…while the history of intra-East Timorese violence was 23 years old, or more.[765]

608. Throughout the campaign period TNI persisted in the argument that armed militia were an East Timorese response to Falintil, completely disregarding either the TNI's role in the establishing and supporting them, or even the TNI-Falintil conflict of 24 years.

609. The TNI's misrepresentation of the conflict and denial of its own combatant status made negotiations for peace and stability difficult. It never once disclosed its troop levels in the territory to UNAMET MLOs.[766] Faced with this situation, Xanana Gusmão as Falintil commander-in-chief demanded a minimum of a TNI troop reduction and confinement to barracks. Meanwhile TNI commander Wiranto demanded that Falintil disarm. Although TNI did not reduce its numbers, Falintil unilaterally confined itself to cantonments with the explicit objective of proving that it was not the source of violence and of persuading the TNI to reciprocate by itself withdrawing to barracks and by disarming the militias. By 12 August, all 670 Falintil troops were confined to their cantons.*

610. However, the TNI did not withdraw troops to district level barracks, and militia members remained threateningly at large in communities across the territory. Days after the completion of the Falintil cantonment, militia leaders announced that they would lay down their arms. UNAMET observed ceremonies in four districts between 16 and 19 August, where militia members handed over their guns to the police. However, UNAMET observed that the amount of weapons "was only a fraction of those in possession of the militia."[767]

611. Although pro-integration leaders accused Falintil of excesses during this period, UNAMET investigations rarely substantiated such claims. Two incidents of pro-independence violence were proven. In one, independence supporters killed a pro-integration supporter on 12 July, and an Aitarak militia member was killed in Becora, Dili on 29 August.[768]

612. In addition to his role in the Task Force for the Implementation of the Popular Consultation in East Timor, Major-General Zacky Anwar Makarim seems to have been entrusted with the task of running the militia campaign.[769] On 18 August a US Congressional delegation witnessed violence in Suai and their testimony led to the official removal of Makarim, as well as of the Bobonaro and Covalima district commanders. The rationale behind this removal was that a few isolated officers were responsible for the violence, an approach that did nothing to curb the excesses of the Indonesian military as an institution. On 13 August, Colonel Tono Suratman was replaced by another Korem Commander with a Kopassus background, Colonel Noer Muis.[770]

* The four Falintil cantonment sites were in Uaimori, Manatuto (260 troops), Atalari, Baucau (70 troops), Poetete, Ermera (153 troops) and Aiassa, Bobonaro (187 troops). UNAMET Military Liaison Officers observed these cantonment sites and met with Falintil members. [See Martin, Self-Determination, p. 73.]

613. On 24 August, the UN Secretary-General addressed the Security Council and cited a statement from the independent Electoral Commission that the election period was never "free of intimidation, violence or interference (as required by 5 May Agreements)".[771]

Final preparations for the vote

614. The formal campaign period ended on 26 August. UNAMET employed up to 4,000 East Timorese staff to assist in the conduct of the ballot at the 200 polling stations across the country.[772] All staff were required to conduct themselves in a politically neutral manner, and were managed by international electoral staff. International observer groups and media arrived in large numbers in the days leading up to 30 August, ensuring that the ballot itself took place under the scrutiny of the international community.

The ballot

615. 30 August 1999 dawned as a remarkable day in the history of Timor-Leste. Despite months of intimidation and violence, people across the country came out in droves to cast their ballot.[773] Many dressed in their best clothes, and in rural areas they walked for hours to reach polling centres. By dawn, up to 50% of those registered to vote were waiting outside polling stations to cast their ballot. People waited patiently in long queues in most polling centres, and quickly returned home after casting their vote. Polling stations opened from 6.30am to 4.00pm, though in most places voting was completed by early afternoon.

616. International observers and the media commented on the courage and dignity of the people, who after 24 years of violence would not allow the intimidation of the past months to prevent them exercising their right to determine their future. The East Timorese cast their ballots in huge numbers, with 98.6% of those registered voting. In contrast to the surge of violence on 26 August, the day was peaceful in most areas. However, militia killed two East Timorese UNAMET staff in Atsabe. A Civpol (UN Civilian Police) witness placed the TNI at the scene.[774]

617. Immediately after the vote, before the count and the announcement of results, the Indonesian Foreign Minister, Ali Alatas, confirmed the Indonesian government's view that the ballot was legitimate:

> I am very encouraged and pleased to say that [the vote] constitutes indeed a free and peaceful, and therefore fair execution, of the consultation.[775]

618. However, the pro-integration spokesman Basilio Araújo produced a list of 37 alleged violations by UNAMET staff and claimed the ballot was unfair. The Electoral Commission considered the objections of the pro-integration supporters over a day and a half of deliberations on 2 to 3 September. The Electoral Commission concluded:

> Whatever merit there might be in individual complaints regarding alleged misconduct and/or partiality on the part of the electoral staff, none of them, singly or collectively, impaired the process as such.[776]

The count and the results

619. In order to ensure the secrecy of the ballot, the vote was counted in Dili. In the afternoon of 30 August, UNAMET staff from the polling stations brought the votes to their district headquarters under the watch of the UN police. These were stored under guard by UN police overnight, and were brought to the Dili counting centre by helicopter or by road convoy by UNAMET staff and UN police on 31 August. In Maliana a helicopter transporting the ballots was shot at, and in Gleno and Atsabe in Ermera District there was violence and intimidation from militia groups against the UNAMET teams transporting ballot boxes.[777] The count was centralised in Dili. There would be no individual reporting of district or regional results, but a single result for the entire electorate. This was to ensure both security for regions who might otherwise be targeted by violence for their political affiliation, and also to counter earlier suggestions by the pro-autonomy movement that the territory might be split to reflect regional results.

620. At the counting centre in the Dili Museum in Comoro, UNAMET electoral officers from across the country gathered to conduct the count. International observers, including the official Portuguese and Indonesian delegations, had access to the count centre and witnessed all stages of the process. Many of the large international media contingent left Timor-Leste immediately after the peaceful day of voting, as did some of the international observers.

621. Militia violence broke out in the days following the ballot. On 1 September militia arrived in Dili and conducted attacks on pro-independence supporters close to the UNAMET compound in Balide. One man was filmed by international media running for his life and being caught and hacked to death by militia. Hundreds sought refuge in the school next door to the UNAMET compound. In Ermera violence broke out, and UNAMET evacuated its staff to Dili. On 2 September in Maliana, militia surrounded the UNAMET office and went on a spree of shooting and house burning. Two East Timorese UNAMET staff were killed.

622. Counting proceeded round the clock, in increasingly poor security conditions. The UN determined to make a simultaneous announcement of the result, by the Secretary-General in New York on the evening of 3 September and by his Special Representative Ian Martin in Dili on the morning of 4 September. In consultation with the Indonesian

Task Force, it was thought that a morning announcement in Dili would allow for better control of the security situation during the initial ensuing daylight hours.[778]

623. At 9.00am, Saturday 4 September, Ian Martin read the results of the ballot at the Mahkota Hotel in Dili: 21.5% of voters had voted for the special autonomy package, 78.5% against. The Electoral Commission had prepared its final determination on the ballot:

> The Commission was able to conclude that the popular consultation had been procedurally fair and in accordance with the New York Agreements, and consequently provided an accurate reflection of the will of the people of East Timor. There can be no doubt that the overwhelming majority of the people of this troubled land wish to separate from the Republic of Indonesia.[779]

Indonesia departs: scorched earth

Overview

624. With the announcement of the result of the ballot the United Nations called on Indonesia to ensure security in the territory.[780] Diplomatic pressure was brought to bear to achieve this end, but provisions for the protection of the East Timorese population were still inadequate. The events of September and October 1999 have been the subject of two judicial processes and a number of investigative reports, by East Timorese, Indonesian and international organisations, agencies and organs, including the United Nations.*

625. The Indonesian military and militia are known to have killed between 1,200 and 1,500 East Timorese in 1999, 900 of these after the ballot. Between them they murdered 400 in mass killings, and the remainder in individual killings.[781] Victims suffered brutal deaths, many were cut down with machetes, and of those that escaped death many were mutilated and continue to suffer health problems. In particular, the killers targeted and executed CNRT leaders and their families.[782] Torture, sexual violence and forcible transfer of the population occurred across the territory.[783] Over half the population, 550,000 people, fled their homes, including 250,000 who were transferred to West Timor by force or under intimidation (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).[784] Militia killed people seeking refuge in churches, and clergy and nuns were among those targeted. TNI and militia collaborated in implementing a strategy of mass violence across the territory.

626. The attention of the world focused on the UNAMET compound in Dili where a small number of UNAMET officials and the only remaining international journalists in the territory took refuge. Frantic diplomatic activity took place both behind the scenes and sometimes publicly to put pressure on Indonesia to fulfil its security obligations or consent to an international force to restore security. No nations were willing to act to protect the people of Timor-Leste without Indonesia's consent. East Timorese leaders outside Timor-Leste worked to convince world and regional powers to intervene to save lives. At the United Nations, at the APEC summit being held in New Zealand, in Portugal and Rome, in Jakarta and Australia, East Timorese leaders worked unceasingly.

* UN Commission of Experts in 1999–2000, Serious Crimes Unit and Panel in Timor-Leste; the East Timor Ad Hoc Tribunal on Human Rights in Jakarta, Indonesia; the Indonesian KPP-HAM report and the report by Professor Geoffrey Robinson for the UN High Commissioner of Human Rights are perhaps the most notable to date. The latter was delivered as a submission to the CAVR by the OHCHR.

627. With the TNI demonstrating that it would not bring the violence under control and with a Security Council team on the ground in Dili and Jakarta, Indonesian President Habibie consented to an international force on 12 September. A week later the commander of the International Force for East Timor (Interfet), Australian Major-General Peter Cosgrove, arrived in Dili followed a day later by his troops. As the TNI departed Timor-Leste, it destroyed 70% of major infrastructure, houses, and buildings, it razed entire villages and it looted the possessions of the East Timorese.[785]

628. Xanana Gusmão returned to Timor-Leste on 22 October, and on 25 October the UN Security Council established the United Nations Transitional Administration for East Timor (UNTAET), with Sérgio Vieira de Mello as its head. The task of addressing the humanitarian crisis and rebuilding the shattered nation of Timor-Leste lay ahead.

Violence following announcement of the results

629. The post-ballot violence that began late on 30 August and built during the days of vote counting intensified after the announcement of the result on 4 September 1999. In Dili, fearing the threat of reprisal for the pro-independence vote, large numbers of people either fled to Dare in the foothills behind the city or sought refuge in places such as the ICRC compound, Bishop Belo's residence and the Dili Diocese compound, and the school next to the UNAMET compound. UNAMET staff withdrew to the Balide compound after the announcement of the ballot result.

630. On 5 September, the Aitarak militia, the TNI and the police, assaulted the Dili Diocese office, segregating East Timorese UNAMET staff and CNRT members, and killing between 15 and 20 of the 300 people seeking refuge in its grounds.[786] The military moved the few remaining journalists and surviving internally displaced persons to the UNAMET compound in Balide, where internationals were to remain until their evacuation. On 6 September, the militia violently cleared the 7,000 people seeking refuge at the ICRC compound and Bishop Belo's residence on Dili's waterfront, which they then destroyed. These people were later taken to West Timor as part of a contingency plan named Hanoin Lorosae II (Operation Remember Lorosae II) developed by the police months earlier, as noted above.

631. On the same day on the south coast in Suai, the Laksaur militia, in the presence of the district administrator and district police and military chiefs, killed between 27 and 200 of the remaining 2,000 refugees in the church.[787] Among the first to be killed were three priests, cut down with machetes by militia members. Subsequent exhumation of bodies indicated children and women were among the dead.[788] Investigations and witness testimony have shown the involvement of TNI territorial troops.[789]

632. The murder of the Catholic priests signalled that the Catholic Church had become a target. The Church had long maintained its tense co-existence with the Indonesian occupying authorities, but until the post-ballot violence its personnel had not been a target for murder. In the days that followed the attack in Suai, this targeting of Catholic clergy became a pattern seen in other districts. The Commission heard eyewitness testimony of the very deliberate targeting of clergy when they were seeking to prevent violence:

> I saw Father Francisco holding up both hands and saying to the militia, "Enough. Don't shoot anymore. All of us are Timorese. Stop." The Father screamed when he saw how many victims had fallen, however the militia paid no attention to his screams. Then a militia…approached Father Francisco. He pretended to hug Father [Francisco], then escorted him down to the grotto of the Virgin Mary. When they came back, [he] shot the priest. But Father Francisco was not yet dead, so [he] took a sword and stabbed him in the chest. That is when he died.[790]

633. As the tension and violence mounted across the country, people fled their homes seeking safety in the forests and mountains. Thousands of people flocked to the protection of Falintil in their cantonments.

634. In general the violence against the community by TNI and militias was most severe in the western districts. In these districts, close to the border with West Timor and where there were fewer Falintil, TNI-militia links were strongest. By 7 September Falintil Deputy Commander Taur Matan Ruak was desperate, and threatened to retaliate from his base at Uaimori. Speaking to Taur Matan Ruak by satellite phone, Xanana Gusmão forbade this no matter what the cost in human life and suffering, on the grounds that any retaliation would create the civil war TNI had so long tried to engineer and risk forfeiting the international intervention that was the only hope for salvation.[791] Falintil discipline remained mostly intact despite the extreme provocation. A number of killings perpetrated by independence supporters or Falintil members were reported as having occurred during the period after the ballot, mostly in the western districts.[792]

TNI takes formal control

635. On 4 September, TNI reorganised its Timor-Leste command under Major-General Adam Damiri of Kodam IX Udayana, taking formal control from the police. On 5 September, General Wiranto met with militia and TNI commanders in Timor-Leste, and then with Bishop Belo, who asked Wiranto to control the militia.[793] On 6 September, the Secretary-General's Personal Representative Jamsheed Marker pushed Indonesia to invite international forces, a request which met with an angry refusal. President Habibie declared martial law the next day, placing Major-General Kiki Syahnakri in command. He replaced territorial units with Kostrad troops, the theory being that the territorial troops were acting out of emotional attachment to the territory and that new troops would be more likely to conduct themselves professionally.

636. Crimes against humanity continued to occur after the TNI took formal control. These attacks followed the established pattern of militia killings involving the TNI, frequently with senior TNI personnel in direct attendance. Many killings had common elements: they followed a period of mounting violence, they targeted select individuals, and they seemed to conform to a procedure that extended to systematic body disposal using trucks that all evidence indicates were supplied by the military.[794] Their patterns included weaponry, which relied on "home-made" guns (senjata rakitan), knives, machetes, and some automatic weapons.[795] The threats, beatings, rapes and house burnings of previous months were now perpetrated systematically and on a mass scale. Militia burnt Timor-Leste with petrol supplied by the military, often delivered in fire engines with petrol in their water tanks. They loaded looted goods onto army trucks. It is improbable that such an enormous logistical exercise could have been carried out without TNI involvement.[796]

637. The Commission also received a submission containing testimony that priceless East Timorese cultural artefacts and relics were taken by Indonesian authorities from the site known as the Dili Museum in Comoro during the violence in September 1999.[797] The Museum had been opened by Indonesian authorities in 1995, and in 1999 housed a collection of some 3,000 objects, including ancient tais (traditional woven cloth), traditional pottery, basketry, and sacred and domestic carvings in wood and stone. The submission quotes an interview with Virgilio Simith, who in 1999 was a senior member of CNRT responsible for cultural affairs. In the first Cabinet of the RDTL after 20 May 2002, Virgilio Simith was the Secretary of State for Culture, Youth and Sport. Virgilio Simith said that many objects were taken to the Museum in Kupang, where he said there are now 68 pieces of East Timorese tais. He recalled that during continuing negotiations on outstanding bilateral issues between Indonesia and Timor-Leste during the UNTAET administration, Indonesian representatives had explained the removal of the artefacts by saying that "because of the unsettled political environment in Timor-Leste, the objects were removed for 'safekeeping.'" However, Virgilio Simith noted that he understands that authorities in Kupang now maintain that the objects were "bought with funds from the Indonesian budget and therefore form a part of the Indonesian patrimony." Virgilio Simith told interviewers that he believed that many of the items, especially the tais, had been on sale in the Indonesian town of Ubud in Bali since around 1999.[798]

638. Sexual violence and sexual slavery were widespread during this period. The Commission heard in particular from many women in Suai of their experiences after the massacre at the church on 6 September, when they were taken to the nearby school and repeatedly raped before being forced over the border where many were held in sexual slavery.[799]

639. The 8 September killings in Maliana illustrate the pattern well. Following days of mounting violence TNI trucks brought militia to the district police headquarters, where hundreds of people had sought refuge. In the presence of TNI and police officers the militia singled out and executed at least 13 CNRT leaders among those taking shelter.[800] Thirteen who escaped the massacre were hunted down and killed with machetes the following day. Some days later a similar incident took place far from sight in the isolated district of Oecussi. The Sakunar militia segregated and killed CNRT leaders in Passabe. Following this, an estimated 170 people were killed over the following month, the last killed two days before Interfet's belated arrival in the district.[801]

The UNAMET compound

640. While this violence was going on around the territory, unarmed UNAMET personnel took refuge in their regional headquarters. Ian Martin testified to the Commission about the situation in the compound during this period, and about UN efforts to gain international intervention. He told of direct attacks against UNAMET personnel and offices in the districts, and the decision to withdraw UNAMET regional teams to the Dili compound. A UN police officer was shot by militia using a high-powered weapon in Liquiçá and was only saved by his flack-jacket; in Baucau, police trained automatic weapon fire for over 20 minutes at chest height into the UNAMET office, where over 70 staff were seeking refuge. When the Baucau regional office staff evacuated to the airport, TNI and militia sought to prevent the evacuation of East Timorese UNAMET staff to Dili. By 5 September most UNAMET regional teams had withdrawn from the districts to the Dili compound in Balide. Ian Martin recalled that East Timorese staff members of UNAMET were especially targeted, and told the Commission:

> UNAMET local staff were among the first to be killed as the polls closed and in the days which followed. Fifteen East Timorese staff members of UNAMET are known or believed to have lost their lives…I ask that the Commission take note of the particular courage displayed by the local staff of UNAMET, without whose service the United Nations could not have fulfilled its mandate to conduct the ballot.[802]

641. UNAMET staff were trapped in the compound in Balide. Teams leaving the compound in Dili to seek access to food and water in the UNAMET warehouse were shot at. The small number of foreigners still in Dili fled to the compound, along with a number of East Timorese seeking refuge. On the evening of 5 September, sustained automatic gunfire was heard at the school next to the compound and after 20 minutes of attack, large numbers of people seeking refuge in the school started to leap the razor-wired walls into the UNAMET compound. There were around 1,500 people in this group. This meant that there were over 3,000 people in the UNAMET compound, with limited access to food, water and sanitary conditions.

642. By 6 September, apart from Church personnel, there were virtually no foreigners in Timor-Leste outside the UNAMET compound. The TNI cordoned off the compound, achieving the first step of closing off Timor-Leste to the outside world. Among those trapped in the compound were a small number of international journalists. On mobile telephones and satellite connections they told the story to the world. But while the world media focused on the besieged UNAMET compound in Dili, it had no images of the systematic violence and destruction taking place across the territory.

Growing international pressure

643. East Timorese leaders outside the territory conducted frantic diplomatic activity to seek international intervention. Xanana Gusmão was finally released from imprisonment by Indonesia on 7 September, and handed over to UNAMET in Jakarta. To forestall any assassination attempt, he was shuttled to the British Embassy in Jakarta, and from there to Darwin, Australia. Bishop Belo had been evacuated to Baucau after his Dili residence was attacked, and from there by UN airplane to Darwin on 6 September. He travelled to Rome and Lisbon to seek support. José Ramos-Horta and others travelled to Auckland, in New Zealand, where regional and world leaders had gathered for the annual APEC summit. Worldwide, and especially in Australia and Portugal, mass protests, driven by the non-governmental solidarity movement and by the East Timorese diaspora, called for international intervention. Combined with the poignant but limited images from the UNAMET compound in Dili, and the messages of journalists and others in the compound, the story dominated international news and kept up pressure on Indonesia and world leaders to intervene.[803]

644. The UN Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, conducted his own urgent personal diplomacy. His first efforts were aimed at having Indonesia fulfil its security obligations. President Habibie opposed the Secretary-General's idea of an international peacekeeping force, conveyed by a direct telephone call on 5 September, and instead declared martial law in the territory. The Secretary-General increased the pressure on Indonesia by stating publicly that further measures would have to be considered if matters did not improve in Timor-Leste within 48 hours.[804]

645. Before the ballot, and again on 1 September, Portugal had been calling for the mobilisation of an international peacekeeping force. Australia had been making quiet preparations in the event of the need for military intervention since late 1998, and had troops in readiness. New Zealand was also preparing. However, no state was prepared to intervene militarily without Indonesia's consent.[805] On 4 September the Australian Foreign Affairs Minister, Alexander Downer, publicly declared Australia's willingness to lead an international force into Timor-Leste, if Indonesia agreed and if it received a UN Security Council mandate. Kofi Annan and the Australian

Prime Minister John Howard were in constant contact about these efforts, seeking Indonesian agreement to an international force and gathering a coalition to form a force which could be rapidly deployed.

646. On 5 September, the UN Security Council formed a mission to travel to Jakarta and Timor-Leste.* The mission left New York on 6 September, accompanied by Francesc Vendrell, the Deputy Personal Representative of the Secretary-General. The mission began meetings on 8 September. It met President Habibie, his likely successor Megawati Soekarnoputri, a delegation of UNAMET staff who had left the Dili compound and flown direct to Jakarta, and with General Wiranto. They also met the recently released Xanana Gusmão. The mission insisted that it travel to Timor-Leste.

647. On 10 September, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Mary Robinson, flew to Darwin to meet with East Timorese UNAMET staff and refugees who had been evacuated. She talked publicly of the need to bring those responsible for the violence to justice.[806]

648. Meanwhile, the gathering of world political and economic leaders at the APEC summit fortuitously provided a forum for addressing the situation. Influential statements came from the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF). World Bank President James Wolfensohn wrote directly to President Habibie on 8 September stressing the importance of Indonesia restoring order and honouring the result of the Popular Consultation. Indonesia, still economically vulnerable after the 1997 Asian financial crisis, came under increasing pressure. When US President Clinton arrived at the summit on 11 September he announced the suspension of arms sales to Indonesia. The UK and the European Union made similar announcements.

649. On 11 September, the Security Council mission travelled to Dili. General Wiranto flew to Timor-Leste in advance of the mission. When it arrived Dili was relatively calm, indicating the capacity of the TNI to maintain security when it chose to do so.[807] The mission was briefed at TNI headquarters, and met with UNAMET staff and displaced East Timorese people in the compound. It returned to Jakarta later that day, as the Security Council was meeting in New York to consider the situation in Timor-Leste. The Security Council meeting lasted nearly six hours, with 50 delegations speaking.[808] Support for international intervention in Timor-Leste was high, with many countries seeking Indonesia's consent to this step.

650. The isolation of Indonesia over events in Timor-Leste had reached its height. On 12 September, with the Security Council mission still in Jakarta, President Habibie held a Cabinet meeting. Following this he telephoned the UN Secretary-General to ask for UN assistance to restore peace and security in Timor-Leste, and immediately after made an announcement to this effect on Indonesian national television and radio networks.

651. With Indonesian consent gained, the Security Council passed Resolution 1264 (1999) on 15 September, mandating a multinational force with full Chapter VII powers to restore peace and security in Timor-Leste. Ian Martin testified to the Commission that it was only after this international commitment that he made the decision to close down the UNAMET compound in Dili. He told the Commission that earlier, on 8 September, he had recommended that UNAMET withdraw but that a meeting with senior staff demonstrated that they were willing to stay as long as East Timorese were with them in the compound.[809] On 10 September the first evacuation removed most of the UNAMET staff, including some East Timorese staff, leaving 80 volunteers to stay with the East Timorese seeking refuge in the compound. Many of them were local UNAMET polling staff, and were certain to be targeted if left behind.

* The five members of the mission were Martin Andjabal of Namibia, Ambassador Jeremy Greenstock of the United Kingdom, Ambassador Danilo Türk of Slovenia, Ambassador Hasmy Agam of Malaysia and Minister Alphons Hamer, the Deputy President of the Security Council, of the Netherlands.

652. When Indonesia announced on 12 September that it would accept international intervention, there were fears that the TNI and the militia would seek to take reprisals against the UNAMET staff and those displaced with them in the UNAMET compound before the force could land in Dili.[810] Intense diplomatic activity sought the permission of President Habibie and Prime Minister Howard for the evacuation of the 1,500 East Timorese displaced in the UNAMET compound, and on 14 September they were evacuated to Darwin. Ian Martin travelled with them. The UNAMET compound was closed, and a small team of 12 UNAMET staff relocated to the heavily fortified Australian consulate where they awaited the arrival of Interfet, surrounded by Kostrad soldiers.

Forced evacuation of population

653. Behind the frantic diplomatic efforts and the limited picture of Timor-Leste offered by those still in the UNAMET compound, the destruction and forced relocations that had begun in the days following the announcement of the result of the Popular Consultation intensified. Although generally worse and of longer duration in those western areas where TNI-militia links were stronger, the violence took place across the territory.[811]

654. Before the ballot, the TNI and police had planned a mass evacuation of the population. They had detailed contingency plans to save the population from a civil war that Indonesia forecast would follow the ballot. This was part of a pre-planned policy, as noted above (see paragraph 651).[812] Views differ as to whether this was an evacuation to protect East Timorese, or a forced removal under intimidation and violence. While some genuinely sought to leave the territory, the conditions of violence were generated by the TNI and its militias, the same agents organising the evacuation. Following the ballot, 250,000 people, over a quarter of the population, were transferred from Timor-Leste, mostly to West Timor (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). Both military and police were involved in effecting their removal, and police and military district commands were used as transit points for the evacuation.[813] Frightened by marauding militia, many people sought military or police protection and were subsequently taken to West Timor. Eyewitness accounts say people were expelled from their homes by TNI and militia, then their property was destroyed.[814] Forced expulsions continued until the arrival of Interfet on 20 September.[815] Many East Timorese had fled by airplane to Java in the days immediately following the ballot, fearing the outbreak of violence.

655. About 400,000 people were estimated to have fled violence in the towns and villages for the relative security of the hills inside Timor-Leste (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). Not trusting the Indonesian military or police, many ran to the protection of Falintil cantonment areas in the mountains. Tens of thousands fled the large towns. Around 10,000 left Ermera, and between 30,000 and 40,000 people fled Dili for the area around the Church compound in the foothills around Dare. In Dare those with mobile telephones called contacts around the world and described their bird's-eye view of the destruction of Dili. Food, water and medicines were in short supply, and the fear of TNI and militia attack was high.

Interfet arrives: TNI withdraws

656. On 19 September, the commander of Interfet, Australian Major-General Peter Cosgrove, his Thai deputy and heads of other national contingents flew from Darwin to Dili, accompanied by the head of UNAMET, Ian Martin. On 20 September Interfet troops arrived in Timor-Leste.*

657. The Indonesian military was in the process of withdrawing. On 20–21 September, Battalion 745 withdrew from Lautém to Dili, and are known to have killed 17 people as they did so (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). In addition to TNI killings in the post-ballot period, certain militia groups continued to be active. On 23 September militia killed 12 people in Ainaro. On 25 September five days after Interfet arrived in Timor-Leste, the long-established Kopassus-linked Tim Alfa militia ambushed and executed, with machetes, members of a humanitarian convoy led by Catholic nuns on a bend near the Sika River in the district of Lautém. Nine people, including five clergy, an Indonesian journalist and two others were killed.[816]

658. Conscious of TNI anger at its intervention, and aware of the potential danger posed by militia groups, Interfet deployed cautiously. It took a month to reach isolated areas such as Oecussi. As it secured areas, people who had been hiding in the mountains or sheltering with Falintil returned to the ruins of their towns and villages. Many of those returning from the mountains and other places of internal displacement were hungry and sick, and generally in very poor condition. On 30 October the last of the Indonesian military had withdrawn.[817] The Falintil commander-in-chief, Xanana Gusmão, was present at Dili airport to see off the final departing troops.

659. The experience of the 250,000 refugees in West Timor was substantially different from that of people internally displaced within Timor-Leste. Most settled in camps along the border and near Kupang. The Commission heard testimony from a coalition of Indonesian non-governmental organisations from West Timor who worked with East Timorese refugees.[818] The coalition told of camps controlled by the TNI and their militia auxiliaries, where ordinary people lived under fear and intimidation. Women and girls in particular were powerless and vulnerable. Testimonies to the Commission from women victims tell of sexual slavery at the hands of militia members.

* At full strength, Interfet comprised approximately 11,000 troops from 20 different countries. Australia commanded the force, and contributed 5,000 troops. It took some time to reach its maximum strength, and initially was outnumbered by the TNI. [Dunn, East Timor, p. 361].

660. Facilities in West Timor were poorly prepared and could not cope with such numbers. Upon arrival, many signed forms declaring their intention to become Indonesian citizens and accept resettlement elsewhere in Indonesia. Some later said they signed under duress.[819] Militia groups retained authority within the camps, and continued to target CNRT leaders. Mau Hodo, who had tried to continue dialogue with the KPS after the ballot, disappeared in Atambua.[820] Long after the Popular Consultation, the militia continued to harass and intimidate refugees and to spread misinformation about the situation in Timor-Leste. They also interfered with those that wished to return.[821]

The formation of UNTAET: Security Council Resolution 1272, 25 October 1999

661. Small numbers of UNAMET staff returned to Timor-Leste with the arrival of Interfet. Military liaison officers were the first to return, then a small number of police and civilian affairs officers. The immediate concern was security and stability, and addressing the urgent humanitarian crisis. With Interfet deployed and securing the territory, a huge international humanitarian intervention began. A conference of donors was held in November in Tokyo where pledges of $522 million were received.[822] UN agencies, the IMF and the World Bank, and international NGOs mobilised emergency relief. The CNRT organised its network to assist this operation. East Timorese NGOs were active in humanitarian assistance and coordination, although they faced a major challenge in holding their own as the huge international operation got under way. The Catholic Church played an important role in coordination in many places.

662. Indonesia maintained that it had de jure control of Timor-Leste until its Parliament made a formal decision on the results of the ballot. However, it agreed that the United Nations could exercise de facto powers.[823] On 19 October, the Indonesian People's Consultative Assembly (MPR) rescinded the 1976 law incorporating Timor-Leste as a province (East Timor), and on 25 October the UN Security Council passed Resolution 1272 (1999) establishing the United Nations Transitional Administration of East Timor (UNTAET), making the United Nations the official administering authority of Timor-Leste.

Returning home

663. For East Timorese people in West Timor, in other parts of Indonesia, in Portugal, Australia and other parts of world, those who had been displaced recently, those being released from Indonesian prisons, and those in long-term exile, the question was when and how to return home. Of East Timorese leaders outside Timor-Leste, Bishop Belo was the first to return on 5 October after a month outside the territory. Xanana Gusmão returned to a tumultuous welcome on 22 October. After 24 years overseas José Ramos-Horta returned, then left to return escorting the newly appointed UN Transitional Administrator and Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Sérgio Vieira de Mello, on 1 December. East Timorese refugees began coming back from West Timor in the last months of 1999, assisted by UNHCR, IOM and international NGOs. Others, some in exile since 1975, returned to find their homeland in ashes.

664. The right to self-determination had finally been respected and upheld by the international community, but only after the East Timorese people had shown great courage in the face of intimidation and mass violence and had cast their vote. The task of building a nation based on respect for human rights, the rule of law and democratic principles, including justice for past crimes against humanity, is the work and hope of current and future generations.

Endnotes

1. Dr Asvi Warman Adam, in a paper titled "The History of East Timor in the Indonesian History" delivered to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
2. Luís Filipe F. R. Thomaz, De Ceuta A Timor, DIFEL, Lisbon, 1994, p. 598.
3. James Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, Longueville Media, Third Edition, 2003, Australia, p. 17.
4. René Pélissier (ed), Timor en Guerre, Le Crocodile et Les Portugais (1847–1913), Pelissier, Orgaral, 2000.
5. Soebandrio, then Foreign Affairs Minister, at the First Committee of the United Nations General Assembly 1957, quoted in Dunn at pp. 85-6.
6. Geoffrey Robinson, "People's War: Militias in East Timor and Indonesia", in South East Asia Research 9, 3, pp. 271-318.
7. Hélio Felgas, Timor Português, Agência Geral do Ultramar, 1956, p. 227, as quoted in Abílio de Araújo, Timor Leste: Os Loricos Voltaram a Cantar: Das Guerras Independentistas à Revolução do Povo Maubere, Lisboa, 1977, p. 75.
8. See Geoffrey C. Gunn, Timor Loro Sae: 500 Years, Livros do Oriente, Macau, 1999, pp. 95-103.
9. Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, p. 17.
10. René Pélissier (ed), Timor en Guerre, Le Crocodile et Les Portugais (1847–1913), Pelissier, Orgaral, 2000.
11. Peter Hastings, "The Timor Problem", Australian Outlook, (Journal of the Australian Institute of International Affairs), Vol 29, No 1.
12. David Scott, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, Dili, 15–17 March 2004.
13. Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, pp. 19-22.
14 See Tomás Gonçalves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

15. Gunn, Timor Loro Sa'e, pp. 235-236.
16. Rowena Lennox, Fighting Spirit of East Timor: The life of Martinho da Costa Lopes, Pluto Press, 2000, p. 62.
17. Xanana Gusmão, Timor-Leste: Um Povo Uma Pátria, Edições Colibri, 1994, p. 3.
18. Arnold Kohen, From the Place of the Dead: Bishop Belo and the Struggle for East Timor, Lion Books, Oxford, 1999, p. 88.
19. Lennox, *Fighting Spiri*t, p. 63.
20. Gusmão, Timor-Leste: Um Povo Uma Pátria, p. 3.
21. See Bill Nicol, Timor: The Stillborn Nation, Visa Books, Melbourne and Connecticut, 1978, p. 21.
22. João César das Neves, The Portuguese Economy: A Picture in Figures XIX and XX Centuries, Universidade Católica Editora, 1994, pp. 79-84.
23. ACFOA (Australian Council for Overseas Aid), Report on Visit to East Timor, October 1975, p. 7.
24. Official records of the UN General Assembly, Thirtieth Session, Supplement No. 23 (A/10023/Rv.1), chapter VIII, annexe, section B, paragraph 56.
25. Thomaz, pp. 686-687; Helen Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism in East Timor: Fretilin 1974–1978, The Origins, Ideologies and Strategies of a Nationalist Movement, Otford Press, 2002, p. 39.
26. João Mariano de Sousa Saldanha, Ekonomi Politik Pembangunaan Timor Timur, Pustaka Sinar Harapan, Jakarta, 1994, p. 57; see also: Working Paper on Timor prepared by the UN's Secretariat for Special Committee on Decolonization, 20 November 1975, in Heike Krieger (ed), East Timor and the International Community: Basic Documents, Cambridge University Press, 1997, pp.18-26.
27. Timor: pequena monografia, Agência-Geral do Ultramar, 1965, pp. 47-48.
28. UN General Assembly Resolution 1807 (XVII), 1962, para. 4 (c). See Heike Krieger (ed), East Timor and the International Community: Basic Documents, Cambridge University Press, 1997, p. 31.29.
29. Bill Nicol, Timor: The Stillborn Nation, Visa Books, Melbourne dan Connecticut, 1978, p.21
30. Relatório da Comissão de Análise e Esclarecimento do Proceso de Descolonização de Timor (Relatório CAEPDT), Presidência do Conselho de Ministros, Lisabon, 1981, p. 25.
31. Norrie MacQueen, The Decolonization of Portuguese Africa: Metropolitan Revolution and the Dissolution of Empire, Longman, London, 1997 p. 79.
32. Relatório da Comissão de Análise e Esclarimento do Proceso de Descolonização de Timor (Relatório CAEPDT), Presidência do Conselho de Ministros, Lisabon, 1981, p. 5.
33. Law No. 7/1974. Lihat Heike Krieger (ed.), East Timor and the International Community: Basic Documents, Cambridge University Press, 1997, p. 34.
34. See Mário Lemos Pires, video recorded testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
35. Mario Carrascalão, Xanana Gusmão, Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Domingos Oliveira, João Carrascalão all explained this point in their respective testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
36. Kreiger, pp. 25-29.
37. Ibid, pp. 30-31.
38. Mário Lemos Pires, Descolonização de Timor, Publicações Dom Quixote, 1994, pp. 46-47.
39. Relatório CAEPDT, p. 44.
40. Domingos Oliveira, former Secretary General of the UDT political party, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
41. See Mário Lemos Pires, Relatório do Governo de Timor, p. 28-30. See also testimonies of Mario Carrascalão and Domingos Oliveira on UDT, and Mari Alkatiri, José Ramos-Horta and Francisco Xavier do Amaral on ASDT and Fretilin to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
42. Domingos Oliveira, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 18 December 2003.

43. Mârio Lemos Pires, Descolonização de Timor, Publicações Dom Quixote, 1994, pp. 191-121.
44. See, Lemos Pires, Relatório, p. 23; see also Jill Jolliffe, East Timor: Nationalism and Colonialism, The University of Queensland Press, 1978, p. 67.
45. CAVR Interview with Paulo Freitas da Silva, Dili, 9 July 2003; see also Lemos Pires, Relatório, p. 20.
46. James Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, Longueville, 2003, p. 62.
47. See José Ramos-Horta, Yusuf Wanandi and James Dunn, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003. Yusuf Wanandi's testimony was delivered as a paper and read publicly by National Commissioner Rev. Agustinho Vasconselos.
48. Gary Gray, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
49. José Ramos-Horta, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 17 December 2003.
50. Francesc Vendrell, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
51. Harold Crouch, The Army and Politics in Indonesia, Cornell University Press, Ithaca, dan London, p. 155; Adam Schwarz, A Nation in Waiting: Indonesia in the 1990s, Allen & Unwin, NSW, 1994, p. 20
52. James Dunn, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003; see also Xanana Gusmão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
53. J.R. Walsh dan G.J. Munster, Documents on Australian Defence and Foreign Policy 1968–1975, Hong Kong, 1980, pp. 192-193.
54. Official Records of the General Assembly, quoted in Decolonisation, UN Department of Political Affairs, No. 7, August 1976, p.41
55. Quoted in Jill Jolliffe, East Timor: Nationalism and Colonialism, The University of Queensland Press, 1978, p. 66; facsimile copy of original letter in CAVR Archive.
56. Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade [DFAT], Wendy Way (ed), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor, 1974-76, University of Melbourne Press, 2000, p.18.
57. See UN document A/AC 108/L. 13.3, dated 3 December 1962, quoted in John Taylor, East Timor: The Price of Freedom, p. 21. Also Ken Conboy, Intel: Inside Indonesia's Intelligence Service, Equinox Publishing, Singapore, 2004, p. 39.
58. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
59. CAVR Interview with Aloysius Sugianto, former Opsus officer, Jakarta, 24 July 2003.
60. Statement of Ambassador Sani to the General Assembly, 13 December 1975, reprinted in Drs Machmuddin Noor, Lahirnya Propinsi Timor Timur, Badan Penerbit Almanak Republik Indonesia, 1977, p. 271 [The Establishment of the Province of East Timor, Publishing Authority Almanac of the Republic of Indonesia].
61. James Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, p. 90. See also testimony of James Dunn to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
62. Soekanto et al., Integrasi: Kebulatan Tekad Rakyat Timor Timur, Yayasan Parikesit, November 1977, p. 97 [Integration: The Fate of the People of East Timor, Parikesit Foundation].
63. See Document 7 Cablegram to Canberra, Jakarta 22 May 1974, in DFAT, Wendy Way (ed), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of East Timor, p. 56.
64. See Document 26 Record of Meeting between Whitlam and Soeharto, State Guest House Yogyakarta, 6 September 1974, 10am, in DFAT, Wendy Way (ed) Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of East Timor, p. 97.
65. Bilveer Singh, Timor Timur, Indonesia dan Dunia: Mitos dan Kenyataan, Institute for Policy Studies, 1998, p. 52 [East Timor, Indonesia and the World: Myths and Reality].
66. CAVR Interview with Yusuf Wanandi, CSIS, Jakarta, 24 July 2003.

67. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
68. José Ramos-Horta, Timor-Leste: Amanhã em Díli, Publicações Dom Quixote, 1994, pp. 58-59. See also Funu: The unfinished saga of East Timor, The Red Sea Press, 1987, pp. 6-7.
69. Ramos-Horta, op. cit., pp. 75-76. He also spoke of how he was claimed to have "provoked" young people in Bidau to throw stones at the Portuguese soldiers, a claim he thought was absolutely false.
70. Domingos Oliveira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
71. Domingos Oliveira, ibid.
72. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
73. Lemos Pires, video recorded testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
74. Mârio Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974–1976, 15–18 December 2003.
75. João Carrascalão, Mari Alkatiri, Francisco Xavier do Amaral and Domingos Oliveira, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
76. José Ramos-Horta, Timor-Leste-Amanhä em Díli, Publicaçöes Dom Quixote, 1994, pp. 96-97 [Timor-Leste – Tomorrow in Dili].
77. Domingos Oliveira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
78. Xanana Gusmão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
79. CAVR Interview with Tomás Gonçalves, Dili, 23 October 2003.
80. Rogério Lobato, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
81. Rogério Lobato, ibid.
82. Lemos Pires, Descolonização, pp. 112–113.
83. Rogério Lobato, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
84. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Nicolau Marito Reis, Dili.
85. Mario Carrascalão and Domingos Oliveira, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
86. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
87. Mari Alkatiri, ibid.
88. Manuel Carrascalão, testimony at the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15 December 2003.
89. Domingos Oliveira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
90. Fretilin, Manual e Programa Políticos, p. 9
91. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
92. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
93. Mario Carrascalão, ibid.
94. José Ramos-Horta, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

95. João Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
96. José Ramos-Horta, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
97. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
98. Mario Carrascalão, ibid.
99. Mario Carrascalão, ibid.
100. João Carrascalão and Mari Alkatiri, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
101. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
102. José Ramos-Horta, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
103. Tomás Gonçalves, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
104. See, for example, Manuel Duarte, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003; see also Alexandre da Costa and António Amado, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003; see also Domingos Maria Alves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003
105. Isabel dos Santos Neves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, 29–30 March 2004.
106. Xanana Gusmão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
107. Mário Lemos Pires, Descolonização de Timor, Publições Dom Quixote, 1994, p. 58.
108. Relatório da Comissão de Análise e Esclarecimento do Process de Descolonização de Timor II [Analyses and Explanation on the decolonisation process in Timor II], Lisbon, 1981.
109. Mário Lemos Pires, video recorded testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
110. Relatório da Comissão de Análise e Esclarecimento do Process de Descolonização de Timor II, p. 38.
111. A. Barbedo de Magalhães, Descolonização do Ensino em Timor: Um Projecto a Intervenção Indonésia Matou á Nascença, Porto, February 1997.
112. Rogério Lobato, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
113. Mário Lemos Pires, video recorded testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 17 December 2003.
114. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
115. Domingos Oliveira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
116. Mario Carrascalão and Mari Alkatiri, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
117. Domingos Oliveira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
118. Mário Lemos Pires, video recorded testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
119. See "Setelah Townsville," Tempo, 5 May 1975; Conboy, Kopassus, p. 208; see also Ramos-Horta, Funu, p. 66.
120. Ramos-Horta, Funu, p. 64.

121. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

122. Domingos Oliveira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

123. See testimonies of Xanana Gusmão and Mario Carrascalão at the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

124. Domingos Oliveira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

125. See "Indonesia Plans Armed Takeover in Timor," The Age, 22 February 1975, Melbourne Australia, cited in Taylor, East Timor, p 40 and footnote 44; see also Conboy, Kopassus, p 238.

126. Jiwa Atmaja, TNI Kembali ke Jatidiri: Profesionalisme Kodam IX/Udayana, p. 74.

127. Conboy, Intel, p. 90.

128. CAVR Interview with Tomás Gonçalves, inaugural Apodeti member, Dili, 23 October 2003.

129. Tomás Gonçalves, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

130. Tomás Gonçalves, ibid.

131. Conboy, Kopassus, p. 207.

132. Soekanto (ed), Integrasi, Yayasan Parikesit, 1976, pp. 116-134.

133. Lemos Pires, Descolonizaçäo, p. 49.

134. Relatorio II, p. 54.

135. Ibid, pp. 44-46.

136. Mário Lemos Pires, video recorded testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

137. See document 123 in DFAT, Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor, 1974–1976, p. 247.

138. See Document 26, Record of Meeting between Whitlam and Soeharto, State Guest House, Yogyakarta, 6 September 1974, 10am, in DFAT, Wendy Way (ed), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor, 1974-76, p. 96.

139. Ibid, p. 97.

140. See Document 123, Record of Conversation between Whitlam and Soeharto, Townsville, 4 April 1975, in DFAT, Wendy Way (ed), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor, 1974–1976, p. 245.

141. Ibid.

142. See Document 14, Memorandum to Jakarta, Canberra, 5 July 1974, in DFAT, Wendy Way (ed), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor, 1974–1976, p. 119.

143. See Document 37, Minute from Woolcott to Renouf, Canberra, 24 September 1974, in DFAT, Wendy Way (ed), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor, 1974–1976, p. 111.

144. See Document 127, Letter from Woolcott to Willesee, Jakarta, 17 April 1975, in DFAT, Wendy Way (ed), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor, 1974–1976, p. 253.

145. Richard Woolcott, The Hot Seat: Reflections on Diplomacy from Stalin's Death to the Bali Bombings, Harpers Collins Publishers, Sydney, 2003, p. 306.

146. Lemos Pires, Descolonizaçäo, Publicações Dom Quixote, 1994, pp. 167-168.

147. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

148. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, ibid.

149. CAVR Interview with Mari Alkatiri, Dili, June 2004. See also testimony of Mari Alkatiri to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

150. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

151. National Security Archive collection, Memorandum of Conversation between Presidents Ford and Suharto, 5 July 1975, Camp David.

152. Woolcott, The Hot Seat, p. 148

153. See Domingos Oliveira and João Carrascalão, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

154. Mário Lemos Pires, video recorded testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 16 December 2003.

155. Tomás Gonçalves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 18 December 2003.

156. CAVR Interview with João Carrascalão, Dili, 30 July 2004.

157. See Document 169, Cablegram to Canberra, Jakarta, 17 August 1975, in DFAT, Wendy Way (ed), Documents on Australian Foreign Policy: Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor, 1974-76, p. 313.

158. João Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

159. Mario Carrascalão and Domingos Oliveira, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

160. Submission of Domingos Oliveira to CAVR, p. 26

161. Lemos Pires, Descolonização, Publicações Dom Quixote, 1994, p. 181-231.

162. Ibid, p. 204.

163. Rogério Lobato, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 17 December 2003.

164. Mario Carrascalão and Domingos Oliveira, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

165. Mário Lemos Pires, video testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 16 December 2003.

166. See Relatório da CAEPDT, Presidencia do Conselho de Ministros, Lisbon, 1981, pp. 186-191; see also Lemos Pires, Descolonizaçäo, p. 228.

167. Lemos Pires, Descolonizaçäo, p. 213.

168. Ibid, p. 225.

169. Jolliffe, East Timor: Nationalism and Colonialism, The University of Queensland Press, 1978, pp. 121-122; see also Lemos Pires, Descolonizaçäo, p. 205

170. Relatório do Governo de Timor, p. 118.

171. CAVR Interview with Rogério Lobato, Dili, 26 August 2003.

172. CAVR Interview with Lucas da Costa, ASDT regional committee member, Dili, 21 June 2004.

173. CAVR Interview with Rogério Lobato, Dili, 26 August 2003.

174. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15 December 2003; Mário Lemos Pires, video recorded testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15 December 2003; and CAVR Community Profile, Asucai Village Lorosae, Nain Feto Sub-district, Dili, 29 August 2003.

175. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 18 December 2003.

176. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 18 December 2003.

177. Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, p. 176.

178. CAVR Interview with Elidio Maria de Jesus, 24 June 2003; see also HRVD Statements # 03426-01 and 03427-01.

179. Adelino Soares, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 December 2003; see also Manuel Duarte, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Florentino de Jesus Martins, Ermera, [undated].

180. Xanana Gusmão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

181. Rogério Lobato, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

182. João Carrascalão and Mari Alkatiri, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

183. On the involvement of senior figures in violations committed by Fretilin, see CAVR Interview with Humberto Martins da Cruz, Dili, and CAVR Interview with Francisco Gonçalves: on UDT violations, see CAVR Interview with João Carrascalão, Dili, 30 July 2004.

184. Mario Carrascalão and Rogério Lobato, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15 and 17 December 2003.

185. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15 December 2003.

186. Tomás Gonçalves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 18 December 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Aloysius Sugianto, Jakarta, 23 July 2003.

187. Tomás Gonçalves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 18 December 2003; João Carrascalão, ibid; and Father Francisco Fernandes and Father Apolinario Guterres, Statement Delivered to the Fourth Committee of the UN General Assembly on behalf of the Comissão dos Refugiados de Timor Oriental, 26 October 1979.

188. Lemos Pires, Decolonizaçäo, pp. 247-248.

189. Jolliffe, East Timor, p. 139; see also Dunn, East Timor, 2003 p. 179.

190. Relatório da CAEPDT, p. 230.

191. See Relatorio da CAEPDT I, p.308-11; Relatorio da CAEPDT, p.231; Dunn, op.cit, p 184; and Jolliffe, op.cit. p.184.

192. See Akihisa Matsuno, "The Balibó Declaration: Between Text and Fact," in Pedro Pinto Leite (ed), The East Timor Problem and the Role of Europe, International Platform of Jurists for East Timor, 1996.

193. Heike Krieger [editor], East Timor and the International Community: Basic Documents, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1997, pp. 70-71.

194. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003; see also Jolliffe, p. 150.

195. Conboy, Kopassus, pp. 211 and 233; see also Julius Pour, B*enny Moerdani: Portrait of a Soldier Statesman*, Yayasan Kejuangan Panglima Besar Sudirman, Jakarta, 1993, p. 390.

196. Conboy, Kopassus, pp. 218-221; see also: CAVR Interview with Rui Lopes, Camenassa, Covalima, 31 October, 2003.

197. Conboy, Kopassus, p 212.

198. CAVR Interview with Rui Lopes, Camenassa, Covalima, 31 October 2003.

199. "International Committee of the Red Cross, East Timor Relief Operation," Report to the ICRC Geneva, 16 September 1976, p 1.

200. Jolliffe, East Timor, p 146.

201. Jolliffe, East Timor, p 164; see also Helen Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism in East Timor, Otford Press, Sydney, 2001, p. 154.

202. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004.

203. Jolliffe, East Timor, p 155; Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism in East Timor, p. 197; Dunn, East Timor, 2003, p. 271.

204. Fretilin Central Committee, press release, 13 September 1975, signed by Francisco Xavier do Amaral. CAVR Archive.

205. Relatório da CAEPDT, p 230.

206. Fretilin Central Committee's statement, 16 September 1975, document ascribed to but not signed by Francisco Xavier do Amaral. CAVR Archive.
207. Dunn, Timor: A People Betrayed, p. 229.
208. Jolliffe, East Timor, p. 180.
209. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004.
210. See for example HRVD Statements 02226; 09081; 08432.
211. See for example João Baptista, 19/08/2003, Aileu, Statement 05806-01, CAVR CRP database; and João Soares, 15/05/2003, Ainaro, Statement 04969-01, CAVR CRP database.
212. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
213. HRVD Statement 01688.
214. See Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, as Secretary General of Fretilin, 15–18 December 2003.
215. Report on Visit to Portuguese Timor by Senator Gietzelt and K.L. Fry, p. 4 [CAVR Archive]; see also Dunn, East Timor: Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, p. 220.
216. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, as Secretary General of Fretilin, 15–18 December 2003.
217. See Senator Gietzelt and Mr KL Fry, Report on visit to Portuguese Timor, September 1975; see also James Dunn, A People Betrayed, p. 187; see also CAVR Interview with Mari Alkatiri, Dili, 25 June 2004.
218. Monis da Maia, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
219. CAVR Interview with Mari Alkatiri, former Fretilin Secretary General, Dili, 25 June 2004.
220. CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Manlewana-Dili, 5 December 2004.
221. CAVR Interview with João da Costa, Letefoho-Same, 24 June 2003.
222. José Ramos-Horta, "Timor Leste Amanha Em Dili", from De regresso de Jacarta, a cupula da UDT, pp. 107-113.
223. CAVR Interview with João da Costa, Letefoho-Same, 24 June 2003.
224. Report on Visit to Portuguese East Timor, Senator Gietzelt and K.L. Fry, p. 4.
225. Rogério Lobato, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
226. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
227. CAVR Interview with Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes, Dili, 5 May 2004.
228. HRVD Statement 03361-01.
229. Xanana Gusmão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003; see also Rogério Lobato, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
230. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, former President of Fretilin, Dili, 18 June 2004.
231. See Dunn, A Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, p. 211; see also Report on Visit to Portuguese East Timor, Senator Goetzelt and K.L. Fry, p. 3. CAVR Archive.
232. Report on Visit to Portuguese East Timor, Senator Gietzelt and K.L. Fry, p. 8.
233. Helen Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism in East Timor, Otford Press, Sydney, p. 154.
234. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, former President of Fretilin, Dili, 18 June 2004.
235. Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism, 2001, p. 155.
236. Hill, ibid, p. 185
237. "ICRC Relief Programme in Eastern Timor", 24 November 1975, p. 2; see also Geoffrey Gunn, Timor Loro Sa'e: 500 Years, Livros do Oriente, 2000, chapter 13 "Colonial Capitalism and Underdevelopment in Post-war Timor."

238. See John G. Taylor, Perang Tersembunyi: Sejarah Timor Timur yang Dilupakan, Fortilos, Jakarta, 1998, pp. 1-28. [translated from: John G. Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War: The Hidden History of East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1991].

239. Andre Pasquier to ICRC Geneva, Concerning the Situation in East Timor, Report on the activities of the delegation from 1–15 September, Darwin, 16 September 1975.

240. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, former President of Fretilin, Lecidere, 28 August 2003.

241. CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Manlewana-Dili, 5 December 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Rafael Nascimento, Aileu, June 2003.

242. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, former President of Fretilin, Dili, 18 June 2004.

243. Report on Visit to Portuguese East Timor, Senator Gietzelt and K.L. Fry, p. 6

244. ACFOA, Report on a Visit to East Timor for the ACFOA Timor Task Force, p. 8.

245. Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism, p. 192.

246. CAVR Interview with Lucas da Costa, ASDT regional committee member, Dili, 21 June 2004.

247. Report on Visit to East Timor for the ACFOA Timor Task Force, p. 4 and p. 7.

248. Shirley Shackleton, "Planting a Tree in Balibó", in Peter Carey (ed), East Timor at the Crossroads, Cassell, New York, 1995, p. 116.

249. Jolliffe, East Timor, p. 201.

250. Adelino Gomes (Portuguese journalist), film footage held in CAVR Archive.

251. Interview with João Viegas Carrascalão, 13 March 1996, [transcript p. 131], "Report on the Deaths of the Australian Based Journalists in East Timor in 1975", June 1996.

252. Van Atta and Toohey, "The Timor Papers, part II" The National Times, p. 16.

253. CAVR Interview with Albino do Carmo, Suai, 31 October 2003.

254. Budiardjo and Liem, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, p 21; Conboy, Kopassus, pp. 231-232; Korps Marinir TNI AL, 1970–2000, Jakarta, Dinas Penerangan Korps Marinir, 2000, pp. 188-189.

255. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, former leader of Fretilin, Dili, 18 June 2004.

256. Jolliffe, East Timor, p 201; see also Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

257. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, CAVR National Public Hearing to The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

258. Jolliffe, AAP's Delivery, 11 October 1975, quoted by Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism, 2001, p 157.

259. Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism, p. 197.

260. Jolliffe, East Timor, pp. 215-16.

261. Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, p. 232.

262. CAVR Interview with Adriano João, former member of Falintil during 1975, Dili, September 2004.

263. Jolliffe, East Timor, p. 217; CAVR Interview with Mari Alkatiri, Fretilin Secretary General, Dili, 25 June 2004.

264. CAVR Interview with Mari Alkatiri, former Fretilin Secretary General, Dili, 25 June 2004; see also Jolliffe, East Timor, p. 217; see also José Ramos-Horta, Funu: Perjuangan Timor Lorosae Belum Selesai, Solidamor, Jakarta, 1998, pp. 145-146 [translated from José Ramos-Horta, Funu: Unfinished Saga of East Timor, The Red Sea Press, Trenton NJ, 1987].

265. CAVR Interview with Mari Alkatiri, Dili, 25 June 2004; see also Jolliffe, East Timor, p 216; see also Ramos-Horta, Funu, p 146.

266. Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism, 2001, p. 201.

267. CAVR Interview with Manuel Gaspar da Silva, former member of Fretilin militia, Uatolari, Viqueque, 19 September 2003.

268. Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism, 2001, p. 200.

269. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, former President of Fretilin, Dili, 18 June 2004.

270. CAVR Interview with Mari Alkatiri, Dili, 25 June 2004

271. Jolliffe, East Timor, p. 217.

272. Jolliffe, East Timor, p. 217; Ramos Horta, Funu, p. 146.

273. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, “Comrades! Independence or death! We will win,” English translation of the speech given at the inauguration of the Council of Ministers of the Democratic Republic of Timor Leste, Dili, 29 November 1975, p. 8 [Copy at CAVR Archive].

274. CAVR Interview with Mari Alkatiri, Dili, 25 June 2004; see also CAVR Interview with Lucas da Costa, ASDT regional committee member, Dili, 21 June 2004; see also CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004.

275. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004.

276. Soekanto (ed), Integrasi, pp. 283-284.

277. See Akihisa Matsuno, “The Balibó Declaration: Between Text and Fact,” in Pedro Pinto Leite (ed), The East Timor Problem and the Role of Europe, International Platform of Jurists for East Timor, 1996.

278. Mario Carrascalão, João Carrascalão and Domingos Oliveira; Clementino Amaral; and Paul Freitas; testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003; see also José Martins of KOTA in an interview with Aboeprijadi Santoso published in Jejak-jejak Darah: Tragedi & Pengkhianatan di Timor Timur, Amsterdam dan Yogyakarta: Stichting Inham & Pijar, 1996, pp. 85-86 [Traces of Blood: The Tragedy and Betrayal of East Timor].

279. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

280. East Timor and the International Community: Basic Documents, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1997, pp. 39-40.

281. United Nations Department of Political Affairs, Trusteeship and Decolonisation, No. 7, August 1976, p. 44.

282. CAVR Interview with Yusuf Wanandi, former CSIS researcher, Jakarta, 24 July 2003.

283. Soekanto, Integrasi, p. 276.

284. Soekanto, ibid, pp. 289-291.

285. “Malik Warns,” The Canberra Times, 3 December 1975, quoted in Jolliffe, East Timor, pp. 225-226.

286. See, for example, Document 206, Cablegram to Canberra, Kuala Lumpur, 2 September 1975, in DFAT, Wendy Way (ed), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese East Timor, pp. 468-470.

287. See Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, p 152, 155, 157; see also telegram from American Embassy Surabaya to American Embassy Jakarta, 20 February 1975; memorandum 6362-x to Henry Kissinger from National Security Council, 30 December 1974; US Department of State Telegram, American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary of State Washington, 21 August 1975.

288. Decolonization, p 30; see also Jolliffe, East Timor, p. 217.

289. Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, 1983, p. 276.

290. Dunn, ibid, 1983, p. 236.

291. Telegram from American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, “Ford-Suharto Meeting”, 6 December 1975.

292. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004; reiterated in Mari Alkatiri and Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

293. Jolliffe, East Timor, p. 226.

294. Jolliffe, ibid, p. 227.

295. See David Scott, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, March 2004.

296. CAVR Interview with Mari Alkatiri, Dili, 25 June 2004.

297. Jolliffe, East Timor, p 232.

298. Dr Kenneth Chan, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, Dili, 15–17 March 2004.

299. Telegram from Francisco Xavier do Amaral to US President Ford, Dili, 5 December 1975.

300. Telegram from American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary of State Washington, "Ford-Suharto Meeting", 6 December 1975.

301. Machmuddin Noor et al., Lahirnya Propinsi Timor Timur, [The Birth of the Province of East Timor] Badan Penerbit Almanak Republik Indonesia, Jakarta, 1977, p. 83.

302. Machmuddin Noor et al., ibid, p 82.

303. Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, p. 251.

304. Telegram from Mari Alkatiri to President of the UNSC, circulated to UNSC October 8, cited in telegram, US Mission UN New York to Secretary State Washington, Cables to Security Council about Portuguese Timor from Fretilin, 11 October 1975.

305. Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, p. 196.

306. See Van Atta and Toohey, p. 15; see also Ken Conboy, Kopassus, Equinox Publishing, Jakarta, 2003, p. 231.

307. Hendro Subroto, Eyewitness to the Integration of East Timor, Pustaka Sinar Harapan, Jakarta, 1997, p. 147.

308. Dr Asvi Warman Adam, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

309. See Subroto, Eyewitness, p. 137-138 and Korps Marinir, p. 190.

310. Subroto, Eyewitness, p. 142.

311. Korps Marinir p. 190; see also Subroto, Eyewitness, p. 137.

312. Subroto, Eyewitness, p. 137, 150; see also M. Saleh Kamah, Seroja, p. 106; see also Korps Marinir, p. 191.

313. Pour, Murdani, p. 398; see also James Dunn, Timor: A People Betrayed, 1996, p. 282.

314. Subroto, Eyewitness, p. 154.

315. Conboy, Kopassus, p. 243.

316. John G. Taylor, East Timor: Indonesia's Forgotten War, Zed Books, London, 1991, p 70.

317. Subroto, Eyewitness, p. 170.

318. Subroto, ibid, p. 174.

319. CAVR Interview with Carlos Maria Soares, Dili, 27 December 2003.

320. George Aditjondro, In the Shadow of Mt Ramelau: The Impact of the Occupation of East Timor, Leiden, INDOC, Netherlands, 1994, p 87.

321. Pour, Murdani, p 325.

322. National Security Council Memorandum for Brent Scowcroft, from Clinton E. Granger, Indonesian Use of MAP Equipment in East Timor, 12 December 1975.

323. José Ramos-Horta, "Timor Leste Amanha Em Dili", from De regresso de Jacarta, a cupula da UDT, p. 113.

324. Pernyataan Pemerintah Tentang Timor Portugis, Antara, 9 December 1975. [(Indonesian) Government statement on Portuguese Timor]

325. Pernyataan Pemerintah Indonesia Tentang Timor Portugis, Antara, 15 December 1975. [Indonesian Government statement on Portuguese Timor]

326. See for example, M. S. Kamah, Catatan dari Dili, [Notes from Dili] Antara, 19 December 1975.

327. Dr Asvi Warman Adam, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

328. CAVR Interview with Francisco Calsonha, 13 August, 2004, Dili; CAVR Interview with Kuo Nhen (Konneng) Lay (aka Mali Sera), Dili, 23 February 2004. See also Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances.

329. CAVR Interview with Alexandrino do Rego, former hospital worker, Dili, 4 February 2004.

330. CAVR Interview with Frederico dos Santos Almeida, Dili, 29 August 2003.

331. CAVR Interview with Kuon Nhen (Konneng) Lay (aka Mali Sera), Dili, 23 February 2004.

332. Subroto, Eyewitness, p 182.

333. Felismina dos Santos Conceição, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, November 2003.

334. See CAVR Interview with Francisco Soriano, Dili, 3 July 2004; HRVD statement 25666; CAVR Interview with Francisco da Cunha, Dili, 3 February 2004.

335. HRVD Statement 9471-02; see also CAVR Interview with Domingos Freitas, Dili, 29 June 2004.

336. See for example testimonies of Xanana Gusmão and Francisco Xavier do Amaral to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

337. Xanana Gusmão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

338. Tomás Gonçalves and Clementino Amaral (as representative of the KOTA party), testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 18 December 2003.

339. Telegram, US Mission UN New York to Secretary of State Washington, Portuguese Timor: Further Messages to United Nations from Fretilin, 18 December 1975.

340. Pour, Murdani, p. 398-399.

341. David Scott, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

342. Telegram, US Mission UN New York to Secretary State Washington, Portuguese Timor – Letter to President of UNSC from Fretilin, 4 February 1976; see also Telegram, US Department of State circular, Timor, 29 January 1976; see also David Scott, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

343. Telegram, US Mission UN New York to Secretary of State Washington, Text of letter to President of UNSC from Fretilin, 4 February 1976.

344. See Francesc Vendrell, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

345. Machmuddin Noor et. al, Lahirnya Propinsi Timor Timur, Badan Penerbit Almanak Republik Indonesia, 1977, p. 26.

346. Ibid, p. 29.

347. Ibid, p. 52.

348. Telegram from Provisional Government of East Timor (PGET) to President of UN Security Council, cited in telegram from US Mission UN NY to Secretary of State Washington, 23 December 1975; see also Machmuddin Noor et al., Lahirnya, p 56.

349. CAVR Interview with Mário Viegas Carrascalão, Dili, 30 June 2004

350. Machmuddin Noor et al., Lahirnya, p. 59.

351. See David Scott, testimony to the CAVR National Public Haring on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004; see also Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, p 15, 23; Dunn 2004, p 244.

352. See Conboy, Kopassus, p. 256.

353. Antonio Serpa and Monis da Maia, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

354. CAVR Interview with Humberto Martins da Cruz, former prison chief Aileu, Dili, undated.

355. Ibid.

356. Ibid; see also Alexandre da Costa Araújo, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.

357. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

358. CAVR Interview with Tomás Gonçalves, former Partisan and Apodeti leader, Farol, Dili, 23 October 2003.

359. CAVR Interview with João da Costa, former prisoner of UDT, Same, 24 June 2003.

360. Monis da Maia, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

361. Angelo Araújo Fernandes, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.

362. ABRI/TNI, 25 Tahun Kodam XIV Hasanudin, 1957–1982 [25 years of Regional Military Command XIV Hasanudin, 1957–1982] (no bibliographical information).

363. Dinas Penerangan TNI Angkatan Udara, 50 Tahun Emas Pengabdian TNI Angkatan Udara, [Bureau of Information of Indonesian Air Force, 50 Golden Years' Service of Indonesian Air Force], Jakarta, (undated), p. 134.

364. Data in this paragraph is from ABRI/TNI, 35 Tahun Darma Bakti Kostrad [35 Years Service of Kostrad] (no bibliographical information available), p. 82.

365. See, for example, Manuel Carceres da Costa (about the town of Laclo in Manatuto District) and Fransisco Soares Pinto (about the town of Illiomar in Lautém District), testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

366. Report published in The Canberra Times, 27 November 1979, cited in Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, 2003, p. 259.

367. See, for example, Julio Alfaro and Maria José Franco Pereira, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

368. See testimonies of Mari Alkatiri as historical actor to the CAVR National Public Hearing in The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003, and Marito Reis to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

369. See Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, Aurora Books, Victoria, pp. 41-43.

370. Ibid, p. 42..

371. Father Leoneto do Rego, excerpts from an interview given in 1980, presented at CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

372. Manuel Carceres da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

373. See HRVD Statements 5028, 3150, 0160, 2056.

374. Clementino Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

375. CAVR Interview with Mário Viegas Carrascalão, Dili, 30 June 2004.

376. Machmuddin Noor et al., Lahirnya, p. 18.

377. See Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

378. Tempo, 36 June 1976, cited in Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War Against East Timor, p. 97.

379. Report of the Government delegation of the Republic of Indonesia to East Timor. No. Pem.1/8/26, 26 June 1976, reprinted in Machmuddin Noor et al., Lahirnya, p. 111.

380. Testimony of US Rear Admiral Gene R. La Roque, US Congressional Hearings, 10 June 1980; see also Budiardjo, p. 27; John Taylor, East Timor: The Price of Freedom, Zed Books, London and New York, 1999, p 84.

381. CAVR Interview with Albino do Carmo, Former Falintil commander Suai, Covalima, 31 October 2003.

382. CAVR Interview with José Pereira, Lolotoe, Bobonaro, 29 October 2003.

383. Telegram, American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary of State Washington, GOI request for help in Timor, 29 April 1976.

384. CAVR Interview with Taur Matan Ruak, former Falintil Commander, Part II, Dili, 14 June 2004.

385. Dunn, Timor: A People Betrayed, 1983, p. 280; Conboy, Kopassus, p. 274.

386. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004; see also Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy.

387. Gilman dos Santos, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

388. Departemen Pertahanan-Keamanan, Petunjuk Pelaksanaan Nomor JUKLAK/06/V/1976 tentang Kegiatan Di Bidang Operasi Tempur Tahun 1976/1977. [Department of Defence and Security, Manual Instruction No. JUKLAK/06/V/1976 reg. Activities in Field of Combat Operation year 1976/77.]

389. Dinas Penerangan Korps Marinir, Korps Marinir TNI AL 1970–2000 [Bureau of Information of Marines Corps, Marines Corps of Indonesian Armed Forces 1970–2000], Jakarta, 2000, p. 233.

390. East Timor News, "Indonesian Withdrawal Way to Peace", 2 June, 1977, p. 1.

391. East Timor News, "Fretilin Ready for Offensive", 16 June, 1977, p. 1.

392. East Timor News, 19 May, 1977, p. 4.

393. Telegram, Secretary State Washington to American Embassy Jakarta, Report of Wolff Sub Committee on visit to Indonesia, 28 June 1977.

394. Memorandum, Mike Armacost to Zbigniew Brzezinski, Initiatives to Deepen Relations with Indonesia, 14 June 1977.

395. See Secretary State Washington to all East Asian and Pacific Diplomatic Posts, Weekly Status Report – Thailand, Indonesia, Malaysia, Burma and Singapore, 23 March 1978; see also telegram, US Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, Preparation of Congressional Presentation Document (CPD) FOY 1979 Security Assistance Program, 16 December 1977; see also telegram, American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, A4 sales to Indonesia, 12 May 1978.

396. Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 78.

397. Budiardjo and Liem, The War in East Timor, p. 30.

398. Communiqué, Douglas J Bennet Jr, Assistant Secretary for Congress Relations to the Hon. Frank Church, Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, US Senate, 6 April 1979.

399. Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 95.

400. See Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar: Resistance in Rural East Timor, Point Lonsdale, Australia 2003, p. 11.

401. See CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004; see also CAVR Interview with José da Conceição, Kupang, 24 August 2004; see also CAVR Interview with Sera Malik, Soe, West Timor (Indonesia), 28 August 2004.

402. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

403. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004; see also Gusmão, To Resist, pp. 130-131.

404. Budiardjo and Liem, War Against East Timor, p. 61.

405. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

406. Our Victory is Just a Question of Time, Communiqué from the Permanent Committee of the FRETILIN Central Committee, dated 14 September 1977, on the occasion/on Xavier do Amaral's treason, Lisbon, 1977, pp. 7-27.

407. See Domingos Maria Alves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003, and Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

408. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004; see also Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p. 47.

409. American Embassy Lisbon to Secretary of State Washington, "Fretilin Coup may postpone UNGA East Timor debate", 20 September 1977.

410. Domingos Maria Alves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.

411. Antonio Amado J.R. Guterres, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.

412. Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, 1984, p. 27.

413. East Timor News "'Victory is ours!' Offensive Defeated", 8 September 1977, p. 1, citing Radio Maubere broadcasts, The Age, 31 August 1977, Melbourne, Australia, and The Australian, 5 August, 1977.

414. The Australian "Foreign Affairs gag on Timor build-up," 1 September 1977; see also James Dunn, Timor: A People Betrayed, 1983, p. 312.

415. See "Border Zone Offensive Meets Big Defeat", East Timor News, 20 October, 1977, p. 1.

416. CAVR Interview with Carlos Tilman, Suai, 31 October 2003.

417. Marine Corps, TNI Navy 1970–2000, Official Department of Information, Marine Corps, Jakarta, 2000, pp. 236-237.

418. Manuel Carceres da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

419. See Manuel Carceres da Costa of Manatuto District, João Sereno of Covalima District, Maria José da Costa of Manatuto and Manufahi Districts, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

420. East Timor News, "Suharto Gambles on Wet Season Offensive", 15 December 1977, p. 1.

421. Ibid.

422. CAVR Interview with Duarte Gaspar Corte Real, Ainaro, 22 October 2003; CAVR Interview with Francisco Piedoso Martins, Ainaro, 22 October 2003.

423. CAVR Interview with Francisco Barros, Ainaro, 22 October 2003.

424. Maria José da Costa testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

425. Budiardjo and Liem, War Against East Timor, p. 30.

426. Ibid, p 29.

427. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.

428. CAVR ABRI/TNI research file. CAVR Archive. See also Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations for statistical patterns of reported violations related to this period.

429. Douglas Kammen, Submission to CAVR, interview with former Kostrad officer who served in East Timor in 1977–1978, name withheld, Indonesia, [undated].

430. See, for example, CAVR Interview with Abilio Quintão Pinto, Illiomar, Lautém, 7 October 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Teotonio [no last name], Ossu, Viqueque, 2 October 2003.

431. HRVD Statement 3889.

432. CAVR Interview with Tomás Soares da Silva, Uatolari, Viqueque, 4 October 2003.

433. Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p. 56.

434. Dunn, Timor: A People Betrayed, 1983, p. 280; Conboy, Kopassus, p. 274.

435. See Pat Walsh, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

436. See Abilio dos Santos Belo, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

437. Dinas Penerangan Korps Marinir, Korps Marinir TNI AL 1970–2000, [Marine Corps, TNI Navy 1970–2000, Official Department of Information, Marine Corps], Jakarta, 2000, pp. 276-279.

438. See Edmundo da Cruz, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

439. Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 96.

440. CAVR Interview with Taur Matan Ruak, former Falintil commander, Part II, Dili, 14 June 2004.

441. Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p. 59.

442. Association of Ex-Political Prisoners (Assepol), submission to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

443. See Lennox, Fighting Spirit of East Timor, p. 133 and pp. 155-157; see also Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 84.

444. Gilman dos Santos, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

445. See ABRI/TNI Instruction Manual No. Juknis/05/1/1982 System of Security of Towns and Resettlement Areas, reprinted in Budiardjo and Liem, The War in East Timor, p. 183; see also Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine.

446. USAID, East Timor-Indonesia, Displaced Persons, Situation Report No 1, 9 October 1979, cited in Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p 88; see also CRS Final report, p. 3.

447. Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 89, 90.

448. ABRI/TNI Juknis/04-B/IV/1982 Tentang Cara Mengamankan Masyarakat dari Pengaruh Propaganda GPK [Instruction Manual No: JUKNIS/04-B/IV/1982, Subject: How to Protect the Community from the Influence of GPK Propaganda], cited in Budiardjo and Liem, The War in East Timor, 216-17.

449. See for example Fransisco Soares Pinto of Illiomar Sub-district in Lautém, Manuel Carceres da Costa in relation to camps in Metinaro, and Abilio dos Santos Belo in relation to camps in Ainaro and the situation in the village of Mau Chiga, testimonies to the CAVR, National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July, 2003.

450. See Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p. 59; see also HRVD Statements 9188-02, 0187-01, 7800-02, 8088-05.

451. HRVD Statement 8274-04.

452. Former CRS official Gilman dos Santos, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

453. Pat Walsh, testimony to the CAVR, National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

454. Ibid.

455. Gilman dos Santos, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

456. Pat Walsh, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

457. Gilman dos Santos, testimony National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

458. Catholic Relief Services-USCC East Timor Emergency Program, Final Report, June 1979-December 1980, pp. 11 & 19.

459. Pat Walsh, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

460. Gilman dos Santos, testimony National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

461. See, for example, Joana Pereira of Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

462. Bernado Villanova, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

463. Rosalina da Costa of Manufahi, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

464. Abilio dos Santos Belo, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

465. Maria de Ceu Lopes Federer, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003

466. Ibid.

467. Reuters and AP reports, 4 March 1982, cited in Timor Information Service, No. 35, March/April 1982, p. 6.

468. See, for example, Abilio dos Santos Belo and Marito Reis, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

469. Department of Information, Republic of Indonesia, East Timor After Integration, 1983, p. 88.

470. Maria de Ceu Lopes Federer, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

471. Ibid.

472. "Berita Buana", 14 July 1982, in Pengungkapan Kebenaran Timor Leste; see also Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the to CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, 28–29 April 2003.

473. Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 195

474. Timor Timur Dalam Angka [East Timor in Figures], Office of Statistics of the Province of Timor Timur, 1981.

475. Costa Alves and Moreira Reis, interview with Portuguese Catholic priest Father Leoneto do Rego, 1980, published in Funu magazine, Portugal, July 1980.

476. Ibid.

477. See Assepol Submission to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

478. See for example Julio Alfaro, Maria da Silva and Maria José Franco Pereira, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

479. Telegram, American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, Reports of Fretilin attacks in East Timor capital, 18 June 1980.

480. CAVR Interview with Bernardino Villanova, Ataúro, Dili, 7 March 2002.

481. Telegram, US Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, [censored] Impressions after June 10 attack in East Timor, 25 June 1980.

482. See, for example, Bernardino Villanova, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

483. HRVD Statements 2399 and 0663; CAVR Interview with João Rui, Dili, 20 June 2003, CAVR Interview with Francisco Soares, Dili, 5 August 2003.

484. See Angkatan Bersenjata, 26 February, 1982; See also Conboy, Kopassus, p. 297.

485. Komando Daerah Militer XVI/Udayana, Komando Resor Militer 164/Wira Dharma, Instruksi - Operasi No: INSOP/03/II/1982. [Regional Military Command XVI/Udayana, Sub-regional Command 164/Wira Dharma, Instruction for Operation No. INSOP/03/II/1982]

486. See Xanana Gusmão, letter dated 10 May 1983, p. 3.

487. See ABRI/TNI "Petunjuk Tehnis [sic] Nomor Juknis/05/I/1982 Sistem Keamanan Kota dan Daerah Pemukiman" [Technical Guidelines number Juknis/05/I/1982 Security system for the city and settled area], p. 3, which cites "Perintah Operasi Korem 164/WD: 08/Kikis-D." ["Orders for Korem Operation 164/WD: 08/Kikis-D], reprinted in Budiardjo and Liem, War In East Timor, p. 183.

488. ABRI/TNI Instruction Manual No. JUKNIS/06/IV/1982, Babinsa/TPD Activity in Developing and Phasing out Trained People's Resistance Forces, reprinted in Budiardjo and Liem, p. 238.

489. ABRI/TNI "Instruksi – Operasi No: INSOP/03/II/1982," p. 8.

490. See Korps Marinir TNI AL 1970–2000, Dinas Penerangan Korps Marinir, Jakarta, 2000, p. 274.

491. CAVR Interview with Anselmo Fernandes Xavier, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 October, 2003.

492. Informação sobre a situação socio-humana nas zonas de Ossu, Viqueque, Uatolari e Uato-Carbau Abril 1982, p. 4, Resistance document, dated 5 May 1982, Dili. [Information about the social-human situation in the zones of Ossu, Viqueque, Uatolari and Uato Carbau in April 1982. Unpublished. CAVR Archive.]

493. The Age, Melbourne, Australia, "Timor: Tales of Torture", 14 May 1982, cited in Taylor, p. 111; see also Lennox, Fighting Spirit, p. 172; see also telegram, American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary of State Washington, Briefing on the Military Situation in East Timor, 17 November 1981.

494. "Is There Enough to Eat in East Timor?" Asian Wall Street Journal, 21 June 1982.

495. Xanana Gusmão, Message to the 37th United Nations General Assembly, in Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p. 81.

496. Telegram, American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary of State Washington, Briefing on the Military Situation in East Timor, 17 November 1981.

497. Budiardjo and Liem, The War in East Timor, p. 174; Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 101.

498. CAVR Interview with Albino da Costa, Dili, June 2003.

499. HRVD Statement 2092.

500. CAVR Interview with Albino da Costa, Dili, June 2003.

501. CAVR Interview with Antonio dos Santos, Mehara, Tutuala, Lautém, 10 October 2003.

502. CAVR Interview with João Fuas de Carvalho, Tutuala, Lautém, 10 October 2003.

503. Lennox, Fighting Spirit of East Timor, p. 175.

504. Alfredo Alves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, 28–29 March 2003.

505. Budiardjo and Liem, The War in East Timor, p. 174.

506. Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 117.

507. Lennox, Fighting Spirit of East Timor, p. 180; see also Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 152

508. Lennox, ibid, p. 181.

509. Timor Information Service, no 38, Sept/Oct 1982, p. 7: World Council of Churches Visit, June 3-6 1982.

510. Telegram, 17 November 1981, American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, Briefing on the military situation in East Timor.

511. See for example testimony of Maria Ceu Federer Lopes to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

512. See Joana Pereira of Quelicai, Manuel Carceres da Costa of Laclo and Edmundo da Cruz of Lautém, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

513. Catholic Relief Services-USCC East Timor Emergency Program, Final Report, June 1979-December 1980, p. 3.

514. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.

515. Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p. 58.

516. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.

517. Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p. 61.

518. Ibid, p. 63.

519. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004; see also Paulino Gama, "A Fretilin Commander Remembers", in Peter Carey (ed), East Timor at the Crossroads, Cassell, New York, 1995, p. 101.

520. See Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p. 64; see also interview with Lere Anan Timor, Archive of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project [radio], Taibessi, March 2002 [CD No. 18].

521. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.

522. Ibid.

523. Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

524. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.

525. Ibid.

526. Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar, p. 18.

527. Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p. 68

528. CAVR Interview with Justo Talenta, then information secretary of the Brigada Vermelha, Dili, 3 November 2003; see also testimony of Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo" to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

529. See CAVR Interview with Cornelio Gama (L-7), Baucau, 9 April 2004; CAVR Interview with Justo Talenta, Dili, November 2004; CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 June 2004; CAVR Interview with Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", Dili, 26 March 2003; and interview with Lere Anan Timor, Archive of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project [radio], Taibessi, March 2002 [CD no. 18].

530. "Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência e Proposta de Paz" [The Structural Readjustment of the Resistance and Proposal for Peace, CAVR Tetum translation, no publication information – original version in Portuguese in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste – Um Povo, Uma Pátria, Edições Colibri, Lisbon, p. 95-107]; see also interview with Lere Anan Timor, Archive of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project [radio], Taibessi, March 2002 [CD. No. 18]; see also Agio Pereira, The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor, working paper delivered to a conference in Sydney 1994 [undated].

531. See CAVR Interview with Cornelio Gama, Baucau, 9 April 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", Dili, 26 March 2003.

532. Message to the Nation of H.E. The President of the Republic Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão on the Occasion of Falintil Day Commemoration in Uaimori, 20 August 2003, at http://www.etan.org/et2003/august/17-23/20fal.htm. CAVR Archive.

533. CAVR Interview with Julio Maria de Jesus, ex-Falintil, Lospalos, Lautém 29 May 2003; see also Budiardjo and Liem, The War Against East Timor, p. 70. See also Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy.

534. Budiardjo and Liem, The War Against East Timor, p. 170.

535. ABRI/TNI Juknis/04-B/IV/1982 Tentang Cara Mengamankan Masyarakat dari Pengaruh Propaganda GPK; translation cited in Budiardjo and Liem, Instruction Manual No: JUKNIS/04-B/IV/1982 [Subject: How to Protect the Community from the Influence of GPK Propaganda], reprinted in Budiardjo and Liem, The War Against East Timor, pp. 216-17.

536. HRVD Statements 7816-01, 3315-01, 7250-01; see also Aditjondro, In the Shadow of Mt Ramelau, p. 83; see also testimony of Olga da Silva Amaral to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, 28–29 April, 2003.

537. See CAVR Interviews with Horacio La Hakiduk, Dili, 2 June 2003; with Albino da Costa, Dili, June 2003; and with Antonio Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004.

538. See ABRI/TNI Juknis Tentang Cara Babinsa/TPD dalam membongkar Jaring Pendukung GPK, Korem 164, Seksi Intel, [date obscured, among a batch of documents captured by Falintil from ABRI/TNI in 1982; CAVR Archive].

539. See Lennox, Fighting Spirit of East Timor: The Life of Martinho da Costa Lopes, Zed Books, London and New York, pp. 189-191.

540. See Domingos Oliveira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 18 December 2003.

541. Agio Pereira, The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor, paper work.

542. "Fretilin Explains Why No Negotiations," East Timor News, Australia, No. 36, 29 June 1978; see also Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 18 December 2003.

543. See CAVR Interview with Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", 26 March 2004; CAVR Interview with Cornelio Gama, 9 April 2003; interview with Lere Anan Timor, Archive of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project [radio], Taibessi, March 2002 [CD no. 18].

544. See CAVR Interview with Cornelio Gama, Baucau, 9 April 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 14 June 2004; CAVR Interview with Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", Dili, 26 March 2003; and interview with Lere Anan Timor, Archive of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project [radio], Taibessi, March 2002 [CD No. 18].

545. Patrick A. Smythe, "The Heaviest Blow" – The Catholic Church and the East Timor Issue, LIT, Germany, 2004, p. 45.

546. See José Ramos-Horta, closing address to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

547. Kohen, From the Place of the Dead: Bishop Belo and the Struggle for East Timor, p. 150.

548. Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, p. 40.

549. Kantor Statistik Timor Timur, Timor Timur Dalam Angka 1981 [Statistic Office of East Timor, East Timor in Figures], Dili, 1981, p. 71.

550. International Documentation Centre [IDOC], Rome, Introduction, pp. 1-2, Pro Mundo Vita Dossier "East Timor", 1984, Brussels, pp.36-7, cited in Smythe, "The Heaviest Blow", p. 39.

551. See Ken Conboy, Kopassus: Inside Indonesia's Special Forces, Equinox Publishing, Jakarta and Singapore, 2002, p.298; see also "Record of Meeting with Governor of Timor Timur (East Timor) on 28 July 1983, to Government Office, Dili," in Official Report of the Australian Parliamentary Delegation to Indonesia, led by The Honourable W. L. Morrison, M.P., July–August 1983, p. 152.

552. Peter A. Rohi, "Hanya Dengan 1 Pistol di Pinggang Kotak Suara Dikawal Ke Los Palos [sic]," Sinar Harapan newspaper, 1 June 1982.

553. CAVR Interview with Tomás Soares da Silva, Dili, 4 October 2003.

554. A. Goldstone, interview with Jacobs, Lisbon, 4 August 1982 [CAVR Archive].

555. Telegram, American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, East Timor Governor address to Jakarta political officers luncheon, 29 April 1983.

556. Xanana Gusmão, Message to the 37th UN General Assembly, 14 October 1982, reprinted in Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p 82.

557. See Abilio dos Santos Belo, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

558. See Budiardjo and Liem, The War in East Timor, pp. 146-7.

559. CAVR Interview with João Fuas de Carvalho, former Fretilin functionary, Tutuala, Lautém, 10 October 2003.

560. Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar, 2003, footnote p. 22.

561. See Chamberlain; see also CAVR Interview with João Fuas de Carvalho, Tutuala, Lautém, 10 October 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Aleixo Ximenes, a former UDT member, Venilale, Baucau, 2 February 2004.

562. CAVR Interview with Aleixo Ximenes, Venilale, Baucau, 2 February 2004.

563. CAVR Interview with Daniel Amaral, former Hansip, Venilale, Baucau, 3 October 2003.

564. See Jill Jolliffe, Timor: Terra Sangrenta, O Jornal, Lisbon, 1989, pp. 163-170.

565. See CAVR Interview with Cornelio Gama (L-7), 9 April 2004; see also CAVR Interview with Antonio Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 29 March 2004.

566. Telegram, Negotiations to End Insurgency in East Timor, 11 June 1983, US Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington.

567. Official Report of the Australian Parliamentary Delegation to Indonesia, led by The Honourable W. L. Morrison, M.P., July–August 1983.

568. CAVR Interview with Constantino dos Santos, former Falintil Macadique, 26 June 2003; see also Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 18 December 2003.

569. J. Jolliffe (ed), Timor Newsletter, Vol. II, No. 3, October 1983, p. 6, cited in Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar: Resistance in Rural East Timor, 2003, p. 23.

570. See CAVR Interview with Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", Dili, 26 March 2004; CAVR Interview with Albino da Costa, Dili, June 2003; and CAVR Interview with Taur Matan Ruak, part II, Dili, 14 June 2004.

571. See Budiardjo and Liem, The War in East Timor, pp. 131-5.

572. Lennox, Fighting Spirit of East Timor, p. 215.

573. Ibid, p. 185.

574. Patrick A. Smythe, "The Heaviest Blow" – The Catholic Church and the East Timor Issue, p. 38.

575. Ben Anderson, Arief Djati and Douglas Kammen, "Interview with Mario Carrascalão," Indonesia 76, October 2003, pp. 7-8.

576. Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War in East Timor, p. 139 and p. 47.

577. Telegram, American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, Current developments in East Timor [obscured] on renewed fighting, access by foreigners, etc., 23 September 1983.

578. American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, Briefing on the military situation in East Timor, 17 November 1981.

579. See Conboy, Kopassus, p. 310.

580. Ben Anderson, Arief Djati and Douglas Kammen, "Interview with Mario Carrascalão," Indonesia 76 October 2003, p. 8.

581. Telegram, US Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, Negotiations to End Insurgency in East Timor, 11 June 1983.

582. See "Translation of Letter from Fretilin by K. Reppter (Canberra)", in Official Report of the Australian Parliamentary Delegation to Indonesia, led by The Honourable W. L. Morrison, M.P., July–August 1983, pp. 169-170.

583. See HRVD Statements 6957-01; 5330-01; 2369-02; 6205-01; 39977-01; 5344-02.

584. 1983 US State Department Annual Report on Indonesia, p. 109.

585. Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

586. CAVR Interview with José Gomes, Village Head of Bibileo-Lalerek Mutin, Lacluta, Viqueque, 13 December 2003.

587. Telegram, American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, Views on East Timor Developments, 9 September 1983; see also CAVR Interview with José Gomes, Village Head of Bibileo-Lalerek Mutin, Lacluta, Viqueque, 13 December 2003; see also Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 142.

588. American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, Current developments in East Timor [obscured] on renewed fighting, access by foreigners, etc., 23 September 1983.

589. Timor Information Service, Gough Whitlam Fails to Convince, March/April 1982, p. 10.

590. "Timor Bishop Accuses Military of Massacring 84 Villagers", Peter Millership, Reuters, Dili, 1 March 1984, cited in Taylor, East Timor, p. 147.

591. CAVR Interview with José Gomes, Village Head of Bibileo-Lalerek Mutin, Lacluta, Viqueque, 13 December 2003.

592. See also Olinda Pinto Martins, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, November 2003.

593. American Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, Current developments in East Timor [obscured] on renewed fighting, access by foreigners, etc., 23 September 1983.

594. Moerdani, article in Sinar Harapan newspaper, 17 August 1983, cited in Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 143.

595. Budiardjo and Liem, The War in East Timor, p. 139.

596. Telegram, US Embassy Jakarta to Secretary State Washington, [Obscured] Views on East Timor Developments, 9 September 1983.

597. ACFOA, East Timor Report No. 5, November 1983.

598. "Letter to Belo from Indonesian Bishops Conference, 1983", reprinted in Just Reading No 2, The Church and East Timor, Catholic Commission for Justice, Development and Peace 1993, p. 18; see also Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 154.

599. See Xanana Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, pp. 85-126.

600. Ibid, pp. 129-136.

601. CAVR Interview with Antonio Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 18 December 2003; see CAVR Interview with Avelino Coelho, 17 July 2004; see also Constancio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle: Inside the Timorese Resistance, Boston, South End Press, 1997, p. 122.

602. Pinto and Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle: Inside the Timorese Resistance, p. 123.

603. See Abel Guterres, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

604. Sister Monica Nakamura, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

605. See Antonio Tómas Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak) and Mariano Soares, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

606. See Marito Nicolau dos Reis, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

607. Ade Rostina Sitompul, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

608. CAVR Interviews with Aleixo da Silva Gama ("Cobra"), Dili, [undated]; CAVR Interview with Antonio Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 18 December 2003; CAVR Interview with José Manuel Fernandes, Dili, 31 October 2002; and CAVR Interview with Avelino Coelho, Dili, 17 July 2004.

609. CAVR Interview with Avelino Coelho, Dili, 17 July 2004; CAVR Interview with Gregório Saldanha, Dili, 6 May 2004; and CAVR Interview with Octávio da Conceição, Dili, 3 November 2002.

610. CAVR Interview with João Freitas da Câmara, Dili, 5 June 2004.

611. Ibid.

612. See Arnold S. Kohen, From the Place of the Dead: Bishop Belo and the Struggle for East Timor, p.161.

613. Ibid, pp.151-152.

614. Ibid, p.166; see also Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, 28–29 April 2003.

615. Kohen, From the Place of the Dead: Bishop Belo and the Struggle for East Timor, p. 167.

616. Ibid, p. 169.

617. Ibid. pp. 169-173.

618. UNGA Resolution no. 37/30, 1982.

619. Francesc Vendrell, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

620. Ian Martin, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 17 March 2004.

621. Francesc Vendrell, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community 15–17 March 2004.

622. Kohen, From the Place of the Dead: Bishop Belo and the Struggle for East Timor, p. 177.

623. Ibid, p. 178.

624. See Gregório Saldanha, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

625. Constâncio Pinto, "The Student Movement and The Independence Struggle in East Timor: An Interview" in Richard Tanter, Mark Selden & Stephen R Shalom (eds), Bitter Flowers, Sweet Flowers, East Timor, Indonesia and The World Community, London, Rowman & Littlefield Publishers Inc., p. 34.

626. See, for example, CAVR Interview with José Manuel, Dili, 31 October 2002; and CAVR Interview with Fernanda Soares, Caicoli, Dili, 21 January 2003.

627. CAVR Interview with Gregório Saldanha, Dili, 6 May 2004; see also CAVR Interview with Octávio da Conceição, Dili, 3 November 2002.

628. CAVR Interview with Gregório Saldanha, Dili, 6 May 2004.

629. Keputusan Presiden Republik Indonesia, Nomor 62 Tahun 1988 tentang Penyelenggaraan Pemerintahan dan Pembangunan di Propinsi Daerah Tingkat I Timor Timur [Decree of President of Republic of Indonesia No. 62/1988 reg. the Organisation of Administration and Development in the Province of East Timor], published in Himpunan Peraturan Negara [Collected State Regulation] Triwulan IV, 1988, Sekretariat Negara Republik Indonesia, Jakarta, pp. 1103-05.

630. ACFOA Development Dossier No 29, East Timor: Keeping the Flame of Freedom Alive, February 1991.

631. See Yeni Rosa Damayanti and Nugroho Katjasungkana, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

632. "A Message to Catholic Youth in Timor-Leste and Students in Jakarta", 20 May 1986, reprinted in Xanana Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, pp. 109-110.

633. Francesc Vendrell, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

634. José Ramos-Horta, Closing Address to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.

635. Pinto and Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle: Inside the Timorese Resistance, Foreword.

636. Simplicio Celestino de Deus, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.

637. Max Stahl, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.

638. Simplicio Celestino de Deus, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.

639. See Kohen, From the Place of the Dead: Bishop Belo and the Struggle for East Timor, pp. 197-200.

640. Max Stahl, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.

641. Alexandrino da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, 29–30 March 2004.

642. CAVR Interview with Avelino Coelho Silva, Dili, 17 July 2004; CAVR Interview with João Freitas da Camara, Dili, 5 June 2004; see also Pinto and Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle, pp. 196-197.

643. See Gregório Saldanha, testimony to the CAVR Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

644. Luhut Pangaribuan and Ade Rostina Sitompul, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

645. East Timor After Santa Cruz: Indonesia and the international order, compiled by Peace is Possible in East Timor, Ed. Peace is Possible in East Timor, Lisbon, January 1993.

646. Tony Parkinson, "Hawk Blasts Jakarta Over Sick Remarks", The Australian, 22 November 1991; see also Pinto, testimony to Hearing Before The Subcommittee On International Operations And Human Rights Of The Committee On International Relations House Of Representatives, One Hundred Fifth Congress, Second Session; May 7, 1998.

647. HRVD Statement 02049.

648. Assepol, Submission to CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

649. Xanana Gusmão, Speech at the Inauguration of the CAVR headquarters at the former Balide Prison, Dili, 17 February 2003.

650. See Geoffrey Robinson, East Timor 1999: Crimes Against Humanity – A Report Commissioned by the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, July, 2003, p. 85 [Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to the CAVR]. CAVR Archive.

651. AFP, "East Timor/Church", Jakarta, 12 July 1994.

652. Amnesty International, East Timor – Continuing Human Rights Violations, 2 February 1995.

653. Alexandrino da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, 29–30 March 2004. See also article by Kieran Dwyer in Matebian News, April 1995, published by the East Timor Relief Association (ETRA), Sydney, Australia.

654. Ade Rostina Sitompul, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003; Assepol, Submission to CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

655. Nugroho Katjasungkana, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

656. CAVR Interview with Joaquim Fonseca, Dili, 23 May 2004; CAVR Interview with Fernando de Araújo (Lasama), Dili, 5 May 2004; and CAVR Interview with Avelino Coelho, Dili, 17 July 2004.

657. CAVR Interview with Joaquim Fonseca, Dili, 23 May 2004; and CAVR Interview with Oscar da Silva, Dili, 23 May 2004.

658. CAVR Interview with Fernando de Araújo ("Lasama"), Dili, 5 May 2004.

659. See Yeni Rosa Damayanti, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

660. See Yeni Rosa Damayanti and Nugroho Kacasungkana, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

661. CAVR Interview with Mariano Sabino Lopes, Dili, [undated interview].

662. See CAVR Interview with Virgílio da Silva Guterres, Dili, 21 February 2005; see also CAVR Interview with Avelino Coelho, Dili, 17 July 2004.

663. CAVR Interview with Virgílio da Silva Guterres, Dili, 21 February 2005.

664. Kompas newspaper, Jakarta, 18 November 1995.

665. CAVR Interview with Naldo Rei, Dili, 11 November 2003.

666. CAVR Interview with Mariano Sabino Lopes, Dili, 2004; see also CAVR Interview with Naldo Rei, Dili, 11 November 2003.

667. CAVR Interview with Joaquim Fonseca, Dili, 23 May 2004.

668. CAVR Interview with Mariano Sabino Lopes, Dili, [undated interview].

669. Dunn, East Timor, 2003, pp. 338-9.

670. Francesc Vendrell, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

671. Suzannah Linton, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

672. Ibid.

673. Nobel Peace Prize Presentation Speech, 10 December 1996, available at http://nobelprize.org/peace/laureates/1996/presentation-speech.html.

674. Bishop Carlos Belo, Nobel Peace Prize Acceptance Speech, 10 December 1996.

675. Francesc Vendrell, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

676. Ibid.

677. Ibid.

678. Jim Schiller, The 1997 Indonesian Elections: Festival of democracy or costly fiction?, Occasional Paper 22, Centre for Asia Pacific Initiatives, University of Victoria, May 1999.

679. "Statement of the National Commission on Human Rights concerning the unrest in Jakarta and surrounding areas," Komnas HAM [Indonesian National Commission for Human Right], 2 June 1998.

680. Don Greenless and Robert Garran, Deliverance: The Inside Story of East Timor's Fight for Freedom, Allen & Unwin, Australia, 2002, pp. 28-29.

681. Dan Nicholson, "The Lorikeet Warriors: East Timor New Generation National Resistance 1989–1999", BA Thesis, University of Melbourne, October 2001, p. 38.

682. CAVR Interview with Basilio Dias Araújo, Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 26 July 2004.

683. John Martinkus, A Dirty Little War: An Eyewitness of East Timor's Descent into Hell 1997–2000, Random House, Australia, 2001, p. 54.

684. Komando Daerah Militer IX Udayana, Komando Resor Militer 164, Rekapitulasi Kekuatan Personil Organik dan Penugasan, July 1998 [Regional Military Command IX Udayana, Sub-regional Military Command 164, Recapitulation of Capacity of Organic Personnel and Its Assignment Allocation]; see also Komando Daerah Militer IX Udayana, Komando Resor Militer 164, Rekapitulasi Kekuatan Personil Organik dan Penugasan Posisi, November 1997 [Regional Military Command IX Udayana, Sub-regional Military Command 164, Recapitulation of the Capacity of Organic Personnel and Its Assignment Allocation].

685. Komando Daerah Militer IX Udayana, Komando Resor Militer 164, Kekuatan Personil Tim Tim Penugasan, July 1998 [Regional Military Command IX Udayana, Sub-regional Military Command 164, East Timor's Personnel Capacity and Its Assignment Allocation].

686. Report of the Indonesian commission of inquiry into atrocities committed in East Timor in 1999 (KPP HAM, Report on East Timor), 31 January 2000, para. 68.

687. See witness testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing, Rona Ami Nia Lian (Hear our Voice), 11–12 November 2002.

688. Martinkus, A Dirty Little War, p. 98.

689. Ibid, p. 106.

690. Ibid, p. 105; see also KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 68.

691. See discussion in Geoffrey Robinson, "People's War: Militia in East Timor and Indonesia", South East Asia Research, 9, November 2001, p. 296.

692. See KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 39; see also Geoffrey Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, pp. 90-93.

693. See Samuel Moore, "The Indonesian Military's Last Years in East Timor: An Analysis of its Documents", Indonesia 72, Cornell South East Asia Program, October 2001, p 31.

694. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 40 and 49.

695. Robinson, People's War, p. 276.

696. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 44; see also Moore, Indonesian Military's Last Years, p. 30.

697. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 48; see also Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 106.

698. Louise Williams, "Separatists fear bloodshed as military arms integrationists", Sydney Morning Herald, 28 January 1999; "Interview: Orders to Kill", Expresso, Lisbon, 17 September 1999.

699. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 47.

700. Danrem 164/WD to Dandim 1627-1639. Secret telegram No TR/41/1999, Jan 28, cited in Robinson, East Timor, p. 110; see also KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 50.

701. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 98; KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 40.

702. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 54.

703. Ibid, para. 50.

704. Cited in Xanana Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, p. 233-4.

705. Cited in Ian Martin, Self-Determination in East Timor: The United Nations, The Ballot, and International Intervention, Boulder, Lynne Riener, 2001, p. 21.

706. Alexander Downer, Press Conference, Adelaide, 12 January 1999.

707. Susan Sim, The Straits Times (Singapore), 2 February 1999, quoted in Greenlees and Garran, Deliverance-The Inside Story of East Timor's Fight for Freedom, Allen and Unwin, Sydney, 2002, p. 93.

708. Moore, Indonesian Military's Last Years, p. 33.

709. Press briefing on East Timor, United Nations, New York, 9 February 1999, cited in Martin, p. 24.

710. See Lansell Taudevin, East Timor: Too Little Too Late, Duffy & Snellgrove, Sydney, 2000, p. 223.

711. Martinkus, A Dirty Little War, p. 119.

712. CNRT message to United Nations Secretary General and Australian Ambassador to Indonesia, 26 January 1999, signed by Leandro Isaac, cited in Taudevin, East Timor, p. 222.

713. CNRT press release "Falintil Resumes Their Mission in Defence of the People of East Timor", 5 April 1999, partly cited in Martin, p. 30.

714. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 193; see also KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 104-114.

715. Mcdonald, Ball (ed), Masters of Terror: Indonesia's Military and Violence in East Timor in 1999, Australian National University, Canberra, 2002, http://yayasanhak.minihub.org/mot/cons92z%20-%20Eurico%20Guterres.htm, at January 2005.

716. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 119-121.

717. See KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 86-191; see also generally Robinson, East Timor, chapter 10.

718. Tono Suratman, Untuk Negaraku, Pustaka Sinar Harapan, Jakarta, 2002, p. 112, and p. 118.

719. See, for example, KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 108 and 119-121.

720. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 70.

721. Ibid, p. 31.

722. Ibid, p. 33.

723. Article 2 of Annexe 3 to the 5 May Agreements, cited in Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (DFAT), East Timor in Transition 1998–2000 – An Australian Policy Challenge, Canberra, 2001.

724. José Ramos-Horta, letter to Kofi Annan, quoted in Greenlees and Garran, p. 147.

725. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 33; see also Francesc Vendrell and Ian Martin, testimonies to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

726. Moore, Indonesian Military's Last Years, p. 41.

727. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 60.

728. Annexe II: Agreement Regarding the Modalities for the Popular Consultation of the East Timorese through a direct Ballot, 5 May Agreements, reprinted in Martin, Self-Determination, p. 144.

729. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 46.

730. Ibid, p. 93.

731. Ibid, p. 42.

732. Ibid, p. 88.

733. See Yeni Rosa Damayanti, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

734. Martin, Self-Determination, p 71.

735. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 216.

736. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 124; see also Robinson, East Timor, p. 63.

737. Martin, Self-Determination, p 71.

738. Ibid, p. 71.

739. Ibid, p. 70.

740. See Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, generally; see also KPP HAM Report on East Timor; See Julieta Jesuirina dos Santos, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, 28–29 March 2004; see also Part 9: Community Reconciliation, section on the background of the CRP mandate.

741. Surat Bupati Kepala Daerah Tk II Dili, Nomor 33 tahun 1999, tentang Pengamanan Swakarsa dan Ketertiban Kota Dili [Letter of Dili District Administrator, No. 33 Year 1999, reg. Self-Initiate Security and Order in city of Dili].

742. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 89; Moore, Indonesian Military's Last Years, p. 39.

743. Ross Coulthart, "Timor on the brink", Sunday Programme, Channel 9 Television, Sydney, Australia. Screened June 1999.

744. Ian Martin, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2003.

745. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, pp. 210-213.

746. Ian Martin, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2003.

747. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 48.

748. Report of the Secretary-General, S/1999/803, 20 July 1999.

749. Ibid.

750. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 45.

751. Electoral Commission, East Timor Popular Consultation. Determination: Registration of Voters, 25 August 1999, cited by Martin, Self-Determination, p. 61.

752. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 161.

753. See Geoffrey Robinson, "People's War: Militia in East Timor and Indonesia", South East Asia Research, 9, November 2001, p. 206.

754. Fernando de Araújo, "The CNRT Campaign for Independence" in James J. Fox and Dionisio Babo Soares (eds), East Timor: Out of the Ashes, Crawford House Publishing, Adelaide, 2000, p. 111.

755. CAVR Interview with Agio Pereira, former Head of the CPCC National Department of Information, March 2005. CAVR Archive.

756. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 43.

757. Ibid, p. 47.

758. CAVR Interview with Basilio Dias Araújo, former spokesman for FPDK, Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 26 July 2004.

759. Surat Gubenur No 200/827/SOSPOL/V/1999, tentang Tindakan terhadap PNS yang terlibat organisasi/kegiatan yang menentang Pemerintah RI, Dili, 28 May 1999 [Letter of Governor (of East Timor) No. 200/827/SOSPOL/V/1999, reg. Action to Civil Servant involved in organisation/activities against the Government of Republic of Indonesia].

760. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 35.

761. Governor's letter to the Bupati of Liquiçá, dated 21 May, 1999, Yayasan Hak collection, cited in Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 115.

762. Governor's letter 461/e.09/BIDRAM II/99 to Bupati of Lautém, Los Palos, Approval of Proposal.

763. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 75.

764. Komando Resort Militer 164/Wira Dharma, Rencana Operasi Wira Dharma-99, [Operation Plan of Wira Dharma-99] Dili, July 1999. (Yayasan Hak document 34.)

765. Tono Suratman, Untuk Negaraku, Pustaka Sinar Harapan, Jakarta, 2002, p. 51.

766. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 71.

767. Ibid, p. 73.

768. "Clash Mars East Timor Registration", The Jakarta Post, 17 July 1999; "Fortilos: Situasi Dili 1/9/99 - 21:00", SiaR, 31 August 1999, cited in McDonald, Ball, et al., Masters of Terror: Indonesia's Military and Violence in East Timor in 1999, Canberra: Strategic and Defence Studies Centre, Australian National University (Canberra Paper #145), 2002, available at: yayasanhak.minihub.org/mot/Timbul%20 Silaen.htm; see also KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 172.

769. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 48; see also Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 39.

770. Don Greenless and Robert Garran, Deliverance-The Inside Story of East Timor's Fight for Freedom, Allen and Unwin, Sydney, 2002, p. 187.

771. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 84.

772. Ibid, p. 90.

773. Ibid, p. 90.

774. Ibid, p. 90.

775. Quoted in Greenlees, p. 191.

776. Report of the Electoral Commission, quoted by Martin, Self-Determination, p. 91.

777. Ibid, p. 90.

778. Ibid, p. 93.

779. Electoral Commission Determination, Dili, 4 September 1999, and see Martin, Self-Determination, pp. 157-160.

780. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 93.

781. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 72.

782. Ibid, para. 161.

783. Ibid, para. 181.

784. Ibid, para. 81.

785. Ibid, para. 84 and 85; see also Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 44.

786. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 221.

787. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 131-135; see also Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to the CAVR, p. 225.

788. Ibid, para. 139.

789. Samuel Moore, "The Indonesian Military's Last Years in East Timor: An Analysis of its Documents", Indonesia 72, Cornell South East Asia Program, October 2001, p. 31.

790. Feliciana Cardoso, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, 28–29 April 2003.

791. Greenlees and Garran, p. 231.

792. See HRVD Statements 3530-04; 6160; 6229; 6762; 6173-03; 4266; 8259; 2104-02; 8255; 1061-05; 0710; see also KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 171.

793. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 97.

794. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, VI.6.

795. Ibid, para. 50.

796. Ibid, para. 162.

797. Submission to the CAVR, interview with Virgilio Simith by David Hicks, Maxine Hicks and Phyllis Ferguson, 7 July 2005. CAVR Archive.

798. Ibid.

799. See discussion in Part 7.7: Sexual Violence and, for example, BM, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing Rona Ami Nia Lian (Hear our Voice), 11–12 November 2002.

800. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 142; see also Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Maliana Indictment, Case No. 2003/18, para. 128-190.

801. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 185.

802. Ian Martin, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

803. Abel Guterres, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

804. Martin, Self-Determination, pp. 104-105.

805. See Martin, Self-Determination, pp. 104-105; see also Ian Martin, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

806. Ian Martin, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

807. See KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 87.

808. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 111.

809. Ian Martin, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

810. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 101.

811. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 98.

812. Ibid, para. 83; Martin, Self-Determination, p. 115.

813. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 164.

814. Human Rights Watch, Report on East Nusa Tenggara, 1999.

815. Ibid.

816. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 151; see also Statement 2285. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Joni Marques, et al., Case No. 2000/9, para. 33-40. Special Panel for Serious Crimes, Judgement, 11 December 2001. Seven militia members including Joni Marques were found guilty by the Special Panel for Serious Crimes.

817. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 115.

818. Truk F [Tim Relawan Untuk Kemanusiaan, Voluntary Team for Humanity]. Submission delivered to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, April 2003.

819. Human Rights Watch, Report on East Nusa Tenggara, 1999.

820. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 97.

821. KPP HAM, Report on East Timor, para. 185.

822. Human Rights Watch, World Report 2001, East Timor, at http://www.hrw.org/wr2k1/asia/etimor3.html.

823. Martin, Self-Determination, p. 115.

Chega!

Part 4.

Regime of Occupation

Part 4. Regime of Occupation

Tables:

4. Regime of Occupation

Introduction

1. From the early days following Portugal's Carnation Revolution in April 1974 and the beginning of the decolonisation process, the Indonesian military began to intervene in the political future of Timor-Leste.* The Indonesian armed forces imposed military solutions to the emerging political problems with disastrous consequences for the people of Timor-Leste. Indonesia's concerns over the emerging post-colonial Timor-Leste need never have resulted in military intervention if hard-line military leaders had not played such an important role in President Soeharto's New Order regime. Once committed to military intervention, ABRI was dominant during the early years of the occupation: by increasing military violence they sought to achieve the political objectives of pacification and integration. To do this, they brought the conflict to every level of East Timorese society, involving East Timorese men, women and children in combat, intelligence, torture and killings to control the population. By the late 1980s, when full-scale military conflict shifted to clandestine resistance by a new generation of East Timorese youth, the Indonesian military again sought violent solutions to the problem. Death squads and paramilitaries in the mid-1990s became forerunners to the widespread militias formed in 1998-99. From 1974 to 1999, there was a consistent pattern of forming East Timorese armed paramilitary forces that operated with impunity with the support of ABRI.

2. This military strategy had extensive and long-term consequences for the people of Timor-Leste. The scale of violence was multiplied and brought into even the smallest villages across the territory. Fear and distrust were sown in communities as Timorese were turned against Timorese, especially through intelligence and surveillance operations. Impunity for perpetrators and the lack of any effective system to uphold the rule of law

* ABRI, the acronym for Angkatan Bersenjata Republik Indonesia (Armed Forces of the Republic of Indonesia), existed until April 1999 at which time the police were separated from the other three services--the army, navy and air force. These three were then jointly named Tentara Nasional Indonesia (the Indonesian National Army) or TNI.

meant that East Timorese people could not trust the police and the mechanisms of civil administration to protect them. The civil administration was effectively subservient to the military as an institution and to powerful individual commanders throughout the occupation. Many key civilian posts, from the national to district levels, were filled by military or ex-military figures. This compromised the civil administration's capacity to operate and implement national development objectives.

3. This part provides background on the Indonesian military and governance systems as they were applied in Timor-Leste throughout the period of occupation. It serves as a reference to assist in understanding the context of the human rights violations reported in other parts of the report.

The Indonesian armed forces and their role in Timor-Leste*

Introduction

4. The Indonesian armed forces played the leading role in the Indonesian intervention and 24-year occupation of Timor-Leste. In 1974-75, after the Carnation Revolution in Portugal opened the way to decolonisation in Portuguese Timor, the Indonesian military intelligence agency, Bakin (Badan Koordinasi Intelijen Nasional), and the closely associated civilian think-tank, the Centre for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), masterminded covert operations and a destabilisation campaign in the territory. From late 1974, these groups began to arm and train East Timorese in West Timor, thus extending the conflict into Timorese society, a practice that was to continue until 1999.

5. The Commission heard testimony from a senior CSIS official, Yusuf Wanandi, who said that military hardliners dominated the debate when Indonesia decided on full-scale military intervention and invasion in 1975. From the outset they characterised the Timor-Leste intervention as an heroic anti-communist crusade, joining it to the ideology and historical antecedents of the New Order regime in order to attract Western support in the continuing Cold War situation. The invasion of Timor-Leste was a large-scale military exercise. The ABRI hardliners had convinced the Indonesian leadership and their international backers that absorbing Timor-Leste would be a quick and simple matter. ABRI's credibility was invested in this venture. When military victory did not come as quickly or as easily as expected, ABRI sought and gained international military assistance that allowed it to intensify its operations.[1]

6. While ABRI could claim to have military control over Timor-Leste from the late 1970s, it was never able to eliminate the armed resistance. As the Resistance shifted to a strategy that relied primarily on clandestine networks, urban protest and an international diplomatic campaign, ABRI applied oppressive measures to subdue this resistance. It established a pervasive hold over Timorese society and the economy. Its territorial structure extended down to the village level, paralleling and dominating the structure of the civil administration. It maintained intelligence networks across the country and mobilised East Timorese civilians into paramilitary forces during the 24-year occupation, culminating in the militias of 1999. It maintained control over the police until April 1999. It also established powerful business interests and monopolies in the territory, which, like its other activities, had a damaging impact on the everyday lives of East Timorese (see Vol. III, Part 7.9: Economic and Social Rights). The invasion of Timor-Leste and the subsequent inability of the Indonesian military to crush resistance to its occupation made the territory the main arena in which Indonesian soldiers could gain experience in combat and anti-insurgency during the 24 years of occupation. Generations of officers used combat experience gained in Timor-Leste to further their careers. Operating in a distant province on the periphery of the Indonesian archipelago, the Indonesian military went about its task with virtually no outside scrutiny within a system where the civil administration had no power to maintain balance or control the military's actions. The Indonesian armed forces operated with impunity.

* This section focuses on the conventional military role of ABRI. ABRI's socio-political role is discussed in Civil Administration, p. 397.

7. The sections in Part 7 of this report on human rights violations set out the consequences of actions by the Indonesian armed forces for the East Timorese and their experience of living under a system dominated by the Indonesian military. This section provides information about the Indonesian military and its operations in Timor-Leste in order to provide a context for the violations parts in Volumes II and III.

Background of the Indonesian armed forces

The historical background to ABRI and TNI[2]

8. First the Dutch and later the Japanese recruited Indonesians into their armed forces. Officers in the Royal Netherlands Indies Army (Koninklijk Nederlands-Indisch Leger, KNIL) were mostly Dutch, but the troops were Indonesians trained by the Dutch. The Japanese invaded in March 1942 and by the end of that year they had established Heiho as an auxiliary unit with guard duties. On 3 October 1943, the Japanese formed a more formal fighting unit known as PETA (pasukan sukarela Pembela Tanah Air, Volunteer Force for Homeland Defence) to support them should allied forces land. During the transition from Japanese control to the recognition of Indonesia as a fully independent nation, a number of armed organisations arose. These groups reflected a wide ideological range from Muslims struggling for an Islamic state to radical nationalists and Communists to those who advocated a secular state. On 22 August 1945, the Preparatory Committee for Independence (Panitia Persiapan Kemerdekaan Indonesia, PPKI) formed the People's Security Body (Badan Keamanan Rakyat, BKR) comprising mostly former PETA members and officers. Following the arrival of allied troops in late September 1945, the BKR became the People's Security Army (Tentara Keamanan Rakyat, TKR) on 5 October 1945 under a centralised command. In a decree issued by Sukarno on 26 January 1946, the People's Security Army became the Army of the Republic of Indonesia (Tentara Republik Indonesia, TRI). The TRI was consolidated in mid-May 1946, and on 26 June 1946 both the air force and navy were placed under the command of the TRI's commander-in-chief, Sudirman, rather than falling under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Defence. On 5 May 1947, Sukarno joined the TRI with other armed groups (laskar) to form the Indonesian National Army (Tentara Nasional Indonesia, TNI). During the 1950s the commanders of the army, air force and navy were under the command of the President, but following the political upheavals and widespread killings in 1965, these services were consolidated along with the police in December 1965 to become the Armed Forces of the Republic of Indonesia (Angkatan Bersenjata Republik Indonesia ABRI) under the commander-in-chief of the armed forces. In April 1999, with the separation of the police from the armed forces, ABRI became the TNI.

The armed forces as saviour of the nation

9. Indonesia's struggle for independence from Dutch colonial rule was long and complex. Its armed phase after the Second World War mobilised a broad cross-section of Indonesian society to evict the Dutch who attempted to reassert their colonial authority following the surrender of the Japanese. The Army of the Republic of Indonesia (Tentara Republik Indonesia, TRI) and later the Indonesian National Army (Tentara Nasional Indonesia, TNI) were formed to lead this struggle and played a key role in forcing the Netherlands to depart after the revolution of 1945-49. During this period the relationship of the armed forces with politicians and the many citizens' militias that sprang up to fight for what was called the Revolution was not always easy. While Indonesia's civilian leadership adopted a democratic constitution in 1950, the military saw itself from the outset as having a major role to play in Indonesia's political future.

10. In the years following independence, a number of milestones marked the consolidation of military power that enabled the military to promote itself as having saved the nation. During much of the 1950s, the armed forces were engaged in combating secessionist and Islamic movements. In 1957-58 Indonesia faced two federalist revolts, one in Sumatra (Pemerintah Revolusioner Republik Indonesia, PRRI) and one in Sulawesi (Perjuangan Rakyat Semesta, Permesta). Both revolts had strong support, including backing from some elements in the military. President Sukarno declared martial law in 1957 and the military, led by General Abdul Haris Nasution, crushed both rebellions. Confident from these victories, and its takeover of nationalised Dutch enterprises at around the same time, the Indonesian military adopted an increasingly aggressive political stance in the late 1950s, first against political parties and then against the democratic system itself. With the support of the military, Sukarno abandoned parliamentary democracy in 1959, reinstating the 1945 Constitution and instituting what he called Guided Democracy which gave greater powers to the president. Guided Democracy also gave the military, as one of several so-called "functional groups", the right to participate in politics.[3]

11. Following a tumultuous period in the early 1960s when Sukarno presided over an increasingly divided Indonesia, the army, under the command of Major General Soeharto, effectively deposed the president and initiated a violent purge against its main political rival, the Indonesian Communist Party (Partai Komunis Indonesia, PKI). With the active support of the military, between 250,000 and 1 million suspected communists were killed in 1965-66, and many more leftists and Sukarno supporters were incarcerated in prisons and prison camps.[4] In Soeharto's New Order, the military was once again represented as having saved the nation, this time from communism.

12. In 1974, the Indonesian military used the threat of communism to justify its involvement in covert operations in Timor-Leste (See Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). At the height of the Cold War this was a powerful symbol for Indonesia's international allies, particularly as the United States sought to control the spread of communism in Southeast Asia. Though there was no evidence that communism was a major force in Timor-Leste politics, or that communist nations were actively wooing Timor-Leste's political leaders, the armed forces depicted the possibility of an independent Timor-Leste as a threat to the stability of Indonesia. For years after the 1975 invasion, ABRI continued to insist that it was fighting a communist enemy in Timor-Leste.[5]

Armed forces doctrine

13. The Indonesian armed forces basic doctrine is known as the Entire People's Defence and Security System (Sistem Pertahanan Keamanan Rakyat Semesta, Sishankamrata), according to which all citizens have a role to play in national defence. The concept emerged from the war of independence in which the armed forces depended on the support of the population.[6] Originally this was a concept based on the idea that the entire nation would need to resist an external enemy if it overpowered the conventional military. Over time its focus changed as the armed forces came to see the greatest threat to national security as being internal.

14. The role of the Indonesian armed forces in national political life changed significantly when in 1959 President Sukarno declared "Guided Democracy" and gave the armed forces the right to participate in politics. Under the leadership of General Abdul Haris Nasution, the armed forces formed a dual function policy (dwifungsi), claiming for itself both a security role and a social-political role.

15. From 1965 and the advent of President Soeharto's New Order regime, ABRI was concerned almost exclusively with internal security. This was articulated in a range of policies and concepts further justifying its engagement in all spheres of the nation's life. In 1966, for example, it adopted the all-embracing concept of ipoleksos - ideology, politics, economic and social.[7] The consolidation of the territorial structure, which gave ABRI a geographical presence throughout Indonesia (see paragraphs 17 and 18), reflected this preoccupation with internal control.

16. During the course of the New Order regime, intolerance of internal dissent increased to the point where any criticism of the regime was regarded as a threat to the state. The 1982 Defence Act laid out ABRI's social-political role, stating that:

> National defence and security includes defence against both external and internal threats, and these threats may be directed against national freedom and sovereignty, national unity and solidarity, the integrity of the nation and national jurisdiction, and the values of the national ideology, Pancasila and the Constitution.[8]

Territorial structure of the Indonesian armed forces

17. The structure of Indonesia's armed forces is divided into two broad operational sections, a combat command and a territorial command. The territorial structure is a particular feature of Indonesia's armed forces, with its roots in the war of independence when the Indonesian armed forces were composed of local, non-professional units that fought a guerrilla-style war against the Dutch. These local units developed into the formal territorial structure that exists today which parallels the civil administrative structure. At the top of this structure operationally is the Regional Military Command (Komando Daerah Militer, Kodam), which oversees a number of Sub-regional Commands (Komando Resort Militer, Korem).* At this level the military commands do not always correspond to the same administrative units across the archipelago. The populous provinces of Jakarta and West, Central and East Java, have their own Regional Commands and in the case of the last three, Sub-regional Commands cover a number of districts. Most Regional Commands, however, cover more than one province while Sub-regional Commands cover the territory of a single province. This was the case in Timor-Leste during most of the period of the occupation (see paragraphs 31-33). Below the Korem, the structure invariably corresponds to the civil administrative units: each district has a District Military Command (Komando Distrik Militer, Kodim) and each sub-district a Sub-district Military Command (Komando Rayon Militer, Koramil). In most villages there is a non-commissioned "village guidance" officer called a Babinsa (Bintara Pembina Desa). The Indonesian military also has civil defence forces known as Wanra (Perlawanan Rakyat, People's Resistance) and Ratih (Rakyat Terlatih, Trained Civilians) under its command. These paramilitary groups are recruited from the civilian population in villages and represent a cost-effective way of extending military control and of enlisting the general public for security duties (see Vol. I, Part 4.3: Militarisation of East Timorese society, paragraphs 64-140). The result of this structure was an institution able to exercise power on both the government and the population at all levels of society, and a large standing army that in 1993 fielded one soldier for every 900 people.[9]

18. During the early years of President Soeharto's New Order regime this territorial structure was consolidated and enlarged. ABRI became the core of the regime, and through its territorial structure was able to use a range of methods to ensure its dominance. It institutionalised consultations with high-ranking members of the civil administration and the police called Muspida (Musyawarah Pimpinan Daerah, Regional Leadership Consultation) at provincial and district levels, and Tripika (Tri Pimpinan Kecamatan, Sub-district Leadership Triumvirate) at the sub-district level. In other areas, the New Order presented a largely civilian face to the world. For example, it exhorted the public to pledge allegiance to the state through ensuring public participation in the ceremonial aspects of Indonesian nationalism. ABRI also implemented public works projects such as 'ABRI Enters the Village' (ABRI Masuk Desa) in keeping with its dual function (dwifungsi).

* Until 1985 groups of Kodam fell under the command of a higher territorial unit, the Kowilhan (Sectoral Defence Command). The Kowilhan was abolished because it came to be seen as redundant.

Indonesian armed forces and the police

19. Indonesia's police force was structurally part of the military throughout the New Order. This long history of effective subservience to the leadership of the armed forces had a profound effect on the independence of the police and their capacity to enforce law and order. This history has contributed to the impunity enjoyed by the armed forces and those who work with it. The police force doctrine, founded on a belief that security is the responsibility of the total population, is similar to that of the armed forces. Under its System of Neighbourhood Security (Sistem Keamanan Lingkungan, Siskamling) members of the community have a role in maintaining security in their locality.[10] Like the military, the police force also has a territorial structure, including a presence at the village level (Bintara Polisi Daerah, Binpolda). In addition to its normal duties, the police maintain an armed division called the Mobile Brigade (Brigade Mobil, Brimob). Brimob originally had responsibility for internal security, but as this role was taken over by the military during the New Order this division began to specialise in riot control and was used extensively for this purpose.

Indonesian armed forces funding and its role in the Indonesian economy

20. Since its inception the Indonesian military has played a role in Indonesia's economy. This is largely because the armed forces received inadequate budget allocations,[11] and consequently were forced to raise funds themselves.[12] This practice of "extra-budgetary" funding became institutionally entrenched.[13]

21. During the Revolution, the armed forces had to improvise to supply its troops, but its deep involvement in the economy dates from the late 1950s, as the military took on a central role in all aspects of national life. The nationalisation of foreign-owned enterprises in 1957 gave the military control over a number of state assets which it used for institutional and personal gain. Military officers also seconded to powerful positions in key state agencies such as the National Logistics Agency (Badan Urusan Logistik, Bulog)[14] that is responsible for the distribution of basic staples. This was the beginning of the armed forces' institutionalised role as a source of economic dominance within the nation.

22. During the New Order, President Soeharto moved to reduce the budget allocation to the military from almost 30% to less than 10% of government expenditure.[15] He won praise for what appeared to be a reduction in the role of the military in the society. However, at the same time ABRI grew in size and territorial reach, and developed its role in state affairs. The shortfall in government funding was made up by ABRI's business ventures.[16]

23. The development objectives of the New Order regime provided a justification for ABRI's economic role.[17] The concept of kekaryaan (assignment to civilian posts in state and government agencies, and nationalised enterprises) sanctified ABRI's role in the nation's economy.[18] This tied in closely with another key military concept, namely that 'guidance', as exemplified through military discipline and integrity, was vital to the progress of the whole nation. In order to coordinate these functions, ABRI maintained a central office for social political affairs (Kantor pusat masalah sosial politik, Kantor Sospol).[19] The result was a class of civilian officers that by 1992 had numbered 14,000[20] (see paragraphs 141-183 below).

24. The military's control of key state assets allowed it to ensure that lucrative contracts were granted to ABRI-linked businesses. This often resulted in the inefficient running of state agencies for military gain. A clear example of this was the near-bankruptcy of the state oil conglomerate Pertamina in the mid-1970s after it had accumulated massive debt and become "a state within a state" answerable only to President Soeharto.[21] The Pertamina crisis coincided with the build-up to intervention in Timor-Leste and initially gave the military pause about the feasibility of launching a full-scale invasion of the territory.[22]

25. In addition to their formal role in the bureaucracy and state enterprises, ABRI officers also operated in a variety of extra-legal capacities. They were able to use their position to operate as middlemen for entrepreneurs willing to pay for privileged access. Many entrepreneurs were Indonesian-Chinese investors who provided the capital and financial management skills while the ABRI officers provided the political influence and, if required, military force.[23] A prominent member of this group was Liem Sioe Liong, a close partner of Soeharto's since before the New Order. Foreign investors entered into similar relationships.[24] For example, the Indonesian military was contracted by PT Freeport McMoran, a gold and copper mine in West-Papua, to provide security as part of their transaction with the mining company.[*]

New Order reorganisation of the armed forces

26. During the Sukarno era the four military services (Army, Navy, Air Force and the Police) had been rivals, and the joint chiefs of staff were not effective in coordinating them.[25] Greater unity and centralisation were achieved in the late 1950s and 1960s, and in 1967 President Soeharto, using the New Order, placed the military services under the command of a single ministry, the Department of Defence and Security (Departemen Pertahanan dan Keamanan, Dephankam).[26] From 1967 until the end of the New Order, army generals held the position of ABRI commander-in-chief. Operational authority was taken from the service chiefs and given to the Minister of Defence and Security who tended to be the ABRI commander-in-chief. These changes confirmed the army's de facto dominance over ABRI.

* According to The Jakarta Post, 13 March 2003, Freeport-McMoran Copper and Gold Inc. sent "a confidential document to the New York City controller's office and the US Security and Exchange Commission, disclosing that in 2001 it paid US $4.7 million for the employment of about 2,300 'Indonesian government security personnel'".

Sian Powell, The Australian, 15 March 2003, reported that Freeport disclosed that it had made payments of US $11 million to the TNI over the preceding two years. According to Powell, Freeport stated that "The Grasberg mine has been designated by the Government of Indonesia as one of the Indonesia's vital national interests. This designation results in the military's playing a significant role in protecting the area of company operations." The Freeport statement said that it paid expenses for "government-related security" for the mine operations of US $5.8 million in 2001 and US $5.6 million in 2002. [see http://www.minesandcommunities.org/Action/press127.htm].

27. Under Soeharto, the intelligence sector grew to a position of great power within the military. Intelligence became one of the core aspects of internal security operations which also included territorial, combat and law and order operations.[27] Repression of internal dissent was a major function of the armed forces. Combined with the new centralised command structure, this growing intelligence sector had a major impact on the military's policy and behaviour.

28. President Soeharto came to power in turbulent times and one of the first structures he established to secure his position was the Operational Command for the Restoration of Security and Order (Komando Operasi Pemulihan Keamanan dan Ketertiban, Kopkamtib). He had direct control of this extra-constitutional and very powerful institution.[28] It was overwhelmingly anti-communist in intent and its mission was to:

> Restore security and order from the consequences of the G30S/PKI revolt (the 1965 alleged coup) as well as other extremist or subversive activities.[29]

29. In 1966 the Central Intelligence Body (Badan Pusat Intelijen, BPI) was renamed Coordination of National Intelligence (Koordinasi Intelijen Nasional, KIN) and was subordinated to President Soeharto through Kopkamtib. A more informal body that played a prominent role in early New Order Indonesia was General Ali Moertopo's Special Operations unit, which helped to manage the 1971 elections and responded covertly to a variety of challenges such as ending the "confrontation" with Malaysia and orchestrating the "Act of Free Choice" (Penentuan Pendapat Rakyat, Pepera) in West Papua in 1969.[30] In 1974 the Special Operations unit worked closely with the civilian think tank, the Centre for International Strategic Studies (CSIS), in developing the strategy that led to the takeover of Timor-Leste (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict).

30. In 1974, after a major riot known as the Malari affair exposed both widespread dissatisfaction with the New Order and serious divisions in the military itself, Soeharto consolidated and centralised intelligence and the internal security apparatus. Extensive powers were concentrated in the hands of Major General Benny Moerdani who headed the intelligence section at the Department of Defence and Security, was deputy chief of Bakin (Badan Koordinasi Intelijen, Intelligence Co-ordinating Agency) and also head of the Ministry of Defence and Security's Strategic Intelligence Centre. The system of military and political checks and balances that might normally restrain intelligence bodies was removed, and intelligence services attained an unprecedented level of power and influence. Generals Moertopo and Moerdani, and their intelligence networks, played a key role in the development and implementation of policy for Timor-Leste in 1974-75.

Organisational structures of the Indonesian armed forces in Timor-Leste

31. How the military command structures of the Indonesian armed forces over the 25 years of Indonesia's intervention, invasion and occupation of Timor-Leste were made to conform with those in Indonesia will be examined below. However, the nature of the conflict forced ABRI to treat Timor-Leste as a special and extreme case throughout the period of occupation.

32. Throughout the 24-year period there were a number of structural and policy shifts in the way the Indonesian military was organised in Timor-Leste. These modifications were influenced by the nature of the conflict in Timor-Leste, by levels of international assistance, and at times by the level of international scrutiny and ultimately by international pressure on Indonesia to withdraw from the territory. The phases of Indonesian military involvement in Timor-Leste were:

- Covert intelligence operations in 1974 in preparation for full-scale military takeover and occupation;
- The establishment of a Timor-Leste regional command structure for a 'transitional period' which lasted until the end of the 1970s as ABRI sought to consolidate its position and crush the armed resistance;
- The transfer of command into the conventional regional command structure as ABRI declared Timor-Leste 'pacified';
- The expansion of the territorial structure of ABRI after 1979 to control the civilian population as people came down from the mountains and were resettled in camps and villages;
- The establishment of parallel combat and territorial command structures in the 1980s;
- The decision to treat Timor-Leste as a "normal" province as Indonesia partially opened Timor-Leste at the end of 1988;
- The shift of focus to intelligence operations and the use of riot police, Brimob, to counter the spread of clandestine activities and public demonstrations in the 1990s;
- The deployment of Army Strategic Reserve Command troops (Komando Strategis Angkatan Darat, Kostrad) in late 1998 as the militias were formed;
- The creation of a special command structure after the Popular Consultation (30 August 1999) when President Habibie declared martial law in Timor-Leste;
- Liquidation of the special command structure in late September 1999 and replacement by a Task Force for East Timor to coordinate the Indonesian withdrawal with the incoming International Force for East Timor (Interfet).

33. This outline provides background to the sections on human rights violations in Vols. II-III, Part 7 of this report and to Vol. IV, Part 8: Accountability and Responsibility.

It does not aim to give a comprehensive analysis of all the factors that contributed to structural or policy shifts in the Indonesian armed forces or to their consequences. Instead it highlights key developments relevant to the Commission's core concerns.

Table 1 - Structure of military commands in Timor-Leste

Dates	Command	Major known operations
Late 1974	Operasi Khusus (Opsus)[31]	Operasi Komodo
Early 1975	Assistant I/Intelligence of Defence and Security Department with support from Special Warfare Command (Kopassandha)[32]	Operasi Flamboyan
31 August 1975	Operasi Seroja Joint Task Force Command (Komando Tugas Gabungan Operasi Seroja, Kogasgab Seroja).[33]	Operasi Flamboyan Operasi Seroja (invasion)
August 1976	East Timor Regional Defence and Security Command (Komando Daerah Pertahanan dan Keamanan Timor Timur, Kodahankam)	Operasi Seroja
October 1978	Operasi Seroja Joint Task Force Command (Kogasgab Seroja)	Operasi Seroja Operasi Skylight
26 March 1979	Sub-Regional Command 164/Wira Dharma (Korem 164)	Operasi Security Operasi Kikis Operasi Persatuan
1984	Security Operations Command for East Timor (Komando Operasi Keamanan Timor, Koopskam Timor Timur) (Combat and Intelligence Command)	Operasi Watumisa 1 Operasi Watumisa 2

May 1990	Operations Implementation Command in East Timor (Komando Pelaksanaan Operasi Timor Timur, Kolakops Timor Timur)
March 1993	Sub-regional Command 164 (Korem 164)	No formal operations conducted, although combat troops permanently in Timor-Leste.
7 September 1999	Martial Law Authority Command in East Timor (Komando Penguasa Darurat Militer Timor Timur)
23 September 1999	Indonesian Task Force for East Timor (Satuan Tugas Indonesia di Timor Timur)

Source: CAVR research and compilation

Operasi Seroja Joint Task Force Command,[34] August 1975 to August 1976

34. Indonesian military involvement in Timor-Leste began in mid-1974 when Major General Ali Moertopo's Special Operations (Opsus) unit began to work covertly in Operasi Komodo. In early 1975, Operasi Komodo ended and was replaced by Operasi Flamboyan under the control of Major General Benny Moerdani, the chief of intelligence at the Department of Defence and Security. The new operation received more resources and involved Special Forces (Kopassandha) units. It undertook a wider range of activities than had Komodo, including destabilisation, intelligence gathering, and the paramilitary training of East Timorese recruits. On 31 August 1975, the commander-in-chief of the armed forces and minister of defence and security, General Panggabean, established the Operasi Seroja Joint Task Force Command (Kogasgab Seroja).[35] This brought Indonesian military involvement in Timor-Leste under the direct control and central command of ABRI.

35. The Seroja Joint Task Force Command was led by Brigadier-General Soeweno, who directed the full-scale invasion in December 1975 known as Operasi Seroja. This was a combined military operation involving troops from all service branches, including:

- The Army Strategic Reserve Command (Komando Strategis Angkatan Darat, Kostrad);
- The Special Warfare Command (Komando Pasukan Sandhi Yudha, Kopassandha);

- The Air Force Rapid Response Troop Command (Komando Pasukan Gerak Cepat, Kopasgat), of the air force;
- Marine and infantry battalions from several regional commands.

36. Although the Operasi Seroja Joint Task Force Command had direct command over all troops, operations were conducted under the strategic reserve command (Kostrad), initially under its Second Combat Command (Komandan Tempur, Kopur II), and after March 1976 under the Airborne Combat Command (Komando Tempur Lintas Udara, Kopur Linud).

37. In early 1976, Seroja Command divided Timor-Leste into four operational sectors. Sector A covered Dili and the enclave of Oecussi; Sector B covered the districts of Bobonaro, Covalima, Ermera and Liquiçá, Sector C covered Aileu, Ainaro, Manufahi and Manatuto; and Sector D covered Baucau, Viqueque and Lautém.* With the exception of sector A (Dili), a composite Combat Team Regiment (Resimen Tim Pertempuran, RTP) was assigned to oversee operations in each sector. Each Combat Team Regiment comprised six to eight territorial battalions supporting artillery, cavalry and engineering units that were designated "combat support units" (Bantuan Tempur, Banpur).

East Timor Regional Military Command, August 1976–October 1978

38. Soon after the Indonesian parliament passed the law integrating Timor-Leste into the Republic of Indonesia in July 1976, ABRI reorganised the military structure in Timor-Leste to incorporate what had been external operations into the conventional military structure. On 4 August 1976, the Ministry of Defence and Security in effect made its operation in Timor-Leste into a domestic operation by establishing the East Timor Regional Defence and Security Command (Komando Daerah Pertahanan dan Keamanan Timor Timur, Kodahankam Timor Timur). Ministry documents defined its role as consolidating the military position during what was called a transitional period:

> The East Timor Regional Defence Command was established with the aim of laying the foundation for the Guidance and Development of Defence and Security in East Timor during the "transitional period", which lasts until the end of the Second Development Plan (in 1979), along with implementing the Guidance and Development of National Defence and Security Policy.[36]

39. The changes were far-reaching:

* Indonesia adjusted some district boundaries (Zumalai was originally part of Bobonaro/Ainaro, not Covalima), and also changed some names in the late 1970s (Same became Manufahi, Lospalos became Lautém).

- The military began to establish a territorial system of District Military Commands (Komando Distrik Militer, Kodim) and Sub-district Military Commands (Koramil). The Kodim were initially numbered from 01 (Dili) to 13 (Oecussi). The February 1977 instruction regarding the organisation of the Regional Defence Command envisaged that eight of the Kodim would operate under a Sub-regional Military Command (Korem), while the other five were to operate independently and report directly to the Regional Defence Command (Kodahankam). However, given that Sub-regional Military Command 164 was not established until March 1979, all of the Kodim were in effect under the direct command and control of Regional Defence Command and, from October 1978 until March 1979, its successor, Seroja Joint Task Command (Kogasgab).
- Under the Regional Defence Command were several kinds of combat units. Continuing the practice of its predecessor, the Regional Defence Command deployed Combat Team Regiments (RTP) in the operations sectors. In late 1976 - early 1977 these included RTP 16 in sector B, RTP 13 in sector C, and RTP 15 in sector D. In addition Independent Combat Battalions (Batalion Tempur Berdiri Sendiri) and Independent/non-RTP Combat Support Battalions (Batalion Bantuan Tempur Berdiri Sendiri), comprising artillery, cavalry, engineering and other specialist troops, were also deployed.
- The Regional Defence Command included a unit called the Intelligence Task Force/Implementing Body (Satuan Tugas/Badan Pelaksanaan Intelijen, abbreviated Satgas/Balak Intel, or simply Satgas Intel). This unit played a prominent role in internal repression, which it would continue to play throughout the next two decades.
- Military Police were deployed in Dili and other major towns. Available evidence suggests that Military Police played an active role in the growing system of detention centres and the establishment of prison facilities. CAVR does not have any evidence to suggest that Military Police took disciplinary measures against military personnel during this period.
- Provincial, district and sub-district police units were established at this time, although they operated directly under the command of the Regional Defence Command for several years.
- The military bureaucracy also expanded greatly.* [37]

40. [40.] During this period, ABRI was engaged in full-scale military operations against Fretilin/Falintil, which controlled significant areas of the interior and a large proportion of the civilian population. International military hardware, especially from the US, played a critical role in giving ABRI the capacity to destroy Fretilin's mountain and jungle bases and to end this phase of the resistance.

* In addition to the general staff already present, the East Timor Regional Defence Command commander was also served by a number of service specialties (information, finance, mental development, history, law, and psychology), implementation bodies (communications and electronics, Military Police, health, personnel administration, Command Logistics, a naval station and air force base), and operational units (Brigif/RTP, an intelligence task force, independent battalions, territorial units, navy and air force task forces, etc.).

Operasi Seroja Joint Task Force Command (Kogasgab), October 1978–March 1979

41. On 12 October 1978, a new Operasi Seroja Joint Task Force Command (Kogasgab Seroja) was established.[38] The Seroja Joint Task Force was placed under the control of Regional Military Command XVI/Udayana (Kodam XVI/Udayana), which included the Indonesian provinces of Bali, and West and East Nusa Tenggara.[39] A month later operational control over Timor-Leste was transferred from the Ministry of Defence and Security, which had administered the territory directly until then, to the Regional Defence Command II (Komando Wilayah Pertahanan, Kowilhan II), which covered Java, Bali and all of Nusa Tenggara. These changes signalled a judgment by ABRI that it had substantially achieved military victory over Fretilin/Falintil, and that "normalisation" would soon be in order. The ministerial decree establishing the new command stated:

> From the time of its founding and in the shortest possible time Operasi Seroja Joint Task Force Command (is to) destroy the remnants of the armed Gang of Security Disturbers (Gerombolan Pengacau Keamanan) to maintain and increase the security of the region, and to assist in preparing to normalise the functioning of the civil administration by carrying out Domestic Security Operations in the province of East Timor.[40]

42. Brigadier-General Dading Kalbuadi, who had run the Regional Defence Command since 1976, was appointed Commander of Regional Command XVI/Udayana and hence retained direct command over military operations in Timor-Leste.

43. Under the command of Colonel Sutarto, the Seroja Joint Task Force Command oversaw the final stages of Operasi Seroja in Timor-Leste in late 1978 and early 1979 (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). With the fall of the last Fretilin base areas on Mount Matebian (November 1978), Mount Kablaki (about January 1979), Fatubessi, Ermera (February 1979) and Alas, Manufahi (March 1979), ABRI had achieved formal control over all territory in Timor-Leste. The death of Fretilin President Nicolau Lobato on 31 December 1978 provided further reason for the Indonesian military to think that the war was over. These developments set the stage for a further reorganisation of military structures in Timor-Leste.

Sub-regional Military Command 164/Wira Dharma, 1979–1999

44. Declaring Timor-Leste pacified, ABRI brought Operasi Seroja to an end, and on 26 March 1979 established the territorial Sub-regional Command 164/Wira Dharma (Korem 164).[41] This was one of four sub-regional commands under Regional Military Command XVI/Udayana headquartered in Denpasar, Bali. As the civilian population surrendered and was resettled in detention camps and later villages, the territorial structure was expanded. Non-commissioned village guidance officers (Babinsa) extended the reach of the military into the villages. By the 1990s the number of village guidance officers exceeded the total number of villages in Timor-Leste.[42]

45. When carrying out operations, the sub-regional commander was also the commander of the Operation Implementations Command (Komando Pelaksana Operasi, Kolakops). This was really just another name for the sub-regional command, though with the addition of non-organic troops.[43]

46. In 1979, the Ministry of Defence and Security issued an instruction on combat operations in Indonesia for 1979-80. The aim of operations in Timor-Leste was explained as:

> a) Destruction of the remaining activities and ability of the armed resistance of the Gang of Security Disturbers so they no longer have strategic significance, particularly with regards to political resistance by elements of the Gang of Security Disturbers overseas.
>
> b) Partition off Timor-Leste so it is not possible for the Gang of Security Disturbers to escape from the territory or for the smuggling of physical assistance from abroad into the territory of Timor-Leste.
>
> c) Assist in the infrastructure rehabilitation programme and normalise the activities of the populace.[44]

Security Operations Command for Timor-Leste, 1984–1990

47. In 1984 ABRI established a new combat command structure called the Security Operations Command for East Timor (Koopskam Timor Timur).[45] The commander of the Army Strategic Reserve Command's First Infantry Division (Divif I/Kostrad) headed it, and his staff filled the new combat command structure.

48. Throughout this period there was a hierarchical relationship between the Sub-regional Command (Korem) and the Security Operations Command (Koopskam). The Security Operations Command was the superior command with responsibility for combat and intelligence operations, while Sub-regional Command 164 was responsible for territorial affairs. The head of the Security Operations Command was a brigadier-general and thus outranked the commander of Sub-regional Command 164, who was a colonel.

49. Both the Special Warfare Command (Kopassandha) and the Army Strategic Reserve Command (Kostrad) played major combat roles in Timor-Leste during this period. The officers appointed to command the Security Operations Command (Koopskam) during the mid-1980s served simultaneously as commanders of the West Java-based Strategic Reserve (Kostrad) First Infantry Division.* This dual appointment facilitated coordination between the Special Warfare Command (Kopassandha) and troops from the Army Strategic Reserve Command's First Infantry Division (Divif I/Kostrad) based in West Java.

* This can be confirmed for Brigadier-General Sugito (c. 1983-85), Brigadier-General Warsito (1985-87) and Brigadier-General Mantiri (1987-88), and is likely also the case for Brigadier-General Sutarto (?–83).

50. In July 1988 the Army Strategic Reserve Command Second Infantry Division was appointed to replace the First Infantry Division within the structure of the Security Operations Command for East Timor. A military history book indicates that at the time of the handover, ABRI considered Falintil to be weak, but acknowledged its capacity to both mount operations and influence the population.

> The remnants of the GPK (Gerombolan Pengacau Keamanan, Gangs of Security Disturbers) running wild in the forests of East Timor, particularly in the central and eastern sectors, physically total less than 244 people. They possess around 217 weapons composed of various light, long and short types.
>
> They are former leaders and members of Fretilin and they have communist, Marxist and Leninist ideological sympathies. They are still capable of indicating their existence. Through various means they influence a minority of the people to support an independent nation separate from the Republic of Indonesia.[46]

Operations implementation command (Kolakops) in Timor-Leste, 1990–1993

51. In December 1988, in response to a request by Governor Mario Viegas Carrascalão earlier in the year, President Soeharto signed Presidential Decree No. 62/1988 granting the province of East Timor an "equal status" with the other 26 provinces of Indonesia. Decree No. 62 permitted freer travel within the province, allowed Indonesian citizens from elsewhere in Indonesia to enter Timor-Leste, granted foreign tourists entry into Timor-Leste and allowed foreign journalists to visit Timor-Leste (subject to official approval). This was an attempt to put a kinder face on the Indonesian military occupation of the territory. In 1989 the sub-regional (Korem) commander, Colonel Rudolf Samuel Warouw, announced a new operation called Operasi Senyum (Smile) that aimed to reduce travel restrictions, release a number of political prisoners and curtail the use of torture during interrogations.

52. The decision to treat Timor-Leste like a "normal" province also entailed a further transformation of the military structure. In May 1990 the Security Operations Command for East Timor was turned back into the Operations Implementation Command in East Timor (Kolakops Timor Timur).[47] The Korem commander, Colonel Rudolf Samuel Warouw, was appointed to command Kolakops and promoted to brigadier-general, replacing the hard-line Brigadier-General Mulyadi.

53. However, this period coincided with the rise of the urban youth and clandestine movement of the Resistance, and the use of public demonstrations against the Indonesian regime (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). On 12 November 1991, Indonesian military troops were filmed as they massacred peaceful demonstrators at the Santa Cruz cemetery in Dili (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict and Vol.

II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Although a Military Honour Board was convened and a number of officers were dismissed from active service and some non-commissioned officers and privates court-martialled, there was no immediate move to alter the military structures in Timor-Leste.

Sub-regional Command 164/Wira Dharma (Korem 164), 1993–1999

54. Despite international condemnation of the Indonesian military after the Santa Cruz massacre, ABRI was confident that it had brought the Resistance under control. An August 1992 military document stated:

> The repressive actions of the Government of the Republic of Indonesia have broken up a large part of the clandestine network, both inside and outside East Timor.[48]

55. Military confidence increased further with the capture of Xanana Gusmão on 20 November 1992 and of Mau Hunu (Antonio Gomes da Costa) on 3 April 1993.

56. Military efforts shifted increasingly to the control and repression of youth resistance, with Special Forces Command (Komando Pasukan Khusus, Kopassus) taking the lead.[49] When Operations Implementation Command in East Timor (Kolakops) was abolished, the Joint Intelligence Unit (Satuan Gabungan Intelijen, SGI) was transferred to Sub-regional Command 164 and renamed the Intelligence Task Force (Satgas Intel). In contrast to the official policy of normalising the status of Timor-Leste and reducing the military presence, in late 1994 Colonel Prabowo Subianto and the Special Forces Command (Kopassus) initiated psychological operations to intimidate and terrorise the Timor-Leste population, increased military training of civil servants and university students, expanded the paramilitary teams, and established new militia organisations.[50]

57. The focus on repression of the urban resistance during the 1990s was also signalled by the large presence and extensive use of the anti-riot police, Brimob.[51] Anti-riot police units were present in far larger numbers in relation to the size of the population than was normal in Indonesia during this period. By August 1998 nearly 7,400 anti-riot police, renowned for their violence, were deployed in Timor-Leste, divided between territorial units (with 214 personnel) and units brought from outside the territory (7,156) (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detentions, torture and ill-treatment.)

Continued combat troop presence

58. In March 1993, the Operations Implementation Command (Kolakops) was abolished and its functions were handed over to the sub-regional command (Korem). Combat operations are not the standard responsibility of territorial commands.[52] The Combat Sectors A and B in Timor-Leste were transferred to the Sub-regional Command 164 and ABRI continued to deploy large numbers of combat troops. Precise information on troop deployments is available from 1998, due to the availability of secret military documents that were passed out of Timor-Leste.[53] It is clear from these documents that combat troops were extensively deployed; five infantry combat battalions, as well as several special duty contingents, were in Timor-Leste since August 1998. In addition, Special Forces Command (Kopassus) training units were present, evidence that Timor-Leste was used as a training ground for ABRI's elite troops.[54]

59. Between the time Operations Implementation Command in East Timor was abolished (in 1993) and 1999, the Indonesian Armed Forces continued to deploy the Army Strategic Reserve Command (Kostrad) and the Special Forces Command (Kopassus) as well as infantry and other units from outside Timor-Leste. From 1993 until 1997, on average there were six external battalions posted in Timor-Leste at any one time. The Commission's data show that only one Army Strategic Reserve Command battalion was deployed in Timor-Leste at any given time. In 1995 ABRI began special deployments of strategic troops to Timor-Leste. The first contingent of these troops, code-named Rajawali (Hawk),* was deployed to the combat sectors under Sub-regional Command 164 in October 1995.[55] They were primarily drawn from the Strategic Reserve Command, and troops apparently served 12-month tours of duty. In late 1998 troops from the intelligence and counter-terrorism units of the Special Forces Command were deployed. These troops were attached to the Intelligence Task Force (popularly referred to by its previous title SGI). In 1998 the total number of external battalions present in Timor-Leste increased to at least 12.[56]

Martial Law Military Command in Timor-Leste, September 1999

60. In the violent aftermath of the Popular Consultation, and under intense international pressure to allow an external peacekeeping force into Timor-Leste, General Wiranto sent a letter to President B.J. Habibie on 6 September 1999 about the "continual development of the situation in East Timor and policy recommendations to handle it".[57] Wiranto explained that security had deteriorated, becoming "brutal and anarchistic and had led to the loss of lives and property." Among the reasons he cites are the "disappointment of the pro-integration groups caused by the impartiality of UNAMET" as well as the "misconception on the part of pro-integration groups who believe they can change the result of the referendum by force". International pressure prompted President B.J. Habibie to act on this letter, signing Presidential Decree Number 107 1999 that declared martial law in Timor-Leste beginning at midnight on 7 September 1999.

61. Following the declaration of martial law, General Wiranto issued a Commander's Directive outlining the establishment of a Martial Law Authority Command in East Timor (Komando Penguasa Darurat Militer Timor Timur) as of midnight on 7 September 1999.[58] The stated objectives of this command were to return security in Timor-Leste in the fastest possible time, to give security assurances so that the results of the Popular Consultation could be acted on and to maintain the credibility of the Government of the Republic of Indonesia, including that of the Armed Forces of Indonesia and the National Police.

* Distinct from Kopassus Rajawali.

62. Major-General Kiki Syahnakri was appointed martial law commander. He and other newly-appointed senior officers, several of whom were Special Forces Command officers,* had served in Timor-Leste during the 1990s and some had held command positions in the lead-up to the Popular Consultation. Thus a predominately Special Forces Command (Kopassus) leadership commanded Strategic Reserve Command troops during the martial law period. Wiranto may have wanted Special Forces Command officers in command positions to lessen the blow to Special Forces personnel who had played a primary role in organising the militia and to prevent inter-corps tensions from developing. The most egregious human rights violations of 1999 occurred during this period of martial law.

Martial law command liquidated: Indonesian Task Force for Timor-Leste

63. The UN and key member states put Indonesia on notice that it had limited time to prove that martial law was effectively restoring law and order (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). When it became obvious that this was not the case, President Habibie succumbed to this pressure and requested UN assistance. The Security Council passed Resolution 1264 on 15 September 1999, and Interfet, with full Chapter VII powers, was deployed on 20 September to restore peace. On or soon after 23 September 1999, President B.J. Habibie ended martial law in Timor-Leste.[59] The Martial Law Operations Command in East Timor was liquidated and a new security command named the Indonesian Task Force for East Timor (Satuan Tugas Indonesia di Timor Timur) was established. The head of this task force was Police Brigadier-General J.D. Sitorus, the commander was Colonel Sahala Silalahi and the deputy commander was Colonel Suryo Prabowo. The Indonesian Task Force for East Timor was intended to coordinate with the incoming Interfet.

* Those who had served in Timor Leste were Kiki Syahnakri, Amirul Isnaeni, Andi Gerhan Lentara, and those from Special Forces Command were Amirul Isnaeni, probably Lilik Koeshardianto and Irwan Kusnadi.

Militarisation of East Timorese society*

Introduction

64. Over the course of the Indonesian occupation, East Timorese society underwent extensive militarisation. Although the extent and intensity of militarisation varied over the 24-year occupation, overall it was pervasive and had a profound impact on the lives of all East Timorese people.

65. Soon after the Carnation Revolution of 25 April 1974, the Indonesian military increased its intelligence focus on Timor-Leste with the aim of supporting the pro-integration Apodeti party. By the end of 1974, it was running covert operations in the territory (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict), and was arming and providing military training to Apodeti members in West Timor.[60] Indonesian military intelligence was the chief architect of the takeover of Timor-Leste. It conducted a diplomatic campaign to assert Indonesia's status as a concerned party that ultimately led Indonesia to the decision to invade Timor-Leste in October 1975.

66. Intelligence operations were a major part of Indonesian military operations throughout different periods of the conflict. Beginning with the covert operations of 1974-75, through the early years of the occupation of the main towns, and subsequently during the mass surrenders and resettlement of civilians in 1977-78, intelligence figured prominently (see paragraph 4-63 above; also Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). After the mass surrenders, the Resistance changed its strategy and began to develop clandestine networks where the civilian population had settled. Indonesian intelligence used East Timorese spies to try to break these networks, destroying the sense of trust and social cohesion in East Timorese communities.

67. Indonesia invaded Timor-Leste with the assistance of what it termed Partisans, members of Apodeti, UDT and other parties who had fled to West Timor from mid-1974. The Partisans established a precedent for the Indonesian military's use of East Timorese proxies. During the full-scale war that ensued in the late 1970s, Indonesia developed East Timorese battalions and paramilitary groups. It also mobilised civil defence forces and pressed men and boys into providing logistics support for combat troops. In the early 1980s, the Indonesian military forced massive numbers of civilians to march across the island to flush out the remaining resistance forces (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict).

68. The state structure that Indonesia imposed on Timor-Leste was itself heavily militarised. This derived from the extensive involvement of the armed forces in

* This section discusses the various types of paramilitary forces deployed in Timor-Leste by the Indonesian military. In this section the term 'civil defence force' is used to describe Hansip, Ratih, Wanra, etc. – groups comprising East Timorese recruited by the Indonesian armed forces. The term 'paramilitary' is used to refer to the East Timorese auxiliary units established by ABRI throughout the occupation and the term 'militia' is used to refer to the groups that were established in the period leading up to the Popular Consultation in 1999. 'Auxiliary forces' is an umbrella term used to describe these various groupings collectively.

Indonesian politics and the economy during President Soeharto's New Order regime (see pars 4-63 above). In Timor-Leste, the Indonesian military had an even more pervasive role than in New Order Indonesia. ABRI was directly involved in establishing the province of Timor-Leste and thereafter dominated its administration (see this chapter on civil administration, below). Throughout Indonesia's occupation of Timor-Leste, the province was a conflict zone, varying from full-scale war in the early years to a low-level conflict during much of the 1980s and 1990s. Timor-Leste represented the extreme compared to other provinces of Indonesia where the armed forces were engaged in conflicts. Unlike those provinces, Timor-Leste became part of Indonesia only through invasion, annexation and occupation. It was therefore distinct from Indonesia, and the armed forces had to adopt different methods to subjugate it.* In addition, Timor-Leste was an external acquisition. For these reasons Timor-Leste was categorically distinct from Indonesia, and the behaviour of the armed forces in Timor-Leste was similarly atypical. This explains the thorough militarisation in Timor-Leste by the Indonesian government.

69. In the 1990s East Timorese youth became more open in their willingness to protest the Indonesian occupation. The primary response to this was a shift in military strategy from waging war against Falintil to an intelligence war against the growing clandestine resistance.

70. The scout movement, martial arts groups and student bodies in schools and at universities aimed to instil discipline and loyalty to Indonesia into East Timorese youth. Indonesia placed great emphasis on its national ideology (Pancasila) and the performance of nationalist rituals through military-style ceremonies and events to celebrate national days.

71. While these activities may have had an insidious militaristic quality, the recruitment of East Timorese youth in the mid-1990s to form paramilitary groups was brutal. These groups, under the protection of the Special Forces Command (Kopassus) conducted organised crime activities by day and disappearances of independence supporters by night. These youth groups were forerunners to the militias that were rapidly developed by ABRI/TNI in 1998-99. As in 1974-75, the Indonesian military again used East Timorese to give non-Timorese troops "plausible deniability" for their role in the violence. Nevertheless, in 1999 it was clear that the militias were an extension of the TNI.

Pre-Indonesian militarisation of Timor-Leste

72. Timor-Leste is a mountainous country that was historically divided into regional kingdoms. Most traditional regional kings (liurai) maintained armies of local men, who, from time to time, would fight armies in neighbouring kingdoms.[61] In its dealings with Timorese liurai, Portugal used a strategy of divide-and-rule, often using the armed forces of "friendly" liurai to crush the dissent of others (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). This pattern where an outside power used the liurai as intermediaries to raise forces in defence of foreign interests was replicated by Indonesia in its covert activity in 1974-75 and in the subsequent years of occupation.

* The Commission notes that parallels exist with other conflict zones within Indonesia, such as West Papua and Aceh.

73. The Second World War first brought Australian and British troops to neutral Portuguese Timor and then Japanese occupation forces. Many East Timorese took great risks to assist the small numbers of Australian troops in their guerrilla activities, while others sided with the Japanese or were caught between the warring international forces. Over 40,000 East Timorese civilians are reported to have died during the Japanese occupation, and the war left deep divisions.[62]

74. When Portugal returned after the Second World War, it maintained a professional armed force, comprising Portuguese soldiers and recruits from Portugal's African colonies. The police were technically part of these armed forces. East Timorese were also recruited to the armed forces, though few held positions above the lower ranks. There was not much resistance to the Portuguese colonial authority during these years that were dominated by Salazar's authoritarian regime. The Portuguese secret police, PIDE, monitored all signs of opposition among the East Timorese and had a fearful reputation.[63] This suppressed freedom of expression and the ability to form political associations or to have political debate. Compared to the subsequent experience under Indonesia, the impact of the armed forces on society was minimal.

75. When the Armed Forces Movement (MFA) took power in Lisbon on 25 April 1974, East Timorese quickly formed political parties (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). The Commission heard testimonies from leaders of the two major parties, Fretilin and UDT, who said they used force and violence in their campaigning and efforts to gain influence in the community.[64] When UDT took power on 11 August 1975, it did so with guns from the police force. When Fretilin responded the decisive factor in its victory was the support from East Timorese members of the Portuguese armed forces and their weapons. Both UDT and Fretilin indiscriminately distributed guns to their civilian members, greatly increasing the scale of violence during the internal conflict.[65] Although the internal armed conflict was relatively brief, it intensified existing divisions and created new ones that scarred East Timorese society throughout the years of the Indonesian occupation. These divisions were manipulated by the Indonesian military in its efforts to crush the Resistance, that included strategies of militarising East Timorese society.

Indonesian militarisation of Timorese political parties before the occupation

76. The Commission heard testimony from Tomas Gonçalves, the son of Apodeti leader Guilherme Gonçalves, the king of Atsabe (Ermera), about how the Indonesian military employed a strategy of arming and training young men associated with the party from late 1974.[66] ABRI named this group the Partisans. In October 1974, Tomas Gonçalves travelled to Jakarta and met with senior Indonesian military figures. This was not long after Indonesian Foreign Minister Adam Malik had met with Fretilin Foreign Affairs Minister José Ramos-Horta and assured him that Indonesia respected Timor-Leste's right to self-determination and independence. ABRI began to build its strategy of preparing East Timorese armed auxiliaries at a time when Portugal was attempting to conduct an orderly decolonisation process.

77. When Tomas Gonçalves returned in November 1974, 216 young men from the Atsabe area were mobilised and sent to West Timor where they received basic military training and weapons from ABRI operatives, including members of the Special Forces Command (Kopassus).[67] At least some of these men were forced to participate by Apodeti leaders.[68] Tomas Gonçalves told the UN-supported Serious Crimes Unit in Timor-Leste how these youths were mobilised:

> I was appointed supreme commander of the Partisans on 2 December 1974. There was a supreme commander, myself, then there were two company commanders, eight platoon commanders, and 16 team commanders. There were 216 combatants in all. I was under the command of Yunus [Yosfiah of the Susi Team, a Special Forces command that was part of Indonesia's Operasi Flamboyan].[69]

78. Around 50 Partisans were attached to each of the three Special Forces teams - Susi, Umi and Tuti - and deployed in home areas.[70] After the 11 August 1975 attempted coup by UDT, ABRI, with members of these Partisan forces, began cross-border raids from West Timor. The three teams conducted further cross-border raids in mid-September, again with limited success.[71] These raids included the forced recruitment of East Timorese men to serve with the Partisans[72] and a number of killings.[73]

79. Following defeat in the civil war, UDT's armed forces and supporters retreated to the border and by the end of September to West Timor. According to UDT military leader, João Carrascalão, more than 500 of the 3,000 UDT troops who crossed the border were armed.[74] They were absorbed into the Partisan force. Further ABRI cross-border raids in mid-October involved larger numbers of Partisans and were better supported by naval artillery, enabling the capture of Batugade, Balibó (Bobonaro) and other border towns.[75] According to Tomas Gonçalves, the attack included 216 Apodeti Partisans, 450 Indonesian troops and 350 men under the control of João Tavares.[76] This last group was known as Halilintar. The Halilintar re-emerged in 1994 with the mission of suppressing the growing clandestine movement in Bobonaro District and went on to become one of the leading militia groups in 1998-99. In addition to providing valuable local knowledge of Portuguese Timor to Indonesian commando units, the Partisans were a vital part of Operasi Flamboyan's continuing strategy of "plausible deniability". ABRI developed the myth that Indonesian soldiers involved in these operations were merely volunteers helping East Timorese return to take control of their homeland.[77] However, Tomas Gonçalves told the Commission that the planning and implementation of operations were led by members of the Indonesian military, with East Timorese Partisans used as support troops, guides and sources of intelligence.[78]

80. It seems that selected Partisans took part in the invasion of Dili,[79] and others were involved in the landing at Baucau three days later. After the invasion, Partisans participated in attacks further inland. While generally ABRI reorganised its use of East Timorese auxiliaries, some Partisan units were maintained throughout the duration of the occupation, such as a group in Ermera that in 1999 numbered around 130.[80]

Establishment of East Timorese combat battalions

81. In 1976, ABRI began providing formal military training to East Timorese when it sent 60 Partisans to Java. In June 1977, 400 more East Timorese, some of whom had previously served as Partisans, followed. On 1 October 1977, these men graduated with the rank of private, and on 24 January 1978, the East Timor military commander, Colonel Dading Kalbuadi, formally established Infantry Battalion 744/Satya Yudha Bhakti. The new battalion of 460 troops was divided into four companies under the overall command of Major Yunus Yosfiah.[81] In early 1977 these troops were given "raiders" training in Tacitolu, west of the Dili airport, and then declared ready for combat. A second group of more than 500 East Timorese recruits was trained in 1978. They formed Battalion 745/Sampada Yudha Bhakti which was inaugurated in September 1978 under Major Theo Syafei. Plans for a third battalion, 746, were dropped after the new recruits were deemed physically and mentally unacceptable.[82]

82. The battalions were intended to be entirely manned by East Timorese. However, this goal was never realised. Among the East Timorese soldiers were Indonesian infantry and Special Forces troops, and the officers down to platoon level were Indonesian.[83] The two battalions were part of the permanent territorial Regional Military Command (Korem) structure in Timor-Leste during the occupation, and were used extensively in combat operations as well as for internal security duties. They developed a reputation for brutality. The former Partisan, Tomas Gonçalves, described Battalion 744 in its early days:

> The Partisans only became evil after [Battalion] 744 was formed by Yunus [Yosfiah], and they became 744 members. 744 was comprising Javanese, commandos, and all sorts. The whole time Yunus was the commander of 744 there were extrajudicial killings going on constantly, massacres...[84]

83. ABRI also recruited East Timorese into the Korem/Kodim/Koramil regular territorial structure. Some had formerly served in the Portuguese colonial army. Others were former members of civil defence forces (Hansip) who had been recruited into ABRI through the Milsas programme (see section on "Tri-monthly Military Member" Milsas, paragraphs 100-102 below). By July 1998, there were 6,097 East Timorese serving in ABRI, of whom 5,510 were in the army and 569 in the police. The chances of East Timorese becoming officers or non-commissioned officers were far less than those of Indonesians. The data show that in July 1998 only 0.4% of East Timorese serving in the Indonesian armed forces were officers and less than 24% were non-commissioned officers, while 76% were privates. The breakdown for Indonesians in the 17,834 armed forces in Timor-Leste at the time was very different: 5.6% were officers, 34.1% were non-commissioned officers and just 60.4% were privates.[85]

Early paramilitaries, 1976–1981

84. From the outset the Indonesian armed forces aimed to bring Timorese into the conflict in Timor-Leste. It recruited East Timorese members into the armed forces and used East Timorese paramilitary groups to conduct covert operations. During the late 1970s the Indonesian military mobilised East Timorese specifically to fight against Fretilin/Falintil. The paramilitaries had a different role from that of the Partisans who had been treated more like porters or combat support personnel than as frontline troops. It also differed from the civil defence forces that did not normally play a frontline combat role. The paramilitaries established in the late 1970s and 1980s were generally closely linked to the Special Warfare Command (Kopassandha).

85. One of the first paramilitary forces was formed in September 1976 when Major-General Benny Moerdani personally granted the Special Warfare Command captain, A.M. Hendropriyono, permission to form a special platoon of East Timorese (Peleton Khusus, Tonsus) in Manatuto. The unit was recruited from an initial Apodeti core in Laclubar (Manatuto) and led by ex-Falintil member João Branco.[*] It quickly expanded beyond platoon size. Tonsus was well-armed and assigned East Timorese to special combat operations in the central sector.[86] Tonsus was a successful initiative that recognized East Timorese as equals rather than as inferiors. Despite its successes, the unit lapsed in 1978, and ABRI resumed using East Timorese as auxiliary personnel such as logistical assistants rather than as front-line combatants.[87]

86. ABRI recruited East Timorese for several other teams during the late 1970s. One group, called Nuclear Team (Tim Nuklir) operated in Moro (Lautém) under the command of sub-district administrator, Edmundo da Conceição da Silva.[88] Ex-partisan members known as regional military command volunteers or Skadam (Sukarelawan Kodam) were involved in the assault on Mount Kablaki in June 1977. Their title, "Skadam" seems to imply that they were formally incorporated into the ABRI structure.[89]

Paramilitaries in the 1980s

87. In 1979 ABRI established the Morok Team (literally, "Wild Team") under the command of Filomeno Lopes in Manatuto.[90] Comprising former Apodeti and UDT members, the Morok Team operated in Manatuto throughout the 1980s. A second team, called the Asahan Team, was established in 1980 by the intelligence section of the Manatuto District Military Command. It was placed under the leadership of Domingos ("Apai") da Silva and Antonio Doutel Sarmento, but functioned for only a year.[91] In 1981, at the time of Operation Security (Operasi Keamanan), a third team called Alap-alap was formed and used primarily to back up combat troops.[92]

* Tomas Gonçalves (interviewed by SCU on 8 August 2000) described João Branco's men being trained in Dili. [CAVR Community Profile of Pairara, Moro (Lautém), 28 March 2003].

88. In the 1980s ABRI established a number of more highly trained paramilitaries. One of the first was Railakan Team (literally, "Lightning Team") formed in about 1980 or 1981 under the command of an ABRI private, Julião Fraga, an East Timorese from Baguia (Baucau) and operating in Baucau.[93] The Lightning Team engaged in a variety of tasks such as the arrest, interrogation and torture of suspected clandestine members and taking part in operations to search out Falintil. Around 1983 the group was renamed the Saka (Satuan Khusus Pusaka, Heirloom Special Unit) Team. Julião Fraga continued to command the renamed group until his assassination in Baucau in 1995. The Railakan/ Saka Team was occasionally seen working directly with Kopassus[94] and regularly acted as an intermediary in conducting arrests for the Sub-district Military Command (Koramil).[95] At about the same time as the Railakan Team was renamed Saka Team in 1985, a sister paramilitary group called Sera Team was established in Baucau. Under the command of a former Falintil leader named Sera Malik, the Sera Team operated primarily in the Baucau-Vemasse-Venilale area. Alfa Team, yet another paramilitary squad from this period, was established in Lautém by the Special Forces Command (Kopassus) captain, Luhut Panjaitan, probably in 1986.[96]

89. The paramilitary groups served a number of purposes, such as participating in offensives and operations. A CAVR informant recalled:

> Major Sinaga formed Parrot Team (Tim Lorico) in the village of Oestico Loilubo (Vemasse, Baucau) from former Falintil. He used them for jungle operations, and after they found a Falintil place ABRI troops would go in and shoot… After Sinaga left Timor-Leste, the members of Tim Lorico disappeared one by one.[97]

90. The paramilitary groups also had functions that reflected their proximity to the Special Forces Command (Kopassus), such as covert operations and functioning as intelligence agents. These teams established the tradition of close relations between ABRI, specifically the Special Forces, and East Timorese paramilitary units. In the case of key individuals these relations were often sustained throughout the years of the conflict.[98]

Civil defence forces

91. One of the ideological cornerstones of the Indonesian military is the concept of Total People's Defence and Security System (Sistem Pertahanan Keamanan Rakyat Semesta, abbreviated Sishankamrata), according to which all civilians have a role to play in national defence.* In theory, Indonesian civilians may be selected to undergo basic military training, after which they are referred to as Trained Populace (Rakyat Terlatih, Ratih). Further selections may be made from the ranks of the Ratih to form (a) the Civil Defence Force (Pertahanan Sipil, Hansip), responsible for protecting civilians in case of natural disaster or war, (b) the People's Security Force (Keamanan Rakyat, Kamra), which is responsible for assisting the police, and (c) the People's Resistance Force

* This concept is derived the guerrilla strategy employed during the Indonesian revolution.

(Perlawanan Rakyat, Wanra), responsible for assisting the armed forces.* Although all of these categories are theoretically under the administration of the Department of Home Affairs (Departemen Dalam Negeri, Depdagri), in Timor-Leste these groups operated directly under Indonesian military command and control.[99]

92. The recruitment of East Timorese civilians into civil defence forces in Timor-Leste during the conflict is an example of how ABRI adapted its standard strategies in the territory. In Timor-Leste, ABRI used civil defence forces in a conventional territorial security role, but also in combat, surveillance and intelligence roles. In Indonesia, the Department of Home Affairs administers the civil defence forces, but in the early years of the conflict in Timor-Leste civil defence forces were directly under Indonesian military command and control; it was only in the 1980s that responsibility passed to the Department of Home Affairs.[100]

93. The widespread use of East Timorese civil defence forces had a dramatic impact on the East Timorese, bringing the conflict and the military into peoples' daily lives. Based in communities, members of civil defence forces were used as a link between the civilian population and the military. Intelligence gathering was a pervasive activity, and civil defence force members, either with members of the Indonesian military or on their own, were often involved in direct violations of civilians' rights. Protected by ABRI, they enjoyed some impunity for their actions. The Commission took many statements and heard many testimonies of the violence committed by other community members who were members of the military's civil defence forces (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment; and Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence, respectively).

94. The first East Timorese Hansip (Civil Defence) units were established during the second half of 1976, not long after Indonesia's act of integration in July 1976.[101] By mid-1978 there were 5,897 Hansip in Timor-Leste: numbers varied across the territory, with the largest numbers in Baucau (700) and Ainaro (665), and the fewest in Lautém (187).[102] Hansip were regularly used as combat support personnel, a role typically filled elsewhere in Indonesia by Wanra units (Perlawanan Rakyat, People's Resistance). In Indonesia, the Civil Defence forces (Hansip) were an established institution whose members were salaried and so had some longevity of service, whereas Wanra members did not receive a salary. However, the distinction between Hansip and Wanra in Timor-Leste was not always clear. This is either due to the military using Hansip in the capacity of Wanra, or because sometime between 1978 and 1980 Hansip were reclassified as Wanra. The two fulfilled essentially the same role. By 1980 the number of what by then were officially called Wanra reached 6,500, but two years later had decreased to 4,800.[103]

95. The Trained Civilians force (Rakyat Terlatih, Ratih) was first established in Timor-Leste in 1981 to assist in Operation Security (Operasi Keamanan). By the following year there were 6,000 members.[104] This rapid expansion coincided with a plan to convert

* For an overview of this system, see secret document Komando Resor Militer 164 Wira Dharma, Seksi-Intel, "Rencana Penyusunan Kembali Rakyat Terlatih," signed by Major Willem da Costa, dated 10 September, 1982, p. 2; and Robert Lowry, The Armed Forces of Indonesia (St. Leonards, NSW: Allen and Unwin, 1996), p. 111.

Hansip/Wanra into Ratih, mainly to save money. A People's Security Force (Keamanan Rakyat, Kamra) was established by the Indonesian police in early 1981 and by 1982 numbered 1,690.[105] In sum, by 1982 nearly 12,500 East Timorese were involved in the various civil defence organisations. Although it is difficult to make a definitive statement without knowing exact population figures for Timor-Leste in 1982, this figure is roughly 2.25% of the population,[*] higher than the national rate of around 2%.[†]

96. During 1981-82 the military command in Timor-Leste demoted many Hansip members to Ratih status. At the time ABRI stated its goal as:

> [D]eveloping a consciousness among the Timorese people of the need to defend the state, towards developing the realisation by every single citizen that he/she has the right and duty to take part without reserve in the defence of the state.[106]

97. ABRI had trouble controlling its civil defence forces. In 1983, partly as a consequence of poor treatment, and possibly in response to losing their jobs as part of a 1982 downsizing plan,[107] many Hansip members defected to Falintil.[108]

98. Civil defence units functioned within the already extensive territorial military structure, which at the village level included the Village Guidance Non-Commissioned Officer (Babinsa), a Village Guidance Policeman (Binpolda), and sometimes a platoon of Battalion 744 or 745 troops. ABRI put great effort into recruitment of civil defence units. Some members joined willingly; others under coercion.[109] Civil defence unit members generally received a short period of training from the local territorial command (Kodim or Koramil), and once trained they fulfilled a combat support role to ABRI and its paramilitaries:

> The function and task of the militia are to patrol, to block the trails used by the enemy when on the move (this can be executed on their own or together with Marine Troops 5). The functions and tasks of the Hansip are to guard certain TNI posts (at night), to act as guides on patrols, or to undertake combat support activities for the militia.[110]

99. In most cases Hansip were expected to take orders from the local Indonesian military command.[111] The Commission found that civil defence forces were implicated in a large number of violations during military operations.[‡]

* This calculation is based on Indonesia's 1981 census that calculated the population of Timor-Leste as 555,350. See Timor Timur dalam Angka, 1981 [East Timor in Figures, 1981], Statistics Office, East Timor Province, p. 25.

† This figure is based on a 4m-strong civil defence force in a population of 200 million in 1992. See Robert Lowry, The Armed Forces of Indonesia, p. 112.

‡ The CAVR human rights violations database (HRVD) lists 784 acts perpetrated by Hansip from 1975-79. See in particular Vol. III, Part 7.7: Rape, Sexual Slavery and Other Forms of Sexual Violence and Vol. III, 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment of this report.

"Three-month military men", (Milsas) 1989–1992

100. It appears that after taking control of the Hansip from ABRI in the early 1980s, by 1989 the Department of Home Affairs was unwilling to provide sufficient budgetary resources to maintain the Hansip and a group of reserves known as Societal Protection who were trained for disaster and emergency services (Perlindungan Masyarakat, Linmas). At the time, ABRI was struggling to attain its planned quota of 3.5% of the national population as civil defence members.[112] As membership of civil defence units in Timor-Leste exceeded the national average, a cost-saving measure is a likely reason for this reduction.[113] As a result the Department of Home Affairs decided to transfer many of the Hansip into the army. This programme was called Milsas, an abbreviation from militerisasi, or as "three-month military training". The Indonesian Human Rights Commission noted that:

> Milsas - which senior military officials in Jakarta often referred to as regional sons of the TNI - functioned only in East Timor to assist TNI East Timor operations.[114]

101. In 1989, ABRI sent approximately 1,000 former Hansip to Malang (East Java) and Bali to attend three-month training courses. On completion of the course, the former Hansip became ABRI personnel and returned to Timor-Leste where most were posted in the District Military Commands (Kodim). In 1992, a second group of 1000 former Hansip were selected and sent to Java and Bali for training. José Sales dos Santos explained:

> I was militarised in the second wave, with 1,000 Hansips from all districts. [As many as] 700 were sent to train in Malang and 300 were sent to train in Bali. After three months, each returned for duty in his own Kodim.[115]

102. Between 1989 and August 1991, the "milsas" programme led to a 50% reduction in the total number of Hansip (including the People's Security force or Kamra and People's Resistance or Wanra) from 4,996 to 2,023.[116]

Operations assistants (Tenaga Bantuan Operasi, TBOs)

103. ABRI forced large numbers of East Timorese civilians to serve as porters, guides, cooks and personal assistants for the army, particularly during the period of intensive operations in the late 1970s and early 1980s. A military document from 1982 states that 60,000 East Timorese were involved as support personnel.[117] These were designated as operations assistants (Tenaga Bantuan Operasi, TBO). Many people were recruited as TBO during the 1981 operation known as the 'fence of legs' (Operation Kikis) (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict and Vol. III, Part 7.3: Forced displacement and famine) One account describes the force used in recruitment:

> In 1979, Francisco Amaral was visited by three Hansip and taken to Uatolari…he was interrogated by [members of] the sub-district administrator and Battalion 202 about where (Fretilin) equipment was hidden, which he didn't know…he was beaten until he urinated and defecated and blood came out of his mouth and nose. After that a Marine company took him as an operations assistant (TBO).[118]

104. Many young people were taken as operations assistants (TBOs). They would be attached to a unit for variable periods of time, sometimes the duration of an operation, although sometimes much longer. The Catholic Apostolic Administrator, Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes noted that this forced recruitment had disastrous consequences for ordinary rural people who were taken away from their fields at planting time. A 1978 police report offered a frank assessment of the social consequences of forced recruitment:

> During Operasi Gempur in the central sector recently, people were forced to become TBOs. Implementing this caused anxiety among the people, primarily in Dili, which became quiet at night (because) parents became worried that their children will be taken by ABRI. Educational activities at school and scouting activities are somewhat interrupted temporarily.[119]

105. Vol. III, Part 7.8 on The Rights of the Child details the experiences of East Timorese children and youth taken as operations assistants by the Indonesian military. Many were subjected to combat conditions and gruelling forced marches carrying heavy military equipment, and were required to live in military camps with adult soldiers. Alfredo Reinado Alves recalled his experiences when he was taken from his mother as an 11-year-old operations assistant (TBO), and the intimidation and violence committed by Indonesian soldiers against his young East Timorese peer:

> One day one of the TBOs who was carrying a heavy load, refused to accept more weight to his load. The soldier became angry. When they arrived back at base camp, all the soldiers in the platoon and the TBOs were gathered together. The commander said that a TBO is not allowed to refuse to carry something. He said the army had come to help and to bring independence. After that, the TBO who had refused to carry the goods was called and before everyone's eyes he was shot dead. They told us that if we refused to comply, our fate would be the same as his.[120]

'Intel' – East Timorese spies

106. Throughout the course of the conflict military intelligence units employed East Timorese spies and informants to gather information. ABRI's first use of East Timorese in an intelligence capacity pre-dated the invasion of Timor-Leste, when it relied on Partisan troops to provide local intelligence, and to serve as guides during early incursions into Timor-Leste. According to Tomas Gonçalves, the Partisans were questioned about geographic and political information about Portuguese Timor:

There, they [the Indonesians] did not communicate with us. They called us the Partisans, and the Partisans did not communicate with them… When they called me over they asked me, 'More or less how many guns do they have in Timor? How many companies are there? Over there do many people know how to use guns? Do they know how to be guerrilla fighters?'[121]

107. Later, when mass numbers of civilians surrendered and were held by ABRI in detention camps and resettlement villages, ABRI's priority was to keep them separated from the remaining Falintil. However, ABRI needed intelligence sources to know who was close to the guerrilla forces. In late 1981 and January 1982, Sub-regional Military Command (Korem) 164 Commander Colonel Adolf Sahala Radjagukguk issued a series of orders concerning territorial operations and intelligence, the role of Babinsa, and urban security, including resettlement areas.[122] These orders indicate that the military recognised that strong resistance remained among the civilian population. There was a need to focus on destroying the linkages to and support for the armed Resistance. To achieve this the documents set out goals such as building a society in which security forces were implanted deeply within each community, observing and relying on East Timorese informants to create a powerful intelligence operation capable of controlling the civilian population and limiting contact with Falintil. An example was an organisation formed in Quelicai:

At that time (1981) there was an organisation called 'Siliman' (Siguranca Sipil Masyarakat), formed by TNI-Koramil, with a goal of spying. The members were residents of Quelicai. Amongst them were (names listed)… The organisation often observed the movements of the deponent and if they were seen would report them to Koramil.[123]

108. In the early 1980s, following the major surrenders of 1978-79, a significant number of Timor-Leste's population was forced into resettlement camps. Structurally, ABRI designed civil defence posts (Hansip/Wanra) to be situated surrounding cities and towns. The civil defence troops (Hansip/Wanra) were expected to fulfil an intermediary role between the people and the military, typically represented at village level by a Babinsa or Village Guidance Team (Tim Pembina Desa).* Their tasks included carrying out duties assigned by the military as well as monitoring their fellow citizens. In support, members of Trained Civilians (Ratih) would provide internal security:

Civilian males armed with spears and machetes can, in case of danger, be gathered in one place in their village (within the town).[124]

109. This came during a period when ABRI wished to use more East Timorese as security/defence auxiliaries, aiming to bring Timor-Leste closer in line with ABRI's doctrine of "Total People's Defence" (Hankamrata). A military document from February 1982 discussed the ideal:

* The presence of Babinsa posts in every village in Timor-Leste is a far higher coverage than what is normal in Indonesia and reflects ABRI's goal of achieving tight control over Timor-Leste's population.

> With security taking hold [ABRI gaining control], SATPUR (combat units) would decrease in size while the role of civil defence (HANSIP-WANKAMRA) would increase and would even play the most important role in defending and securing their territories from the remaining GPK and extremists.[125]

110. East Timorese were recruited to work as informants in a number of ways. Some willingly offered to help the intelligence units, others were offered bribes, and still others recruited by force of threat. The military often sought to "turn" clandestine members and former Falintil guerrillas to work for the Intelligence Task Force (Satuan Tugas Intelijen).

111. Towards the end of the 1980s, as the Resistance developed a clandestine movement in the towns and cities, ABRI needed a strong local intelligence capacity in order to control this growing network. From this point, ABRI's strategy changed from focusing on the guerrilla insurgency to trying to dismantle the growing clandestine resistance. Each of the territorial units (e.g., Regional, District and Sub-district Commands) contained intelligence personnel and each recruited its own network of informants. The most notorious intelligence unit was the Intelligence Task Force (SGI, Satuan Tugas Intelijen).[*] This unit was first established under the East Timor Regional Defence and Security Command (Kodahankam) in 1976 and later transferred to successor command structures.[†126] Formally under the control of the Regional Military Command (Korem), by the mid-1990s Special Forces Command (Kopassus) had extensive control over the Intelligence Task Force.[127]

112. East Timorese referred to intelligence informants and spies as mauhu; "mau" being a male and "hu" meaning to blow. This system of intelligence informants and spies played a large role in creating suspicion among East Timorese. It enabled the military to penetrate the Resistance, as well as enabling it to plant rumours and misinformation. Many East Timorese were forced to play a dangerous double game, and were continually at risk of being suspected by either side. There were large numbers of East Timorese spies and their prevalence meant that civilians rarely knew who was mauhu and who was not, who to avoid and who could be trusted. The pervasiveness of the system sowed deep suspicion among the East Timorese population, and social bonds and cohesiveness were casualties of this undercover element of the conflict.

* See paragraphs 56 and 59. The military normally abbreviated the full name Satuan Tugas Intelijen to Satgas Intel, but there are also military documents from 1992-93 in which it is abbreviated SGI. Most East Timorese, however, simply know the unit by the name SGI.

† In 1978 the Intelligence Task Force was transferred to Operasi Seroja; in 1979 it was transferred to Sub-regional Military Command 164; in 1984 to the Security Operations Command; and in 1990 it was transferred to the Operational Implementation Command (Kolakops).

1990s and a focus on youth

113. By the late1980s, young East Timorese had emerged as an important new element of the clandestine urban resistance movement. This was especially troublesome for the Indonesian regime that had invested its hopes in the new generation of East Timorese who had been educated within the Indonesian system.

114. In the late1970s and early1980s, Indonesian police, then formally part of the military, fostered the Indonesian scout movement (Pramuka) to instil nationalist discipline among East Timorese young people. This programme included military-style training such as marching and drilling, providing assistance to the Indonesian Red Cross, and attendance at official ceremonies. By May 1978 there were nearly 10,000 participants, rising to 22,455 by 1981.[128] Youth martial arts groups were also formed and encouraged. Through public physical training and wearing uniforms such groups mimicked the behaviour of soldiers.

115. East Timorese tertiary students were also targeted by the Indonesian armed forces. By the 1990s Timor-Leste had one university and one polytechnic college and a student regiment (Resimen Mahasiswa, Menwa) was established on those campuses. In common with student regiments in Indonesia, this was an avenue for ABRI to provide additional indoctrination to students.[129] In Timor-Leste the student regiment became a means for ABRI to infiltrate student organisations and clandestine groups active on campus. East Timorese students who went to Java and Bali to study were obliged to join the official East Timorese student organisation, Imppettu (Ikatan Mahasiswa, Pemuda dan Pelajar Timor Timur, The East Timorese Student and Youth Association).[130] Many East Timorese were under intelligence surveillance.

Death squads

116. In the early 1990s a new style of paramilitary force known as Ninja gangs emerged as a part of ABRI's efforts to control the growing urban clandestine resistance. These gangs operated at night dressed in black and wearing balaclavas.[131] They were feared for their role in the growing number of disappearances of suspected Resistance members. Effectively they were death squads.*

117. In 1995, a new group emerged called Young Guards Upholding Integration (Garda Muda Penegak Integrasi, Gadapaksi)†. It was essentially a continuation of the Ninja gangs, with a similar focus on targeting the clandestine Resistance. This had strong links to the Special Forces Command (Kopassus), and was founded by President Soeharto's son-in-law, Special Forces officer, Colonel Prabowo, in July

* The Ninja groups' behaviour was very similar to the Petrus 'mysterious killings' in Java of the early 1980s, although they served a different purpose. Masterminded by General Benny Moerdani, perpetrators of the Petrus 'mysterious killings' targeted criminals and left their bodies on public display.

† Sometimes spelt Gardapaksi.

1995.[132] Although the organisation was officially intended to assist Timorese youths in small-scale business ventures, members quickly developed a host of illegal or semi-legal smuggling, gambling, and protection rackets. In addition, it continued to target and harass the clandestine movement in the manner similar to the Ninja squads. The Young Guards developed rapidly; by early 1996 it had 1,100 members. In April 1996 it was announced that there were plans to add 1,200 members per year, and in May of that year, 600 members were sent to Java to receive training from the Special Forces Command.[133] Despite its public links to the Special Forces, two years after its establishment the head of the Young Guards (Gadapaksi), Marçal de Almeida lamented the fact that his organisation was reputed to be full of spies (mauhu). The emergence of the Young Guards coincided with the ascendancy of the Special Forces Command (Kopassus) over the Army Strategic Command (Kostrad) in Timor-Leste. Along with the dominance of the Special Forces came a shift towards psychological operations designed to infiltrate, intimidate and destroy the clandestine Resistance. The Young Guards was a front line element in this strategy. In 1995, the various paramilitaries in Timor-Leste received military training in Aileu conducted by the Special Forces Command. The Young Guards continued until it was replaced by a variety of militia groups in 1998-99.

Militias, 1998–1999

118. Many of the militias which emerged in 1998-99 had roots in groups formed much earlier in the occupation period. Below is a chart of the history of Timorese militias, including the names of the Timorese leaders, by sector and district, founded from 1975–1999.

Table 2 - Militias in Timor-Leste, 1975–1999

Sector A: East Commander: Joanico Césario Belo, East Timorese Special Forces Command (Kopassus) Sergeant
District	Name	Leader in 1999	Date founded	Background/links
Lautém	Jati Merah Putih (True to Red White)	José da Conceição	1985	Team Alfa originally established by Special Forces in 1985; renamed JMP in 1999.

Viqueque	Makikit (Eagle) 59/75 Junior/Naga Merah (Red Dragon)	Alfonso Pinto (Lafaek) Alvaro de Jesus	1983 1999	Sponsored by Special Forces. Roots in the 1959 Viqueque rebellion.
Baucau	Saka	Joanico C. Belo (Special Forces)	1983	Formed by Special Forces from ex-Falintil and earlier Baucau paramilitary, Railakan, 1959-75.
	Sera	Sera Malik	1986	Founded by Special Forces as with Saka.
	Forum Komunikasi Partisan (Partisan Communication Forum	Antonio Monis	1999	Re-formed in 1999 from old Partisan members of 1975.
Manatuto	Mahadomi (Live and Die with Integration	Aleixo de Carvalho	1999	Founder and advisor Vidal Doutel Sarmento was District Administrator (Bupati) and member of Special Forces.
	Morok (Wild)	Filomeno Lopes da Cruz (April 1999: Thomas de Aquino Kalla)	ca. 1995

Sector B: Central Commander: Eurico Guterres,
(former leader of Youth Guards 'ninja' group, Dili, early 1990s)

District	Name	Leader in 1999	Date founded	Background/links
Dili	Aitarak (Thorn)	Eurico Guterres	1999	Dili-based young guards militia; early 1990; trained by Special Forces
Liquiçá	BMP (Besi Merah Putih, Red and White Iron)	Manuel de Sousa	27 Des 1998	Direct military link-based at Maubara Sub-district Military Command (Koramil)

Ermera	Darah Integrasi (Blood for Integration)/ Partisans; Naga Merah (Red Dragon)/Darah Merah (Red Blood); Pancasila (Five Basic Principles) Team	Miguel Babo Soares, Antonio da Sousa Lucas Martins, José Pereira João da Costa, Paulo Berlelo	April 1999	Partisan and People's Resistance (Wanra) heritage

Sector C: South-West
Commander: Cancio Lopes de Carvalho

District	Name	Leader in 1999	Date founded	Background/links
Ainaro	Mahidi (Mati Hidup Untuk Indonesia, Live or Die for Indonesia)	Cancio Lopes de Carvalho	17 Dec 1998	Ainaro Military Commander
Manufahi	ABLAI	Nazario Corte Real	27 Mar 1999	Special Forces links
Covalima	Laksaur (a kind of bird)	Olivio Mendonca Moruk		District Administrator (Bupati) and military commander of Covalima
Aileu	AHI (Aku Hidup untuk Integrasi) I Live for Integration)	Horacio Araújo	27 Mar 1999	Set up and supported by district administration

Sector D: West Commander: João Tavares, (former leader of Halilintar paramilitary, part of pre-invasion covert operations in 1975)
District	Name	Leader in 1999	Date founded	Background/links
Bobonaro	Halilintar (Thunder) Dadurus Merah Putih (Red White Tornado); Guntur (Thunder); ARMUI (Aku Rela Mati Untuk Integrasi, I Volunteer to Die for Integration); Kaer Metin Merah Putih (Pegang Kuat Merah Putih, Hold Fast to Red White); Harimau Merah Putih (Red White Tiger); Saka Loromonu (Western Saka); Firmi Merah Putih (True Believer in Red White)	João Tavares Natalino Monteiro	1975; re-formed in 1994	Long-term military links through Halilintar
Oecussi	Sakunar (Scorpion)	Simão Lopes	April 1999	linked to Special Forces

Source: CAVR research and compilation

Formation of the militias

119. The Indonesian armed forces began to mobilise militia groups across Timor-Leste in mid-to late 1998. The militias were formed as a direct response to the new freedom of East Timorese to campaign for independence after the fall of Soeharto in May 1998 and the announcement a month later by his successor, B.J. Habibie, that Timor-Leste could have the option of wide-ranging autonomy. After Habibie went further in January 1999 and offered Timor-Leste a choice between autonomy and independence, militia groups mushroomed in every district.

120. In many ways the formation of the militias was the culmination of the strategy of militarisation described above. In creating the militias, the Indonesian armed forces drew heavily on the variety of auxiliary forces manned by East Timorese that had been developed over the years since 1975. Several of the militias, such as Saka Team and Sera Team in Baucau, Alfa Team in Lautém and Makikit Team in Viqueque, had in fact been in existence for a decade or more. Halilintar in Bobonaro originated as a unit of the Partisans in the months before the invasion, and having been inactive for several years, it was revived in 1994 to assist the Indonesian military in its campaign against the growing clandestine movement in the district. Others were descendants of earlier paramilitaries. The leadership of the Mahidi militia in Ainaro had also led the "volunteers" who had terrorised Ainaro in the early 1990s.

121. Other militias recruited their leadership from officially-sponsored auxiliaries such as the People's Resistance (Wanra), Civil Defence (Hansip) and the Young Guards Upholding Integration (Gadapaksi). A military document dated April 1998 shows that 12 paramilitary teams, covering every district of Timor-Leste except Dili and Oecussi, were then in existence. From the document it is clear that these teams, which included the Saka, Sera, Alfa, Makikit (Eagle), Halilintar (Thunder) and Morok (Wild) Teams - all of which retained their names when they became militias - were part of the territorial structure.[134] The speed with which the militias were mobilised in 1999 was largely due to their ability to draw on existing structures. The antecedents of the main militia groups are summarised in Table 2 in paragraph 118 above.

122. The entire period leading up to and immediately following the Popular Consultation unfolded against a background of violence. Most of this violence was perpetrated by militia groups with TNI troops either playing a supporting role or being directly involved. The role of the Indonesian armed forces in planning and orchestrating this violence is well-documented. Investigations conducted by the Indonesian Human Rights Commission (Komnas HAM) and the UN-sponsored International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor (ICIET) in the immediate aftermath of violence, by the UN-supported Serious Crimes Unit (SCU) in Timor-Leste during the UNTAET and UNMISET missions, as well as the testimonies and submissions received by and research conducted by CAVR itself, all lead to the inescapable conclusion that the Indonesian military was deeply complicit in every aspect of the violence from the initial formation of the militia groups to instigating the final and most comprehensive phase of the violence in September–October 1999.

123. Aside from the historical evidence already cited, there is a massive amount of other evidence indicating that the militias were created, supported and controlled by the Indonesian National Army (TNI). This evidence is summarised below.*

Indonesian National Army (TNI) involvement in formation of the militias

124. Senior Indonesian army officers were involved in the planning, formation and training of the militias. In February 1999 the former Partisan leader, Tomas Gonçalves, who claimed to have been offered but to have refused a senior position in the militia structure, spoke to the international media. He described the role of key military personnel in establishing the militia, naming the Sub-regional Military (Korem) commander, Colonel Tono Suratman, and the commander of Regional

* The Commission's summary of the evidence of links between the militias and the TNI relies heavily on Geoffrey Robinson, East Timor 1999: Crimes Against Humanity, A Report Commissioned by OHCHR submission to CAVR, July 2003. pp.82-129.

Military Command (Kodam) IX Udayana Major-General Adam Damiri, as well as indicating the prominent role of the Joint Intelligence Task Force (SGI) dominated by Special Forces (Kopassus)[*135] Tomas Gonçalves said:

> The order came from the regional commander, [Major-General] Adam Damiri, to the East Timor commander and the Special Forces Commander Yayat Sudrajat – liquidate all the CNRT, all the pro-independence people, parents, sons, daughters and grandchildren. Commander Sudrajat promised a payment of Rp200,000 to anyone wanting to serve in the militia.[136]

125. In the indictment of the Serious Crimes Unit against General Wiranto and others, the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes described a series of meetings in which senior officers planned the formation and recruitment of militias:

1. In or about August 1998 [the commander of Region IX Udayana, Major-General] Adam Rachmat Damiri arranged for a pro-Indonesian East Timorese leader to fly from Timor-Leste to Denpasar, Bali for a meeting. At this meeting, Damiri told the East Timorese leader to establish a group to promote integration.
2. In or about August 1998 Damiri travelled to Dili and met with TNI commanders and pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders. [The commander of Sub-regional Military Command (Korem) 164, Colonel] Tono Suratman was present at this meeting. Damiri told the group that international attention was focused on Timor-Leste and this was a problem for Indonesia. He told them that they needed to come up with a plan for creating organisations that would spread pro-Indonesian sentiment throughout Timor-Leste. He told them that they must form a solid civil defence force based on previous TNI-supported models and that this force should be expanded and developed to protect integration.

* In 1993, the Joint Intelligence Task Force (SGI) was renamed the Intelligence Task Force (Satuan Tugas Intelijen). However, it continued to be widely referred to as the SGI (see Vol. I, Part 4.2: The Indonesian Armed Forces and their Role in Timor-Leste). In 1999 it was staffed by a Special Forces unit, named Three Earth (Tribuana) Task Force, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Yayat Sudrajat. The Special Forces Command (Kopassus) had held a dominant role in the Indonesian military structure in Timor-Leste from the mid-1990s.A number of senior officers who had Special Forces Command (Kopassus) backgrounds and who had completed tours of duty in Timor-Leste played influential roles during the Popular Consultation. They included the senior intelligence officer Major General Zacky Anwar Makarim, who was officially the chief military representative on the Indonesian task force assigned to liaise with UNAMET. It is believed that he also played a key role in developing the militias during this period. Aside from Lieutenant Colonel Sudrajat, the Sub-regional Military (Korem) commander, Colonel Tono Suratman, had also previously been in Kopassus. His immediate superior, Major General Adam Damiri, the Bali-based commander of the Regional Udayana division, was another Kopassus member. At the Indonesian cabinet level, another key figure in developing policy on Timor-Leste was the Coordinating Minister for Political Affairs and Security, retired General Feisal Tanjung, who was one of four ministers in the cabinet with a Kopassus background. Another was the Minister of Information, Yunus Yosfiah, whose extensive involvement with Timor-Leste went back to his pre-invasion command of the Susi Tim. (Robinson, pp. 28-29).

3. In or about November 1998, Damiri travelled to Timor-Leste. During this visit he again met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders in Dili, including individuals who later became leaders of militia groups. Damiri asked the men to join together and assist TNI to fight the pro-independence group Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor [Frente Revolucionária de Timor Leste Independente, Fretilin]. During this meeting with pro-Indonesian leaders, Damiri praised future militia leader Eurico Guterres as being a young man eager to fight for integration and said that he was willing to give Guterres 50 million rupiah to begin his work.
4. In or about November 1998, Tono Suratman met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders at his headquarters in Dili. [Tribuana commander, Lieutenant Colonel] Yayat Sudrajat was present at this meeting. Suratman told the group that he wanted future militia leader Eurico Guterres to form a new organisation to defend integration similar to the pro-Indonesian Youth Guards Upholding Integration (Gadapaksi).
5. In early 1999, [Major-General] Zacky Anwar Makarim [who was head of the armed forces intelligence agency, BIA, until January 1999] received the founding members of the pro-Indonesian East Timor People's Front (Barisan Rakyat Timor Timur, BRTT) at his office in Jakarta. During the meeting he said that guerrilla warfare would be necessary to overcome independence supporters if the autonomy option lost at the ballot.
6. In or about February 1999, Damiri met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders at Regional Military Command IX headquarters in Denpasar, Bali. Damiri told the men that TNI was ready to give secret support to pro-Indonesian forces. He explained that it must be secret in order to avoid international scrutiny and criticism. Damiri asked the men to gather East Timorese who had served in TNI. He told them that they should meet with Suratman for further instructions.
7. In or about February 1999, Suratman met with a pro-Indonesian East Timorese leader in Dili. He told him that because TNI was under a reformist regime, it could not take part in open operations against the independence movement. Suratman asked the pro-Indonesian leader to form a militia group. Suratman said that TNI was willing to provide any form of assistance required by militia groups.
8. In or about February 1999, Yayat Sudrajat met with TNI personnel and pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders at Intelligence Task Force headquarters in Dili. Sudrajat told the group that the Intelligence Task Force had a list of independence supporters that were to be killed. He stated that the Intelligence Task Force and the pro-Indonesian groups would cooperate to carry out these killings. He said that Special Forces (Kopassus) dressed as civilians would start to carry out murders of pro-independence supporters.
9. In or about March 1999, [Assistant for Operations to the Army Chief of Staff, Major General] Kiki Syahnakri met with pro-Indonesian East

Timorese leaders at TNI headquarters in Jakarta. Syahnakri told the group that TNI would support their pro-Indonesian efforts and that Makarim was responsible for coordinating activities leading up to the popular consultation. Syahnakri told them that firearms had been sent to Timor-Leste, and that when the men returned to Dili they should contact Suratman to arrange distribution of the firearms.

10. In early 1999, [the governor, Abilio] Soares encouraged the District Administrators [Bupati] to form militia groups in their districts. Some of these District Administrators became militia leaders.[137]

126. One aspect of the TNI's role in the creation of the militias was its direct involvement in recruitment. In early 1999 the then Korem chief of staff, Lieutenant-Colonel Supardi, was quoted as saying that the TNI had recruited 1,200 militiamen and would continue recruitment until March.[138] In addition to using the financial incentive of Rp200,000 to encourage recruitment,* the TNI used threats and coercion (see further below). Targets of approximately ten men per village were established for the recruitment of militia members in each district.[139] In addition, training of the militias was conducted according to rules set out in instructions and reports issued by senior officers all the way up the regional command structure.[140]

TNI endorsement of the militias

127. Members of the TNI and Indonesian administration conferred official status on the militias. They did this, for example, by attending militia inauguration ceremonies and rallies throughout Timor-Leste. The Sub-regional military (Korem) commander, Colonel Tono Suratman, met and gave "guidance" to members of the Red White Iron (BMP) militia at the district military command (Kodim) 1638 headquarters on 16 April 1999, ten days after the massacre of civilians in Liquiçá church and one day before the militia rampage in Dili in which BMP also took part.[141] As late as 8 May 1999, Timor-Leste regional military commander, Colonel Suratman, attended the inauguration of the Manatuto Loves Integration (Mahadomi) militia in Manatuto. He and others, including the governor, Abilio Soares, the district administrator of Dili, Domingos Soares, and the then assistant for army operations, Major General Kiki Syahnakri, were also present at the rally on 17 April 1999 at which Eurico Guterres spoke to militiamen and encouraged them to kill "those who have betrayed integration". At the end of the rally, the militia dispersed and went on a rampage around Dili. Among their targets was the house of Manuel Carrascalão where several hundred people had taken refuge to escape militia violence in their districts. At the house they killed 12 people.[142]

128. In addition to these shows of support, the Indonesian authorities gave the militias official endorsement by treating them as part of the formal auxiliary military structure.

* At that time, Rp200,000.00 = US$26.66.

In official communications, militia groups were regularly referred to as being part of existing civil defence groups.[143] From April 1999, militia groups were also officially recognised as voluntary civil security organisations (Pam Swakarsa).[144]

TNI participation in militia activities

129. The close connection between the TNI and the militias is most clearly demonstrated by the overlap in their memberships. Many militia members were also enlisted TNI soldiers, a fact that has been confirmed through official Indonesian military and government documents.[145] At least one militia (Saka Team) had been a "special company" fully integrated into the structure of the TNI for several years.[146] In addition, militia leaders were treated as part of the official security apparatus and invited as such to meetings with military, police and government authorities.[147]

The provision of training, weapons and operational support

130. The TNI also provided the militias with training, weapons and operational support. The role of the TNI in training militias has been confirmed by numerous sources including Indonesian documents, telegrams and at least one statement to the media by Lieutenant Colonel Supardi, the sub-regional military command (Korem) chief of staff in the early months of 1999.[148] Weapons were provided, and control over their use maintained by the TNI.[149] Ample evidence of this is found in documents but also in the very possession by militias of modern weapons of the type used by Indonesian military and police.[150] General Wiranto himself acknowledged to investigators that:

> Sometimes weapons were provided, but this does not mean that [militias] carried weapons wherever they went. The weapons were stored at Sub-district military headquarters.[151]

131. The Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes made the following allegations in her indictment of General Wiranto and others:

1. In or about March 1999, [Governor Abilio] Soares held a meeting in his office in Dili. [Sub-regional 164 commander, Colonel Tono], Suratman and [commander of the Special Forces Tribuana Task Force, Lieutenant-Colonel Yayat] Sudrajat were present at the meeting. Soares told a group of pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders that independence supporters who sought protection with priests and nuns were communists and ought to be killed. He also told the group that TNI would supply weapons to pro-Indonesian forces. He said that if TNI could not supply enough weapons, he would do so himself. He said that he would provide the pro-Indonesian organisation BRTT with funding.
2. In or about March 1999, Sudrajat and other members of TNI delivered a large number of firearms to a pro-Indonesian East Timorese leader. Sudrajat asked the East Timorese leader to give the weapons to pro-Indonesian militia groups.

3. In or about April 1999, [the head of the armed forces intelligence agency, BIA], Major General Zacky Anwar Makarim told TNI commanders and pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders that they should work hard for autonomy because if autonomy lost, more blood would flow. He offered pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders the use of automatic firearms and ordered Suratman to arrange for the collection and distribution of these firearms.
4. In or about April 1999, Suratman, after being asked by Makarim to provide automatic firearms to pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders, ordered his subordinate Sudrajat to arrange for the collection and distribution of the firearms.[152]

132. The TNI also provided operational support to the militias. Sometimes such support took the form of militias using TNI bases and posts. In the case of militias established well before 1999, the use of a TNI base was simply the continuation of a long-standing relationship. One example was the use by the Alfa Team of the Special Forces (Kopassus) base in Lospalos.

Joint TNI-militia operations

133. Joint operations commonly involved the presence of TNI troops when militia attacks took place, with the TNI troops in position behind militiamen and firing only in their defence.[153] One such militia operation where TNI troops were present was the Liquiçá church massacre in April 1999. The participation of TNI members became less frequent after the arrival of UNAMET in June 1999, though it did continue during the weeks leading up to the ballot, including in such high-profile instances as the attack on the UNAMET office in Maliana (Bobonaro) on 29 June 1999. Widespread joint TNI-militia operations resumed after the 29 August ballot, in September 1999, once international staff had been forced to flee the districts and were either under siege in UNAMET headquarters in Dili or had left the country.[154]

Provision of financial and material support by the TNI and other agencies

134. Finally, there is substantial evidence indicating that the Indonesian civilian and military authorities funded the militias and provided resources for their use. An estimated US$5.2 million was channelled to the militias through the Indonesian civilian administration.[155] Standard budgets for the "socialisation of autonomy" were drawn up by each district, containing allocation for the militias, and submitted to the governor for approval.* Additional funds were provided through other arms of the Indonesian government and the TNI. There is also evidence that pro-integrationist political groups, the United Forum for Democracy and Justice (Forum Persatuan Demokrasi dan Keadilan, FPDK) and the People's Front of East Timor (Barisan Rakyat Timor Timur, BRTT) - both of which had close ties to the civil administration (see chapter 4.4 on Civil administration below) - were used to channel funds from the government and the military to the militia.[156] The United Forum was chaired by the district administrator (Bupati) of Dili, Domingos Soares, while the People's Front chairman was Francisco Lopes da Cruz, the former UDT president who had been deputy governor of Timor-Leste in the early years of the occupation, and who before 1999 was a roving ambassador with a brief to push Indonesia's case on Timor-Leste internationally.[157]

* Several such budgets are in the CAVR's Archives.

135. These close links between the militias, the TNI and Indonesian civilian authority led the UN Commission of Inquiry to state in its report that:

1. There is also evidence that the Indonesian Army and the civilian authorities in Timor-Leste and some in Jakarta pursued a policy of engaging the militia to influence the outcome of the Popular Consultation. The approach pursued was to provide the impression that the East Timorese were fighting among themselves.
2. There is evidence that the policy of engaging militias was implemented by the Kopassus (Special Forces Command of TNI) and other intelligence agencies of the Indonesian army. The policy manifested itself in the form of active recruitment, funding, arming and guidance, and the provision of logistics to support the militias in intimidation and terror attacks.
3. There is evidence to show that, in certain cases, Indonesian army personnel, in addition to directing the militias, were directly involved in intimidation and terror attacks. The intimidation, terror, destruction of property, displacement and evacuation of people would not have been possible without the active involvement of the Indonesian army, and the knowledge and approval of the top military command.
4. The Indonesian police, who were responsible for security under the 5 May Agreement,[*] appear to have been involved in acts of intimidation and terror and in other cases to have been inactive in preventing such acts.
5. The Commission is of the view that ultimately the Indonesian army was responsible for the intimidation, terror, killings and other acts of violence experienced by the people of Timor-Leste before and after the Popular Consultation. Further, the evidence collected to date indicates that particular individuals were directly involved in violations of human rights.[158]

* Talks between Indonesia and Portugal in New York City on 5 May 1999 resulted in the two governments entrusting the UN Secretary-General with organising and conducting a "Popular Consultation" to determine whether the East Timorese people accepted or rejected special autonomy for Timor-Leste within the unitary Republic of Indonesia. The Indonesian National Police Force had the task of maintaining security during the Popular Consultation.

The consequences of militia-TNI cooperation

136. Ian Martin, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General during UNAMET, told the Commission:

> [T]he Deputy-Prosecutor for Serious Crimes appointed by the United Nations has found sufficient evidence to charge the highest leadership of the TNI with crimes against humanity…In my opinion, it is beyond doubt that the destruction of East Timor was not merely the result of an emotional response of militia and a mutiny of East Timorese within the TNI: it was a planned and coordinated operation under TNI direction.[159]

137. The violent events of 1999 are covered elsewhere in this report (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict, Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances, Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence). For the purposes of this chapter, it is important to note the close relationship between the TNI and the East Timorese militia groups, as well as TNI's domination of the civil administration and the national police in Timor-Leste. When the UN entered Timor-Leste in May 1999, the militias backed by the TNI were terrorising the population, unchecked by intervention of the Indonesian police.[160]

138. The Indonesian authorities asserted that these militia groups were spontaneous expressions of local support for integration, and that the violence was the result of conflict among pro-independence and pro-integration East Timorese. But there were no real efforts to rein in this threat. Those responsible for the massacres in Liquiçá and Dili in April 1999 were not pursued or brought to justice. The supposed disarmament of the militias in August 1999 was clearly designed to create the impression that the militias were reciprocating the decision of Falintil to place its forces in cantonment (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict).

139. When massive violence occurred after the ballot, TNI tried to paint a picture of spontaneous violence caused by shock and anger at the pro-independence result. However, the rapid implementation and widespread extent of the violence and destruction indicated a well-planned and resourced operation with sophisticated logistical support.[161] Although militia were often the frontline of these activities, in many cases they were supported directly by military or police personnel.[162] They were in effect implementing a TNI plan. Indeed, the militia's threatened destruction of Timor-Leste in the event of a vote for independence had been foreshadowed by Timor-Leste's military Commander, Colonel Suratman, months before the consultation, when he said in an interview on Australian television:

> I want to give you this message: if the pro-independence side wins, it's not going to just be the Government of Indonesia that has to deal with what follows. The UN and Australia are also going to have to solve the problem and well, if this does happen, then there'll be no winners. Everything is going to be destroyed. East Timor won't exist as it does now. It'll be much worse than 23 years ago.[163]

140. Throughout the lead-up to the ballot the East Timorese civilian population was terrorised and could not look to the police or to the civil administration to respect the rule of law and restore law and order. The military and police, whose job it was to protect the population, instead allowed and supported this violence and intimidation. With the withdrawal of the UN and international observers in the days after the ballot,* cooperation between the militia and TNI was overt as both participated in the removal of huge numbers of the civilian population to West Timor and other parts of Indonesia.[164] During this process Indonesian military, police and Timorese militia committed murders, sexual violence and other abuses against civilians.

Civil administration

The Provisional Government of Timor-Leste

141. On 18 December 1975, shortly after its full-scale invasion of Timor-Leste, Indonesia established the Provisional Government of East Timor (Pemerintah Sementara Timor Timur, PSTT).† Most positions in this government were filled with East Timorese supporters of integration with Indonesia, predominately from Apodeti and UDT. Members of the Provisional Government were appointed in Dili as fierce fighting was taking place as the invasion pushed towards the interior. In the seven months of its existence the Provisional Government was virtually powerless to make autonomous decisions in the face of Indonesian military domination. Former Governor Mario Viegas Carrascalão told the Commission:

> I could not say that PSTT [the East Timor Provisional Government] was an actual government. The Executive Chairman was Arnaldo de Araújo, with Lopes da Cruz as his Deputy. The President of the Popular Assembly was Guilherme Gonçalves. The Popular Assembly had just begun to function...it met once in May 1976 here, just to go over one point of its "charter", that is, the integration without referendum.[165]

142. When the Indonesian People's Representative Council (DPR-RI) passed Law 7/76, and President Soeharto signed this into law on 17 July 1976, Indonesia claimed the integration of Timor-Leste was formally complete. Law 7/76 decreed the formation of a provincial government. To implement this Indonesia issued on 30 July 1976 Government Decree 19/1976 which established a government structure at the provincial and district levels in Timor-Leste. This imposed the standard Indonesian structure of civil government in Timor-Leste. However, with some minor modifications it retained the structure of the Portuguese civil administration: conçelhos became kabupaten (districts), postos turned into kecamatan (sub-districts), sucos became desas (villages),

* Twelve UN Military Liaison Officers remained in the Australian Embassy in Dili after UNAMET evacuated on 14 September 1999. They were protected by Army Strategic Reserve (Kostrad) troops.

† In this sub-section the report will denote East Timor, in English, to represent the Indonesian administrative title of Timor Timur used for the territory. Timor-Leste is retained when describing the territory other than as the Indonesian administrative unit.

and aldeias became kampungs (hamlets). The result of this policy was that there were far more administrative units at the district and sub-district levels and therefore a far more extensive civil administrative presence in Timor-Leste than in Indonesia. Moreover, as in Indonesia, in Timor-Leste the Indonesian military (ABRI) established a territorial command structure that paralleled the civil administration, meaning it too had a heavier presence at the local level than was normal in Indonesia.

Table 3 - Indonesian administration structure, with Portuguese and Indonesian military equivalents

Level	Indonesian term	Administrative post	Portuguese equivalent	Parallel Military command province	provinsi	governor (gubernur)	territory	sub-regional military command (Korem)
district (13)	kabupaten	district administrator (bupati) and secretary	conçelhos	district military command (Kodim)
sub-district (62)	kecamatan	sub-district administrator (camat) and administrative assistant	postos administrativos	sub–district military command (Koramil)
village (442)	kelurahan/desa	village head (kepala desa)	suco	non-commissioned guidance officer or team (Babinsa)
hamlet	kampung/dusun RW (rukun warga) RT (rukun tetangga)	hamlet head [143.] (kepala kampung)	chefe de aldeia
neighbourhood	RT/RW	neighbourhood head (kepala RT)

Source: CAVR research and compilation

The position of Governor*

143. During Soeharto's New Order regime, the governor of an Indonesian province was appointed to a five-year term by the president, and approved by the national

* The governors in Timor Leste from 1976-99 were as follows: Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, 1976–1978, Apodeti; Guilherme Maria Gonçalves, 1978–1982, Apodeti; Mario Viegas Carrascalão, 1982–1987 and 1987–1992, UDT; Abilio José Osorio Soares, 1992–1997 and 1997–1999, Apodeti.

People's Representative Council (DPR).* Active or retired military officers were appointed to the governorship of many Indonesian provinces In Timor-Leste, Indonesia appointed indigenous, civilian governors throughout the occupation.

144. On 4 August 1976, Jakarta appointed Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, leader of Apodeti, as its first governor, bringing the new province of Timor-Leste (Timor Timur) into existence. The UDT leader, Francisco Lopes da Cruz, was appointed deputy governor. Araújo was replaced in 1978, after he was openly critical of Indonesia.[166] In an interview with an Indonesian journalist in September 1980, Araújo said:

> The government is showing great attention [to Timor-Leste], but unfortunately it is not being directed to the East Timorese. It's like during the Portuguese colonial period: money came from Portugal earmarked for the East Timorese people only to be sent back to Portugal in the name of private individuals who had been sent by Portugal itself.

145. He advised the Indonesian Government to:

> [C]reate a normal situation as quickly as possible and put an end to the situation of terror, unchecked power, arbitrariness, of taking the law into one's own hands, lawlessness, economic monopolies and so on, similar to the time of Portuguese colonialism.[167]

146. Araújo's replacement, Guilherme Maria Gonçalves, was a member of the Apodeti Presidium, a signatory of the Balibó Declaration and a liurai. He had been a prominent supporter of the Indonesian annexation, having supplied many of the men who formed the East Timorese Partisan units that accompanied the invasion forces. His term as governor ended in 1982 after a dispute with the Regional Administrative Secretary (Sekretaris Wilayah Daerah, Sekwilda), Colonel Paul Kalangi, over the assignment of coffee tax payable to the local government.[168]

147. During these early years the civil administration faced many problems. It lacked personnel, communication was difficult owing to limited understanding of Indonesian by the East Timorese, and at the leadership level there were disputes between the Apodeti and UDT members working with Indonesia. A March 1983 Indonesian police report stated:

> Ever since the establishment of the PSTT [East Timor Provision Government], in appointing local government officials the Indonesians gave priority to former members of the Apodeti party [whether governor, district or sub-district administrator], while former members of the UDT party had to be content to be their assistants and deputies. However, many of the former UDT in administrative positions had poor relations with their superiors. This resulted in a muddled local administration.[169]

* The governor, as the executive and the chairman of the Provincial People's Representative Council (DPRD), is formally the highest authority in an Indonesian province.

148. In addition, civil administration was a secondary consideration for Indonesia in the early years of occupation when ABRI was fighting a major conflict with Fretilin troops.

149. The third governor, Mario Viegas Carrascalão, one of the founders of UDT, was appointed on 18 September 1982. He held the position for two terms, until June 1992.* Carrascalão was one of few Timorese with a university degree, and had been part of Indonesia's delegation at the UN from 1980-82.[170] He told the Commission that he was appointed at the "instruction" of General Moerdani.[171] During Carrascalão's period as Governor, Timor-Leste underwent a process of 'normalisation' within the Indonesian system. The administration was consolidated and Timor-Leste brought into line with most Indonesian provinces. In late 1988, President Soeharto signed Presidential Decree 62/1988, formally ending the sealing off of the territory and normalising its status as a province.[172] Mario Carrascalão told the Commission that it was only after this decision that the military lightened its control of the territory.[173]

150. After two five-year terms, Carrascalão was replaced in 1992 by Abilio Osorio Soares, a relatively minor figure in† Apodeti.[174] Soares's candidacy was supported by President Soeharto's son-in-law, Lieutenant Colonel Prabowo, then of Kopassus, which was deeply engaged in Timor-Leste at the time.[175] Abilio Soares was governor until the end of the Indonesian occupation.

151. The former UDT president, Francisco Lopes da Cruz, remained deputy governor until 1982. He was replaced by an Indonesian military officer, Brigadier-General A B Saridjo, who held the position until 1993.[176] He was then succeeded by another military officer, Lieutenant Colonel J Haribowo, who held the office until 1999. Both of the two last deputy governors were former Regional Administrative Secretaries (Sekwilda).

152. In 1987, Timor-Leste was divided into three administrative districts: the east, based in Baucau, the central district, based in Gleno, and the west, administered from Maliana (Bobonaro).‡ Each of these was administered by an assistant governor, who was often a military officer. [177]

Regional administrative secretary (Sekwilda)

153. Officially, the second in command in the provincial executive was the Regional Administrative Secretary (Sekretaris Wilayah Daerah, Sekwilda). In reality, as in Indonesian provinces, because the Regional Administrative Secretary had control of the provincial budget this was a very influential position. The position was formally appointed by the Minister of the Interior. Initially an East Timorese filled this post, although all but one of the subsequent appointees were military officers.* The Regional Administrative Secretary managed a secretariat which was responsible for the processing of projects.[178] An equivalent position also existed at the district level.

* Mario Carrascalão told the Commission that he resigned his position as Governor after the Santa Cruz massacre of November 1991. CAVR national public hearing on Women and the Conflict, April 2003.

† Abilio Soares was the younger brother of prominent Apodeti figure José Osorio Soares, who had been executed while in Fretilin custody in January 1976, on the south coast of Timor-Leste.

‡ These divisions varied from the five military divisions.

The People's Representative Council

154. The People's Representative Council is the legislative wing at each level of government in Indonesia. It exists at the national level (DPR), the provincial level (DPRD Level I) and the district level (DPRD Level II). In theory, the chair of the DPRD I is, with the Governor, the highest authority in the province. At the time of Indonesia's occupation of Timor-Leste, 80% of the seats in each level of the council were contested by three state-sanctioned parties.† ABRI automatically received the remaining 20% of the available seats.

155. The first DPRD in Timor-Leste was established by Law I/AD, 1976 on 4 August 1976, with Guilherme Gonçalves as its chair. It had 30 members, none of whom were elected. District level DPRDs were also established. The former Viqueque Vice District Administrator (Wakil Bupati), Armindo Soares Mariano, told the Commission that to be a member of the Assembly at the beginning of 1976, the only criteria was to be appointed and approved by the Regional Leadership Consultation‡ (Musyawarah Pimpinan Daerah, Muspida) consisting of the administrator and military commander at the district level. He added:

> At the time they [Muspida] would appoint members directly because there was no parliamentary institution yet, there were no general elections and the DPR had just been formed in 1982 [sic-the DPRD was formed in 1976]. At the district level the members were also appointed. Although there was a legislative institution, they were all appointed…everyone… this person came from this village and this sub-district. Let's say they needed 20 people for the DPRD in Viqueque at the time, so these 20 people would be taken from five sub-districts, four people each, and they were non-formal leaders, local liurai or sons of liurai with some prominence, so they were appointed and they sat there.[179]

---

* Regional Administrative Secretaries in Timor-Leste: José Bonifacio dos Reis Araújo (1976), J.R. Sinaga (ABRI), A.P.Kalangi (ABRI, 1980), Drs. Saridjo (ABRI), Antonio Freitas Parada, J. Haribowo (ABRI), Drs. Radjakarina Brahmana (ABRI).

† Golkar (Golongan Karya, Party of the Functional Groups), PDI (Partai Demokrasi Indonesia Indonesian Democratic Party), PPP (Partai Persatuan Pembangunan, United Development Party).

‡ Muspida was theoretically a consultative exchange mechanism to enable coordination between civil administration and local territorial police and military commands. In practice this was dominated by the military.

156. There is no record of the DPRD paying attention to the plight of the people of Timor-Leste during the famine of 1979-80.[180] However, in 1981 the economic exploitation of Timor-Leste by Indonesian officials inspired local parliamentarians to write a report to President Soeharto.[181] The report, signed by the oldest and youngest parliamentarians, expressed dismay at the economic regime the occupying power had created and its impact on ordinary East Timorese:

> The economic situation of the people of East Timor is passing through the most tragic phase since the beginning of the civil war... Considerable assistance for the purpose of building up the economy has been received…but the people of East Timor have not felt any benefit from their production of agricultural commodities such as coffee, sandalwood, candlenut, timber, copper and other produce. PT Denok is a special enterprise that has been located in East Timor to absorb all the main economic products of the province in return for its services to the Government of Indonesia…Five years after integration, most of the population is not yet able to enjoy stable living conditions.[182]

157. The report also complained of the misuse of development funds by military officers working in senior positions in the civil administration. The report accused the Regional Administrative Secretary, Colonel Paul Kalangi and his deputy, Captain A. Azis Hasyam, of plundering development funds allocated from the central government in Jakarta. The DPRD members claimed to know of expenditures of "hundreds of millions of rupiah" which they found to be "totally fictitious". The report also alleged that medicines sent as aid could be found in local shops in Dili, while hospitals continued to experience shortages. Finally, the members complained that to obtain jobs in the "provincial" government, the largest source of employment in the country, an applicant had to become an Indonesian citizen. Employment in the public service, then, was effectively available only to those who supported the occupation.* In an indication of how the military occupation dealt with human rights issues and even the mildest expressions of dissent, the parliamentarians who wrote the report were later arrested.[183]

158. General elections are held in Indonesia every five years. The first national election in Timor-Leste was held in 1982. 311,375 East Timorese voted. The results were clearly fraudulent and initially showed over 100% of registered voters casting their ballot for the government party, Golkar (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). As a result of the general election, 36 took the seats in the DPRD Level I, while eight members of this assembly represented Timor-Leste at the national DPR. In later years a degree of pluralism developed within the tightly controlled limits of the New Order. By 1995 the Timor-Leste DPRD I had grown to 45 seats. In that year's election Golkar won 20 seats; PDI five; PPP two; and ABRI received its allotted nine.

* This systematic discrimination in employment is similar to the New Order requirement that all government employees be Golkar party members who swear to protect the Pancasila ideology.

Table 4 - Composition of the Timor-Leste Provincial Assembly by Faction, 1980–1997
Year	PPP Faction	Golkar Faction	PDI Faction	ABRI Faction	Non-ABRI Faction	Total Assembly Members
1980	0	25	0	0	0	25
1981	0	24	0	0	0	24
1982*	0	32	0	4	0	36
1987*	0	34	2	9	0	45
1988	0	34	2	9	0	45
1989	0	33	2	9	0	44
1990	0	34	2	9	0	45
1991	0	34	2	9	0	45
1992*	2	29	5	9	0	45
1997*	1	30	5	9	0	45

general election year.*
Source: East Timor Provincial Parliament

Government administrative bodies: The national programme at the provincial level

159. Indonesian government administration during the New Order period was highly centralised. Most policy decisions were made in Jakarta as part of a structured national planning system. Indonesia implemented five-year plans (Rencana Pembangunan Lima Tahun, Repelita) as the basis of its fiscal and development policy. The Jakarta-based ministries, government departments and bureaus implemented policy through their counterpart offices at the provincial level. It took several years before this structure was operational in Timor-Leste, as Indonesia's primary focus was on military operations. The government also needed to recruit and train government functionaries. From the outset of the Indonesian occupation, Timor-Leste was controlled by the military. During the early years of the occupation, unlike any other territory in Indonesia, the Department of Defence and Security established teams that directly administered Timor-Leste. Timor-Leste was passed to the Department of Home Affairs in 1978, with the administration conforming to normal Indonesia practice.* However, the military retained ultimate control of the administration. The military held key positions in the civil administration and wielded effective veto power over appointments. This gave it immense power, primarily over the province's economy, but also over local policy.

* Even after its administration was brought into line with ordinary Indonesian practice, Timor-Leste remained a special case. Timor-Leste got a special budget directly from the central government. Also, it received extensive special funds through a presidential instruction (Instruksi Presiden, Inpres). In addition, in the national budget there was a special budget line for Timor-Leste (budget item 16).

160. Once formal integration had taken place in July 1976, the Indonesian military began to implement standards in line with those in place in Indonesian structures. On 14 August 1976 the Ministry of Defence and Security made Timor-Leste a domestic military operation by establishing the East Timor Regional Defence and Security Command (Kodahankam Timor Timur) operating beneath the Ministry of Defence and Security.[184] Ministry documents stated that:

> The East Timor Regional Defence and Security Command was established with the aim of laying the foundation for the Guidance and Development of Defence and Security in East Timor during the "transitional period" which lasts until the end of the Second Development Plan [April 1979], along with implementing the Guidance and Development of the National Defence and Security Policy.[185]

161. The subsection on ABRI in this chapter discusses this process in more detail. The military established a territorial structure that introduced the system of military and police commands and posts that paralleled the civil administration down to the village level.

162. During the first few years of the Indonesian occupation, Jakarta directly administered Timor-Leste. In 1976-77 the Central Coordinating Team for Education and Culture (Tim Koordinasi Pusat Pendidikan dan Kebudayaan) was responsible for educational programming and coordination. It reflected the early focus of the occupying regime on language training to assimilate the East Timorese into the Indonesian state.[186] On the ground in Timor-Leste, it functioned through an Assistant Team for Education and Culture (Tim Pendamping Pendidikan dan Kebudayaan).

163. By 1978, a more broadly based team had been established to handle administration. This was the Central Development Implementation Team (Tim Pelaksana Pembangunan Pusat, TPPP). Staffed by personnel from government agencies in Jakarta, it was chaired by General Benny Moerdani. It worked through the Regional Development Implementation Team (Tim Pelaksana Pembangunan Daerah, TPPD) which was formally headed by the governor, but actually under the control of Colonel Paul Kalangi, then Regional Administrative Secretary.[187] Most sectors of the administration, such as security and order, political affairs, information, communications, population control and settlements, labour, family reunions and religion were under the direct supervision of the TPPP in Jakarta. The local government was responsible only for five sectors: primary education, health, public works, agriculture and social welfare.[188]

164. After 1978, when administrative control of Timor-Leste formally passed from the Department of Defence to the Ministry of Home Affairs, Indonesia established more administrative units. Its focus was on education and public information. The first operational government unit was a preliminary education office which opened in 1978. In addition to language, another early focus was information, and in 1978 the Timor

Department of Information installed a television transmitter at Marabia in the hills to the south just outside Dili. The department prioritised the distribution of television sets throughout Timor-Leste to ensure broadcasts could be watched.[189]

165. Also in the late 1970s a preliminary Regional Planning and Development Board (Badan Perencanaan Pembangunan Daerah, Bappeda) began to function. It focused on infrastructure, primarily building schools and teacher training. In 1979 the Department of Education was formed, thus establishing a separate process from the Regional Office of the Department of Education and Culture for the Province of East Timor (Kantor Wilayah Departemen Pendidikan dan Kebudayaan Provinsi Timor Timur).[190] When the third national five-year plan was launched in April 1979, Timor-Leste was partially incorporated into the national planning mechanism. At the start of the fourth national five-year plan in 1984, Timor-Leste became an integral part of Indonesian policy planning and implementation.

166. During the early 1980s, Indonesia developed conventional administrative structures in Timor-Leste. It established the two types of office ordinarily present at the provincial level – regional branches (kantor wilayah, kanwil) of central government departments based in Jakarta, and operational units (dinas) administered directly by the provincial government. The regional bureaus and agencies are important offices in the Indonesian system of government, being vertically integrated with their national offices and responsible for direct implementation of policies, for example taxation and industrial policy.[*191] In Timor-Leste, these agencies were mostly headed by military officers seconded into the civil administration (dikaryakan)[†] and predominantly staffed by non-Timorese personnel.[192] Among these regional branches was the powerful Regional Development Planning Board (Badan Perencanaan Pembangunan Daerah, Bappeda). As the primary coordinating board for government projects, this Board allocated lucrative projects to business, the military and government officials.[193]

167. The other group of offices administered directly by the provincial government were operational units called dinas,[‡] some of which had branches at the district level. These had a higher proportion of East Timorese staff, sometimes up to 60%.[194] Despite

* The "vertical" regional bureaus and agencies under the office of national cabinet ministers included Mining and Energy, Agriculture, Co-operatives, Education and Culture, Industry, Transmigration, Trade, Health, Forestry, Transportation, Information, Public Works, Social Affairs, Employment, Rural Development, State Ideology, and Family Planning (BKKBN). Other branches included Regional Logistics, the Regional Development Planning Board (Bappeda), the Provincial Inspector, Statistics and Social and Political Affairs.

† Dikaryakan officers were active military officers seconded to the civilian administration as part of ABRI's 'dual function' doctrine that gave it a role in politics and development, as well as defence.See paragraps 64 - 135, above). At the end of the occupation, "dikaryakan" officers filled 140 key positions in the government of Timor-Leste, including the leadership of 19 provincial administrative offices, the Deputy Governor position, and two assistant governor posts. The Regional Administrative Secretary (Sekwilda), the head of Social and Political Affairs (Kakansospol), and the Director of the Regional Development Planning Board (Bappeda) were all military personnel. At the district level, the military controlled 64 posts, including three of the 13 District Administrator (Bupati) positions. See 1998 captured military documents, "Rekapitulasi Karyawan ABRI yang bertugas di eksekutif + legislatif", pp. 1617.

‡ Dinas units included Agriculture, Animal Husbandry, Education and Culture, Fisheries, Forestry, Local Revenue, Mining, Plantations, Public Health, Public Works, Roads and Traffic, Social Affairs, and Tourism.

provincial administrative responsibility for these operational units, a high degree of overlap between provincial offices and regional branches of central offices meant that overall local government was "a mere extension of the central government".[195]

District and sub-district administration

168. District-level administration was headed by a district administrator (Bupati) appointed by the governor. The district administrator was responsible for coordinating the sub-districts (kecamatan) within that district. Timor-Leste's sparse settlement, coupled with the relatively high number of district and sub-district administrative divisions, meant that it was an over-administered province.

169. Government administration at a district level consisted primarily of dinas sub-offices. For example, there was a dinas for each unit of local administration - employees, public services and infrastructure. Among the dinas at the district level there was a relatively high proportion of Timorese staff, roughly 60%, though most of these held lower-ranking jobs.[196] After Timor-Leste was sub-divided into three administrative regions in 1987, an assistant governor who coordinated the district administrators was assigned to each region.

170. In the early years of the occupation, very few qualified candidates were available for public service, and this affected the appointment of many positions. An account by the former district administrator of Lautém during the early years of the occupation indicates the difficulties the military faced in putting together an administration:

> Public servants from the Portuguese era were immediately appointed. It had to be approved by ABRI…Those of us who came down [from the hills] early and had been public servants were immediately appointed, whether Fretilin, Apodeti or UDT…just appoint him...But every sub-district had a camat [sub-district administrator]. There was staff from [the] central government to assist us. They were also ABRI…They assisted us because we didn't speak Indonesian.[197]

171. The first district administrators were all either members of, or affiliated to, the Apodeti or UDT political parties. Some, like Claudio Vieira, were former Partisan members. Appointments seem to have been based on a mixture of desperation for skilled personnel and the military concern for control and compliance. Other key appointments, such as that of the sub-district administrator (camat), were made by the district administrator in conjunction with the local Regional Leadership Deliberation* (Musyawarah Pimpinan Daerah, Muspida).[198] The former district administrator of Viqueque, Armindo Soares Mariano, described the procedure to the Commission:

> It was the Bupati [district administrator] together with the Muspida [regional leadership deliberation] who made the recommendation. At that time there were nothing like proper criteria being applied. So the Bupati submitted the name. It was his suggestion and was signed by the Dandim [District Military Commander], who was the chairman of the Muspida. The Bupati also signed it. Then the name was sent to the provincial level, and a Governor's Decree issued [to appoint him].[199]

* At the district level, the district administrator (bupati), sub-regional military commander (danrem) and police chief (kapolres) met in the regional leadership deliberation (muspida).

172. Over the duration of the Indonesian occupation, military officers filled some of the district administrator positions, although East Timorese tended to be appointed to the position, as was the governor.

Table 5 - District administrators by origin and affiliation, 1976–1999

District	Dates	District Administrator	Party	Origin	Ethnicity
Aileu	May 1976 – 1989	Abel Dos Santos F.	UDT	-	Timorese
	1989 – 1994	Fernão Verdial	-	Ainaro	Timorese
	1994	Waluyo	ABRI	-	Indonesian
	1994 – 1999	Suprapto Tarman	ABRI	-	Indonesian
Ainaro	May 1976 – 1984	Moises Da Silva Barros	Apodeti	Ainaro	Timorese
		Letkol. H Hutagalung	ABRI	-	Indonesian
		José A B dos Reis Araújo	Apodeti	Ainaro	Timorese
	1994 – 1999	Norberto de Araújo	Apodeti	Ainaro	Timorese
	1999	Evaristo D. Sarmento	UDT	Maubisse	Timorese
Ambeno	Mei 1976 – 1984	Jaime dos R de Oliveira	UDT	Same	Timorese
	1984 – 1989	Letkol. Imam Sujuti	ABRI	-	Indonesian
		Vicente Tilman PD	Apodeti	Viqueque	Timorese
	1994 – 1999	Filomeno Mesquita	Apodeti	Ambeno	Timorese

Baucau	May 1976 – 1982	Abel da Costa Belo	Apodeti	Baucau	Timorese
	1982 – 1987	Kol. I Gusti Ngurah O.	ABRI	-	Indonesian
	1987 – 1992	Drs. Herman Sediono	ABRI	-	Indonesian
	1992 – 1999	Virgilio Dias Marçal	UDT	Baucau	Timorese
Bobonaro	May 1976 – 1984	João Da Costa Tavares	UDT	Bobonaro	Timorese
	1984 – 1989	João Da Costa Tavares	UDT	Bobonaro	Timorese
	1989 – 1992(?)	Mariano Lopes da Cruz	UDT	Manatuto	Timorese
	1992(?) – 1999	Guilherme dos Santos	UDT	Bobonaro	Timorese
Covalima	May 1977 – c. 1981	Américo da Costa Nunes	Apodeti	Bobonaro	Timorese
	c. 1981 – 1989	Rui Emiliano T Lopes	UDT	Suai	Timorese
		Rui Emiliano T Lopes	UDT	Suai	Timorese
	1994 – 1999	Drs. Herman Sediono	ABRI	-	Indonesian
Dili	May 1976 – 1984	Mario Sanches da Costa	eks-Fretilin	Laleia	Timorese
	1984 – 1989	Raimundo Sarmento	UDT	Manatuto	Timorese
		Armindo Soares Mariano	Apodeti	Viqueque	Timorese
	1994 – 1999	Domingos MD Soares	-	Manatuto	Timorese
Ermera	May 1976 - 1984	Tomas Aquino Gonçalves	Apodeti	Atsabae	Timorese
	1984–1989	Tomas Aquino Gonçalves	Apodeti	Atsabae	Timorese
		Letkol. Inf. Hidayat	ABRI	-	Indonesian
	1994–1999	Constantino Soares	-	Ermera	Timorese

Liquiçá	May 1977–1984	Francisco dos Santos Ribeiro	Apodeti	Liquiçá	Timorese
	1984 – 1989	Jaime Remedios de Oliveira	UDT	Same	Timorese
		Gaspar Sarmento	UDT	Liquiçá	Timorese
	1994 – 1999	Leoneto Martins	Apodeti	Maubara	Timorese
Lautém	May 1976 – 1985	Claudio Vieira	Apodeti	Moro	Timorese
	1985 – 1990	Letkol. Hendrikus	ABRI	-	Indonesian
	1990 – 1995	José Valente	Fretilin	Lore	Timorese
	1995 – 1999	Edmundo Conceicão Da Silva	Apodeti	Moro	Timorese
Manatuto	May 1976 – 1984	Luis Maria da Silva	Fretilin	Manatuto	Timorese
	1984 – 1989	Elias Enes Carceres	Kota	Manatuto	Timorese
		Abilio José Osorio	Apodeti	Laclubar	Timorese
	1994 – 1999	Soares Vidal Doutel Sarmento	Apodeti	Manatuto	Timorese
Manufahi	May 1976 – 1984	Alexandrino Borromeo	Apodeti	Manufahi	Timorese
	1984 – 1989	Tomas Correia	UDT	Manatuto	Timorese
		Nazario Andrade	UDT	Manatuto	Timorese
	1995 – 1999	Nazario Andrade	UDT	Manatuto	Timorese
Viqueque	May 1976 – 1984	Jaime dos Santos Carvalho	Apodeti	Viqueque	Timorese
	1984 – 1989	Mayor Syarif Hidayat	ABRI	-	Indonesian
	1989 – 1994	Y. Hendro S.	ABRI	-	Indonesian
	1995 – 1999	I Ketut Lunca	ABRI	-	Indonesian
	1999	Martinho Fernandes	Apodeti	Viqueque	Timorese

Source: CAVR research and compilation

Village-level administration

173. An Indonesian village is administered by a village head (Kepala Desa), who coordinates with two subsidiary neighbourhood administrative units (Rukun Tetangga, RT and Rukun Warga, RW). In Portuguese times, the East Timorese village (suco) was often administered by the local king (liurai). During the Indonesian occupation, as was the case in most of Indonesia, the hereditary traditional leader was often someone imposed by the state.[200]

174. After major displacements and resettlement of most of the population between 1978 and the early 1980s, Indonesia began economically and socially to develop the villages of Timor-Leste. The Institute for Community Sustainability (Lembaga Ketahanan Masyarakat Desa, LKMD) was created by the Ministry of Home Affairs (Mendagri) in 1980 by Minister of Home Affairs' Decree 25, 1980, and in 1982 Indonesia established this organisation in Timor-Leste. The organisation was staffed by villagers who were tasked with implementing state development goals at the village level.

175. Another significant body of village administration was the Village Cooperative Unit (Koperasi Unit Desa, KUD). This was a farming cooperative that worked with state monopolies to sell farm produce. Although its stated goal was for the state to guarantee farmers with an income and market, in practice these good intentions were often abused by the various state monopolies. This was the case in Timor-Leste, where the Village Cooperative Unit was used to purchase coffee from farmers at prices far below market rates, a practice which the military-backed coffee monopoly PT Denok profited from extensively (see extensive discussion in Vol. III, Part 7.9: Economic and Social Rights). The Indonesian economist, Professor Mubyarto, commented on the impact this had on the East Timorese coffee industry and on the credibility of the civil administration:

> [T]he stagnation of the coffee economy is due mainly to the arrangement by which private monopolies buy coffee through the official Village Unit Cooperatives system. In the eyes of the general public the private monopoly which operates through the village cooperatives diminishes the government's credibility, especially in relation to its capabilities (or even its integrity) in village development.[201]

176. Military commanders and high-level administration officials such as the governor benefited from their control of the coffee industry. Former governor Mario Carrascalão described the division of the huge profits reaped at the expense of East Timorese farmers, and how these "coffee fee" funds were divided between district- and provincial-level military and civilian officials - the governor, the state prosecutor, the military commander and others.[202]

177. In 1984 a military-run development programme called "ABRI Enters the Village" (ABRI Masuk Desa, AMD) was launched.[203] ABRI contended that this was a valuable contribution to village development by territorial troops, whereas critics of the programme saw it as yet another way for the military to keep the population under surveillance.

178. The degree of control by the military over local administration and the economy, as well as security matters, left many East Timorese deeply embittered, including some of those who had initially supported the Indonesian intervention and occupation. A team of Indonesian economists described the impact of the military on the province's economy:

> Because of the military's excessive interference in economic and development matters, local people tend not to have much respect for them. Indeed, some among the East Timorese elite detest the military because they are held responsible for the region's economic stagnation.[204]

The civil service

179. Indonesia built a large civil service in Timor-Leste, nearly twice as large in relation to population than the national civil service.[*] In 1981 there were 780 public servants. By 1997 there were over 33,602.[205] Of these, 18,000 were in the districts, and the remainder, 15,300, were in Dili. Many of these were teachers and health workers. Many civil servants in Timor-Leste were recruited from Indonesia. They generally held more powerful positions than their East Timorese counterparts. East Timorese applicants to government positions had to acquire Indonesian citizenship. They were typically treated with suspicion and were always screened to prove their loyalty to the Indonesian state and its doctrine, Pancasila. A special division of ABRI known as the Tactical Command (Komando Taktis, Kotis) conducted the screenings.[†] The deep suspicion of East Timorese personnel indicated by this process was a factor in their lack of opportunity to rise to higher levels of the civil service.[206]

180. The Indonesian civil administration in Timor-Leste was, for most of the occupation, subservient to the military administration and its structures. The military dominated all aspects of administration in the early years of occupation when pacification of the Resistance was the first priority and full-scale military operations were underway. As this situation eased in the late 1970s, the military failed completely to destroy the armed resistance, and its preoccupation with controlling the civilian population resulted in the predominance of military administrative structures all the way to sub-district and village levels. Military personnel also held key positions within the civil administration itself. Many used these positions for their own financial advantage. The results were dual administrations, over-administration and a stifling impact on the economy and development. The civil administration was also compromised by its closeness to ABRI.

* Civil servants were 3.09% of the population, versus 2.12% at a national level (Timor Timur Dalam Angka, Biro Pusat Statistik [East Timor in Figures, Central Bureau of Statistics], Dili, 1993).

† Tactical command officers could be found at every structural level of the military command and were responsible for daily intelligence and population surveillance. In the late 1970s they had responsibility for screening people who had come down from the Mountains. Anyone wanting to apply for a work permit, travel permit, identity card, or even a marriage certificate, first had to complete a 15-page questionnaire before the tactical command officer. The questionnaire covered the individual's personal life in great detail, going back generations. It also covered someone's political affiliations, attitudes and reactions to UDT's August 1975 "coup", Indonesia's December 1975 invasion, integration, Fretilin, and more. The answers were legally binding, and "incorrect statements" were punishable.

181. The New Order regime produced a highly centralised process of government based in Jakarta which meant that outlying provinces such as Timor-Leste were removed from policy decisions and lacked direction over their own future. This was exacerbated in the militarised context of conflict in the territory. This regime also politicised civil administration, and this was further entrenched in the context of Timor-Leste where East Timorese with active pro-integration backgrounds were favoured over others. In addition, Indonesian authorities' distrust of East Timorese resulted in posts, particularly senior ones, within the civil administration being dominated by Indonesians brought to the territory.

182. The civil administration in Timor-Leste was seriously flawed and compromised. In the context of continuing conflict and a heavily militarised society for the 24 years of Indonesian occupation, its effectiveness as a professional institution serving the people of the territory was limited. This in itself obstructed the protection and promotion of human rights of the East Timorese people.

183. Furthermore, at the end of 1998 and during 1999, Indonesian public servants were heavily politicised in terms of self-determination issues, both before and after the signing of 5 May Agreement. The government budget was used to support pro-autonomy campaigns, including allocations for militia activities (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict).

End notes

1. Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, pp. 7-17; James Dunn, East Timor: Rough Passage to Independence, Longueville Books, NSW, 2003, p. 254; Robert Lowry, The Armed Forces of Indonesia, Allen and Unwin, St. Leonards, NSW, 1996, pp. 315-316.
2. Most of the information in this section is taken from Ulf Sundhaussen, The Road to Power: Indonesian Military Politics 1945–1967, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 1982, pp. 1-50.
3. Ian MacFarling, The Dual Function of the Indonesian Armed Forces, Australian Defence Studies Center, University of New South Wales, NSW, 1996, p. 114.
4. Robert Cribb, "How Many Deaths? Problems in the Statistics of Massacre in Indonesia (1965–1966) and East Timor (1975–1980)" in Ingrid Wessel and Georgia Wimhöfer (eds.), Violence in Indonesia, Abera Verlas, Hamburg, Germany 2001, pp. 82-98.
5. Dunn, p. 159.
6. Lowry, p. 135.
7. MacFarling, p. 87.
8. Lowry, p. 20.
9. Ibid, p. 94.
10. Ibid, p. 110.
11. Ulf Sundhaussen, "The Inner Contradiction of the Suharto Regime: A starting point for a withdrawal to the barracks" in David Bourchier & John Legge (eds.), Democracy in Indonesia 1950s and 1990s, Centre for Southeast Asian Sudies Monash University, Victoria, 1994, pp. 277-278.
12. Harold Crouch, "The Trend to Authoritarianism: The Post-1945 Period" in Harry Aveling (ed.), The Development of Indonesian Society, University of Queensland Press, St. Lucia, 1979, p. 197.
13. Harold Crouch, The Army and Politics in Indonesia, Cornell University Press, Ithaca, 1978, p. 274.
14. Crouch, The Army and Politics…, p. 280.
15. Department of State, Annual Report on Military Expenditures, 1998, submitted to the Committee on Appropriations of the U.S. Senate and the Committee on Appropriations of the U.S. House of Representatives, 19 February 1999.

16. Douglas Kammen, "Notes on the Transformation of the East Timor Military Command and its Implications for Indonesia", Indonesia 67, April 1999, Cornell University South East Asia Program (SEAP), Ithaca, pp. 64; Lowry, p. 23.
17. Crouch, The Army and Politics, p. 273.
18. MacFarling, p. 100.
19. Ibid, p. 130.
20. Ibid, p. 145.
21. Crouch, The Army and Politics, pp. 275-77.
22. Yusuf Wanandi, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004; Vol. III, Part 7.9: Economic and Social Rights.
23. Crouch, The Army and Politics, p. 299.
24. Ibid, p. 300.
25. Lowry, pp. 47-48.
26. Arnold C Brackman, Indonesia: Suharto's Road, American-Asian Educational Exchange, New York, 1973, p. 29.
27. MacFarling, p. 139.
28. Ibid, p. 92.
29. Keputusan Presiden 19/1969 [Presidential Decree 19/1969], 3 March 1969, cited in MacFarling, p. 92.
30. Lowry, pp. 70-72.
31. Ken Conboy, Kopassus: Inside Indonesia's Special Forces, Equinox Publishing, Jakarta, 2003, p. 197.
32. Pusat Sejarah dan Tradisi TNI, Markas Besar TNI, Sejarah TNI Jilid IV (1966–1983) [Center for TNI History and Tradition, TNI Main Headquarters, TNI History Volume IV (1966–1983)], Jakarta, 2000, p. 145; Conboy, p. 199.
33. Surat Keputusan Menhankam/Pangab No. Skep/1063/VIII/1975 [Decree of Minister of Defence and Security/Armed Forces Commander-in-chief No. Skep/1063/VIII/1975] signed by General M Panggabean.
34. Surat Keputusan [Decree] No. Skep/1063/VIII/1975.
35. Ibid.
36. Surat Keputusan Menhankam No. KEP/03/II/1977 tentang Pokok-Pokok Organisasi dan Prosedur Komando Daerah Pertahanan dan Keamanan Timor-Timur (Kodahankam Tim-Tim) [Decree of Minister of Defence and Security, No. KEP/03/II/1977 re. Organisational Principles and Procedures of Regional Defence and Security Command of East Timor], 18 February 1977.
37. Surat Keputusan Menteri Pertahanan dan Keamanan/Panglima ABRI dan Menteri Dalam Negeri, No. KEP/35/X/1976 – No. 261, Tahun 1976 tentang Pembentukan Organisasi dan Tatakerja Staf Koordinasi Kewilayahan Provinsi Timor Timur [Decree of Minister of Defence and Security/Armed Forces Commander-in-chief and Minister of the Interior, No. KEP/35/X/1976 – No. 261, 1976 re. Organisational Formation and Coordination of Staff Management for Territory of East Timor Province], 26 October 1976.
38. Telegram Menteri Pertahanan dan Keamanan/Panglima ABRI, Nomor STR/969/1978 tentang Persiapan Likuidasi Kodahankam Tim-Tim [Telegram of Minister of Defence and Security/Armed Forces Commander-in-chief, No. STR/969/1978 re. Preparations for Liquidation of the East Timor Regional Defence and Security Command], 11 September 1978.
39. Jiwa Atmadja, TNI Kembali ke Jatidiri: Profesionalisme Kodam IX/Udayana [TNI Returns to Its True Self: Professionalism of Regional Military Command IX/Udayana], Penerbit Tabloid Mingguan Taksu, Denpasar, 2000, p. 65.
40. Surat Keputusan Menteri Pertahanan dan Keamanan, Nomor KEP/23/X/1978 tentang Normalisasi Penyelenggaran Pertahanan dan Keamanan di Daerah Timor-Timur dan Pembubaran Kodahankam Tim-Tim, [Decree of Minister of Defence and Security Nomor KEP/23/X/1978 re. Normalization of Implementation of Defence and Security in East Timor Region and Dismantling of East Timor Regional Defence and Security Command], 12 October 1978.
41. Kolakops Timor Timur dalam Gambar dan Peristiwa Tahun 1992–1993 [East Timor Operations Implementation Command in Pictures and Events of Year 1992–1993], Dili, 1993, p. 182.

42. Tapol, “East Timor Under The Indonesian Jackboot, An Analysis of Indonesian Army Documents,” Occasional Report No. 26, October 1998; http://tapol.gn.apc.org/reports/REast.htm at 18 June 2005.
43. Document sent by Sub-regional Military Commander (Danrem) 164/Wiradarma to the District Military Commanders 1627 to 1639 (Dandim): TR Dan Kolak Ops No. TR/661/IX/1983, 28 September 1983, as contained, e.g., in the court file of David Dias Ximenes (No. 22/PID/B/84/PN.DIL).
44. Departemen Pertahanan dan Keamanan, Petunjuk Pelaksanaan No. JUKLAK/01/IV/1979 tentang Kegiatan Bidang Operasi Tempur Tahun 1979–1980 [Department of Defence and Security, Implementation Guidelines No. JUKLAK/01/IV/1979 re. Field Activities of Combat Operations for the Year 1979–1980], 23 April 1979.
45. Surat Keputusan Pangab No. KEP/17/P/IX/1984 [Decree of Armed Forces Commander-in-Chief No. KEP/17/P/IX/1984], 19 September, 1984, cited in 35 Tahun Dharma Bakti Kostrad [35 Years of Army Strategic Reserve Command’s Service], p. 84.
46. 35 Tahun Dharma Bakti Kostrad, p. 91.
47. Kammen, “Notes on the Transformation of the East Timor Military Command and its Implication for Indonesia,” Indonesia 73, April 2002, pp. 61-76.
48. Kepala Tim Analis Intelijen to Panglima Kolakops, Memo Intelijen No. R/63/MI/VIII/1992 [Team head for intelligence analysis to commander-in-chief of operational implementation command (Kolakops), Intelligence Memo No. R/63/MI/VIII/1992], 11 August 1992, cited in Samuel Moore, “The Indonesian Military’s Last Years in East Timor. An Analysis of Its Secret Documents”, Indonesia 72, October 2001, Cornell University South East Asia Program (SEAP), Ithaca, pp. 28-29.
49. Moore, p. 28.
50. Ibid, pp. 26-29.
51. Tapol, Occasional Report No. 26.
52. Douglas Kammen, “The Trouble with Normal: The Indonesian Military, Paramilitaries and the Final Solution in East Timor”, in Benedict R. O’G. Anderson (ed.), Violence and the State in Suharto’s Indonesia, Cornell University South East Asia Program (SEAP), Ithaca, NY, 2001, p. 11.
53. Komando Daerah Militer IX/Udayana, Komando Resort Militer 164, Rekapitulasi Kekuatan Personnel Organik dan Penugasan Posisi [Recapitulation of the Capacity of Organic Personnel and Position of their Tasks], November 1997; Komando Daerah Militer IX/Udayana, Komando Resort Militer 164, Rekapitulasi Kekuatan Personil Organik dan Penugasan [Recapitulation of the Capacity of Organic Personnel and their Tasks], July 1998.
54. Tapol, Occasional Report No. 26.
55. Ibid.
56. Catriona Drew, “The East Timor Story: International Law on Trial”, European Journal of International Law, 1990–2004, Academy of European Law, New York.
57. Surat Menhankam/Panglima TNI kepada Presiden RI tentang Perkembangan Lanjut Situasi Timtim dan Saran Kebijaksanaan Penanganannya [Letter of Minister of Defence and Security/TNI Commander-in-Chief to the President of the Republic of Indonesia re. Continuing Developments of the Situation in East Timor and Policy Suggestions for Handling It], No. R/511/P-01/03/14, signed by General Wiranto, 6 September 1999.
58. Direktif Panglima TNI [Directive of the TNI Commander-in-Chief], No. 02/P/IX/1999, signed by General Wiranto, not dated but apparently issued on 6 September 1999.
59. Letter R/544/P/IX/1999, signed by General Wiranto, 20 September 1999.
60. Tomas Gonçalves, testimony given to the CAVR, National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
61. Bishop Belo, speech at the signing of the Pact of National Unity during the campaign preparations for the 2001 elections for the Constituent Assembly, July 2001, UNDP Timor-Leste Civic Education archives.
62. Mario Carrascalão and Tomas Gonçalves, testimonies given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
63. José Ramos-Horta, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
64. Xanana Gusmão, João Carrascalão and Mari Alkatiri, testimonies given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
65. Mario Carrascalão and Mari Alkatiri, testimonies given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003

66. Tomas Gonçalves, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003; CAVR interview with Tomas Gonçalves, inaugural Apodeti member, Dili, 23 October 2003.
67. Interview with Tomas Gonçalves, inaugural Apodeti member, Dili, 23 October 2003; Conboy, p. 206.
68. HRVD Statements 4599; 2491.
69. SCU interview with Tomas Gonçalves, 8 August 2000, p. 4.
70. SCU interview with Tomas Gonçalves, 8 August 2000, p. 5; Conboy, pp. 216-218.
71. Tomas Gonçalves, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
72. HRVD Statement 1689; CAVR interview with Manuel de Oliveira, Alas, 10 October, 2003.
73. SCU interview with Tomas Gonçalves, 8 August 2000, p. 5; HRVD Statements 1108-01; 1123-01; 1794-01; 4470-01; 2525-01; 6410-08; 1748-03; 5018-01; 3551-01.
74. T Sherman interview with João Viegas Carrascalão, 13 March 1996, pp. 128-129, 132.
75. Jill Jolliffe, East Timor: Nationalism and Colonialism, St. Lucia, Queensland: University of Queensland Press, 1978, p. 164; Helen Hill, Gerakan Pembebasan Nasional Timor Lorosae [Timor Lorosae Movement for National Freedom], Yayasan HAK & Sahe Institute for Liberation, Dili, 2000, p. 195.
76. SCU interview with Tomas Gonçalves, 8 August 2000; Conboy, p. 246.
77. Dr Asvi Warman Adam, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
78. Tomas Gonçalves, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict, 15–18 December 2003.
79. CAVR interview with Manuel de Oliveira, Alas, 10 October 2003; CAVR interview with Rui Lopes, Camenassa (Covalima), 31 October 2003; CAVR interview with Tomas Gonçalves, Dili, 23 October 2003; Olandino Luis Maia Guterres, Partisan, written statement to CAVR, 22 February 1999.
80. Geoffrey Robinson, East Timor 1999: Crimes against Humanity – A Report Commissioned by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), Los Angeles, UCLA, July 2003, p. 160, Submission to CAVR, April 2004.
81. CAVR interview with Manuel de Oliveira, Alas, 10 October, 2003; CAVR interview with Bonifacio Guterres, Baucau, 10 May 2003; for opposing view see CAVR interview with Antonio do Rosario, Hera, 23 June 2003.
82. CAVR interview with Miguel Sanches, Maubara (Liquiçá), 2003.
83. Tapol, Occasional Report No. 26, October 1998, p. 4.
84. SCU interview with Tomas Gonçalves, 8 August, 2000, p. 21.
85. Kodam IX Udayana/Korem 164, Rekapitulasi PA/BA/TA ABRI Putra Daerah Timor Timur [Regional Military Command IX/Udayana, Sub-regional Military Command 164, Recapitulation of ABRI Officers, Soldiers and Non-Commissioned Officers, Native Sons of East Timor], Dili, July 1998.
86. Conboy, Kopassus, 269.
87. Ibid, p. 272.
88. HRVD Statements 2281; 0706; 2130; 1619; 1632; 1633.
89. CAVR interview with Antonio Babo Calsinha, 28 May 2003.
90. CAVR interview with Geraldo da Cruz, Dili, 28 June 2004; HRVD Statements 3039; 0643; CAVR interview with Bonifacio Guterres, Baucau, 10 May 2003.
91. CAVR interview with Geraldo da Cruz, Dili, 28 June 2004; HRVD Statement 0663.
92. CAVR interview with Sebastião da Cunha, Manatuto, 12 May 2004; CAVR interview with Geraldo da Cruz, Dili, 28 June 2004.
93. Korem 164, Seksi-Intel, Rencana Penyusunan Kembali Rakyat Terlatih [Sub-regional Military Command 164, Intelligence Section, The Plan for Rearrangement of Trained Civilians].
94. HRVD Statements 7735-09.
95. HRVD Statements 7081-03; 7059-01.
96. General Prosecutor of the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET), Indictment against Joni Marques et al, p. 6; transcript of Joni Marques defence, Case 9-PID.C.G/2000, p. 38.
97. CAVR interview with João da Silva, 14 June 2003.

98. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OCHCR submission to CAVR, p. 84.
99. See "Tinjauan Strategis Pembangunan Kekuatan dan Kemampuan Komando Antar Resort Kepolisian 15.3 Timor Timur Tahun 1978–1983," Dili, March 1978, Appendix C, p. 4.
100. Daerah Pertahanan Keamanan Komando Antar Resort Kepolisian 15.3 Timor Timur, Tinjauan Strategis Pembangunan Kekuatan dan Kemampuan Komando Antar Resort Kepolisian 15.3 Timor Timur Tahun 1978–1983 [Regional Defence and Security Command Among Police Stations 15.3 in East Timor, Strategic Observation on the Development of Command Strength and Ability Among 15.3 Police Stations in East Timor, 1978–1983], Appendix C, p. 4, Dili, March 1978.
101. Dinas Penerangan Korps Marinir, Korps Marinir TNI AL, 1970–2000 [Marine Corps Bureau of Information, Marine Corps of the Indonesian National Army, 1970–2000], Jakarta, 2000, p. 219; CAVR interview with Aleixo Ximenes, Dili, 2 February, 2004.
102. Daerah Pertahanan Keamanan Komando Antara Resort Kepolisian 15.3 Timor Timur, Laporan Komando Komtarres 15.3 Timor Timur Dalam Rangka Kunjungan Kapolri Beserta Rombongan Ke Daerah Operasi Timor Timur [Regional Defence and Security Command Among Police Stations 15.3 in East Timor, Report of the East Timor Komtarres Command 15.3 in the Framework of the Visit by the Chief of Police and His Entourage to the Operational Region of East Timor], Annexe 17, June 1978
103. Komando Daerah Militer XVI/Udayana, Komando Resort Militer 164/Wira Dharma, Instruksi Operasi No. INSOP/03/II/1982, [Regional Military Command XVI/Udayana, Sub-regional Military Command 164/Wira Dharma, Operational Instruction No. INSOP/03/II/1982], 1982, p. 5. [Note: with no previous record of Wanra, this document most likely refers to the Hansip serving in a Wanra capacity.]
104. Ibid, pp. 7-8.
105. Ibid, p. 6.
106. Instruction Manual No. JUKNIS/06/IV/1982, Village Guidance Officer (Babinsa)/Village Guidance Team (TPD) activity in developing and phasing out Trained People's Resistance Forces, cited in Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, pp. 223-227.
107. Instruction Manual No. JUKNIS/06/IV/1982, p. 223; Operational Instruction No. INSOP/03/II/1982, p. 5; Lowry, p. 111.
108. HRVD Statement 0626-02; 0796.
109. CAVR interview with Marcelino Soares, 8 July 2003; Budiardjo and Liong, p. 134; HRVD Statements 6018-05; 0429-05.
110. Dinas Penerangan Korps [Marine Corps Bureau of Information], p. 219.
111. HRVD Statements 7273; 3113-02; 7037.
112. Lowry, p. 111.
113. Ibid, p. 112.
114. Report of the Indonesian commission of inquiry into atrocities committed in East Timor in 1999 (Komisi Penyelidikan Pelanggaran HAM), Jakarta, 31 January 2000, para 38.
115. CAVR interview with José Sales dos Santos, Bazartete (Liquiçá), 25 July 2003; CAVR interview with Pedro dos Santos, Liquiçá, 9 July 2003.
116. Moore, p. 25.
117. Operational Instruction No. INSOP/03/II/1982, p. 8.
118. HRVD Statement 7455-02.
119. Defence and Security Command Among Police Stations 15.3, Strategic Observation of Chief of Indonesian Police Force to Timor-Leste, p. 15.
120. Alfredo Alves, testimony given at the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and the Conflict, 29–30 March 2004.
121. Tomas Gonçalves, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003; CAVR interview with Tomas Gonçalves, Dili, 23 October 2003.
122. Petunjuk Teknis No. JUKNIS/05/I/1982 tentang Sistem Keamanan Kota dan Daerah Pemukiman, [Instructional Manual No. JUKNIS/05/I/1982 re. Security System for the City and Residential Region], unsigned and undated (last page is missing).
123. HRVD Statement 7092-04.
124. Instructional Manual No. JUKNIS/05/I/1982…, p. 5.
125. Operational Instruction No. INSOP/03/II/1982, p. 1.

126. Decree of Minister of Defence and Security, No. KEP/03/II/1977, p. 45; Decree of Minister of Defence and Security, No. KEP/23/X/1978, p. 20; Komando Resor [sic] Militer 164, Petunjuk Teknis No. JUKNIS/01-A/IV/1982, signed by Williem da Costa, 10 September 1982, but produced in April 1982; Komando Operasi Keamanan Timor Timur, Prosedur Operasi Tetap Nomor: PROTAP/3/IV/1988 Tanggal [Security Operation Command for East Timor, "Fixed Operational Procedure No. PROTAP/3/IV/1988], Appendix E-2, 30 April 1988, p. 3; Kodam IX Kolakops, Rencana Operasi "Halo Kapaz" [Regional Military IX Operational Implementation Command, Plan for "Halo Kapaz" Operation], 31 August 1991, secret, cited in Moore, p. 21.
127. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OCHCR submission to CAVR, p. 30.
128. Defence and Security Command, Among Police Stations, Annexe 17; Kantor Statistik Propinsi Timor Timur, Timor Timur Dalam Angka 1981 [Statistics Bureau of East Timor Province, East Timor in Figures 1981], Dili, December 1982, p. 56.
129. Lowry, p. 112.
130. CAVR interview with Joaquim Fonseca, Dili, 23 May 2004.
131. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OCHCR submission to CAVR, p. 85.
132. "Gadapaksi Tegakkan Integrasi Timtim" ["Young Guards Uphold the Integration of East Timor"], Suara Timor Timur (Dili), 12 August 1996; Robinson, East Timor 1999, OCHCR submission to CAVR, p. 86.
133. "Gada Paksi Kembangkan 17 Bidang Usaha di Timtim" [Young Guards Develop 17 Types of Business in East Timor], Suara Timor Timur (Dili), 14 February 1996; "HUT Kopassus Memiliki Makna Refleksi dan Introspeksi" [The Special Forces' Anniversary Has Meaning for Reflection and Introspection), Suara Timor Timur (Dili), 17 April 1996.
134. Komando Daerah Militer IX Udayana/Komando Resor Militer 164, Rekapitulasi Unsur Perlawanan Wilayah Propinsi Timor Timur, Periode Tahun 1997/98 [Regional Military Command IX/Udayana/Sub-regional Military Command 164, Recapitulation of Resistance Elements in East Timor Province, Period 1997/98], April 1998.
135. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OCHCR submission to CAVR, p. 98.
136. Ibid, p. 87.
137. Indictment, Deputy General Persecutor for Serious Crime against Wiranto, Zacky Anwar Makarim, Kiki Syahnakri, Adam Rachmat Damiri, Tono Suratman, Muhammad Noer Muis, Yayat Sudrajat, Abilio José Osorio Soares, District Court of Dili, Timor-Leste, 22 February 2003.
138. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OCHCR submission to CAVR, p. 98.
139. Ibid, pp. 87, 98.
140. Ibid, pp. 102-103.
141. Report of the Indonesian commission of inquiry, 31/01/2000, para 51.
142. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OCHCR submission to CAVR, pp. 92-93, 104-105.
143. Ibid, p. 93.
144. Ibid, p. 94.
145. Ibid, p. 100.
146. Ibid, p. 100.
147. Ibid, p. 95.
148. Ibid, pp. 101-103.
149. Ibid, pp. 106-113.
150. Ibid, pp. 106-113.
151. Ibid.
152. Ibid, p. 107.
153. Ibid, p.103
154. Ibid, pp.104-105.
155. Ibid, p.129.
156. Ibid, pp. 125, 129.
157. Ibid, p. 36.
158. International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor, Report to the UN Secretary-General, A/54/726, S/2000/59, paras 136-140, New York City, 31 January 2000.

159. Ian Martin, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 17 March 2004.
160. Report of the Indonesian commission of inquiry, paras 177, 180.
161. Ibid, paras 185, 191.
162. Ibid, para 180.
163. Ross Coulthart, "Timor on the brink", Sunday Program, Channel 9, Sydney, Australia. Screened June 1999.
164. Report of the Indonesian commission of inquiry…, 31/01/2000, paras 184, 185.
165. CAVR interview with Mario Viegas Carrascalão, Dili, 30 June 2004.
166. Ibid.
167. Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, answer to questions of Yayat Handayana, Jakarta, 10 September 1980.
168. James Dunn, East Timor: Rough Passage to Independence, Longueville Books, NSW, 2003, p. 71.
169. Confidential report, Regional Defence and Security Command Among Police Stations in East Timor, Strategic Observations on the Development of Command Strength and Ability 1979–1983, 15.3.
170. Roy Pakpahan, Mengenal Timor-Timur Dulu dan Sekarang, Solidaritas Indonesia untuk Perdamaian Timor Timur (Solidamor) [Knowing East Timor Then and Now, Indonesian Solidarity for Peace in East Timor], Jakarta, September 1998, p. 16.
171. CAVR interview with Armindo Soares Mariano, Kupang, 20 July 2004; CAVR interview with Mario Viegas Carrascalão, Dili, 30 June 2004.
172. Pakpahan, p. 18.
173. Mario Viegas Carrascalão, testimony given to the CAVR, National Public Hearing on Women and the Conflict, 8–29 April 2003.
174. Monis da Maia, testimony of at the CAVR, National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
175. Pakpahan, p. 19.
176. CAVR interview with Mario Viegas Carrascalão, Dili, 12 September 2003.
177. Jon Pedersen and Marie Arneberg, Social and Economic Conditions in East Timor, International Conflict Resolution Program, Columbia University, New York, no year of publication, p.115.
178. Ibid, p. 116.
179. CAVR interview with Armindo Soares Mariano, former District Administrator of Dili, Kupang, 20 July 2004.
180. East Timor in Figures 1981, East Timor Provincial Bureau of Statistics, Dili, December 1982.
181. DPRD Tingkat I Timor Timur, Laporan kepada Bapak President Republik Indonesia Tentang Masalah dalam Penyelenggaran Pemerintahan Timor Timur [Regional People's Representative Council of East Timor, Report to the President of the Republic of Indonesia re. Problems in Implementation of Government Administration in East Timor], Dili, 3 June 1981; Dunn, East Timor: A People Betrayed, pp. 240-241.
182. "Regional People's Representative Council complains", Report 102/DPRD/VII/1981, 3 June 1981, reprinted in Timor Information Service No 32, Sept/Oct 1981, p. 6.
183. Dunn, p. 290.
184. Radiogram Menhankam/Pangab [Radiogram of Minister for Defence and Security/Armed Forces Commander-in-Chief] No. RDG/Siaga/240/B/VIII/1976, 14 August 1976, CAVR archives.
185. Decree of Minister of Defence and Security, No. KEP/03/II/1977. Basics of Organisation and Procedure of the Timor-Leste Regional Command of Defence and Security, 18 February 1977 (CAVR archives).
186. Ulu Emanuel (ed.), 20 Tahun Timor Timur Membangun, [20 Years of Development in East Timor], Pemerintah Daerah Tingkat I Timor Timur, Dili, 1995, p. 97.
187. CAVR interview with Mario Viegas Carrascalão, Dili, 30 June 2004.
188. Australian Parliamentary Delegation Report, 1983, p. 66; CAVR interview with Mario Viegas Carrascalão, Dili, 30 June 2004.
189. Ulu Emanuel, p. 100.
190. Ibid, p. 99.
191. Jon Pedersen and Marie Arneberg (Eds), Social and Economic Conditions in East Timor, International Conflict Resolution Program, Columbia University, New York, no year of publication, p.117.

192. Ibid, p.116.

193. TAPOL, Occasional Report No. 26, October 1998; Lansell Taudevin, East Timor: Too Little Too Late, Duffy and Snellgrove, Sydney, 1999, pp. 77-78.

194. Pedersen and Arneberg (Eds.), p.116.

195. Ibid, p. 118.

196. Ibid, p.117.

197. CAVR interview with Claudio Vieira, Dili, 10 June 2004.

198. CAVR interview with Armindo Soares Mariano, former District Administrator of Dili, Kupang, 20 July 2004; CAVR interview with Claudio Vieira, former District Administrator of Lautém, Dili, 10 June 2004.

199. CAVR interview with Armindo Soares Mariano, former District Administrator of Dili, Kupang, 20 July 2004.

200. Pedersen and Arneberg (Eds.), Social and Economic Conditions..., p.116.

201. Prof Dr Mubyarto, Dr Loekman Soetrisno, et al, East Timor: The Impact of Integration, Gadjah Mada University, Yogyakarta 1990, translated by Indonesia Resources and Information Program, Australia, 1991, p. 50.

202. CAVR interview with Mario Viegas Carrascalão, Dili, 30 June 2004.

203. Ulu Emanuel, p. 163.

204. Prof Dr Mubyarto, et al, p. 61.

205. Kantor Statistik Timor Timur, Timor Timur Dalam Angka 1983 [East Timor Statistics Bureau, East Timor in Figures 1983], p. 32; Kantor Statistik Timor Timur, Timor Timur Dalam Angka 1997 [East Timor Statistics Bureau, East Timor in Figures 1997], p. 57.

206. Prof Dr Mubyarto et al, p. 60.

Chega!

Part 5.

Resistance: Structure and Strategy

Bagian 5. Resistance: Structure and Strategy

Tables:

5. Resistance: Structure and Strategy

Introduction

1. The Resistance against Indonesian occupation in Timor-Leste went through a complex development. This part provides an overview of the Resistance movement including: its emergence during the period of Fretilin administration following the coup; the effect of destruction of the Fretilin bases in 1978-79 by the Indonesian military including the loss of a number of Fretilin/Falintil leaders and the end of the protracted people's war strategy; the regeneration of Falintil, the armed front of the Resistance, after 1987 and its structure and strategies until the referendum in 1999; and the structure and strategies of the clandestine front over the course of the occupation. The third front in the Resistance movement, the diplomatic front, is discussed in Vol. II, Part 7.1: Self-Determination, and so has not been considered in detail here. The Commission notes that this part is only a first step in understanding the complex history of this aspect of Timorese history and that there is considerable scope for further research in the future.

2. The Resistance had its origins in the armed conflict triggered by the attempted coup of 11 August 1975. The UDT coup aimed to get rid of the so-called "communist" elements in Fretilin that UDT considered dangerous to the national interest of Timor-Leste. The Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor (Frente Revolucionaria de Timor-Leste Independente, Fretilin), which succeeded in securing the support of most East Timorese in the Portuguese colonial armed forces, won the conflict in fewer than 20 days. With its victory over UDT, and the departure of the Portuguese colonial government, Fretilin found itself having to act as the de facto government of the territory. Its leadership, which previously believed they could secure independence without armed conflict, suddenly faced a new situation that forced them to reorganise.

3. The invasion of the powerful Indonesian military on 7 December 1975 forced Fretilin and its armed wing, the Armed Forces for the Liberation of Timor-Leste (Forças Armadas de Libertação Nacional de Timor Leste, Falintil) to flee to the mountains to reorganise into an armed resistance force. Fretilin were confronted with many problems during the process of reorganisation. Differences of opinions arose on the structure and even more so on the strategy to be used by Fretilin/Falintil. The changes in structure and strategy over time did not reflect only the changes in the nature of the conflict, but were also a result of conflicts within the Resistance movement itself.

4. The fact that the majority of people fled to the forest also became a problem. A number of resistance leaders believed that the war they were fighting was not only about the expulsion of foreign aggressors, but also a revolution to erase the old social order that oppressed people, known as "exploitation of man by man" (exploração do homem pelo homem) and to build in its place a new social structure without oppression. For them the war was a revolutionary war. In the aftermath of the Indonesian invasion, a majority of Fretilin leaders held this view. In the forest civilians were organised to support the armed resistance logistically and politically. People were organised through social and political programmes to create new social structures free from oppression and exploitation.

5. Other leaders, especially those with a military background, tended to see the war only from its military aspect, and regarded the people as a burden to the Resistance because of the military resources required to protect civilian lives. With the Indonesian military's relentless offensive against Fretilin resistance bases, the conflicts within the Resistance increased. Unable to endure the attacks, some leaders allowed or even advised people to surrender.

6. Other leaders tried to negotiate with the enemy, but these actions were strongly opposed and sometimes became a source of armed conflict within the Resistance.

7. The destruction of the "liberated zones" (zonas libertadas) brought about an entirely new situation. Civilians, some Fretilin civilian leaders and some Falintil troops were captured or surrendered because they could not withstand the Indonesian military assaults. Other Falintil units and a few Fretilin leaders managed to escape the "encirclement and annihilation" operations and survived in the forest by constantly moving from one place to another. The separation of civilians from the armed resistance prompted the Resistance to enter a new phase, where Falintil in the forest were supported by civilians in the settled, Indonesian-controlled areas. Previously, by contrast, civilians had been organised by Fretilin cadres in the Resistance support bases (bases de apoio), while Falintil had been responsible for security.

8. Falintil troops regrouped into small independent units without a fixed base, which made guerrilla attacks on the Indonesian military. Logistical support, which was once received from civilians in the Resistance bases de apoio, now had to be obtained from civilians in the occupied territory. As such, the armed resistance movement in the forest had to develop new ways to organise civilians as their main source of support.

9. Underground activities (clandestina) supporting the armed struggle in the bush and the diplomatic struggle overseas became increasingly important. These activities were first carried out by Fretilin cadres in the city who had not run to the bush at the time of the Indonesian invasion on 7 December 1975. After the destruction of the zonas libertadas, the Fretilin political cadres as well as ex-Falintil commanders and soldiers also began to undertake clandestine activities to support the struggle. Their role was crucial to providing logistics and information to Falintil, for communication between Falintil forces who were separated from each other and for communication between leaders of the armed resistance in the bush and leaders of the diplomatic resistance overseas.

10. In 1981 the Revolutionary Council of National Resistance (Conselho Revolucionário de Resistência Nacional, CRRN) was established and formally took over the leadership of the Resistance. In practice Falintil led the Resistance because it represented the only functioning resistance leadership. Although the commander of Falintil was the National Political Commissar (Comissário Político Nacional), Falintil's real power came from its position as the most active branch of the Resistance. Indeed, political activities among the civilian population at this time were limited to assisting Falintil logistically.

11. The National Council of Maubere Resistance (Concelho Nacional de Resistência Maubere, CNRM) was founded in 1987 to replace the CRRN. This changed Fretilin's role in the leadership of the Resistance to a purely symbolic one. The Resistance leadership accepted that independence could never be achieved through war because of the enemy's military dominance, and instead focused on achieving independence through a peaceful resolution with primary attention to the international arena. The diplomatic struggle, which had been launched before the Indonesian invasion in 1975, was given new emphasis. International support was sought not only from non-aligned nations and socialist nations, but also from liberal democratic nations that had previously paid little attention to the plight of Timor-Leste.

12. Some resistance leaders felt the need to establish a new forum to accommodate all political parties and movements that supported independence, especially for those outside Fretilin. The CNRM aimed to be a movement of national unity, struggling against occupation on three fronts: the armed front in the forest, the clandestine front in the villages and towns in Timor-Leste and Indonesia, and the diplomatic front in the international arena (for more information on the diplomatic front see Vol. II, Part 7.1: Self-Determination). At this time, Falintil went through a "breaking of party ties" (despartidarização) with Fretilin, and became the national armed forces, under the leadership of the CNRM. This arrangement continued after the establishment of the National Council of Timorese Resistance (Concelho Nacional de Resistência Timorense, CNRT) in place of the CNRM in April 1998 in Peniche, Portugal, which led the Resistance until the end of the Indonesian occupation in 1999.

Fretilin and the bases de apoio

13. The Indonesian invasion caused major displacement of civilians to the forests and mountains with Fretilin. This issue is discussed in detail in Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced displacement and famine.

14. Providing the large number of refugees with shelter, food and other basic necessities was a huge problem for Fretilin. Fretilin, having written a social and political programme as early as November 1974, appeared well prepared to organise the people. Cadres immediately arranged administration from the sub-village (aldeia), to the village (suco) up to the district (região) level using their existing organisational structures. Administrators at the aldeia level reorganised people from their own aldeia, suco administrators reorganised people from their suco, and so on until there was a Fretilin government administration in the mountains. It appears that this reorganisation was an initiative from the rank and file cadres. Eduardo de Jesus Barreto, a cadre from Ermera zone, stated:

> Up until early 1976 there was no strong formal structure at the base, but Fretilin militants in bases managed to organise people although not formally…People individually or in groups also performed farming activities like growing corn, tubers, and other edible plants.[1]

15. This spontaneous restructuring lasted from the beginning of the war until mid 1976. At that time, the Indonesian army had managed to take control of only the towns, the north coastal road from west to east and the central corridor running from north to south. Xanana Gusmão testified to the Commission:

> The enemy came into Dili, Baucau, Lospalos, and people fled. There was still major confusion. After that it began to stabilise…When the enemy managed to take over the main roads, the north road and from north to south, it began to feel stable. This situation gave an idea to the Central Committee to establish six sectors in May 1976...having to do with the division of political administration from aldeia, suco, zona, região, and sector.[2]

Organisation of civilians

16. The organisation of civilians (and the military) was discussed at the Fretilin Central Committee's second plenary session held in Soibada, Manatuto, in May 1976 (the Soibada Conference).* At this conference, it was decided to form national civilian and military structures. The zonas libertadas were divided into six sectors.† These sectors defined both military zones under military command and political

* According to this document, the plenary session was held from 15 May to 2 June 1976. The session decided "three Maubere Revolution guidance principles", which are : people's war, protracted war, and self-reliance. [Relatório da Delegação do Comité Central da Fretilin em Missão de Serviço no Exterior do Pais, p.3.]

† There were supposed to be seven sectors, with the Oecussi enclave as the seventh sector, but circumstances did not allow for the establishment of this sector. [CAVR interviews with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004; and Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003.]

administrative units under Fretilin administration. In accordance with the principle that politics commands the gun (a política comanda fuzil), the military commanders deferred to the civilian political administrators.* However, some of the highest military positions, such as Chief of Staff and the minister and two deputy ministers of defence, were also members of the Fretilin Central Committee.

17. The position of political commissar (comissário política), the supreme leader in each sector with responsibility for both political and military matters, was also created in Soibada. All political commissars were members of the Fretilin Central Committee.† The sectors, the districts they covered and the political commissar in each sector is set out below:

Table 1 - Fretilin regional structure since May 1976

Sector	Districts Included	Political Commissar
Ponta Leste (Eastern End)	Lautém	Juvenal Inacio (Sera Key)‡
Centro Leste (Central East)	Baucau and Viqueque	Vicente dos Reis (Sa'he)§
Centro Norte (Central North)	Manatuto, Aileu, and Dili	João Bosco Soares
Centro Sul (Central South)	Manufahi and Ainaro	Hamis Bassarewan (Hata)
Fronteira Norte (North Frontier)	Ermera, Liquiçá, and some part of Bobonaro	Hélio Pina (Mau Kruma)
Fronteira Sul (South Frontier)	Covalima and some part of Bobonaro	César Correia Lebre (César Mau Laka)

* This principle had already been in effect since the establishment of Falintil in August 1975 after the 11 August Movement. From that time, Falintil was under the command of the Fretilin Central Committee. See, for example, CAVR interviews with Lucas da Costa, Dili (one of the people who initiated the establishment of the first Falintil units in Aileu), 21/6/2004, and CAVR interview with Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 9/6/2004.

† According to Xanana Gusmão, who at the time was a member of the Fretilin Central Committee, the Timor-Leste Democratic Republic government's departments were no longer functioning, only Fretilin (government) was functioning. (CAVR interview with José Alexandre [Xanana] Gusmão, Dili, 7/7/2004.) In the Fretilin Central Committee there was a Permanent Committee, in charge of making decisions if a Central Committee plenary session was not possible. (CAVR interview with Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004.)

‡ In the RDTL Board of Ministers, Sera Key was the Minister of Finance. After the Aikurus (Remexio, Aileu) meeting, some parts of Baucau and Viqueque, east of the road connecting Baucau to Viqueque, were included in Ponta Leste Sector. This change was because Indonesia's control of that road made it difficult for the two territories in that sector to communicate. [CAVR interview with Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003; Xanana Gusmão, "Autobiography" in Sarah Niner (ed.), To Resist is to Win! The autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, Victoria: Aurora Books, 2000, p. 49.]

§ In the RDTL Board of Ministers he occupied the position of Minister of Labour and Welfare.

18. In performing their tasks the political commissars were assisted by assistant commissars (Assistente Comissáriado),* who were each responsible for a specific area: health, agriculture, education, the women's organisation Popular Organisation of Timorese Women (Organização Popular da Mulher Timor, OPMT), and political propaganda. The secretariat where the Fretilin administrators worked was called the comissáriado. Sectors were then divided into smaller administrative units.†

Table 2 - Fretilin administrative structure

Administrative Unit	Area	Leadership
Region (regiaõ)	Similar to the area covered by a conselho in the Portuguese colonial administration system, today referred to as district.	A secretary (secretário) and a regional vice secretary (vice secretário regional)
Zona (zona)	Similar to the territory that, in the Portuguese administration system, was called posto, today referred to as sub-district.	Zone Committee (comité da zona) led by a secretário and vice secretário da zona. In the Comite da Zona there was a: Health Commission (Comissão de Saúde), Agriculture Commission (Comissão da Agricultura) and Education Commission (Comissão da Educação).[3] Attached to each commission was an activista, whose task was to implement the programmes. There was also an activista responsible for political education.
Village (suco)	Same as a village today.	Secretário de suco assisted by a vice secretário. They were in charge of suco-level bodies called sections (secções),

* In the Ponta Leste sector, the Delegado Komisariado was better known as "DK" (pronounced "de kapa") [CAVR interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, 19 May 2004.]

† Some mentioned the existence of barracas (barracks) units, but they were not part of the formal administrative structure.

		such as the: health section (secção de saude), agriculture section (secção da agricultura), education section (secção da educação) and political propaganda section (secção da propaganda política).
Sub-village (aldeia)	Same as a sub-village today.	Village ward (responsável da aldeia)

19. This structure was a continuation of the government system established by Fretilin when it took control of Timor-Leste after the defeat of the 11 August Movement. For instance at the zona level, some informants told the Commission that the government was run by a directorate (direcção), which consisted of a secretary and vice secretary, assistants, the local leader of the OPMT women's organisation and the local leader of the youth organisation, the Popular Organisation of Timorese Youth (Organização Popular de Jovens Timorenses, OPJT),[4] following the structural model Fretilin had employed at the district level after 11 August 1975 (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict).

20. This structure changed little until the destruction of the zonas libertadas. In 1977, as the zonas libertadas came under growing pressure from Indonesian military attacks, the Fretilin leadership abolished the região level of administration, and the zona was placed immediately under the administration of the sectors. A new position of adjunct (adjunto) was created. The adjunto, who like political commissars were members of the Fretilin Central Committee, assisted the zona administrators in the implementation of Fretilin social-political programmes.[5] There were two to three adjunto in each sector. In 1978, the title of activista was changed to assistant (assistente).[6]

Military organisation

21. In the area of military organisation, there was also confusion after the invasion of December 1975. Falintil troops assigned to the border areas and towns, which fell immediately after the invasion, retreated to their places of origin. In the sub-district (which had now turned into zonas), Falintil regrouped into units called companies (companhias),[*] led by a zona commander (comandante da zona). Most comandantes

* These companies consisted of former colonial soldiers and civilians who had received military training from the army after the UDT "11 August Movement" and joined the militia formed by Fretilin. Initially, when Fretilin began to face attacks from the Indonesian army on the land border in October, some militia members had joined Falintil units that were assigned to face the Indonesian army in the border area. [CAVR interviews with José Alexandre Gusmão, Dili, 7/7/2004; Adriano João, Dili, 23/4/2003; Filomeno Paixão, Dili, 17/6/2004; Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21/6/2004; Agostinho Carvaleira Soares, Cailaco, Bobonaro, 13 August 2003; Sebastião da Silva, June 2003, Cornelio Gama (aka Nahak Leki, L-7), 9 April 2003; and Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.]

da zona were sergeants in the Portuguese colonial armed forces.* There were between one and four companies in each zona, depending on the availability of trained men and weapons.[7] Each company consisted of three or four platoons (pelotões).[8]

22. These companies were theoretically under the control of the Falintil General Staff (Estado Maior das Falintil). After the unilateral declaration of independence on 28 November 1975, Falintil came under the Department of National Defence, which was led by a minister and two deputy ministers. The minister was Rogério Lobato, who was also the Commander of Falintil (Comandante das Falintil), and the deputy ministers were Hermenegildo Alves and Guido Soares. When Rogério Lobato left Timor-Leste to continue the struggle overseas, just days after 28 November 1975, the two deputy ministers took over the ministry. The defence department oversaw the Falintil General Staff (Estado Maior das Falintil), which was under the command of the Chief of Staff (Chefe do Estado Maior), Guido Soares, whose deputy chief (Sub-Chefe do Estado Maior), was José da Silva.†

23. After the invasion this structure was found not to be effective. Companies were under the control of the zona commanders, who operated relatively independently of the central command and focused mainly on defending their own zona. This created problems when it came to conducting military operations. Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, who was a company commander in Liquiçá, explained:

> So in one zona…there was one zona commander. The zona commander had one to three companies under his command. In Liquiçá, for example, there were three companies with one zona commander. But each only took the initiative in their own sub-districts…Some sub-districts had plenty of weapons, while others didn't have any weapons at all.[9]

24. The problem was resolved by the decision made at the Conference in Soibada (Manatuto) to reorganise the military. With the establishment of sectors, regions, and zones for all zonas libertadas, sector commands (comandos da sector), regional commands (comandos da região), and zone command (comando da zona) were established.[10] There was a commander appointed to each sector, region and zone. Aside from the battle companies, the Self-Defence Forces (Força Auto Defesa, Fade) were established in settlements. A Fade unit comprised people from the local area with basic military training. The strength of the Fade varied between local areas; one zone could have up to one company.[11] Some were armed with traditional weapons like spears and arrows, others with automatic rifles. Because most did

* For instance, the zona commander of Quelicai (Baucau), Aquiles Freitas, had been a colonial soldier with the last rank of a first sergeant (sargento) and the last position of a cavalry troop company commander in Atabae (Bobonaro). [CAVR interview with Adriano João, Dili, 10 June 2003.] The zona commander of Cailaco (Bobonaro), José Maria, was a second sergeant (furiel) in the Portuguese army in Timor-Leste. [CAVR interview with Agostino Carvaleira Soares, 13 August 2003).

† José da Silva was replaced by Domingos Ribeiro in the second half of 1976. José da Silva was replaced because he challenged the Soibada, Manatuto Conference's decision to reorganise the troops, which brought him into conflict with the Fronteira Norte Political Commissar, Mau Kruma, who was responsible for implementing the new structure. [CAVR interview with Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004.]

not have firearms, Fade units were also known as the armas brancas, the "white soldiers" (who only used traditional weapons). The Fade's main task was to defend settlements, although some were also sent to assist frontline Falintil units.[12]

25. As it was before the reorganisation, the zona commanders oversaw the troop companies, but they operated under the authority of the região commander, while the região commander himself was under the command of the sector commander.[*] With this reorganisation, the Falintil General Staff oversaw all the territorial commands. The reorganisation at Soibada increased Falintil's capacity to face the Indonesian army. Falintil's operational territory became larger because they could now operate in areas larger than a zona. Troops and weapons could also be moved from one zona to another according to military need.[13]

26. Further changes in the military structure were decided at the Laline Conference, held between March and May 1977.[†] The Laline Conference agreed that the concentration of military units in the zona was another weakness. Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, who attended the conference, recalled:

> We thought that the strategy was not so good, because [the Ermera] região would say we are Ermera so we belong only to Ermera, and Liquiçá would say it belonged only to Liquiçá. It was hard to supply weapons and ammunition to other região. That was why after the Laline Conference, sector companies were formed to provide people with security, intervention companies were formed that no longer could act from behind or outside…So while previously the war was fought within the região, now it was fought across all the whole sector.[14]

27. Thus every company in a sector was placed directly under the command of the sector commander.

28. Further change took place in mid-1977, related to the Fretilin internal conflict. The Fretilin Central Committee, meeting in Aikurus (Remexio, Aileu), abolished the National Department of Defence, including the deputy minister positions, after an evaluation found it was not effective. Leadership of Falintil fell to the Falintil General Staff. Both deputy defence ministers were "demoted" to the positions of sector commanders. Hermenegildo Alves became the commander of the Centro Leste Sector and Guido Soares became the commander of Centro Sul. Domingos Ribeiro, who was

* Up to that point, the biggest army unit was company (companhia), there was no bigger unit like the battalion (batalhão).

† This was the session of the Highest Resistance Council and the Political Committee of the Fretilin Central Committee, held from 8 March to 20 May 1977 (Relatório da Delegação do Comité Central da Fretilin em Missão de Serviço no Exterior do Pais, p. 4). It is possible that the Highest Resistance Council in this document was the Highest Struggle Council (Conselho Superior da Luta), which consisted of the RDTL President (who also was the president of Fretilin), RDTL vice-president (deputy chairman of Fretilin), minister of defence, Falintil chief of staff, minister of domestic security, and Comissário Política Nacional. [CAVR interviews with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004 and Egas da Costa Freitas, 19 May 2004.] If this was its composition, it is clear that the council was a hybrid, between party (Fretilin) and government (RDTL).

previously deputy chief of staff, became the chief of staff. The deputy chief of staff position was abolished. In the Falintil General Staff, there were eight staff positions called the colaborador do estado maior, responsible for areas under the General Staff's authority such as operations, codes, information, logistics and training.[15]

29. In accordance with the principle of civilian control of the military, the President of Timor-Leste, also the President of Fretilin, Nicolau Lobato, directed the Falintil General Staff. At the same time, Nicolau Lobato also held the position of political commissar for the Falintil General Staff, with the function of providing political orientation to the army.*

30. At this time, a new unit called the Shock Troops (Brigada de Choque, usually abbreviated as Brichoq) was formed.† This brigade was formed by the chief of staff and was directly under his command. It was not based in a specific area, but operated throughout Timor-Leste.[16] Guido Soares, who was previously the chief of the Falintil general staff, became the commander of the Brigada de Choque.[17] With the establishment of this brigade, troop structure now comprised Brigada de Choque, sector and zone companies, and the Força Auto Defesa.

Fretilin's socio-economic programme

31. The organisation of civilians in the zonas libertadas was the responsibility of the Fretilin civil administration. After the invasion, Fretilin's main focus was launching and supporting the Resistance. Xanana Gusmão, then a member of the Fretilin Central Committee, said:

> We had just entered war and the people were among us. [We established] bases de apoio*, with the idea they would function as a base to provide logistical and political support – which we can call revolution…The Fretilin Central Committee in May 1976 put the* bases de apoio into effect. So six sectors were established…with that the base de apoio was defined. The base de apoio structure was formed. Base de apoio was implemented as a mechanism to organise people so they could continue to fight in the war.[18]

32. Settlements, which at first were strategically territories called "retreat zones" (zona reta guarda), finally changed to become the bases de apoio. In these the people were organised to run programmes in agriculture, health, education, culture and women's liberation.[19]

* While the Political Commissioners for sectors were under the Comissário Política Nacional (CPN, National Political Commissioner) that was not the case with Falintil General Staff's Political Commissioner. Not to mention that this position was occupied by the President of the Republic and Fretilin President. According to Jacinto Alves, at the time, Nicolau Lobato, who was also the President of RDTL, worked daily at the Falintil General Staff [CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004].

† This Brigade was also known as the "Brigada Intervenção" (Intervention Brigade), "Força de Intervenção" (Intervention Forces) or "Companhia de Intervenção" (Intervention Company).

Agricultural production

33. To increase production, agricultural work was performed by people organised into work teams (equipa).[20] Agricultural land was divided into three types of ownership: private, coperativa (cooperative) and propriedade estatal (state ownership).[*] Families owned private land and, while all members of a work group worked on such land, the produce belonged to each family. Cooperative land was owned and worked on by all members of a work group and the produce was distributed equally among its members.[†] Everybody worked on propriedade estatal and the produce was used by the state to feed Falintil, the civilian administration, the elderly and disabled, and for seed reserves.[21] Aside from edible crops like corn, tubers, sweet potatoes and bananas, cotton was also planted.[22]

34. Women also worked in agricultural production, performing activities such as pounding sago palm and making plaited items like baskets.[23] If a woman had children to nurse, they nursed them in the crèche (a day care centre). Some people were assigned to a team for maintaining the crèche, organised through the equipa crèche.[24]

35. At first, agricultural production proceeded smoothly. But the situation worsened once the major military offensive began in September 1978. Planted land could not be harvested as the population had to move constantly because of the Indonesian army's attacks. People also could not prepare new land to be planted.[25]

Health

36. The Fretilin cadres responsible for health, including traditional doctors, produced medicine from plants, such as quinine pills and treatments for gunshot wounds.[26] They also cared for the wounded and performed minor operations. Research was conducted to find plants with healing potential. Lucas da Costa, who was the head of Same (Manufahi) Hospital during the Portuguese era, recalled his experiences in the Uaimori area:

> ... I did research on plant therapy, medication using traditional medicines around the middle of 1976…We built a hospital. We conducted studies on traditional medicines. We gathered some people who knew about traditional medicines, we conducted a number of experiments, and we built a pharmacy to make tablets and injections. Our injections didn't work, but our tablets for malaria were a success. We also successfully made one for headaches, and, although it was very coarse, it was quite effective too.[27]

---

* Meaning the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste.

† The Fretilin administrators also had to work in work groups but they only did a small amount of farm work because their time was mostly taken up with politics. [Virgílio da Silva Guterres, Dili, 25 May 2004.]

37. Former students provided public education on healthy living and the construction and use of public toilets. Virgílio da Silva Guterres from Venilale Zone (Baucau) described his experiences:

> [Boys] who were already in the third grade of primary school were… given training on literacy, health and politics. After the training the participants were divided into groups called Brigada Dinamisadora [Dynamisation Brigades], each consisting of five people. The groups' task was to teach literacy and health and assist people to make toilets to meet health standards.[28]

Education and culture

38. Fretilin provided education in two main areas: literacy and politics. Literacy programmes appear to have been conducted in a piecemeal fashion because of the lack of people trained in this field at the time. In certain places OPMT activists ran the programmes and focused particularly on women.[29] In some zones school activities were conducted for children.[30]

39. The most common educational activity was political education. Fretilin gave much attention to providing political training for Fretilin cadres to increase their capacity for organising people and their political and ideological knowledge. The commissariat in each sector established a Centre for Political Training (Centro da Formação Política, Ceforpol). Ceforpol was obligatory for quadro medio (mid-level cadres, the regional and zone committees), but sometimes was attended by quadro inferior (menial cadres, administrators of suco and aldeia). Topics covered included the history of Timor-Leste from the arrival of the Portuguese, theories of social development, the philosophy of dialectical materialism, building people-power, the organisational principles of "the mass line" (linha de massa) and democratic centralism (centralismo democrático), women's emancipation and collective food production. Military strategy and national liberation were also discussed, as well as national liberation wars in other countries such as Guinea Bissau, China and Vietnam. The instructors in the Ceforpols were members of the Fretilin Central Committee and Falintil commanders.[31] Overall, the Ceforpols were under the supervision of the Department of Political and Ideological Orientation (Departemento da Orientação Política e Ideológica, DOPI), which was a department of the Fretilin Central Committee.[32]

40. For the general public, the goal of political education was to encourage the spirit of nationalism and support the national liberation struggle.[33] Zone administrators conducted "enlightenment" (esclarecemento) programmes. In certain places Brigada Dinamisadora carried out the esclarecemento, travelling around to settlements to explain the Fretilin Political Program Manual (Manual e Programa Políticos Fretilin) and the need to work and support Falintil armed forces fighting to restore independence in Timor-Leste.[34] Where there was no Brigada Dinamisadora, the assistente de zona carried out the programme. OPMT activists also provided political education.[35] Usually, popular political education was conducted together with cultural activities. A member of a Brigada Dinamisadora told the Commission that:

> Every brigada was sent to an aldeia to teach during the day. At night their were activities like tebe and dancing, reading traditional poems and singing folk songs…The verses in the poems were about the poor people and their sufferings because of the invasion, and tributes to the people who died fighting for the motherland. Hearing such words aroused people's sympathy for the poor and their determination to fight for the independence of the motherland.[36]

41. Fretilin cultural activities were sought to develop a sense of nationhood, based on the idea that the nation could progress only if the people fought to free themselves from the negative mentality sown by the colonial power. The theme of the poor needing to fight for their liberation had been developed since before the Indonesian invasion. Fretilin took traditional songs from many regions and gave them progressive lyrics. Songs were also sung to traditional dances such as the tebe and dahur.

42. Cultural activities were guided by the Fretilin concept of equality of all human beings. According to Fretilin, colonialism was a form of inequality by which a minority exploited and oppressed the majority. Oppression and exploitation did not only occur between the colonial power and the people of Timor-Leste, but also among the Timorese population itself between the traditional kings (liurai) and the people. This manifested through the tribute that subjects were required to pay to the liurai and forced labour. Inequality was also apparent in the form of discrimination and violence against women as a result of their low position in traditional society.[37] Fretilin introduced the concept of "comradery" (camarada) which viewed each person as a friend and an equal. The need to wipe out inequality from exploitation and oppression and replace it with equality became a theme in songs and verse which were sung at cultural events and in literacy programmes.

Women's emancipation

43. The emancipation of women was also part of Fretilin's socio-political programme. Women were encouraged to get involved in education, health, agricultural production and the production of items to be used by the military such as baskets (lafatik and luhu) and bags. To make it possible for women to carry out these activities, crèches were built. In the crèches, men and women took turns in looking after the children. The crèches also served to teach children to become revolutionary nationalists through songs of struggle, poetry and theatre.[38]

44. In some areas, courses were run to prepare women for marriage. For example, OPMT ran one such course in Zona Modok in the Centro Norte Sector. The aim was to create nationalist families with respect for men's and women's rights. The future brides were taught the concept of women's emancipation. The tradition of barlaque, which required an exchange of goods between the families of the bride and groom and had previously been considered degrading to women, was reaffirmed as a symbol honouring women's dignity. Through these courses future brides also learned to challenge colonialist and feudal attitudes and preconceptions towards women and to defend the dignity of women and men.[39]

Justice system

45. Fretilin created a justice system to deal with people who committed crimes. People were tried according to the type of crime they committed. For minor offences, such as swearing, harassing women (bok feto) and stealing, a process called self-criticism (critíca-auto critíca) was administered. In this process, the perpetrator pleaded guilty in front of a small public audience, expressed their remorse and promised not to reoffend. The perpetrators would be forgiven, once they had received a light punishment, such as gathering firewood or fetching water for the public kitchen for two days. This kind of punishment was called "corrective justice" (justo correctivo).

46. For serious crimes, the process was called people's justice (justiça popular). Serious offences included having contact with the enemy, cooperating with the enemy, spying, and betraying civilians to the enemy and treason. The accused was considered to have opposed Fretilin policies and were put on trial in public, often in front of a large crowd. The military commander who had captured the person laid the charges, the crowd decided on guilt or innocence, while the political commissar, sometimes with the assistance of the sector commander, handed down the sentence.[40] Punishments ranged from death to rehabilitation in an institution called the National Rehabilitation (Rehabilitação Nacional, Renal), "a place to rehabilitate reactionaries to become revolutionaries".[41] Renals were under the authority of the Sector Commissariat, and would vary in number from sector to sector (See Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detentions, torture and ill-treatment).*

47. Rehabilitation was the punishment for people who, despite the seriousness of their crimes, were considered to be able to realise their mistakes and change their ways.[42] In the Renals, detainees were required to work during the day, including agricultural production such as planting and working in rice fields, and other tasks like collecting firewood and fetching water. Their output was used to feed them and to meet Falintil's needs.[43] At night they were required to attend classes in political education. In one Renal, literacy classes were provided.[44]

48. There were at least two kinds of detention facilities in Renal. The first type was a hole in the ground covered with wooden bars or by a wooden panel with a large rock on top of it. These holes varied in size: some were only 80 centimetres in height, forcing people held in there to sit on the floor, while others, such as the one in Renal Nundamar (Remexio, Aileu), were as much as three metres deep.[45] The second type was an enclosure above ground, which was surrounded by walls of stones two to three metres in height.[46]

* Renals were under the direct responsibility of an adjunto. The Renal in Nundamar, Remexio, for example, was under the responsibility of Adjunto Sebastião Montalvão ("Lais") [CAVR interviews with António Amado de Jesus Guterres, Manatuto, 11 December 2003; CAVR interviews with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004.]

49. There were cases where people were deprived of food or water for days in Renals. Sometimes family members were allowed to give them food or water, but on other occasions it was prohibited. Alexandrino de Jesus, a Falintil soldier captured and accused of trying to surrender to the Indonesian army, said of his experiences in a Renal:

> We were taken to the Renal in Sau Kata in Ura Hou Suco [Hatolia, Ermera]. We were ordered to work although we were very physically weak, and without being provided with farming tools. They ordered us to pull-up and tidy one-and-a-half hectares of grass to plant corn. While we worked there, we were never fed. We split our group into two, one group worked to clear the grass, while the other group of four people, including me, searched for cassava [for us to eat]. Luckily there was plenty of cassava around the area. [While we worked] eight Falintil members guarded us…We slept at the place where we worked and each week we were required to report to Fatubessi [Ermera]. None of us died.
>
> We were at the Renal for one-and-a-half-months. After we had planted the corn the commander of Fronteira Norte Sector, Filomeno Paixão, summoned us. When we arrived [the sector command centre in Fatubessi] we were treated well. We were told to line-up to receive food rations. Then we were reinstated as Falintil members.[47]

50. People who were waiting to be investigated and tried by justiça popular, were also detained in Renals. Interrogation was the main form of investigation. Some detainees were tortured during interrogation to extract confessions.[48] Eduardo de Jesus Barreto from the Fronteira Norte Sector, testified:

> I saw for myself how Comandante Região Martinho was buried up to his waist in a standing position without clothes and with his hands tied. Then they burned a car tire and let the burned rubber drops burn his body. I couldn't stand to watch, so I walked away.[49]

51. Not all serious cases were investigated. There were cases where people suspected of having planned to surrender were simply accused by the local commander, and a decision was made on the spot. A former political assistant told the Commission:

> …the guilty person would be brought in front of the public. There, many people would say that he was guilty. Nobody challenged it even if we were innocent. No judge defended us. I witnessed around three cases. One person was suspected and captured in guerrilla zone, and the commander accused him of being a spy. The commander said: "This man was captured in the guerrilla zone. He is a spy." Then people said: "If he is a spy, he must die." A Falintil commander usually handled cases like these and people just went along with whatever he said.[50]

52. As a result, people were punished for crimes they did not commit. A cadre described one such case:

> ...some people they [the commanders] disliked had gone down to the town. Their families came under suspicion, and anything could be done to them, torture them for instance. I opposed that. I said "Don't do it, because if someone goes down to the town, it means that person no longer cares about our struggle. Why do we have to harass their families?" I always opposed it. They accused me of having contacts with them, of betraying the struggle. I was eventually imprisoned for no good reason. I wasn't tortured, I spent a few months below ground.[51]

Strategy

53. The Resistance strategy adopted by Fretilin derived from the idea that it was engaged in a revolutionary war for independence. The concept of revolution was linked to independence, but the independence Fretilin desired involved more than simply the departure of Portuguese colonial rulers and their replacement by a Timorese government. For Fretilin, independence without a change in the social structure would mean only replacing one master with another. Fretilin saw independence as the creation of equality among people by "ending the inequality of the colonial situation, which was based on exploitation of the majority by a minority. The colonial minority and the wealthy exploited the majority".[52] The process through which Fretilin wanted to eliminate the colonial social structure was revolution.*

54. The Fretilin Political Programme and Manual (Manual e Programa Políticos Fretilin) published around September 1975 stated:

> [Fretilin] is called revolutionary because in order for the Timorese people to live prosperously, for true liberation, people have to change, transform, and REVOLUTIONISE all structures, which have been in place for 500 years. We have to make a major transformation by creating new structures to serve the Timorese people. If we do not erase the oppressive structures and replace them with new structures, the Timorese people will never live prosperously, the Timorese people will never gain Independence; only a small number of people will live prosperously, just as has been happening up to this day. Many people would still live in misery.[53]

* Article 2 of the RDTL Constitution stated: "The Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste is led based on FRETILIN's political orientation, which is aimed to erase colonial structures for the creation of a new society free from all kinds of occupation and exploitation." Fretilin also considered that colonialism could take a new form after the nation gained its independence, when foreign capital controlled Timor-Leste's economy. This situation would create an economic dependence called "neo-colonialism" that Fretilin wanted to prevent [Manual e Programa Políticos Fretilin, Manual point 5.]

55. Fretilin considered that traditional Timorese society was also oppressive. In the traditional social structure the liurai held power over the people by forcing them to work for him and to give him tithes. Colonial rulers also used the liurais' traditional status to mobilise people to work on plantations producing goods for export.* Fretilin saw the liurais' authority as feudalism and wanted to eliminate it.

56. Colonialism and tradition were also considered oppressive towards women. Fretilin saw that Timorese women experienced twofold oppression; the general colonial oppression that all Timorese experienced, and the more specific oppression they suffered as a result of traditional and colonialist attitudes towards women.[54] While general colonial oppression took the form of forced labour, inadequate wages, racism and so on, women's oppression was manifested in the way women were treated as an object of pleasure for colonialist employers and as commodities traded in barlaque practices and polygamy. Fretilin aimed to eliminate this oppression. Fretilin's revolutionary programme included "the liberation of women as social creatures".[55]

57. To create a new social structure free of oppression, Fretilin conducted socio-political programmes from September 1975. The most important programmes, according to Fretilin, were ones in the fields of agriculture, health, education and culture.[56] Fretilin saw that in the agriculture sector, colonialism had made the people of Timor-Leste poorer by focusing on export crops. People starved because of food shortages and a limited variety of food.[57] Fretilin sought to develop an agriculture sector that served the interests of the people and enabled "everyone to get proper food for good health, so everyone can live in prosperity".[58] A system of co-operative ownership and organisation was deemed the most appropriate to achieve this goal.† Fretilin planned to build production, distribution and consumption cooperatives all over the country. When Timor-Leste was still under Portuguese rule, Fretilin put this idea into practice in a number of places, among them Bazartete (Liquiçá) and in Bucoli (Baucau), the home villages of Nicolau Lobato and Sa'he respectively, who had pioneered these projects.[59]

58. In education, Fretilin carried out literacy programmes using the methods developed by the Brazilian educator, Paulo Freire.‡ Education was considered important because, for Fretilin, true independence would only happen if people actively participated in government, and people could only participate actively if they knew what they wanted and why. If people lived in ignorance, they would always be exploited. From Fretilin's perspective, the education system under the Portuguese colonial administration was the opposite of what was needed.[60] Freire's method of conscientização was preferable because people not only learned to read and write but also went through a process of gaining

* This forced labour was called auxiliar ("helper"), which the Timorese pronounced "assuliar."

† Fretilin also planned a land reform program, that would involve confiscating big plantations and giving them to people's cooperatives to be worked on. [Manual e Programa Políticos Fretilin, Programa Políticos part, point 2.B.1.]

‡ When the Portuguese government in Timor-Leste under Governor Mário Lemos Pires established an education committee, whose task was to perform decolonisation of Timor-Leste's education, Fretilin played an important role in changing the government policy in this matter. [Helen Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism in East Timor, p. 122.]

awareness of colonial oppression and how to overcome it. The literacy programme, which had been prepared in May 1974, was first implemented in January 1975.[61]

59. Health was viewed as being closely connected to education. Fretilin believed that poor public health was caused by people's lack of knowledge about health and nutrition, which was in turn caused by colonialism. For Fretilin, health education was the only solution to the problem.[62]

60. Fretilin's ideas about culture were closely linked to the need to develop a new national awareness among the people of Timor-Leste. During colonial times people generally understood that they were members of a particular suco community, a particular kingdom, or a particular ethno-linguistic group. For instance, people considered themselves as Turiscai people, as members of the Mambae ethno-linguistic group, rather than as East Timorese, and they viewed outsiders, even people from Dili, as foreigners (malae).[63] Fretilin tried to develop national awareness through programmes of cultural exchange between regions, and giving all East Timorese a sense of ownership of these forms. For instance the tebe dance from one place was introduced in literacy programmes in other places. Similarly, songs such as "Kolele Mai", which originated in a village in Baucau, were introduced throughout the nation. It was also Fretilin that used Tetum, which was the lingua franca throughout the territory, in their meetings and literacy programmes.

61. Fretilin considered that the revolution could be peaceful for two reasons.* First, it was becoming clearer that the Portuguese policy of decolonisation was more likely to lead to independence at the time Fretilin wrote its programme in November 1974. This assured Fretilin that colonialism was bankrupt politically and administratively.[64] Second, Fretilin was becoming increasingly popular because of its socio-political programmes.[65] For example, in the local election of village chiefs in May 1975 in a number of villages in Lospalos (Lautém), 90% of the elected village chiefs were Fretilin supporters.[66] According to Francisco Xavier do Amaral, this increased popularity made the leaders of Fretilin confident that the majority of people wanted independence and that they would easily defeat the idea of federation with Portugal or the idea of integration with Indonesia without an armed struggle.[67] For Fretilin, the way to launching the revolution was to mobilise people to accelerate the agricultural, education, health and cultural programmes.†

62. The socio-political programme implemented after the Indonesian invasion was a continuation of the programmes implemented before 11 August 1975. The

* Francisco Xavier do Amaral stated that Fretilin hoped Portugal "would be willing to give [Timor Leste independence] peacefully" and therefore there was no plan within Fretilin to organise for armed struggle. According to him, armed activities were conducted only after the armed action of 11 August Movement. (CAVR interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004) Terra Mau Bulak also mentioned the establishment of an Exercito de Libertaçao Maubere among the Timorese serving in the Portuguese colonial army by a number of Fretilin Central Committee members around May 1975 [Terra Mau Bulak, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.] But this was denied by Mari Alkatiri (who was the Comissário Política Nacional at the time) and Francisco Xavier do Amaral (who was the President of Fretilin) [CAVR interviews with Mari Alkatiri, Dili, 25 June 2004 and Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004.]

† Helen Hill mentioned that Fretilin searched for "a peaceful alternative to the guerrilla war, which was to draw on people's power to fight the colonial structures." [Helen Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism in East Timor, p. 159.]

difference after the invasion was that the programmes were implemented in the bases de apoio to support the war. During the course of the war, Fretilin itself was radicalised, giving greater emphasis to the elimination of classes in society and declaring Marxism to be its ideology.*

Protracted people's war

63. Initially, as noted above, the war was fought as a spontaneous and decentralised reaction to attacks by the Indonesian military, without a clear overall strategy. At the Fretilin Central Committee's second plenary session in Soibada (Manatuto), held between 15 May–2 June 1976, Fretilin adopted the strategy of "Protracted People's War".† Fretilin conceded that the war could not be won easily and quickly, because of Indonesia's much greater economic and military strength.[68] If Timor-Leste wanted independence, the war would have to be long and hard. Based on its analysis of the international political situation, Fretilin believed that Timor-Leste could not depend on foreign assistance for victory.‡

64. The three main principles adopted at the Soibada Conference were: that the war would be fought by and for the people, that it would be protracted, and that Timor-Leste would have to depend on its own strength. According to this strategy, war was not simply a military conflict between two armed forces, but was also viewed as a war of the people. From a purely military perspective, the deciding factors would be military and economy. But Fretilin believed that the strength and will of the people would be the deciding factor, and that they could be continuously strengthened through education and mobilisation.

65. In the protracted people's war strategy, the bases de apoio played a central role. They provided logistical support for the armed forces, and also built people power through education and mobilisation.[69] Egas da Costa, an assistente de zona in the propaganda section in one of the zones in the Centro Leste Sector, said:

---

* According to Xanana Gusmão, Marxism officially became Fretilin's ideology at the Laline Conference in 1977. This conference was not attended by Fretilin President Francisco Xavier do Amaral. Another source said that Marxism was not confirmed as the official ideology at the conference because of Xavier do Amaral's absence. [CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004]. But cadres who participated in Ceforpol's political education remembered that they studied Marxism in Ceforpol classes. [See for example, CAVR interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, 19 May 2004; Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR.]

† This strategy was formulated by Mao Zedong based on China's experience of war against Japanese imperialism (Mao Zedong, On Protracted War, 1938, republished in Selected Works of Mao Tse-tung [Peking: Foreign Languages Press, 1965]). It seemed that some Fretilin leaders learned this strategy from materials from the African national liberation movements in Portuguese colonies.

‡ The idea to ask for Western countries' assistance was rejected because those countries were "imperialists" and opponents of countries who wanted "true liberation". Indonesia, which launched military aggression, was viewed as a lackey of the United States, which was the leader of imperialist powers in the world. The idea to seek assistance from socialist block countries was also rejected with the reason that the assistance would bind in the future. [CAVR interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004.]

> Because this war was a protracted war, people were educated, trained in bases, so they could have a new view on life.[70]

66. Fretilin considered that Indonesian military assaults were attacks against the people of Timor-Leste, who were attempting to liberate themselves from the oppression of man by man. In carrying out these assaults, Indonesia was considered an accomplice of the world imperialist powers. A document from DOPI, which was ratified at the Laline Conference in 1977, stated:

> [T]he experiences of other countries in the struggle against colonial powers, and our own experience, show that this kind of movement is met by total violence from the imperialist power, and that the only way for a true nationalist movement to protect people from genocide or mass slaughter is to organise, mobilise and educate people to work for the full and complete eviction of the enemy and to beat imperialism.[71]

67. The war was considered the war of all people against enemy powers promoting their imperialist interests. Mobilising and educating people would create a popular force that was invincible in the face of imperialist aggression. The relationship between the people and the soldiers was compared with that between "water and fish", in the sense that the people is water, a means for the soldiers to survive.[72]

68. In more practical terms people supplied food to Falintil soldiers and were thus the source of power for the armed forces. In turn Falintil was considered to be the protector of the people (liman kroat povo), allowing them to live a life without oppression and exploitation in zonas libertadas.[73] Falintil was under the command of Fretilin, which was the guide (mata dalan) of the liberation struggle. The principle that regulated this relationship was "politics commands the gun" (a política comanda fuzil). According to Taur Matan Ruak: "Falintil was like the knife, used by political leaders to cut."[74]

Internal conflict

69. During the period of zonas libertadas, conflicts began to surface among the Fretilin leaders. These conflicts have been represented previously as occurring between ideological factions within Fretilin. This view holds that there were nationalist, social democrat, and Marxist, even Maoist groups, in Fretilin, and that the conflict between them was won by the Marxist or radical group.[75] Accounts received by the Commission describe a different ideological divide centred on military strategy.* This divide manifested through issues like how the principle of civilian control of the military was to be put into practice, the idea of "ideological suicide" (suicido ideológico), and the presence of civilians in Fretilin-controlled territories.

Politics commands the gun

70. The first conflict arose around the implementation of the principle that "politics commands the gun". According to Lucas da Costa's testimony to the Commission, opposition to this principle had already surfaced soon after Fretilin launched its "counter-coup", and it reached a crisis point in October 1975.[76] At that time, not long after Fretilin took control of the whole territory of Timor-Leste, the military commanders, who were mostly former Portuguese soldiers, had a stronger de facto authority than the political leaders.† Adoption of the "politics commands the gun" principle had reduced their authority. Their dissatisfaction was compounded by the fact that many of the political leaders had less military knowledge and experience than they did. Lucas da Costa (Rama Metan) testified to the Commission:

> When Fretilin took control of the territory, frictions were felt between the Fretilin armed forces and several commanders, especially here in Dili. It reached its peak in October.
>
> In Fretilin there was a principle, "A política comanda fuzil" meaning that politics controls the armed forces. [That principle] had been effective since we took control, it was released by the Fretilin Central Committee. So, because of that principle, some company commanders felt that their authority had been compromised because they had to obey the politicians, when it was they who actually oversaw the armed forces, the soldiers, and they felt uncomfortable about interacting with CCF members who were young or inexperienced.[77]

* Egas da Costa Freitas gave a different categorisation, which were socialist, social democrat, and "a rather fascist right." The first persons to mention the existence of "groups" within Fretilin were Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War Against East Timor (London: Zed Books Ltd, 1984). According to them, there were four "groups" inside Fretilin: the underground anti-colonial group, the Casa dos Timorese group, the "group around Xavier do Amaral," and the "group around Alarico Fernandes" (pp. 53-54). John G. Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War: The Hidden History of East Timor (London: Zed Books, 1991) proposed a different grouping: "social-democrat groups" (represented by José Ramos-Horta, Justino Mota, Alarico Fernandes, and Francisco Xavier do Amaral), the group "that combined the tough anti-colonial nationalism with economic independence and political advancement" (Nicolau Lobato with the support of former sergeants of the Portuguese army) and the "nationalist-Marxist" group around Mau Lear and Sa'he (in the revision version of East Timor: The Price of Freedom (London and New York, Zed Books, 1999) pp. 46-48).

† According to Jill Jolliffe, at the time the military police placed road-blocks around Dili and sent a delegate to the Fretilin leaders to demand the arrest of a number of Fretilin militants, considered to be communists. This incident was resolved through a four-hour discussion on 4 November, which managed to convince the soldiers that their accusations were wrong. [Jill Jolliffe, East Timor: Nationalism and Colonialism, pp. 185-186.]

71. This problem continued in the jungle after the invasion, culminating in incidents such as the death of Falintil's deputy chief of staff, José da Silva. José da Silva, a sergeant in the Portuguese colonial armed forces, was commander of Falintil's first company in August 1975. Later Fretilin appointed him as Falintil's Deputy Chief of Staff (Sub-Chefe do Estado Maior). After the invasion, he fought in Ermera, which became part of the Centro Norte Sector. Conflicts among Fretilin leaders occurred over some of the decisions reached at the Soibada Conference. Hélio Pina (Mau Kruma), who was elected political commissar with Antonio Carvalho (Fera Lafaek) as his assistant, was given the task of restructuring the civilian and military relationship as proposed at the conference. José da Silva refused to accept the restructuring and so he captured Mau Kruma and several of his commanders. A fire-fight ensued and José da Silva was captured and imprisoned. He was executed by Fretilin in the middle of 1977.[78]

72. It appears that conflicts about the principle of civilian control of military affairs were also factors in the executions of Agostinho Espirito Santo (a commander in the Fronteira Norte Sector), Aquiles Freitas (a commander in the Centro Leste sector) and Martinho Soares.[*]

Suicido ideológico

73. Fretilin's ideas about the revolution also caused conflict. As the goal of the revolution was to create a classless society, those from the upper classes, such as liurai, were required to abandon their special status in society and commit suicido ideológico. As Xanana Gusmão stated:

> Revolution was communism, no class, no wealthy people, no poor people, no exploitation, everyone was equal. The revolution followed communist ideology…so that there would be no classes and all of us would be equal, the upper classes had to commit suicide, those from the top must sit alongside the people.[79]

74. In the zonas libertadas opposition to Fretilin ideology was denounced as "reactionary" and considered a serious crime.[80] According to Xanana Gusmão, someone who continually committed reactionary actions would be considered a traitor.[81]

75. The execution of Aquiles Freitas is a case in point. Aquiles Freitas was a commander in Atabae when Indonesia launched border raids in October and November 1975. His last rank in the Portuguese military was staff sergeant (primeiro-sargento). After the 7 December 1975 invasion of Dili by Indonesia he became a zona commander in Quelicai (Baucau), his home. He was then promoted to the position of second commander for Baucau Region under first commander

* According to Lucas da Costa, Comandante Agostinho Espirito Santo often had disagreements with Political Commissioner César Mau Laka. [EN: CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.]

Reinaldo Correia (Kilik Wae Gae). Aquiles was not happy about being put under Kilik Wae Gae, who had been a private (soldado) in the Portuguese army, a lower rank than Aquiles had been.[82] A former Fretilin administrator in the Uato Carbau zona (Viqueque) told the Commission that Aquiles Freitas could not disguise his contempt for Fretilin and Falintil:

> ...one day he visited our zone office in Zona Furak Kaun. I was there. I was already the Vice-Secretário. It was strange because this man contacted only certain people; he never had business with the zona. From his words "What's Falintil?!" he seemed to be derisive of Falintil. So we finally concluded that he was indeed anti-revolutionary. And while I was the Vice Secretário, he never came to the office. We were derided as being officials. That is why I dare to say that he was anti-revolutionary.
>
> [Aquiles] came to Uato Carbau in 1976, if I'm not mistaken, around 1976 or 1977…I was still Assistente in Uato Carbau …I met him there, I knew for certain that he never respected the presence of the secretary, vice-secretary, administrators, assistants. He never did. I heard that he said: "Ahh, what is Falintil anyway?!"[83]

76. The execution of Francisco Hornay is another example of this conflict. Problems began at the time of the restructuring of Ponta Leste Sector by Political Commissar Sera Key after the Central Committee's second plenary session in Soibada 1976. Francisco Hornay rejected the appointment of Tomas Pinto as the Illiomar zone secretary because he thought that the position should be held by a liurai. Lere Anan Timor who was the vice-secretary in Illiomar zone at the time, told the Commission that:

> They didn't want Tomas Pinto to be the zone secretary, because they wanted a blue-blood. He [Francisco Hornay] wanted me to be the zone secretary, because I was a blue-blood. We opposed him because of the struggle, because we opposed exploitation…
>
> Tomas Pinto (Lesamau) and I made a report to the Regional Committee and Sera Key, the Ponta Leste Political Commissar. On the basis of that report they [denounced] Hornay's action as reactionary and part of the national reaction led by [Francisco] Xavier [do Amaral]. They held a meeting. No one was allowed to carry arms. [Hornay] stuck to his opinion, and said that Tomas could not be the secretary. In the debate [they] blamed Hornay. They took a unanimous decision…The political commissar, who had a platoon, ordered the troops to strip them of their weapons.
>
> The reaction was that nearly one company was stripped of its weapons. [The Commisar's troops] captured around five or six people and took them to Belta Tres (Irara, Lospalos, Lautém) where the Comissáriat was, and detained them for between one and seven months. After the political commissar thought they had changed, they were released. But after their release they didn't change, they still continued being reactionary. They were required to report to the zone, but they never did. They went straight to Aquiles in Quelicai (Baucau).[84]

77. According to Lere, Aquiles Freitas gave them weapons.[85] Francisco Hornay and two others were then captured again in Baguia (Baucau) and killed in Illiomar (Lautém).[86]

Military strategy

78. The most serious internal conflict within Fretilin appears to have been about which military strategy to use against Indonesia. Some political leaders, who came to be in the majority, thought that the East Timorese must depend on their own strengths and not expect outside assistance. Other military commanders and civilian leaders disagreed, believing that foreign assistance was necessary because of Indonesia's superior strength. In the first Central Committee plenary session held in April 1976 in Barique (Manatuto), there was a debate on this question. Requesting assistance from the United States and its allies was rejected because these nations were considered to be imperialist. Requesting assistance from the Soviet Union was also rejected because it was considered to be socialist imperialist.[87] According to Xanana Gusmão, in that meeting Francisco Xavier do Amaral said that it did not matter where the assistance came from as long as it came soon. Many military commanders agreed and showed their dislike of the political leadership.[88]

There had also been conflicts in the training of the Fretilin mid-level cadres; in this case the Fretilin leadership tended to choose youth:

Youth were brought in to become mid-level cadres, in which many youths were involved because in Fretilin's view, youth were easier to educate compared to older people, who were already familiar with colonial traditions. These youth became the liaisons between the people and the Fretilin Central Committee.[89]

79. Another conflict related to the role of the civilian population. Civilians had a very important role in the strategy of a protracted people's war adopted at the Soibada Conference of May–June 1976. At that time, further disagreements surfaced between a number of civilian leaders and military commanders, backed by Francisco Xavier do Amaral. For Francisco Xavier do Amaral, the presence of civilians could cause problems for Falintil, as they would be burdened with the task of guaranteeing their safety. He thought that it would be better for civilians, especially children and the elderly, to surrender to the enemy, while those who were physically strong would remain in the jungle to fight with Falintil.[90] This idea won support from military commanders.[91]

80. This difference of opinion was sharpened by the tensions between the military commanders and civilian leaders about the reduced authority of military commanders, which dated from before the exodus to the bush. The tensions were compounded further by the animosity felt by some of the former Portuguese army sergeants towards military commanders who had previously been political leaders. Lucas da Costa (Rama Metan) told the Commission:

> [Falintil soldiers who had served in the Portuguese army] felt uncomfortable interacting with some CCF members, who were young or inexperienced…There were some [CCF members], especially the young ones who, just because they had been brave enough to take away weapons, declared themselves commanders. Meno Paixão, for example, managed to confiscate a gun then made himself a commander.[92]

81. The former sergeants, who viewed the war from a purely military perspective, believed that the protracted people's war strategy was inappropriate for Timor-Leste.* They believed that foreign assistance was necessary, and that civilians should surrender so that they would not become a burden for Falintil. According to them, Falintil's ammunition was limited, because of the lack of foreign assistance, and would quickly run out if they had to protect civilians. As the war would continue for a long time, it would be better to use ammunition attacking the enemy rather than just protecting people.[93]

82. The supporters of the protracted people's war strategy considered the idea that civilians should surrender to be treachery. They thought that only with the people could they win the war. Strategically, people were considered a source of power, while ideologically the war was seen as a revolutionary war. The CCF was also concerned about the people's support for independence.† Lucas da Costa told the Commission:

> Friends, especially those from Portugal, wanted to keep people in the forest to be educated and become revolutionary. They thought that if people were to surrender without adequate knowledge of revolution, they would reclaim their previous social status and it would grow back, preventing the success of the proletarian revolution…[94]

* Xanana Gusmão remembered that a former sergeant, who served in an African country occupied by the Portuguese, opposed the Long Term People War strategy by saying that the strategy had worked in Africa because the guerrilla forces had bases outside the borders of their country, and in those bases they were trained and received foreign assistance. The same was not available in Timor-Leste. [CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004].

† Francisco Xavier do Amaral also mentioned another possible reason, that if people surrendered the world would think that it was only Fretilin that wanted independence, and that they did not have the people's support. [CAVR interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral [part III], Dili, 18 June 2004.]

83. For those who viewed the war militarily, the problem was how to drive Indonesia out of Timor-Leste. For those who viewed the war as a revolution, war could erase classes in society, and it had to be made with the people. As such, telling the civilian population to surrender was a betrayal of the national liberation struggle.

84. Many commanders who suggested or allowed people to surrender were captured or even killed. Examples include the capture of Sebastião Sarmento and his removal from the position of commander of Fronteira Norte Sector,[95] the capture of Francisco Xavier do Amaral and his removal from the positions of president of Fretilin and president of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste,[96] and the killing of Agostinho Espirito Santo (commander of Fronteira Sul Sector)[*] and Martinho Soares (a commander in Fronteira Norte Sector).[97]

85. The conflict regarding civilians was not merely ideological, but also related to military developments. With the increase in attacks by the Indonesian military, more parts of the zonas libertadas could no longer be defended. There were piecemeal efforts from military commanders and civilian leaders to negotiate surrender with the enemy.[98] Adriano Soares Lemos told the Commission:

> The Fretilin leaders Ali Alkatiri, Meno Paixão and Pedro Gonçalves from the Fronteira Norte Sector agreed to bring people down to surrender to [ABRI], because the people's condition was critical at the time... if they continued to stay in the forest, everyone would die of either starvation or illness. They agreed on the decision, so Ali Alkatiri and Filomeno Paixão had contacts with [ABRI] in Fatubessi (Ermera), to inform them that people would surrender. [ABRI] agreed to it, so on 6 February 1979, we began to come down from Fatubessi to the area of Caisoru [Liquiçá]. [We] surrendered to [ABRI] Battalion 512 on 7 February 1979.[99]

86. Such actions aggravated the conflicts between other political leaders and military commanders. When Meno Paixão, the commander of Fronteira Norte Sector, and a large group of political leaders and civilians surrendered in February 1979, the political commissar of Fronteira Norte Sector, Mau Kruma, refused to join them. He continued resisting until he was killed with his wife in March 1979.

87. These conflicts were never resolved within the Resistance itself; they ended when the Indonesian military offensive of 1978–1979 led to the destruction of the zonas libertadas.

The end of bases de apoio

88. The period of the bases de apoio ended with the major Indonesian offensive of 1978–1979. The offensive, which Fretilin called encirclement and annihilation (cerco

* According to Maria de Fátima Vaz de Jesus, Commander Agostinho Espirito Santo had a conflict with Political Commissar César Mau Laka on the strategies of war. [CAVR interviews with Maria de Fátima Vaz de Jesus, 23 September 2004 and Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.]

e aniquilamento),* began in mid-1978 with heavy assaults on the western territories (Fronteira Sul Sector and Fronteira Norte Sector). The offensive was then directed eastwards with assaults on bases around Mount Matebian and the Natarbora plain (Manatuto). The attacks then resumed in the west in the early months of 1979, to destroy the remaining forces in the region. This offensive involved strafing and bombings and artillery fire from navy ships, as well as attacks by ground troops (see Vol. I, Part 3.11: History of the Conflict).

89. Falintil could not withstand these new attacks with its static positional defence.† Unlike the Chinese during the war against Japan, Fretilin was unable to retreat to a remote base, unreachable by the Indonesian army, which was one of the basic principles of a protracted people's war strategy. Falintil's bases, such as those around Mount Matebian, Mount Kablaki, and Cailaco (Bobonaro), were reachable by Indonesian soldiers by land, air and/or sea. A Fretilin cadre described the destruction of the Manatuto base to the Commission:

> In May 1978 the situation became worse. The enemy began to surround us. In July the [Indonesian] military started "encirclement and annihilation" from the Central North Sector. Forces from Manatuto began to advance, then [they] came from Aileu, from Laclubar [Manatuto], we were forced to leave Hatuconan [Laclo, Manatuto] for Remexio [Aileu]. Then we circled from Aileu back to Hatuconan. Many people died there; because of an injured leg, people couldn't walk, new born babies, starvation. We just covered the dead with mats and then left them because we didn't have time to bury them, because the enemy was still chasing us.
>
> At night we moved on foot, in the morning we had to hide because the OV-10 fighter planes kept following and shooting at us…and dropping bombs killing many friends, families, people.‡ There were also some killed by landmines.

* It seemed that this term copied the term "encirclement and suppression" used by Mao Zedong in "Problems on War and Strategy" (written in 1938), published in Selected Works of Mao Tse-tung, Vol. 2 (Peking: Foreign Languages Press, 1967). That term showed on page 222 of this collection of writing.

† Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar, p. 18. One Fretilin document, Relatório da Delegação do Comité Central da Fretilin em Missão de Serviço no Exterior do Pais, mentioned that the "encirclement and annihilation" offensive launched toward the Fatubessi (Ermera) base on 1 January 1978 was contained by Falintil, but the battles escalated in Fatululik (Covalima), Dili, Remexio (Aileu), Baucau, Baguia (Baucau), and Bazartete (Liquiçá). Further battles took place in Fatululik (Covalima), Fatubessi, Fatumean (Covalima), Suai (Covalima) and Atsabe (Ermera) on the second week of March 1978 and many Falintil soldiers died. Then "encirclement and annihilation" was launched toward the Centro Norte, Centro Sul, and Centro Leste Sectors, and at the end of June Remexio (located 15 km from Dili) fell to the Indonesian army. [Relatório da Delegação do Comité Central da Fretilin em Missão de Serviço no Exterior do Pais, p. 5.]

‡ In the aerial assaults, aside from using the OV-10 Bronco plane, the Commission also received reports of Skyhawk bomber planes. [CAVR interviews with Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004; Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves, Dili, 5 August 2004.] It should be noted that the British government denied that Skyhawk bombers were being used for military operations in Timor-Leste at the time. [See Pat Walsh's written submission to CAVR, based on his testimony as expert witness during CAVR Public Audience on Forced Displacement and Starvation, 28–29 July 2003.]

When the OV-10 planes shot, people were not in bushes or the forest, but thousands of them in open fields, so many died…

In the encirclement and annihilation in July 1978, nobody surrendered. We then hid in Ilimanu [Laclo, Manatuto]. The next morning the Indonesian military bombed us in Ilimanu, until we couldn't escape.[100]

90. Maria José da Costa, who at the time was in the Centro Sul Sector base in Alas (Manufahi), gave a similar account:

In 1978, the enemy began the strategic siege in Dolok. Many died of starvation. All the people's food was burned, and some were abandoned by families. The siege was like this: warships fired from the sea, warplanes attacked from the air and burned the dry, tall grass, then the troops attacked on the ground.

It was the dry season [in August]. The army set the tall grass alight and the fire quickly burned the whole area as if it was soaked with gasoline. Those of us who were surrounded didn't have the chance to escape because the fire was so huge. Because of this desperate situation, many people couldn't save themselves. [The Indonesian's] strategy prevented many people from escaping.

People managed to escape the encirclement when the Indonesian soldiers returned to their camps to rest in the middle of the night. When we left we were still showered with bullets from the warships at sea. I witnessed many people being burned to death…

After we managed to escape the encirclement the enemy surrounded us in a semi-circle. With support from the sea, they drove us to a plain. This made us run in all directions and the enemy started to capture us.[101]

91. The eastern region base on Mount Matebian fell on 22 November 1978.[102] Falintil troops were divided into groups: some headed to the Centro Leste Sector to join the national forces, and some headed east to become guerrillas. Xanana Gusmão, who was an adjunto in Ponta Leste Sector, told the Commission:

...[O]n 22 November we split up on Matebian. Even though we were surrounded, we always tried to maintain contacts with the Central Committee in Centro [Leste]. We informed them that we could no longer hold out and they told people to surrender and form a guerrilla company in the Ponta Leste Sector…

We had contact with a nearby Racal [communication radio]. That was how we knew the situation throughout the country. We thought the other sectors were totally destroyed. Some people surrendered, some were captured.[103]

92. The last base destroyed was in Fatubessi (Ermera) in February 1979. Adriano João, a mid-level cadre in Fronteira Sul Sector, told the Commission:

> The base de apoio [in Fatubessi] was destroyed on 16 February 1979. People surrendered en masse because they were surrounded by Indonesian military warplanes, which were destroying the defence base around the Cailaco (Bobonaro) mountains. As a result of the Indonesian military campaign, nearly all people came down to the town on the orders of the adjunto, Rui Fernandes, and the commander of Sector Fronteira Norte, Meno Paixão, who wrote to us at that time.[104]

93. Xanana Gusmão states that before the zonas libertadas were destroyed, the Fretilin Central Committee decided that civilians should surrender and that Falintil troops should continue the Resistance war. The news of this decision was spread to all sectors. Jacinto Alves recalled:

> But when cerco e aniquilamento happened, the Central Committee realised that it was better if people surrendered… And it was then announced to the people that women and the elderly aged over 56 years and those aged below 18 years could surrender, and the rest could stay [in the forest].[105]

94. Surrender, which before the major Indonesian major offensive had been condemned as treason, was forced on the Fretilin Central Committee.* The decision did not mean that the struggle was henceforth to be carried out only by Falintil soldiers. The Fretilin Central Committee reminded people to keep helping Falintil and keep fighting for the independence of Timor-Leste, although they did not specifically describe how the struggle was to be continued.[106] Benvinda G.D. Lopes, an OPMT administrator in the Uatolari area (Viqueque), described her experience:

> On 23 December 1978, a letter came from Baucau informing Commander Calisae and Moiseskin: "Now people must surrender because this war still has a long way to go." On that same day my brother Moiseskin came and explained to us: "Now you can leave, you don't have to stay here, you'll die because there is no more food and medicine. We are telling all of you that you can surrender to Indonesia, but you must never forget one thing. Your hands may work for Indonesia but you must remember us always. You can go there but you must find a way to look for us, continue to contact us, you must not be scared." That night on 23 December 1978 we came down from Kilobuti [Uatolari, Viqueque] to Matebian. Then we surrendered to the Indonesian army.[107]

* Taur Matan Ruak compared two actions in different circumstances: "In 1976 when people voluntarily surrendered it was a big problem!…[A] big problem! Now…1979, this surrender, we didn't voluntarily come down. Because we were forced…and that was why the leader accepted this. They were forced to accept." [CAVR interview with Taur Matan Ruak (part II), Dili, 14 June 2004.]

95. Fretilin suffered many losses in this Indonesian military offensive. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, the former President of Fretilin and the President of Timor-Leste, was captured by the Indonesian army near the Dilor River (Lacluta, Viqueque) in August 1978.[108] Alarico Fernandes, the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste's Minister of Information and Internal Security, surrendered with a number of other Central Committee members.* Perhaps the biggest loss was the death of Nicolau Lobato, President of Fretilin and the RDTL, in a battle on 31 December 1978.[109] Other important leaders such as Mau Lear (the vice-president of Fretilin and the RDTL) and Vicente Sa'he (the national political commisar) were killed in February 1979.[110] Mau Kruma, the political commissar in Fronteira Norte, was killed in battle around March 1979.[111] After the offensive ended, only three members of the Fretilin Central Committee were left to continue the struggle from the bush: all the others died in battle, were captured, or surrendered to the Indonesian military.† Many of those who were captured or surrendered were subsequently executed or disappeared.

96. With the fall of the bases de apoio in 1978–1979, the zonas libertadas and the protracted people's war strategy were finished. Any hopes of pursuing a strategy of defending a particular area with people inside that area had ended.‡ The project of creating a new society without oppression and exploitation was also abandoned. People surrendered to the Indonesian army and then lived life under the occupying power. A number of Fretilin civilian leaders, Falintil commanders and soldiers who managed to escape formed small units and continued the guerrilla war.

* It is still not clear why Alarico Fernandes surrendered to the Indonesian army. Fretilin's official source said that it was a "treason" caused by his disbelief in their own strength and that he kept hoping for foreign assistance, that Alarico Fernandes tried to compromise with Indonesia and he separated himself from the Fretilin Central Committee and betrayed them [Relatório da Delegação do Comité Central da Fretilin em Missão de Serviço no Exterior do Pais p. 6). He was said to be involved in what was called the "Skylight" operation by the Indonesian military, which had the objective of capturing Fretilin's highest leaders. (CAVR interview with Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004; "Six Years of Heroic Armed Resistance," East Timor News, Winter 1982, pp. 10-12). Mari Alkatiri mentioned the possibility that Alarico Fernandes was disappointed because, after the removal of Francisco Xavier do Amaral as the President of Fretilin and the RDTL (in which Alarico Fernandes had a major role), it was Mau Lear who was appointed to replace Nicolau Lobato as vice-president of Fretilin and prime minister of the RDTL instead of him (Marí Alkatiri interview, 25 June 2003). Mari Alkatiri also stated that Alarico Fernandes "didn't have an ideology": he captured Xavier hoping that he would be appointed as vice-president of Fretilin and prime minister of the RDTL, and when that didn't happen, he accused Nicolau Lobato as "the hat that covered communists" and launched anti-communist propaganda [CAVR interview with Mari Alkatiri, 25 June 2004]. Xanana Gusmão called Alarico Fernandes a person who "joga sala, joga ba joga mai" (played around badly, played back and forth). Alarico suddenly proclaimed himself Marxist-Leninist in the 1976 Soibada Conference, captured and tortured Francisco Xavier do Amaral in 1977, and then surrendered and showed up in the "Skylight" operation. Xanana Gusmão called "Skylight" an "Alarico movement" and said that the Resistance leaders heard of the movement after Alarico surrendered in September when Indonesia was preparing for the incessant offensives at the end of 1978 [CAVR interview with Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004. See also Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict]

† The three people were: Xanana Gusmão, Fernando Txay, and António Manuel Gomes da Costa (Mau Hunu).

‡ According to Ernest Chamberlain, when the Base in Matebian fell, Falintil was converting its defence strategy from "positional-bases" to "moving", which involved reorganising troops into mobile troops 11,000 strong supported by guerrilla groups (Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar, p. 19). It is still not clear why this strategy was implemented only at the end of 1978, when the decision to launch the protracted people's war was taken in May 1976, a decision that meant that positional war would be replaced with moving and guerrilla troops.

Restructuring the Resistance 1981–1987

97. For the first two years after the fall of the bases de apoio in the zonas libertadas, the remaining Fretilin leaders in the Ponta Leste Sector searched for Fretilin Central Committee members and Falintil troops in other places. They tried to make contact with Fretilin activists and Falintil commanders who had been captured and were living in areas occupied by the Indonesian army. They sought out those they could trust to resume the struggle in a new form. They also tried to gather intelligence on the conditions under which the population in the occupied areas were living and on the strategy and deployment of ABRI units. Their ability to carry out these activities was limited by continued harassment by Indonesian forces, which culminated with Operasi Keamanan (Operation Security) in mid-1981 and which compelled them constantly to take evasive action to avoid direct combat (See Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict).

98. After the fall of the bases de apoio in the zonas libertadas Falintil forces divided into small units of three to four people. Previously the smallest unit had been the secção, comprising seven people. If they entered villages in occupied areas to establish contact with civilians, Falintil troop units would not carry their weapons or wear uniforms. Sometimes Falintil was able to form larger units for specific purposes. Xanana Gusmão recalls that in May 1980 he took a company (of about 60 people) as far west as Mount Kablaki in search of resistance forces still holding out in the bush.[*] The military commander, Kilik Wae Gae, attempted to build a fixed base that could support a full battalion.[†] One informant told the Commission that in early 1979 Xanana Gusmão and Kilik Wae Gae succeeded in forming a "brigade" consisting of four companies.[‡]

Reorganising the Resistance for the new situation

99. At a gathering of surviving military commanders and political cadres in March 1981 a new organisational structure for the Resistance began to emerge. The first "Reorganization of the Nation Conference" after the fall of the zonas libertadas was held in the area of Maubai on Mount Aitana in Lacluta Sub-District (Viqueque) from 1 to 8 March 1981. The conference was organised by the two members of the Fretilin Central Committee still actively engaged in the struggle in the bush, Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão and Mau Hunu Bulerek Karantaianu. The first item on the agenda was the inauguration of new members of the Central Committee: José da Costa (Mau Hudu Ran Kadalak), Bere Malae Laka, Reinaldo Correia (Kilik Wae Gae), Dinis Carvalho (Nelo Kadomi Timor), Sakin Nere Ulas Timor Lemo Rai, Holy Natxa, Tito da Costa (Lere Anan Timor), Hari Nere and Paulino Gama (Mauk

* Xanana Gusmão said that he conducted a search for Central Committee members all the way to Dili with a company of troops. [Xanana Gusmão, To Resist is To Win!, Niner (ed.), p. 64.]

† Lere Anan Timor, who at the time was a mid-ranking cadre in Ponta Leste, said that Kilik Wae Gae, a sector commander before the fall of the zonas libertadas, led this effort [Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.]

‡ A source related that "after Nicolau Lobato was shot dead", Xanana Gusmão and Kilik Wae Gae formed a "brigade" consisting of four companies: Lospalos, Laga (and Quelicai), Sul, and western Ponta Leste [CAVR interview with Sebastião da Silva, Viqueque, June 2003.]

Moruk Teki Timor Ran Nakali Lemo Rai).[112] Together with the two other Central Committee members, Xanana Gusmão and Mau Hunu Bulerek Karataianu, they became the leaders of the internal struggle. The members of the Central Committee living abroad retained their positions: Abílio Abrantes Araújo, Mari Alkatiri, Roque Rodrigues, José Luis Guterres, Guilhermina Araújo, José Ramos-Horta and Rogério Lobato. Abilio Araújo was also appointed Secretary General, while Xanana Gusmão was appointed as the National Political Commissar (Comissário Política Nacional).[113] They became the official resistance leaders.

100. At the conference, the members of the internal Central Committee decided to establish the Fretilin Marxist-Leninist Party (Partido Marxista-Leninista Fretilin, PMLF) and the Revolutionary Council of National Resistance (Concelho Revolucionário de Resistência Nacional, CRRN), and to form new structures for Falintil.[114] The reason for the change of name from Fretilin to PMLF is not clear.[*] Xanana Gusmão said that what they did was only to "ratify" the decision taken by the "pioneers" at the Laline Conference in 1977 when, following the lead of the Central Committee's Department of Political Orientation and Ideology (Departemento de Orientação Politica e Ideologica, DOPI) Marxism-Leninism was officially declared the party's ideology.[115] The Commission was unable to gather any information on party structures under the Central Committee. It is possible that the PMLF consisted only of the Central Committee, which had no subordinate organs operating below it.

101. The CRRN was intended to be the organisational vehicle for everyone who wanted to join the struggle to end the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste. The CRRN was in effect the PMLF's invitation to all Timorese regardless of party or other affiliation to join the Resistance to the Indonesian occupation. Clear information on CRRN's structures is also not available.[†] One source testified that the CRRN leadership at the national level consisted of Fretilin's political cadres, Falintil military commanders, and "representatives of the people [living] in Indonesian-occupied territories".[116] The Committees for Regional Resistance (Comissões Regionais de Resistência) was to operate as the arm of the CRRN in the districts and below them at the sub-district level would be National Resistance Centres (Centros de Resistência Nacional, Cernac) and at the village-level, Nuclei of the People's Resistance (Núcleos de Resistência Popular, NUREP).[117] But these structures operated unevenly throughout the country. An underground activist at the time testified to the Commission:

* Several testimonies stated that the reason for that name-change was tactical, to seek assistance from the Socialist Bloc countries. José da Conceição told the Commission that after attending the National Reorganisation Conference, Fretilin Central Committee member Mau Hunu explained to him that the change was needed to gain political and diplomatic support from socialist block countries in their struggle for national liberation. [CAVR interview with José da Conceição, Dili, 20 October 2004.] Justo Talenta gave a similar explanation. [CAVR interview with Justo Talenta, Dili, 3 November 2002.]

† António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak) said that CRRN consisted of: Xanana Gusmão, Mau Hudu Ran Kadak (Jośe da Costa), Mau Hunu Bulerek Karantaianu, Bere Malae Laka, Kilik Wae Gae, Nelo Kadomi Timor (Dinis Carvalho), Mauk Moruk Teki Timor Ran Nakali Lemo Rai, Ologari Assuwain, Lere Anan Timor, Konis Santana, Venancio Ferraz, Merak, Okan, and Taur Matan Ruak [CAVR interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 18 December 2003.] Six of those people, who were not members of PMLF Central Committee, were Venancio Ferraz, Ologari Assuwain, Konis Santana, Merak, Okan, and Taur Matan Ruak, but they were Fretilin's middle ranking cadres (quadros médios) or Falintil commanders.

The CRRN structure at the time was operating only at top level or in the forest, while there was no structure or base in the towns. It was just a kind of tactic to signal that an armed front [of the] Resistance, which wanted to continue the struggle, still existed. The structure only existed at the level of the Falintil command. The highest official was Xanana Gusmão. Only the members of Falintil knew the structure. We ourselves did not know exactly what the structure was.[118]

102. The CRRN had its headquarters in the forest. Some of the district and sub-district level organs also operated from the forest. Others operated clandestinely in Indonesian-controlled territory in the towns, villages and the new settlements.

103. Falintil's highest military authorities were the Commander-in-Chief (Comandante-em-Chefe) and the Chief of Staff (Chefe do Estado Maior), positions held by Xanana Gusmão and Reinaldo Correia (Kilik Wae Gae) respectively. They were in charge of four Falintil companies placed in each region where guerrillas were operating. Unlike during the period of the zonas libertadas, these companies did not have a fixed base but were highly mobile guerrilla units. After the National Reorganisation Conference, a Red Brigade (Brigada Vermelha), led by Mauk Moruk as the First Commander (Primeiro Comandante) and Ologari Assuwain as the Deputy Commander (Segundo Comandante) was created. It is not clear whether the Brigada Vermelha was one of the units of Falintil or whether all Falintil troops were reorganised under the Brigada Vermelha.*

104. The CRRN leaders were people who before the fall of the zonas libertadas were high and mid-level Fretilin cadres (quadros superiores and quadros médios) and Falintil commanders, an indication that the CRRN was dominated by Fretilin.†

105. The military division of the territory changed completely. Previously the country had been divided into six sectors; at the National Reorganisation Conference, it was divided into three regions (regiões):

* It seems that the Brigada Vermelha served the same function as had been performed by the Brigada de Choque before the destruction of the zonas libertadas. Their troops were not stationed in one place but were mobile and would launch surprise attacks on the Indonesian army. Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves, a former colaborador (staff) in the Falintil General Staff (1977–1978), said that the Falintil General Staff in 1977 devised a strategy of mobile warfare concentrating on a central line running from the extreme east to the western border. At the time the Resistance had evacuated the northern coastal area, and large numbers of people had moved to the fertile lands of the south. The central line stretching from east to west therefore became a shifting battleground for Falintil's Brigada de Choque troops. Several Brigada de Choque companies were formed and trained under the guidance of the former commander of the Fronteira Norte Sector, Sebastião Sarmento. [CAVR interview with Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004.] Ernest Chamberlain said that before the fall of the Matebian base there was a plan to form mobile war units totalling 11,000 people. [Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar, p. 19.]

† Xanana Gusmão and Mau Hunu were members of the Central Committee, which meant they were high ranking cadres. Bere Malae Laka, Lere Anan Timor, Mau Hudu and Konis Santana were cadres responsible for região and zones; they were the mid-level cadres. Kilik Wae Gae and Nelo Kadomi Timor were former Falintil commanders responsible for região, while Taur Matan Ruak was a company commander. There is no information on the non-Fretilin membership of the CRRN.

Table 3 - Military division of the territory at the National Reorganisation Conference
Region	Districts covered	Commander
Far Eastern Region (Região Ponta Leste, also known as Funu Sei Nafatin)	Lospalos, Viqueque, Baucau, and Manatuto	Kroasu and Lemorai
Central Region (Região Centro, also known as Nakroman)	Dili, Aileu, Ermera, and Liquiçá	Fera Lafaek
The Border Region (Região Fronteira, or Haksolok)	Suai, Ainaro, and Maliana	Venancio Ferraz [119]

106. District-level zones were also established and led by three adjunto - one of them became the main official (responsável principal). Each zone's adjunto oversaw several cells (celula), consisting of assistente (assistants) and activista (activists).[120]

107. These territorial divisions differed completely from those of the period of the zonas libertadas. At the time, the territory had been divided into political and administrative units as well as military ones. At every level of that structure political activists managed agricultural production, health education and cultural programmes. After the fall of the zonas libertadas, the regions were exclusively military in character and were based on guerrilla operations. There were no people left in the three regiões, making both civilian administrative units and their associated support activities redundant. The main work of the political cadres – the adjunto, the assistente and the activista – was to form underground cells in Indonesian army-occupied villages, to create and disseminate propaganda to sustain the people's commitment to independence, and to provide logistical support and intelligence for the guerrillas in the forest. And for these purposes a system of caixas (literally, boxes) was organised in every zone and operated by a liaison officer (responsável de caixa) and couriers (ligaçãõ).*

108. Without a civilian population in their midst, the internal Resistance now launched by Fretilin focused on armed struggle. The political cadres maintained contact with the people, not in order to organise them in "building new structures to serve the people", but to assist Falintil guerrilla units with intelligence and logistical support.[121] Their role changed to that liaison with the guerrillas in the forest and the people in the villages and towns under Indonesian occupation.

109. Given that the armed resistance was based in the forest, operationally the core of the Resistance was Falintil, not Fretilin or the CRRN. Fretilin, as the "guide"

* Ligação (connection) was then replaced by the term vias de canais (connecting channel) and from 1986 the role became better known by the term of estafeta [CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama (Criado), Dili, 18 May 2004.] They functioned as couriers carrying mail, intelligence and goods from one connecting hub (caixa) to another, based on Falintil's needs.

(mata dalan in Tetum) of the struggle, still formally set the political line, but as the struggle was now primarily an armed one, politics was chiefly the politics of the armed struggle. In the earlier period the Fretilin Central Committee, either in plenary sessions or, if the Central Committee was unable to convene, through its Permanent Committee, made decisions on the broad issues of policy, to which decisions on military strategy were subordinate. After the fall of the zonas libertadas the decisions that had to be made were chiefly about the armed struggle, and as such fell within the purview of the Falintil commander, sometimes, though not always, acting in concert with the Chief of Staff.* This was inferred in Xanana's statement in connection with the 1984 restructuring, which was not accepted by several of the reassigned commanders:

> I said as Commander-in-Chief that in the military there is no democracy. Either we make war or we don't make war. I made a restructuring…
>
> But the [real] problem is restructuring the military, [I] gave new instructions, took the initiative…If it is a political problem, we could have an intelligent discussion. If the problem is a military one, in war the commander gives the orders.[122]

110. The Resistance had become a fully armed struggle, with Falintil playing the main role. Fretilin's civilian structure was subordinate to Falintil's. The Fretilin adjuntos evolved into logistics and intelligence officers for the Falintil company commanders. As a revolutionary party, the PMLF seems to have existed only on paper. There was no longer mass mobilisation to "build new structures to serve the people" or for the "total elimination of all forms of exploitation". The PMLF activists took up arms to fight as guerrillas or to become couriers between the guerrillas and the people, to obtain food supplies, medicine, clothes and information on the enemy's movements.

Strategy

111. The new reality brought about by the fall of the zonas libertadas required new thinking from the Resistance. A "protracted people's war" strategy was no longer sustainable. The Indonesian army's relentless attacks had forced Falintil to split into small units.† After seriously reconsidering the military strategy, the remaining commanders and political activists determined that the war of resistance against Indonesia was to take the form of guerrilla warfare. Attacks were launched by highly mobile small units around the country with no fixed base. Intelligence would be obtained from civilians who were organised in underground cells (clandestina) in the occupied territories.

* In 1982 the Comissário Política Nacional's function was eliminated in Structural Readjustment (Rejustamento Estrutural). This meant that Xanana Gusmão relinquished the highest internal political position in Fretilin and from then on acted only as Falintil Commander. [Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste-Um Povo, Uma Patria, p.98; and Budiardjo and Liem, The War Against East Timor, pp xii and 67-70.]

† Xanana Gusmão and Taur Matan Ruak stated that initially they split troops into small units in response to the situation created by the Indonesian army; it was not a strategy adopted by the Resistance out of choice. [CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, part II, Dili, 10 August 2004 and Taur Matan Ruak, part II, Dili, 14 June 2004.]

112. Falintil's guerrilla attacks had as their tactical objective the destruction of targeted Indonesian troops, although at the same time Falintil recognised that it could never defeat the Indonesians militarily. The Resistance war shifted from its initial objective of expelling the Indonesian aggressors to demonstrating to the international community that Falintil was still capable of fighting a war of resistance against Indonesian occupation and that the Timorese people wanted independence.*

113. This military strategy was in line with their changed view regarding negotiations. During the period of the zonas libertadas, Fretilin categorically refused to negotiate with Indonesia. One of the slogans at the time was Negociação – Não e Nunca (Negotiation - No and Never). With the failure of the protracted people's war the leaders slowly began to see negotiation as a means to end the Indonesian occupation. The meetings between resistance leaders and the Indonesian army leadership were initiated in Timor-Leste in March–April 1983. They were known as the kontak dame (or kontak damai, peace contacts). Taur Matan Ruak remembers:

> We sought opportunities for peace. That was why in 1983 Xanana accepted the offer of contacts with Indonesia…Their overriding objective was to use the opportunity to strike at us…On the other hand we were thinking of how it could be used to reach a peaceful resolution of the conflict.[123]

114. During the various kontak dame Falintil proposed a plan for resolving the conflict through negotiations between the armed resistance and Indonesia under the supervision of the United Nations. Some of the Resistance's proposals, such as the one for the unconditional withdrawal of Indonesian troops, were still in the uncompromising tradition of the Fretilin of the zonas libertadas. Others included the establishment of a UN peacekeeping force in Timor-Leste to supervise the withdrawal of the Indonesian army providing security for the transitional government, and retaining Falintil troops "to protect people from pressure". The Resistance also proposed a referendum to decide Timor-Leste's political future.[124] This was clearly a softening of the position that had been taken in 1975. Then Fretilin had asserted that the East Timorese had the right to independence and that the people had stated their desire for this through Fretilin Central Committee's Proclamation of Independence on 28 November 1975. By proposing a referendum as a way to end the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste, Fretilin was in fact endorsing the position that had been taken much earlier by the diplomatic front: that since Fretilin's Proclamation of Independence stood no chance of gaining

* In 1983 the Indonesian army wrote a summary of the strategy of the Resistance as they saw it, namely that the objectives of the protracted war launched by Fretilin were: (a) to stay alive by avoiding decisive combat, so as to have the time to restore their forces while at the same time cultivating a high spirit of motivation and strong discipline; (b) to preserve and develop support networks in resettlement areas and in the towns; (c) to show their presence or existence, particularly in the months before the UN General Assembly; (d) to create conditions which would make ABRI feel unsafe anywhere in the territory; (e) to establish mobile bases in many regions, particularly in formerly fertile villages now abandoned by their inhabitants. [Attachment Document 3 in Budiardjo and Liem, The War Against East Timor, p. 197.]

recognition from more than a handful of states, the only course open to the independence movement was to seek to gain international backing for the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The right to self-determination). If in the past diplomatic efforts had been aimed primarily at winning the support of the socialist bloc and the non-aligned states, now the western bloc countries became important, not least because of their influence at the UN, including on the UN Security Council (see section on the Clandestine Front paragraph 145-170). The idea of the primacy of the struggle on the diplomatic front gained weight in resistance thinking, until by late 1984 it was the dominant view among resistance leaders. José da Costa (Mau Hudu Ran Kadalak), a prominent members of the PMLF Central Committee, said that the Resistance leadership now centred its strategy on dialogue and shifted its focus to the diplomatic front, in preference to the armed struggle, although armed operations were to continue whenever possible and necessary.[125]

115. At the same time another shift in thinking was underway. For several years the dominant view within the Resistance had been that Fretilin was the only true champion of independence; and the only true patriots were to be found within Fretilin ranks. After 1982 the idea that other parties and social groupings could also take part in the national liberation struggle began to gain ground. An important milestone in this process was the meeting between the Falintil Commander and National Political Commissar, Xanana Gusmão and the Apostolic Administrator, Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes, in the village of Mehara, Tutuala, Lautém District. At that meeting Dom Martinho said that national unity between Fretilin and UDT was needed if the independence struggle was going to succeed. At first Xanana Gusmão rejected the idea,* but slowly it became more acceptable until in 1983 the PMLF Central Committee affirmed National Unity (Unidade Nacional) as its official policy.[126]

116. The politics of National Unity and the idea of a negotiated, UN-sponsored end to the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste amounted to a radical shift in the ideology of the Resistance, which also had organisational implications. Hopes of gaining the cooperation of parties like UDT, especially its leadership abroad which rejected Timor-Leste's integration with Indonesia, could easily founder on UDT's abhorrence of Fretilin's revolutionary politics. Another party whose cooperation was crucial was the Catholic Church. Several priests, including Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes, had shown their sympathy for the predicament of the Resistance, though not for its ideology. The Church often protected people on the run from the Indonesian army and sent information outside the country. Relations between Fretilin and the Catholic Church had been strained in the past, as the conservative Church could not come to terms with several aspects of Fretilin's ideology.[127] To gain the explicit support of UDT and the Catholic Church, the

* José da Conceição, an adjunto at the time said that in the beginning Xanana Gusmão did not agree with the concept and believed that unification of Fretilin and UDT was like "marrying a frog and a crocodile". [CAVR interview with José da Conceição, Dili, 20 October 2004.]

PMLF needed to abandon its revolutionary politics. Monsignor Martinho Costa Lopes addressed this matter at his secret meeting with Xanana Gusmão in Mehara in 1982.[128]

117. The dissolution of the PMLF occurred during a Central Committee meeting held in April 1984.[129] Thereafter Marxism-Leninism ceased to be Fretilin's ideology, revolutionary politics were abandoned, the principle of " Negotiation – No and Never" adopted in the 1977 Laline Conference was dropped; and the PMLF became just Fretilin again.[130]

118. With those changes National Unity politics and negotiation as a means of defeating Indonesia became central to the struggle. This led to the CRRN becoming increasingly more visible than Fretilin. Although Fretilin, while still the PMLF, formulated the policies of National Unity, their implementation was a matter for the CRRN, which gave it a more important role. The reality was that the struggle was the armed guerrilla struggle led by Falintil. For this reason Falintil's role became more prominent too and so did Xanana Gusmão's position as a military leader. One indication of this was the decision to abolish the position of the National Political Commissar in 1982.[131]

119. Nonetheless, these changes did not go unchallenged. Several members of the Central Committee, including the Falintil Chief-of-Staff, Kilik Wae Gae, and the Red Brigade Commander, Mauk Moruk, opposed the decision to disband the PMLF. They also opposed the National Unity policy adopted the previous year.[132] This conflict caused a crisis in the Resistance leadership. Kilik Wae Gae and friends attempted a coup against Xanana Gusmão, the struggle's highest leader.[133]

120. Xanana Gusmão said that the dispute was not really about politics or ideology, but about his decision to reshuffle the military structure. Several units under the leadership of Kilik Wae Gae, Mauk Moruk and Ologari in the Central Sector were not taking the offensive against the Indonesian army, while Falintil troops in the eastern sector were facing repeated Indonesian attacks. Xanana Gusmão reshuffled several command positions, demoting the recalcitrant commanders to operational level. Kilik Wae Gae was demoted from Chief-of-Staff to Red Brigade Commander, Mauk Moruk was demoted from Red Brigade Commander to Company Commander as was Mauk Moruk's deputy Ologari Assuwain. In his testimony to the Commission, Xanana Gusmão said:

> I carried out a restructurisation. Mauk Moruk didn't have real plans to lead the company [into action]. He just sat up there in the mountains. The troops around him [kept him] secure. I said: "If you want to lead a company, then you will." Ologari, who was the Deputy Commander, just sat around doing nothing. I said: "You will also be a company commander." Because of this [change] they called me a traitor, that I was no longer a Marxist. They held on to the ideology, making it into a problem. But the [real] problem was the military reshuffle. I gave new instructions, gave new directions to the companies, ordering them: "Now find the enemy and kill them"."[134]

121. Other witnesses agreed that the reshuffle caused problems.[135] Cornelio Gama (Leki Nahak Foho Rai Boot), a company commander at the time testified to the Commission:[136]

> There were differences over PMLF. There was also an issue about senior commanders not getting positions. In fact most of them were demoted. Like Mauk Moruk, who previously was the Commander of Brigada Negra [sic] [Brigada Vermelha] and Ologari Assuwain, who previously was the Brigada Negra Deputy Commander [sic] [Brigada Vermelha], and Kilik Wae Gae, who previously was the Chief of General Staff. Kilik became the Commander of Brigada Negra [sic] [Brigada Vermelha], while Mauk Moruk and Ologari both became Regional Commanders.

122. Taur Matan Ruak, who at the time was on the staff of the Falintil General Staff, suggested that the movement of Kilik and his allies was "impure". Taur Matan Ruak reflected:

> Whenever President [Xanana Gusmão] created the Partido Marxista-Leninista, they would say: "the Partido Marxista-Leninista is the wrong politics; social democratic politics are better." Then when it changed to social democratic politics, they said: "This is not good, Partido Marxista-Leninista is better." Nothing was ever right, what did they want?
>
> Basically when a man defends an ideology, a theory or a view, he should have the capacity to defend it, to be ready intellectually to defend his views. But he didn't defend them and he jumped around. That was our case. We didn't know what we should call [the party], how to name it… I saw that there was something impure going on.[137]

123. But Mauk Moruk said that the cause of the opposition of Kilik and his allies was Xanana Gusmão's proposal to separate Falintil from Fretilin.[138] Whatever the cause of the conflict, what happened was that several of the commanders and political leaders who were at odds with Xanana Gusmão died or surrendered with their troops. The dissident group broke away from the main body of the Resistance group. Kilik Wae Gae and Okan, were killed fighting the Indonesian army. Mauk Moruk[*] and Ologari Assuwain ended up surrendering to the Indonesian army.[139]

124. The deaths and surrender of the opponents of the National Unity policy, strengthened Xanana Gusmão's position as leader of the Resistance. The Central Committee expelled Kilik and Mauk Moruk. The Falintil Commander-in-Chief assumed the position of Chief-of-Staff left vacant by the expulsion of Kilik.[140] The

* Aleixo Ximenes told the Commission that before his surrender Mauk Moruk sent him a letter saying that Xanana Gusmão would kill him if he found out that Mauk Moruk wrote a letter of surrender. When he met Aleixo Ximenes, Mauk Moruk said that after breaking with the Falintil leadership, Kilik faced the possibility of death at the hands of Xanana Gusmão or ABRI, should either find him. [CAVR interview with Aleixo Ximenes, Dili, 2 February 2004.]

demise of the opponents of National Unity did not immediately result in the CRRN becoming an effective vehicle for national unity. UDT, in particular, continued to refuse to cooperate with the CRRN. Taur Matan Ruak reflected:

> There were different interpretations of the CRRN… For instance UDT said [in the name] "Conselho Revolucionário"…[the term] "Revolucionário" came from those who were Marxist-Leninist… So they had their own definition. About the important field of strategy, the strategy for resolving the conflict… required a consensus… Consensus only existed in the armed resistance. But at the political level those who were abroad, those who were closely affiliated, like the Fretilin [External] Delegation they accepted it, but UDT and the others didn't accept it…[141]

125. This was probably the reason why the CRRN leadership continued to be drawn from Fretilin. A representative of the Resistance in Australia said that CRRN was not effective because of the internal conflicts within the Resistance leadership "and the lack of resources to resist and to fend off Indonesia's attacks".[142] Even so, there was some progress towards National Unity in March 1986 when an agreement was reached in Lisbon between Fretilin and UDT leaders to unite in the diplomatic struggle for Timor-Leste's independence. This became known as the Nationalist Convergence (Convergência Nacionalista).[143] This agreement proved to be fragile because of the persistent mutual suspicion and the sectarian attitudes among those who were representing Fretilin and UDT abroad. Reflecting on that period, Xanana Gusmão was later to observe:

> In 1986, the Nationalist Convergence was formed in an attempt to dispel the climate of suspicion that existed between the political parties but, once again, good intentions were not enough to create harmony between our separate objectives.[144]

Falintil after 1987

126. In 1987, the Falintil Commander-in-Chief, Xanana Gusmão, took the important step of establishing Falintil as a non-partisan movement, removing the military wing from the Fretilin structure. This decision, known as the "Structural Readjustment of the Resistance" (Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência), was taken at a meeting in Aitana (Lacluta, Viqueque), where it was also decided that the Resistance leadership had to remain inside the country and Xanana, as Falintil commander, resigned from Fretilin.[145] Detaching Falintil from its party political roots was intended to make the armed front a real national force and consolidate its leadership role in the Resistance. Previously, the struggle against Indonesian occupation had been led officially by the CRRN, with Fretilin at the forefront. With the "national unity" policy of the Resistance leaders coming increasingly to the fore, the CRRN became associated with the broader national interest. Fretilin, in contrast, was perceived to be more narrow and partisan. As the only real resistance against Indonesian occupation existed in the form of armed struggle, Falintil became the dominant force in the CRRN, with the Falintil commanders leading the struggle. As a consequence, Falintil was seen to be the only organisation truly fighting for the national interest.

127. Falintil's exit from Fretilin demonstrated Xanana Gusmão's new approach of "national unity" politics. The previous approach had been to try to unify the political parties of Fretilin and UDT under the CRRN. This had proved unsuccessful because of fundamental differences both within and between the two parties. The perceived "radicalism" of the Fretilin Delegation for the Exterior (Delegação da Fretilin em Serviço no Exterior, DFSE) was one such sticking point.[146] The new approach's emphasis on Falintil as a truly non-partisan organisation fighting the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste met with some initial resistance. Lere Anan Timor, a Falintil commander at the time, reflected:

> Falintil left Fretilin with a message from Commander Xanana on 7 December 1987… At the time I was with Mau Hudu… Mau Hudu asked: "Commander Xanana has spoken about it…about leaving the party…about the dissolution of the Marxist-Leninist Party. What do we think? How do we explain it?" I said: "You explain it. You have to explain it [because] you're the political commissar. I don't know how to explain it." This was a big problem…
>
> We retreated to a place near Vemasse and at night we held a meeting. [Mau Hudu] called me, I refused to [go]. The meeting was being held nearby [so I could hear it]. They started a discussion. Many commanders didn't want to accept it. [They said]: "Many people died, we suffered, we lost families… Why did he say that? Now the leader is playing games!"
>
> They didn't want Falintil to separate from Fretilin, didn't want the Marxist-Leninist Part abolished. But slowly, as the situation developed, they [finally] accepted the reasons.[147]

128. The next step in the campaign for national unity was the establishment of the National Council of Maubere* Resistance (Conselho Nacional de Resistência Maubere, CNRM) in December 1988 to replace the CRRN. The CNRM consisted of ten members: three Falintil commanders, five from the clandestine resistance front and two Fretilin members.[148] The Falintil Commander-in-Chief Xanana Gusmão, who was no longer a Fretilin member, became the highest leader of the CNRM with the title responsável principal. The power of this post was extensive, encompassing "full authority over all matters connected with the struggle in Timor-Leste, including international diplomatic struggle".[149]

* "Maubere" is a common Timorese male name and was first used by José Ramos-Horta to refer to the Timorese common man. It was subsequently taken up by Fretilin (see Vol. I Part 3: History of the Conflict).

129. In keeping with the decision to keep the Resistance leadership in the country, the Resistance Delegation for the Exterior (Delegação da Resistência em Serviço no Exterior, DRSE) was formed to carry out resistance activities abroad. Abilio Araújo (Fretilin's secretary-general), Moisés Amaral, and the outspoken former Apostolic Administrator of Dili, Dom Martinho Costa Lopes, were appointed the caretakers of the DRSE. The new structure replaced the DFSE.[150] The change was intended to reinforce the new non-partisan approach and combat the perceived ineffectiveness of the DFSE,[151] which was attributed to internal conflicts within its leadership. The DFSE resisted the change. Its response was to turn itself into the Fretilin External Delegation (Delegação Externa da Fretilin, DEF).[152]

130. The document Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência e Proposta da Paz (Structural Readjustment of the Resistance and a Proposal for Peace) set out CNRM's structure, including the new relationship between the DRSE and Falintil Commando. Falintil was named responsible for running the CNRM internally, while the DRSE was to function internationally through diplomatic representations, dissemination of information, cultural activities, and aid contributions to Timorese refugees abroad.[153]

131. In 1989, Xanana Gusmão appointed José Ramos-Horta as CNRM's special representative and his personal representative abroad.[154] José Ramos-Horta subsequently resigned from his position in the DEF to concentrate on representing the CNRM at the UN and elsewhere.[*] Thereafter the Resistance struggle at the international level was conducted by the CNRM alone and Fretilin's role in the struggle at the international level virtually ceased. The consolidation of the CNRM leadership at the international level was strengthened further by the appointment of non-political party representatives to key positions in a number of countries.[†]

132. The appointment of José Ramos-Horta as the CNRM special representative abroad, and the subsequent consolidation of CNRM's leadership at the international level, resulted in progress being made in the diplomatic struggle. Through the efforts of CNRM representatives abroad, a degree of unity was forged between Fretilin and UDT, which successfully collaborated in carrying out joint diplomatic initiatives. For example, in March 1995, in preparation for the All-Inclusive Intra East Timorese Dialogue (AIIETD), the leaders of the CNRM, Fretilin and UDT held an official meeting to formulate a joint strategy.[155] In September 1996 a joint delegation from the three organisations visited South Africa and met with the African National Congress (ANC), labour unions and parliamentarians to gain support for Timor-

* One source states that the reason for Ramos-Horta's resignation from Fretilin was that "not all [Fretilin] Foreign Delegation members were active in the struggle." [EN: "Fretilin: Roots of Friction," in Fitun (London) No. 11, September 1993.]

† For example, in the 1990s CNRM's representative for Australia and New Zealand was Abel Guterres, for the United States Constâncio Pinto, for Canada Abe Barreto, for Europe José Amorim Dias, and for Portugal Luis Cardoso ["East Timorese in the Diaspora," http://www.uc.pt/timor/diaspora.htm.]

Leste's independence struggle.* In recognition of these efforts, Xanana Gusmão stated in a 1994 message that Fretilin and UDT were "partners" of the CNRM.[156]

133. Despite efforts to turn the CNRM into a broad non-partisan national front, political resistance to CNRM as the leader of the struggle lingered. Xanana Gusmão noted:

> ..we made a pledge to our people to staunchly uphold the principle of "Unite to be able to resist better!" Side by side with our people, who easily understood the objectives of the CNRM, we were ready to cope with all the consequences. But there were distortions in the way the CNRM was perceived. It was seen as a party and incorrectly regarded as yet another player on the scene. It would have been better had this not been so…[157]

134. Although Xanana Gusmão did not directly name those whom he believed held "distorted perceptions" of the CNRM, he was clearly referring to UDT. At this time UDT still considered CNRM to be just Fretilin in disguise, and was not ready to accept Xanana Gusmão as the ultimate leader of the resistance. Francisco Guterres (Lú Olo), who at the time was the Fretilin vice-secretary, remembers:

> For over ten years the CNRM continued to promote national unity, but national unity still did not exist. Those of us who died remained in the forest, the enemy killed us every day, but what exactly did the people in the city want? Until finally you understood that [the word] "Maubere" was worse than Marxist-Leninist. That was why it was changed to CNRT in Peniche.[158]

135. The progress in achieving unity was only confirmed at the Timor National Convention at Peniche, Portugal, in April 1998. At this meeting a number of key political achievements were made. Firstly, the CNRT (Conselho Nacional de Resistência Timorense, National Council of Timorese Resistance) was established, comprising not only Fretilin and UDT, but also other political parties such as KOTA and Apodeti (Pro-Referendum), and non-political organisations such as the Church. Secondly, Xanana Gusmão was chosen as the lider máximo (highest leader) and was subsequently appointed President of the CNRT, with José Ramos-Horta his deputy. Finally, the word "Maubere" in title of the CNRM, which was considered by UDT as being synonymous with Fretilin and containing revolutionary nuances, was replaced by the word "Timorense" (Timorese).

136. The newly established CNRT consisted of three organs, the National Political Commission, the Executive Council and the Jurisdictional Commission. Xanana

* According to the ANC, the delegation consisted of José Ramos-Horta (CNRM Special Representative), João Carrascalão (Chairman of UDT), and Roque Rodrigues (Timor-Leste Ambassador in Luanda, Angola) [African National Congress, "East Timorese Visit," in the African National Congress homepage: http://www.anc.org.za/ancdocs/pr/1996/pr0910b.html.]

Gusmão was appointed the leader of the National Political Commission, while José Ramos-Horta became the chairman of the Executive Council. The membership of the National Political Commission consisted of party representatives, non-partisan organisations and a priest; the Executive Council was made up of representatives from both the political parties and non-political groups; the Jurisdictional Commission consisted of technical experts.[159] There were 22 people appointed to the three bodies in Peniche, all of whom were outside Timor-Leste).*

137. The detachment of Falintil from Fretilin and the establishment of the CNRM confirmed Falintil leadership of the struggle. This was reinforced in the document Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência e Proposta da Paz which set out the Falintil High Command's key responsibilities as:

- Deciding general strategy
- Providing the general political orientation
- Taking necessary action.[160]

138. Endowed with this authority, the Falintil High Command began to take charge of the political and military aspects of the struggle, with the development of the general strategy for the political direction of diplomatic efforts abroad, and the launch of continued armed resistance by Falintil against the Indonesian occupation army. Falintil's role in the overall struggle was described by Taur Matan Ruak: "There were three fronts: the Diplomatic Front and the Clandestine Front took their orders from the Armed Front."† In a speech in Uaimori (Viqueque) on Falintil's anniversary in August 2003, Xanana Gusmão confirmed Falintil's leading role:

> ...it was decided in 1987 to change Falintil into a non-partisan body to become the fundamental base to strengthen the whole resistance movement, which could then lead our struggle to final victory…[161]

* The National Political Commission's members appointed in Peniche were Xanana Gusmão, José Ramos-Horta, João Carrascalão, Padre Francisco Fernandes, Mari Alkatiri, Ana Pessoa, Alberto Araújo, and Domingos Oliveira, and four replacement members: Estanislau da Silva, Agio Pereira, Vicente Guterres, and Zacarias da Costa. Later in September 1998, 12 members of the National Political Commission were selected in Timor-Leste based on the decision of Xanana Gusmão who had the mandate as the president of CNRT to form the internal structure of CNRT: Abel da Costa Belo, David Dias Ximenes, Domingos F.J. Sousa, Leandro Isaac, João Baptista Fernandes Alves, Leão P. Dos Reis Amaral, Lú Olo, Manuel Viegas Carrascalão, Paulo Freitas da Silva, Taur Matan Ruak, Francisco Lopes Carvalho and Lucas da Costa (in Indonesia). The members of the Executive Council were José Ramos-Horta, José Luis Guterres (head of the Foreign Relations Department), Manuel Tilman (head of the Administration and Resources Department), Roque Rodrigues (Central Services), Emilia Pires (Regional Services), Pascoela Barreto (Finance and Resources) and Rama Metan (Youth Department). The Jurisdictional Commission members were: Carlos Alberto Barbosa, Jerónimo Henriques, Alfredo Borges Ferreira and Filomeno Andrade. [CNRT – National Council of Timorese Resistance (http://www.labyrinth.net.au/~ftimor/cnrt.html)].

† CAVR interview with Taur Matan Ruak, Part 2, Dili, 14 June 2004. José da Conceição (formerly an adjunto, and also after the fall of the zonas libertadas) said, "After the roptura (separation of the civilian and Falintil) the military was dominant. Civilian activists' role was to support the military, although they shared the same goal, which was independence." [CAVR interview with José da Conceição, 20 October 2004].

Falintil's Structures 1987 to 1999

The Falintil High Command was under the leadership of Xanana Gusmão, as the Commander-in-Chief (Comandante-em-Chefe). He was also the Chief-of-Staff (Chefe do Estado Maior), overseeing the Deputy General Chief-of-Staff (Sub-Chefe do Estado Maior) Taur Matan Ruak, Political Advisor (Conselheiro Político) Mau Hudu, and Military Advisor (Conselheiro Militar) Mau Hunu Bulerek Karantaianu.[162] The guerrillas operated under them in small units of four to eight people. During the CNRM period, the territorial structure of the armed resistance was the same as during the CRRN period. It was divided into three regions, Ponta Leste, Centro and Fronteira. Several guerrilla units operated in each region under the command of a regional commander.

The late 1980s and early 1990s was a difficult period for Falintil. Commander-in-Chief Xanana Gusmão later explained that there were fewer than one hundred of them remaining.[163] According to Indonesian army reports, there were 67 guerrillas in Ponta Leste, with 45 rifles operating in units of six people.[164] But in the wake of the Santa Cruz massacre on 12 November 1991, Falintil's strength grew from 143 guerrillas with 100 rifles to 245 guerrillas with 130 rifles.[165]

During the 1990s there were a number of changes in the leadership of the Falintil High Command as a result of the captures of several of its members by the Indonesian army. Mau Hudu, the political advisor to the chief-of-staff, was captured in January 1992. After the capture of Xanana Gusmão in November 1992, the CNRM'smilitary advisor, Mau Hunu, took over command of Falintil for a brief period, until he too was captured by the Indonesian army on 3 April 1993. Konis Santana (Secretary for the Comissão Directiva da Fretilin, the highest Fretilin internal structure) then took over command of Falintil in his capacity as the CNRM chief of staff until his death in March 1998. Despite these changes, formally the position of Falintil commander-in-chief and president of the CNRM still belonged to Xanana Gusmão, even though he was incarcerated in Jakarta.

In 1998 the territorial structure was overhauled. The country was divided into four regions; Região 1 covering Lautém and most of Baucau districts; Região 2 covering parts of Baucau, Viqueque and parts of Manatuto; Região 3 covering Dili, Aileu, Ainaro and parts of Manatuto; and Região 4 covering Ermera, Liquiçá, Bobonaro and Covalima.

Falintil's force of only 300 guerrillas in early 1998 had increased to some 1500 by late August 1999.[166] From mid-1998, the number of guerrillas increased rapidly for a number of reasons as former guerrillas returned to their units, young clandestine activists ran off to the forest to avoid capture by the Indonesian army, and the violence of the anti-independence militias, and East Timorese troops in the Indonesian army deserted.

139. Although the Frente Armada was responsible for leading the Resistance, Falintil's strategy for winning the struggle was not primarily a military one. Falintil commanders and political leaders realised that they did not have the military capacity to defeat the Indonesian army, which was far more advanced in terms of weaponry and personnel. For Falintil leadership the key to winning the struggle was diplomatic. Indonesia's invasion and occupation of Timor-Leste violated international law and therefore the integration of Timor-Leste into Indonesia was not internationally recognised.

140. In 1989, the CNRM proposed a peace plan, which envisaged a process sponsored by the United Nations, which would eventually lead to the holding of a referendum through which the people of Timor-Leste would exercise their right to self-determination. The process would involve the following steps:

- the withdrawal of Indonesian troops;
- the simultaneous disarmament of Indonesian-armed paramilitary groups and Falintil guerrillas;
- the establishment of a transitional government which would set a date for a vote on the political status of Timor-Leste;
- a cooperation agreement between the transitional government and Indonesia, with Australia, the European Union and other countries ensuring the rapid and peaceful development of Timor-Leste;
- the establishment of a government of National Unity for a period of 5-15 years at the end of which a referendum would be held and depending on the outcome, sovereignty transferred.[167]

141. The CNRM believed that through dialogue all parties to the conflict would be persuaded of the need to hold a referendum on self-determination. The struggle for international support came to be seen as more important than victories on the battlefield.* Armed resistance would continue although its purpose was no longer to win the war, but just to add weight to the demands of the wider resistance. Agio Pereira described the role of the armed struggle as follows:

* One of the premises of CNRM establishment was that the resolution of the Timor-Leste problem relied on taking the struggle into the international arena, not into the armed struggle. [Agio Pereira "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor," paper presented at a solidarity meeting, Sydney, August 1994.]

Inside East Timor, the Armed Front would mobilise the people to continue for as long as necessary, to at least maintain a quagmire in the battleground so that the diplomatic front could press ahead with a solution which meets the aspirations of the Timorese people and is internationally acceptable.[168]

142. The former Fretilin domestic vice-secretary of Falintil, Francisco Guterres (Lú Olo), told the Commission about its strategy:

...this defined the concrete strategy of resolving the conflict through negotiations. Resolution through negotiations did not mean that we didn't bring in the military to win the war, because the military alone wouldn't [win]. It was the troops' task to defend [the existence] of the army. As far as the Indonesian army was concerned, you could say that we were ready to attack by being defensive. But, we couldn't compare our army [with the enemy's] in operating on a military basis. We went on with the guerrilla [war] to create an objective situation, and a politico-military reality which would achieve the goal of liberating our land.[169]

143. Falintil guerrilla attacks on Indonesian targets were launched mostly for tactical reasons, to obtain weapons and other equipment needed to keep Falintil in existence. Another goal was to exhaust the Indonesian army psychologically. But strategically, the principal goals of the Falintil guerrillas were not military but political. The last Falintil chief-of-staff, Taur Matan Ruak told the Commission:

We evaluated the situation daily…on the international scene, we especially evaluated important events, parliamentary elections in [Indonesia], the presidential election [Indonesia], the 20th of May [the anniversary of the founding of the ASDT political party], troop withdrawals. On those occasions we undertook small actions that would have a large impact. That was why we normally made our evaluation based on such events. So, it wouldn't give people the impression that the situation was calm, which was why we had to create disturbances, why we always had to do something, however insignificant.

This could be considered a counter-campaign to their campaign to convince people that the situation was stable. But the aim was more to destabilise the situation. That was why the operations normally had a specific purpose. It might be an economic purpose, taking food, money, paper, clothes for our use… It might be diplomatic so that it had international repercussions... It always had repercussions of some kind. The repercussions might be more of a military kind if we took arms, and materials. And then there were times when the impact was strictly diplomatic, when we created a security situation which gave people the impression that the war would go on forever.[170]

144. And so Falintil launched its attacks with precision with a view to their impact on the diplomatic struggle, to impress on the world that in Timor-Leste there was still fighting and that the international community must take action to resolve it. From the time of the ceasefire in 1983, the CRRN, and then subsequently the CNRM, said that it would disarm if a peaceful solution, involving a referendum on self-determination, could be found. When the diplomatic solution bore fruit and President Habibie proposed a referendum to determine the future status of Timor-Leste, Falintil attacks virtually ceased, the Resistance turned its attention to preparing peacefully for referendum, and in August 1999 Falintil unilaterally decided to canton forces, as outlined under the 5 May 1999 Agreements on the implementation of the referendum.*

Clandestine liberation movement

145. The history of the clandestine movement during the Indonesian occupation is highly complex and, because of the nature of the movement, there has been very little written on the structures and strategies of the movement. The following overview has been compiled from interviews with former members of the Resistance, but the Commission notes that there is much scope for further research into this fascinating aspect of Timorese history.

146. The Commission has heard that clandestine activities began in the first years after the Indonesian invasion. Fretilin activists and their families in Dili and other parts of the country were organised into small groups and helped the guerrillas by providing food, medicines, clothing and information on the situation in the towns. These small groups evolved spontaneously without a common strategy, worked independently and made their own contacts with the Falintil commanders in the bush.[171]

147. These clandestine groups became increasingly important after the obliteration of the zonas libertadas (liberated zones). Two-way radio communication between guerrilla units, which broke down at this time, was replaced by communication through couriers.† The guerrilla leaders in the jungle established clandestine networks by forming organisations such as the Democratic Revolutionary Committee (Comité Democrático Revolucionário, CDR) and the Popular Militia for National Liberation (Milicia Popular da Libertação Nacional, Miplin).[172] Their main objective was to establish new support bases for the armed struggle because Falintil had to fight without logistical support in the forest. The network expanded

* Falintil troops were voluntarily cantoned in 12 August 1999 prior to the referendum on 30 August. Cantonment for Região 1 were in Atelari (Laga, Baucau district), for Região 2 and Região 3 in Uaimori (Manatuto district), for Região 4 in Poetete (Ermera district) and Odelgomo (Aiassa village, Bobonaro district). According to Falintil's information to UNAMET, 187 guerrillas were placed in Aiassa, 153 in Poetete, 260 in Uaimori, and 70 in Atelari, making a total of 670 people [D. Greenlees and R. Garran, Deliverance: The Inside Story of East Timor's Fight for Freedom, Allen & Unwin, Crows Nest, 2002, p. 182; Martin, Self-Determination for East Timor, p. 72-73,; see also Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict.]

† Those who at the beginning were called "ligação" (liaison), "vias de canais" (channels) and since the mid-80s became known as "estafeta" (relays). [CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama [Criado], Dili, 18 May 2004.]

over the years following the destruction of the zonas libertadas and was able to support Falintil's armed struggle, eliminating the need for a permanent base in the bush. The leaders of the Resistance were therefore able to claim that their bases de apoio (support bases) had shifted to urban and rural settlements controlled by the Indonesian military.[173]

148. The Falintil resistance leadership in the mountains tried to direct the clandestine struggle by forming Miplin. Unlike most clandestine groups, Miplin had a military-type structure. Recruits were organised in unarmed teams and platoons. Taur Matan Ruak, then Falintil operations commander in the eastern region between 1982 and 1984, explained Miplin's role to the Commission:

> The mission of those known as militia was usually to relay information about spies in their midst to prevent [the spies] from doing any harm, and about Indonesian [army] movements. Normally that is what we called a militia. But it wasn't necessary for them to carry weapons because there were no arms [to give them]…
>
> Miplin is a concept we created and it is difficult to compare it to the classic understanding of the term. Sometimes foreigners were surprised because they compared it with their classic concept...[laughter]…Their classic militias are armed and trained in the use of arms. We did not have arms...we used [the militias] to motivate the population to remain alert.[174]

149. Despite the early efforts of the leadership to formalise the clandestine structure, groups still operated independently. Groups formed by former political activists or guerrillas began to appear. At first they only exchanged information on the situation. Later, they started to have contact with Falintil guerrillas and to collect food, medicines and clothes to take to the guerrillas. These groups operated in cells of three to five individuals, known as a núcleos. People in these groups liaised between guerrillas and sometimes with other núcleos. Some groups were organised into networks which were controlled by individuals that the Resistance leadership in the bush appointed. Other clandestine groups were independent but had direct links to Falintil commanders.[175]

150. In 1986, the CRRN increased the effectiveness of the clandestine network by placing it under the co-ordination of the Inter-regional Coordination Organisation (Organização Coordinadora Inter-Regional, OCR).* The OCR was the regional arm of CRRN and operated through the civilian population. It remained effective until around 1988. Although its leaders worked hard in all regions to establish networks, not all groups could be placed under the OCR because the number of clandestine groups kept increasing and because the blanket presence of the Indonesian military and its intelligence network restricted their ability to operate.

* According to Vasco da Gama, Aitahan Matak and Paulo Assis Belo were active in this body. [CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama (Criado), Dili, 18 May 2004.]

151. An important development in the clandestine movement was the formation of urban student cells in high schools. These cells successfully infiltrated and controlled legal organisations such as the Catholic Scouts (Escuteiros) and the Intra-School Students Organisation (Organisasi Siswa Intra-Sekolah, OSIS) the student bodies in each high school set up by the Indonesian government. For example, the members of a clandestine cell called 007 in Dili, Constâncio Pinto and José Manuel Fernandes, were Escuteiros leaders.[176] Ricardo Ribeiro, a Sagrada Familia activist who in 1988 became the liaison between the clandestine and Falintil in the eastern zone, also became an OSIS organiser and eventually the chairman of the association in his high school Hati Kudus, in Dili.[177]

152. With the establishment of the University of East Timor (Universitas Timor Timur, Untim) by the Indonesian government in 1986, university students became targets for clandestine organisational activity. In early 1991 the members of several clandestine cells, including those formerly and secretly based at the Externato de São José school, established the Association of Anti-integration Youth and Students (Himpunan Pemuda, Pelajar, dan Mahasiswa Anti-Integrasi, HPPMAI) working primarily among university students.[*]

153. A parallel development took place outside Timor-Leste in the early 1980s, when the government of Indonesia started to send Timorese students to study in universities in Java, Bali and other parts of Indonesia. Among them were people who had been Fretilin activists during the period of the zonas libertadas. In Indonesia they continued their activism in a student organisation called the Organisation of East Timorese Students and Youth (Ikatan Mahasiswa, Pemuda, dan Pelajar Timor Timur, IMPPETTU), which had been established by the Indonesian military and government in an attempt to control them. Active students were able to use the organisation to serve the needs of the continuing struggle in Timor Leste.[†] In 1988, the National Resistance of East Timorese Students (Resistência Nacional dos Estudantes de Timor-Leste, Renetil) was established in Bali, and in the following two years was established in Java and other islands. At approximately the same time the Secret Commission of the Timorese Students Resistance (Comissão Secreto da Resistência Nacional dos Estudantes Timorenses, CSRNET) was formed. Among the students who continued their education in Bali and Java there were also activists from the East Timorese Catholic Youth Organisation (Organização de Juventude e Estudante Católica de Timor-Leste, OJECTIL) while others organised clandestine groups, like the Clandestine Front of East Timorese Students (Frente Estudantil Clandestina de Timor-Leste, FECLETIL), in their own places of study.[178]

* The Chairman of this organisation was Agusto Gama (who came from a clandestine cell at the Externato de São José and at the time was a member of the Comité Executivo) with Vasco da Gama as vice-chairman. Formerly Vasco da Gama had been active in the Raculima clandestine cell. [CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.]

† For example, João Freitas da Câmara, a political assistant in Bobonaro during the zonas libertadas, after his arrest by the Indonesian military was employed by the sub-district administration of Same and then obtained a scholarship to study at the Atmajaya University, Jakarta in 1981. He became active in support of the clandestine resistance inside Indonesia until his arrest and imprisonment for organising the first demonstration held in Jakarta on 19 November 1991 to protest the Santa Cruz massacre a week earlier. [CAVR interview with João Freitas da Câmara, Dili, 5 June 2004.]

154. Also at this time in Timor-Leste, demonstrations and acts of civil disobedience were increasing in number and intensity, along with other political actions in opposition to the Indonesian occupation. These included flying the national flag of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste, secretly writing messages on walls that condemned the Indonesian occupation and supported independence, and posting and distributing leaflets with the same messages. In Indonesia, in addition to demonstrations, students jumped the fence into foreign embassies to seek political asylum and to attract international attention.

155. With the proliferation of organisations and political activities, and the need to prepare for the expected visit of the Portuguese parliamentary delegation in 1991, the Resistance leadership tried to coordinate all clandestine groups operating in the territory. In June 1990, the political advisor to the CNRM, José da Costa (Mau Hudu Ran Kadalak), called a meeting in Baucau with leaders of the clandestine movements. As a result of this meeting, several clandestine leaders formed the CNRM Executive Committee of the Clandestine Front (Comité Executivo da CNRM na Frente Clandestina, more often known as the Comité Executivo or CE) in Dili. This became the official organ of the CNRM for the coordination of all clandestine groups.* Constâncio Pinto, who at the time was working as a teacher and was active in the clandestine group Orgão 8, was elected secretary of the Executive Committee, with Donaciano Gomes as Deputy Secretary I and José Manuel Fernandes as Deputy Secretary II.[179] António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak) was later added to the executive as Secretary III.†

156. The decision to form the Comité Executivo was also related to a new strategy adopted by CNRM.[180] This strategy, which aimed to obtain independence through diplomatic channels rather than armed struggle, required that the Resistance gain international visibility. When political actions such as the entry of students into foreign embassies attracted international attention, Resistance leaders began to see that the combination of clandestine activity and civil disobedience could achieve this goal. Avelino Coelho, one of the clandestine activists at the time, said:

> ...after we sought asylum [and] after the demonstration in Tacitolu [Dili], actions started being coordinated. Students sought asylum in the Vatican and Japanese embassies [and] then [Pope] John [Paul II] visited and there was a demonstration on 12…October [1989] in Tacitolu. Xanana also changed his strategy then and there, [having realised] the youth movement as an awesome power to strike. So there was still a guerrilla movement but [it was] not active in a military sense, more active in a political sense, as a source of inspiration for the struggle but

* Constâncio Pinto said that the committee was under the CNRM because with the increasing number of UDT and Apodeti members and their children joining the clandestine struggle there was concern that putting the committee under Fretilin would cause a schism. [Pinto and Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle, p. 123.]

† Avelino Coelho Silva, one of the founders of OJECTIL, said that Aitahan Matak was put into the Comité Executivo leadership by Mau Hudu after a protest. [CAVR interview with Avelino Coelho Silva, Dili, 17 July 2004; see also CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.]

> not using Falintil as a military movement because of lack of ammunition and for other reasons. And also to protect the movement itself. So in 1989 the strategy of the Resistance started to shift towards seeking asylum and [holding] demonstrations. In this period…the students' initiatives started to change Xanana's thinking, to change how he led the movement.[181]

157. The Comité Executivo was placed directly under Xanana Gusmão, the president of the CNRM and the commander-in-chief of Falintil. The role of the Comité Executivo was to monitor, direct and co-ordinate all clandestine movements.[182] It comprised several sections including ones for Youth and Mass Mobilisation, Agitation and Propaganda, Study and Analysis, Information and Security, and Finance. Although the Comité Executivo was formally under the CNRM leadership, this did not mean that all clandestine organisations and groups were under its authority. Some of the organisations active in Indonesia worked with the Committee but continued to operate independently. Similarly, in Timor-Leste, many clandestine groups maintained their individual relationships with Falintil commanders in the bush.* Gregório Saldanha, who was responsible for the Youth and Mass Mobilisation section, related an incident to the Commission to illustrate the problem:

> Sometimes there was stubbornness. For example, Constâncio Pinto brought a letter to Motael for Julião Mausiri about the visit of the DPP (Delegasi Parlemen Portugis, Portuguese parliamentarian delegation). Constâncio said: "This is a letter with instructions from Xanana."
>
> At that time [Mausiri] said: "I want all orders to come directly from Xanana and not through intermediaries." He asked Constâncio: "Where is the instruction letter?" So, formally he was refusing because he did not want to acknowledge the CE (Comité Executivo). But independently he asked his courier to ask for that information.[183]

158. António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), a vice-secretary of the Comité Executivo at the time, remembers:

> Organisations like 3-3, 5-5, 7-7 were not under the CNRM structure but they struggled for independence. OJETIL and Renetil were part of the CNRM structure.
>
> All organisations under the umbrella of Orgão 8 [joined the CNRM]. Sometimes [there were organisations that] had a network with specific commanders, like David Alex, Konis [Santana], Venancio Ferras, Merak and others. Those were special networks that did not go through Orgão 8.[184]

---

* For example, the Fitun youth organisation established after the formation of the Comité Executivo operated independently and maintained direct relations with the Chairman of CNRM/Commander-in-Chief of Falintil Xanana Gusmão. [CAVR interview with a Fitun founder, Armando José Dourado da Silva, Dili, 10 June 2004.] Gregório Saldanha admitted that the CE "could not control" all clandestine groups because there were too many as well as others who "did not admit to be involved in the struggle" [CAVR interview with Gregório Saldanha, Dili, 5 June 2004.]

159. Over time, the importance of the clandestine movement in the overall struggle to free Timor-Leste from Indonesian occupation increased. Falintil, which did not receive any logistical support or weapons from overseas, relied on the clandestine activists to obtain food, ammunition, intelligence and the support of the local population. Falintil's very survival depended on the clandestine movement. The Falintil leadership also relied on the underground movement to send information out of the country to activists playing their role in the Diplomatic Front who, without information from inside, would have found it very difficult to convince the international community to continue to take an interest in the Timor-Leste issue.

160. Despite its importance, there was no mention of the clandestine movement in the CNRM structure. The document Structural Readjustment of the Resistance and a Proposal for Peace from the CNRM leadership only mentioned the existence of two organs under the CNRM: the Falintil command and the DRSE. This indicated that the movement was considered to be under the command of Falintil as a channel of communication between Falintil on the one hand and the domestic support base and the Diplomatic Front on the other in support of the armed resistance.

161. The Comité Executivo experienced great difficulties when some leaders had to go into hiding to escape the security forces, which were hunting them after the incident at the Paulus VI High School in October 1990. One of the leaders ran off to the bush to join Falintil.[185] This difficulty was overcome by including people with past experience in clandestine work. One of those who joined the Comité Executivo remembers:

> When they began looking for us after the Paulus school incident, we managed to get away, myself included. I hid and then I surfaced again. Some of my friends went into hiding and only came out after Indonesia left Timor-Leste. Some even left the country. Others hid and when the situation improved came back again to continue their activities. At that time Constâncio Pinto continued to work. José Manuel [Fernandes] ran into the jungle and Adano [Donanciano Gomes] left the country. So the Comité Executivo's programmes stopped. I hid in Balibar [Dili] and after conditions improved I returned and got in touch with Constâncio Pinto and other friends such as Juvencio Martins, Jacinto Alves, Francisco Branco and Filomeno da Silva. Then we revived and reactivated the Comité Executivo and the climax came when we were arrested again on 12 November 1991 [after Santa Cruz].[186]

162. The Comité Executivo was hit badly by the crackdown that followed the Santa Cruz massacre of 12 November 1991. Some Executive Committee officials like Filomeno da Silva, Francisco Branco, Jacinto Alves, Juvencio Martins and Gregório Saldanha were arrested and tried and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. The Comité Executivo secretary, Constâncio Pinto, managed to escape overseas. The next blow was the arrest in Dili in November 1992 of the CNRM president and Falintil commander-in-chief, Xanana Gusmão.[187]

163. To restore its links with the clandestine movement in 1993 and to resume control of its activities, the CNRM, at the time under the leadership of Konis Santana, established the Executive Committee of Struggle/the Clandestine Front (Comité Executivo da Luta/Frente Clandestina, CEL/FC). The CEL/FC was formed as a wing of the CNRM with the specific task of co-ordinating the clandestine movement. The Executive Committee of Struggle /Armed Front (Comité Executivo da Luta/Frente Armada, CEL/FA) was established at the same time to conduct the armed struggle from the bush.[188] With the formation of the CEL/FC the position of the clandestine resistance within the CNRM structure continued to gain in strength. Probably at this time three forms of struggle – the armed struggle in the bush, the clandestine struggle of civilians in the villages and in the cities, and the diplomatic struggle in the international arena – were "made official" under the names of Armed Front (Frente Armada), Clandestine Front (Frente Clandestina) and Diplomatic Front (Frente Diplomática) although the Falintil leadership continued to be highly visible. Regarding the role of Falintil, the last leader of the Clandestine Front, Francisco Guterres "Lú Olo", said to CAVR:

> All groups, so that they could control the work of the Clandestine Front, were in contact with the Armed Front. But the Armed Front also established its own clandestines. The practical structure of the Clandestine Front functioned in Dili but it was mostly the Armed Front that coordinated the clandestines. Hence the Clandestine Front here in Dili had to coordinate with us [the Armed Front] so that the activities of the clandestines could be developed with various commanders…[189]

164. After the Indonesian military captured Xanana Gusmão it was suggested that the leadership be replaced by a "troika" comprising the leader of the armed struggle, the leader of the clandestine resistance and the leader of the diplomatic resistance. Konis Santana, CNRM's chief of staff, and Xanana Gusmão rejected the idea. Xanana retained his position as Falintil commander-in-chief and chairman of the CNRM while in Jakarta serving a 20-year sentence. However, according to Agio Pereira, the day-to-day operations were in the hands of Taur Matan Ruak, Konis Santana and José Ramos-Horta, who were responsible for the armed front, the clandestine front and the diplomatic front respectively.[190]

165. The CEL/FC was led by Keri Laran Sabalae (Pedro Nunes) as secretary and David Dias Ximenes as vice-secretary. They were helped by three adjuntos, Paulo Alves (Tubir Loke Dalan), Paulo Assis Belo (Funo Matak), and Virgílio Simith (Kranek).[191] The adjuntos were given the task of organising the clandestine movement throughout the country. The CEL/FC formed Regional Directive Organ (Orgão Directiva Regional, ODIR), which had responsibility for organising the clandestine movement in the districts. There were three ODIRs covering the whole of Timor-Leste: the eastern region (Paulo Assis), the central region (Paulo Alves) and the western region (Aquilino Fraga Guterres, Ete Uco). In theory the ODIRs presided over a structure consisting of the Zone Executive Committee (Comité Executivo de Zona, Cezo), operating at sub-district level, Nucleus of Popular Resistance (Núcleo de Resistência Popular, Nureps) at the village level and Community Cells (Celula de Comunidade, Celcom) at the aldeia level. In practice this structure did not function at all levels throughout the country.[192]

166. With the disappearance of Sabalae on 1 June 1995, Konis Santana, who was heading the CNRM in the country at the time, took over the leadership of the Clandestine Front.[193] With the formation of the CNRT to replace the CNRM in April 1998, the CEL/FC was replaced by the Internal Political Front (Frente Politica Internal, FPI).[194] Konis Santana remained the leader of the clandestine movement until his death on 11 March 1998 due to illness. Francisco Guterres (Lú Olo), who until Konis Santana's death had been the vice-secretary of the Comissão Directiva da Fretilin (the highest Fretilin organ in the country) became the secretary of the FPI with David Dias Ximenes still in the position of vice-secretary.[195]

167. The formation of the CNRT was followed by extensive organisational changes in the clandestine movement. The movement was restructured to bring it into line with the four regions structure of Falintil, with the addition of an extra region, Região Autonómica Dili, covering the capital and its district. The CNRT executive in the regions were drawn from the Clandestine Front and the Armed Front. According to clandestine activists, the CNRT executive unified the Clandestine Front and Armed Front structures.[196]

168. The top officials in each region were those of secretary and vice-secretary.* The secretary of Região 1 was Renan Selac, the secretary of Região 2 was Sabika Bessi Kulit (who was Falintil commander for that region) with Marito Reis as vice-secretary. The secretary of Região 3 was Falur Rate Laek (who was also Falintil commander in the region) with Virgílio Simith (Kranek) as his vice-secretary. The secretary of Região 4 was Riak Leman with Aquilino Fraga Guterres (Ete Uco) as his vice-secretary. The secretary of the Região Autonóm Dili was José da Silva.[197]

169. The existing clandestine organs from sub-district to aldeia became organs of the CNRT, but retained their old names (Cezo, Nurep and Celcom), but a layer was created to operate at district (sub-região) level.

170. Not long after the formation of the CNRT, Soeharto fell and Indonesia began to undergo a process of democratisation. This gave more room to clandestine activists to manoeuvre. The new Indonesian President, B.J. Habibie, created even more space for the movement to operate in when in June 1998 he offered "broad autonomy" to Timor-Leste. In 1999 the president went further with his offer of two options: broad autonomy and independence. Although in 1998 TNI-backed militias began to form to spread terror among independence activists, this did not shake the resolve of the clandestines. The clandestine organs from hamlet to region stepped up their activities and the population were emboldened in their demands for independence. With the arrival of UNAMET to conduct the public consultation, the focus of the CNRT's work became the task of preparing the population to vote for independence in the Popular Consultation of 30 August 1999. Having achieved independence through the referendum, the main task of the clandestine movement was over.

* Marito Reis, vice-secretary of Região 2, said that when establishing the structure of CNRT it was decided that the secretary had to be a military commander, while the vice-secretary should be "a political activist living in the city". [CAVR interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 17 November 2002.]

End notes

1. CAVR interview with Eduardo de Deus Barreto, Gleno (Ermera), 12 August 2003.
2. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
3. CAVR interviews with Adriano João, Dili, 23 April 2004; Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004; and Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004.
4. CAVR interviews with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004 and Adriano João, Dili, 23 April 2004 (both from researcher's notes).
5. CAVR interviews with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004; Adriano João, Dili, 23 April 2004, Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004. See also CAVR interview with Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003.
6. CAVR interview with Adriano João, Dili, 23 April 2004.
7. CAVR interviews with Julio Maria de Jesus (Unetim activist in Ponta Leste), 29 May 2004; Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004; Tomás Araújo, 14 October 2003; Agostino Carvaleira Soares, Cailaco (Bobonaro), 14 June 2003; see also Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.
8. CAVR interview with Agostinho Carvaleira Soares (former company commander in Fronteira Norte), Cailaco (Bobonaro), 14 June 2003.
9. CAVR interview with Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004.
10. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves (who after 1977 became a staff of Estado Maior das Falintil), Dili, 11 May 2004. See also CAVR interviews with Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004; Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004; Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 9 June 2004.
11. CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, 21 June 2004.
12. CAVR interviews with Sebastião da Silva ("Mendeo"), Ossu (Viqueque), June 2003; Agostinho Carvaleira Soares, Cailaco (Bobonaro), 14 June 2003; Eduardo de Deus Barreto, Gleno (Ermera), 12 August 2003.
13. CAVR interview with Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004.
14. CAVR interview with Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004.
15. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004.
16. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004.
17. CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
18. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
19. CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004; Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004; Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004.
20. CAVR interviews with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004;
21. CAVR interviews with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004; Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004; António da Silva; 10 June 2003; José Francisco Silva, 12 January 2004; Fausto do Carmo Mendonça, Remexio (Aileu), 16 October 2003; Fernando Amaral, Los Palos (Lautém), 28 May 2003.
22. CAVR interview with Eduardo de Deus Barreto, Gleno (Ermera) 12 August 2003.
23. CAVR interview with Umbelina Pires, Manumera, (Turiscai, Manufahi) (no date)
24. CAVR interviews with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004; António Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Manatuto, 11 December 2003; Office for Promotion of Equality, Office of the Prime Minister of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste, Written with Blood, Dili, 2004, pp. 18-19.
25. CAVR interview with Virgílio da Silva Guterres, Dili, 25 May 2004.
26. CAVR interviews with Eduardo de Deus Barreto, Gleno (Ermera), 12 August 2003; Fausto do Carmo Mendonça, 16 October 2003; Caetano de Sousa Guterres, Dili, 22 May 2004.
27. CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
28. CAVR interview with Virgílio da Silva Guterres, Dili, 25 May 2004.
29. Office for Promotion of Equality, Written with Blood, p. 19.
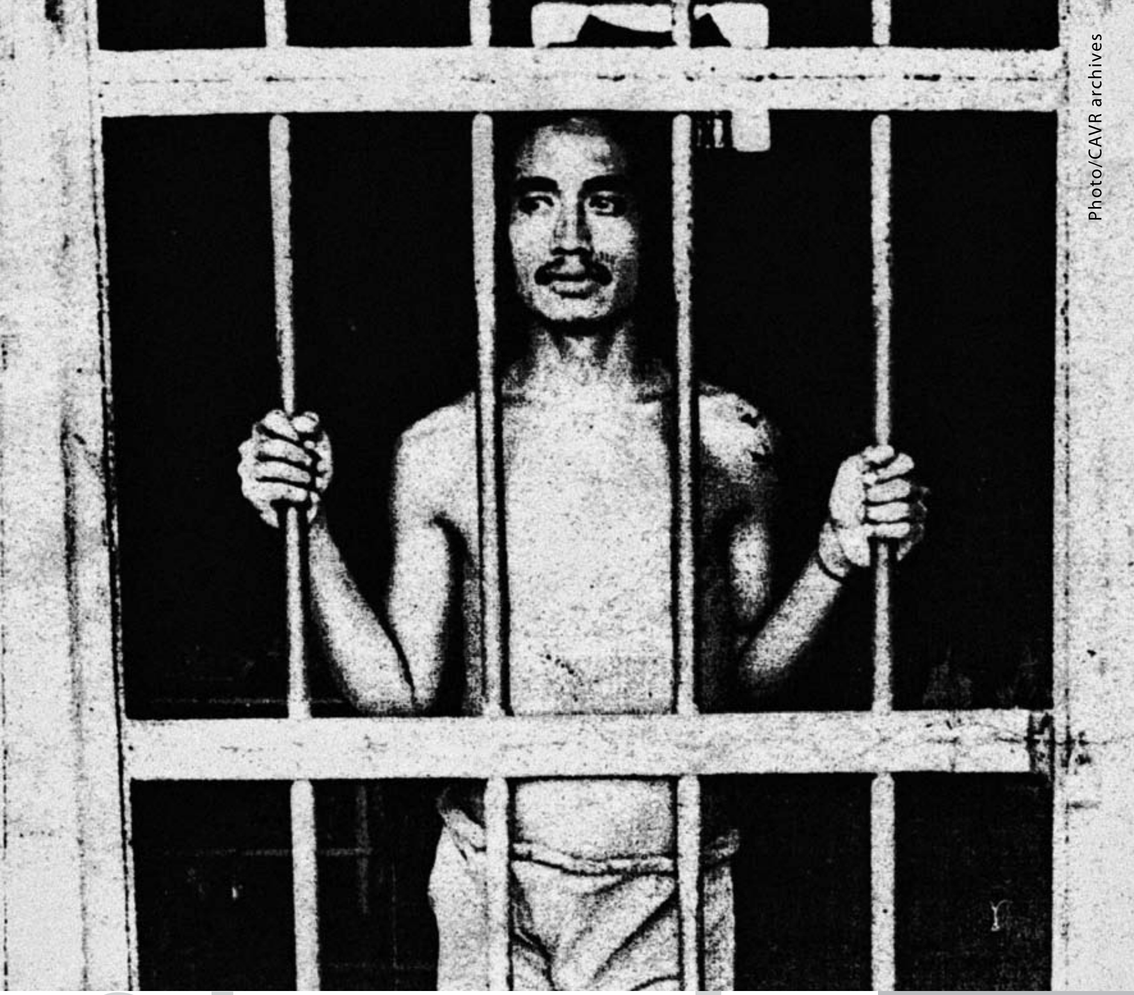
30. Office for Promotion of Equality, Written with Blood, p. 23 mentioned this activity in Modok Zona, Centro Norte Sector.
31. CAVR interviews with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004; Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004; see also Office for Promotion of Equality, Written with Blood, p. 20.
32. CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.



33. CAVR interview with José Francisco da Silva, 12 January 2004; with Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 9 June 2004; Fausto Carmo Mendonça, Remexio (Aileu), 16 October 2003.
34. CAVR interview with Virgílio da Silva Guterres, Dili, 25 May 2004.
35. Office for Promotion of Equality, Written with Blood, p. 23.
36. CAVR interview with Virgílio da Silva Guterres, Dili, 25 May 2004.
37. "Timorese Women 'Are Fighting on All Fronts", East Timor News, No. 14, 25 August 1977. This was written by the first OPMT Secretary, Rosa Bonaparte "Muki" and was translated and a little shortened by the East Timor News editor.
38. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004; see also Office for Promotion of Equality, Written with Blood, pp. 18-19.
39. Office for Promotion of Equality, Written with Blood, p. 21.
40. CAVR interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004.
41. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 August 2004.
42. CAVR interview with Gaspar Seixas, Illiomar (Lautém), 29 May 2003, and Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 August 2004.
43. CAVR interview with Eduardo Jesus Barreto, Gleno (Ermera),12 August 2003.
44. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
45. CAVR interview with António Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Manatuto, 11 December 2003.
46. CAVR interviews with António da Silva and Raquel da Silva, Ossu (Viqueque),10 June 2003; and CAVR interview with Bernardo Quintão, 4 June 2003.
47. CAVR interview with Alexandrino de Jesus, Hatolia (Ermera), 20 October 2003.
48. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 August 2004. Incidence of torture was also reported by Francisco Gonçalves. CAVR interviews with Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003; António da Silva and Raquel da Silva, Ossu (Viqueque), 10 June 2003; Domingos Maria Alves, Aileu, 15 October 2003; Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004; António Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Manatuto, 11 December 2003; Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
49. CAVR interview with Eduardo de Jesus Barreto, Gleno (Ermera), 12 August 2003.
50. CAVR interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004.
51. CAVR interview with António da Silva, Jakarta, 11 August 2004.
52. Departamento da Orientação Política e Ideológica (DOPI) Fretilin Central Committee document titled "The National Liberation Movement, Imperialism and the Puppet Parties," approved at the Highest Resistance Board session, Laline (Lacluta, Viqueque), 20 May 1977. This document was published again in ETNA with the title "National Independence is Not Only a Flag and an Anthem", East Timor News, No. 36, June 29, 1978.
53. Fretilin, Manual e Programa Política Fretilin, 1974, point 3.
54. "Timorese Women 'Are Fighting on All Fronts", East Timor News, No. 14, 25 August 1977
55. "Timorese Women 'Are Fighting on All Fronts", East Timor News, No. 14, 25 August 1977
56. Fretilin, Manual e Programa Políticos Fretilin, Manual Políticos, point 6.
57. Fretilin, Manual e Programa Políticos Fretilin, Manual Políticos, point 9.
58. Fretilin, Manual e Programa Políticos Fretilin, Manual Políticos, point 10.
59. Helen Hill, Gerakan Pembebasan Nasional Timor Lorosae, Yayasan HAK and the SAHE Institute for Liberation, Dili, 2000, pp. 104 and 107.
60. Manual e Programa Políticos Fretilin, Manual Políticos, points 11 and 12.
61. Hill, Gerakan Pembebasan Nasional Timor-Lorosae, pp. 131-132, 138.
62. Manual e Programa Políticos Fretilin, Manual Políticos, point 13.
63. Hill, Gerakan Pembebasan Nasional Timor-Lorosae, p. 95.
64. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR national public hearing on The Internal Conflict 1974–1976, 15–18 December 2003; CAVR interview with Mari Alkatiri, Dili, 25 June 2004.
65. CAVR interviews with Mari Alkatiri, Dili, 25 June 2004 and Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004; Jill Joliffe, East Timor: Nationalism & Colonialism, St. Lucia, Queensland, University of Queensland Press, 1978, p. 90.
66. See the testimonies of Mario Carrascalão, João Carrascalão, and Francisco Xavier do Amaral to the CAVR national public hearing on The Internal Conflict 1974–1976, 15–18 December 2003; See also Hill, Gerakan Pembebasan Nasional, p. 126.

67. CAVR interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004.
68. CAVR interviews with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004; Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 9 June 2004; Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
69. CAVR interviews with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004; Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004; Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004; Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 9 June 2004; and Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
70. CAVR interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004.
71. "National Independence Is Not Only a Flag and an Anthem", East Timor News, No. 36, 29 June 1978, p. 2.
72. CAVR interview with Marito Reis, Dili, 19 June 2003.
73. CAVR interviews with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004, Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004; and Albino da Costa, Soibada (Manatuto), June 2003.
74. CAVR interview with Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 9 June 2004.
75. CAVR interviews with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004 and Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004.
76. CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
77. CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
78. CAVR interviews with Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004; and Jeronimo Albino, Aifu (Ermera) 10 September 2003.
79. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
80. CAVR interview with António da Silva, Jakarta, 11 August 2004.
81. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
82. CAVR interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004.
83. CAVR interview with António da Silva, 11 August 2004.
84. Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.
85. Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.
86. Xanana Gusmão, "Autobiography" in Sarah Niner (ed.), To Resist is To Win! The autobiography of Xanana Gusmão with selected letters and speeches, Aurora Books, Victoria, 2000, p. 50; Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar: Resistance in Rural East Timor, Point Lonsdale, 2003, p. 16.
87. Xanana Gusmão, "Autobiography" in To Resist is To Win!, p. 32; see also CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
88. Xanana Gusmão, "Autobiography" in To Resist is To Win!, p. 32-33
89. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 16 Mei 2005.
90. CAVR interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, part III, Dili, 18 June 2004.
91. CAVR interviews with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004 and Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
92. CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
93. CAVR interviews with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004 and Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
94. CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
95. CAVR interview with Filomeno Paixão de Jesus, Dili, 17 June 2004.
96. CAVR interviews with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, 18 June 2004; Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004; and Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
97. CAVR interview with Alexandrino de Jesus, Hatolia, Ermera, 20 October 2003; Eduardo de Deus Barreto, Gleno, Ermera, 12 August 2003; Adriano João, Dili, 10 June 2003.
98. CAVR interview with Adriano João, Dili, 10 June 2003.
99. CAVR interview with Adriano Soares Lemos, Hatolia (Ermera), 12 August 2003.
100. CAVR interview with Manuel Carceres da Costa, Dili, July 2003.
101. CAVR interview with Maria José da Costa, Manufahi, February 2003.
102. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
103. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
104. CAVR interview with Adriano João, Dili, 10 June 2003.
105. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 August 2004.

106. CAVR interviews with Celestino de Carvalho Alves, Fatubessi (Ermera), 6 October 2003; José da Silva Amaral, Uato-Carbau (Viqueque), 18 September 2003; José da Silva, Dili, 18 March 2003; Francisco Gonçalves, Dili,14 June 2003; Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 14 June 2004.
107. CAVR interview with Benfinda G.G. Lopes, Uatolari (Viqueque), 16 September 2003.
108. CAVR interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Part III, Dili, 18 June 2004.
109. "Memoria Comandante Falintil Ida Kona Ba Nicolau Lobato," Nacroman, No. 2/VIII/2002, p. 3.
110. Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar, p. 20.
111. CAVR interview with Eduardo de Deus Barreto, Gleno (Ermera), 12 August 2003.
112. Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project interview with Lere Anan Timor, op. cit.
113. "Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência Nacional e Proposta da Paz," in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, Lisbon, Editora Colibri, 1994, p. 96.
114. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, part II, Dili, 10 August 2004.
115. Xanana Gusmão, "Ideological Turnaround," in Niner (ed.) To Resist is To Win!, p. 133; Xanana Gusmão, "Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência e Proposta de Paz," in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, p. 96; CAVR interview with Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão, part II, Dili, 10 August 2004.
116. Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, p. 71.
117. Ibid, p. 71.
118. CAVR interview with Eduardo de Jesus Barreto, Gleno (Ermera), 12 August 2003.
119. CAVR interview with Francisco Guterres "Lú Olo", Dili, 26 March 2003.
120. CAVR interview with José da Conceição, Dili, 20 October 2004.
121. CAVR interview with José da Conceição, Dili, 20 October 2004..
122. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, part II, Dili, 10 August 2004.
123. CAVR interview with Taur Matan Ruak, part II, Dili, 14 June 2004
124. Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War against East Timor, pp. 72-73; Jill Jolliffe, Timor, Terra Sangrenta, Lisboa, O Jornal, 1989, p. 137.
125. Agio Pereira, "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor," paper presented at a solidarity meeting in Sydney, August 1994.
126. Agio Pereira, "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor," paper presented at a solidarity meeting in Sydney, August 1994.
127. Hill, Gerakan Pembebasan Nasional Timor-Lorosae, pp. 161-162.
128. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Part II, 10 August 2004; José da Conceição, Dili, 20 October 2004; and Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project; interview with Lere Anan Timor, Submission to CAVR CD No. 18. See also Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict.
129. CAVR interview with Cornelio Gama (L-7), Baucau, 9 April 2003; Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.
130. Pereira, "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor".
131. "Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência e Proposta de Paz," in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, p. 96.
132. CAVR interview with Francisco Guterres (Lú Olo), Dili, 26 March 2004; CAVR interview with Cornelio Gama (L-7), 9 April 2003; and Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.
133. Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18; Xanana Gusmão, "Message to the Nation of H.E. The President of the Republic Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão on the Occasion of Falintil Day Commemoration", Uaimori, Viqueque, 20 August 2003. (English translation available at <www.etan.org/et2003/august/17-23/20fal.htm.>)
134. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, part II, Dili, 10 August 2004.
135. CAVR interviews with Francisco Guterres (Lú Olo), Dili, 26 March 2003 and Cornelio Gama, Baucau 9 April 2004; Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.
136. CAVR interview with Cornelio Gama, Baucau, 9 April 2003.
137. CAVR interview with Taur Matan Ruak, Part II, Dili, 14 June 2004.
138. CAVR interview with Aleixo Ximenes, Dili, 2 February 2004.

139. CAVR interviews with Cornelio Gama, Baucau, 9 April 2003; Taur Matan Ruak, part II, Dili 14 June 2004; Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", Dili, 26 March 2003; Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.
140. "Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência e Proposta de Paz," in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, p. 98.
141. CAVR interview with Taur Matan Ruak, part II, Dili, 14 June 2004.
142. Pereira, "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor".
143. Xanana Gusmão, "Message to the Nation", Uaimori (Viqueque), 20 August 2003.
144. Xanana Gusmão, "Message to the National Timorese Convention" (a message for the CNRT declaration convention in Peniche, Portugal, 1998), in Xanana Gusmão, To Resist is to Win!, page 214.
145. Adelino Gomes, interview with Xanana Gusmão, Timor-Leste, 2-3 June 1991, published in O Publico, 6 September 1991, reprinted in Sarah Niner (ed.), To Resist is to Win!, p. 149.
146. "Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência Nacional e Proposta da Paz," in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, Lisbon, Editora Colibri, 1994, p. 99.
147. Lere Anan Timor, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 18.
148. Pereira, "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor".; Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar, p. 34.
149. Pereira, "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor"..
150. Pereira, "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor".
151. "Fretilin: Roots of the Friction," Fitun (London), No. 11, September 1993, later was uploaded at reg. easttimor <www.hameline.edu/apakabar/basisdata/1993/10/13/0006.html>
152. Pereira, "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor"; "Readjustamento Estrutural da Resistência," in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, p. 102, footnote no. 14.
153. "Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência," in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, p. 102-103.
154. Pereira, "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor".
155. Carla Baptista, "Timorese Summit Meeting," Diario de Noticias, 16 March 1995 republished in http://www.hamline.edu/apakabar/basisdata/1995/03/29/0009.html.
156. Xanana Gusmão, "Message to the East Timor Talks Campaign" reprinted in Sarah Niner (ed.), To Resist is to Win!, p. 197.
157. Xanana Gusmão, "Message to the Timorese National Convention," in Sarah Niner (ed.), To Resist is to Win!, p. 214.
158. CAVR interview with Francisco Guterres "Lú Olo", 26 March 2003
159. CNRT – National Council of Timorese Resistance (http://www.labyrinth.net.au/~ftimor/cnrt.html).
160. Fretilin, "Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência e Proposta de Paz", in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, p. 103.
161. Xanana Gusmão, "Message to the Nation", Uaimori (Viqueque), 20 August 2003.
162. "Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência e Proposta de Paz", in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, p. 102.
163. Xanana Gusmão's address to the Falintil transition to FDTL ceremony, Aileu. 1 February 2002 (English version, "Address to the Transition Ceremony of Falintil to the New East Timor Defence Force" available at <http://www.pcug.org.au/~wildwood/febxanana.htm>.
164. Quoted in Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar, p. 35.
165. Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar, p. 36.
166. Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar, p. 46; Xanana Gusmão, "Address to the Transition Ceremony of Falintil," 1 February 2001, p.2.
167. "Reajustamento Estrutural da Resistência e Proposta da Paz," in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, p. 106-107.

168. Pereira, "The National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM), Overview of the History of the Struggle of East Timor".
169. CAVR interview with Francisco Guterres "Lú Olo", Dili, 26 March 2003.
170. CAVR interview with Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 14 June 2004.
171. CAVR interview with Cornelio Gama ("L-7"), former commander of Região 3, Dili, 9 April 2003.
172. CAVR interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004; CAVR interview with Henrique Belmiro da Costa, Dili, 25 May 2004; CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.
173. CAVR interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004.
174. CAVR interview with Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 14 June 2004.
175. CAVR interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004; CAVR interview with Francisco Guterres "Lú Olo," Dili, 26 March 2003; Constâncio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle: Inside The Timorese Resistance, South End Press, Boston, 1997, pp 96-97.
176. Pinto and Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle, p. 3; Constâncio Pinto, "The Student Movement and The Independence Struggle in East Timor: An Interview," in Richard Tanter, Mark Selden & Stephen R Shalom (Eds), Bitter Flowers, Sweet Flowers, East Timor, Indonesia and The World Community, London, Rowman & Littlefield Publishers Inc., p. 34.
177. CAVR interview with Ricardo Ribeiro, Dili, 14 May 2004.
178. CAVR interview with Avelino Coelho Silva, Dili, 17 July 2004.
179. Pinto and Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle, p. 124
180. CAVR interview with Avelino Coelho Silva, Dili, 17 July 2004.
181. CAVR interview with Avelino Coelho Silva, Dili, 17 July 2004.
182. Pinto and Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle, p. 123.
183. CAVR interview with Gregório Saldanha, Dili, 5 June 2004.
184. CAVR interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 8 December 2003.
185. CAVR interview with Gregório Saldanha, Dili, 5 June 2004; CAVR interview with José Manuel Fernandes, Dili, 31 October 2002.
186. CAVR, interview with Gregório Saldanha, Dili, 5 June 2004.
187. CAVR interview with Francisco Guterres (Lú Olo), Dili, 26 March 2003.
188. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.
189. CAVR interview with Francisco Guterres (Lú Olo), Dili, 26 March 2003.
190. Agio Pereira, "Obituary for Konis Santana", Timor Link, No. 43, June 1998.
191. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004; CAVR interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 11 February 2004.
192. CAVR interview with Eduardo de Deus Barreto, Gleno (Ermera), 12 August 2003; CAVR interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 11 February 2004; and CAVR interview with José da Silva Amaral, Ossu (Viqueque), 27 February 2003.
193. CAVR interview with Francisco Guterres (Lú Olo), Dili, 26 March 2003.
194. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.
195. CAVR interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 11 February 2004.
196. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004; CAVR interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 17 November 2002.
197. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004; CAVR interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 17 November 2002.

Chega!

Part 6.

The Profile of Human Rights Violations in Timor-Leste, 1974–1999

Part 6. The Profile of Human Rights Violations in Timor-Leste, 1974–1999

Tables:

Graphics:

6. The Profile of Human Rights Violations in Timor-Leste, 1974–1999

Introduction

1. In order to achieve the core objectives of its truth-seeking mandate, the Commission developed a number of programmes, including both qualitative empirical research and quantitative statistical analysis. This part presents the findings that resulted from the Commission's statistical work and discusses the methodological approaches used to reach these findings.

2. The introductory section (par. 1-23), provides a brief summary of key findings, an overview of the historical context in which the Commission undertook its demographic and statistical work, and an outline of the Commission's information management decisions.

3. The next section (par. 24-97) presents the Commission's demographic and statistical estimates of the total extent, pattern and trend of, as well as the levels of responsibility for, fatal violations in Timor-Leste between 1974 and 1999. These estimates are derived from statistical and demographic analyses of data collected by the Commission and from external data from official statistical bureaus and human rights NGOs. Although displacement is not necessarily a fatal violation, it is nonetheless closely linked to both conflict-related and famine-related fatalities. Therefore, the analysis of large-scale displacements is included in this section.

4. The next section (par. 98-177) presents an analysis of general patterns of non-fatal violations. The Commission was unable to find sources containing extensive information about non-fatal violations other than its own testimonies. Consequently the Commission was unable to make rigorous quantitative estimates of the total magnitude of non-fatal violations during 1974-99. The statistical analysis described in this section therefore focuses on a macro-level view of patterns and trends of non-fatal violations as revealed in the statements given to the Commission.

5. The following section (par. 178-204) presents a statistical case study of violations reported by the community of the village of Mau Chiga in the context of uprising by the Resistance in their area that took place in August 1982, and the subsequent crackdown by the Indonesian armed forces. This case study is used to highlight the patterns and trends of arbitrary detention, forced displacement and conflict-related deaths which were experienced during the "consolidation and normalisation" phase of the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste in all regions of the territory.*

6. The final section (par. 205-206) provides a brief summary and conclusion to the Part.

7. In addition, the Annexe to this Part describes the data collection and statistical techniques used to derive the Commission's statistical findings. It presents methodological background and detailed discussion about the various datasets, data processing methods used, record linkage techniques developed, and the analysis and estimation techniques employed.

Summary of key findings

Fatal violations

8. The Commission estimates that the minimum-bound for the number of conflict-related deaths during the Commission's reference period, 1974–1999, is 102,800 (+/- 12,000). This estimate is derived from (i) an estimate of 18,600 total killings (+/- 1000) using multiple systems estimation (MSE) techniques and (ii) an estimate of 84,200 (+/- 11,000) deaths due to hunger and illness which exceed the total that would be expected if the death rate due to hunger and illness had continued as it was in the pre-invasion peacetime period.

9. The estimated pattern of fatal violations over time shows a high concentration of killings and deaths due to hunger and illness during the initial post-invasion period between 1975 and 1980. The number of deaths attributed by respondents to "hunger or illness" rose to its highest level during the immediate post-invasion period, 1975-80. However, 1999 marked a high point for estimated killings, 2,634 (+/- 626).

10. The pattern and trend of deaths due to hunger and illness and to killing are positively correlated over time, suggesting that both phenomena have the same underlying cause during the first phase of the conflict. Of the killings and disappearances reported during the Commission's statement-taking process, 57.6% (2,947/5,120) of the perpetrator involvement in fatal violations was attributed to the Indonesian military and police, and 32.3% (1,654/5,120) to East Timorese auxiliaries (such as the militias, civil defence forces and local officials who worked under the Indonesian administration).

Displacements

11. Displacement was widespread: 55.5% of surveyed households reported one or more displacement events, for a total of 2,011 reported displacement events between 1974 and 1999.†

* In this Part, for the purposes of its quantitative research methods, the Commission defines regions in the following way: the Eastern Region comprises Lautém, Viqueque, Baucau and Manatuto; the Central Region comprises Manufahi, Aileu, Dili and Ainaro; and the Western Region comprises Ermera, Liquiçá, Covalima and Bobonaro.

† At the time of the 1990 census there were approximately 4.5 people per household. The 2004 census recorded an increase to about 4.75 people per household (924,642/194,943). The nominal confidence interval is 51.8-59.2% of households.

12. Most displacements occurred between 1975 and1980. The maximum years are 1975 and 1976, with 61,400 (+/- 13,300) and 59,800 (+/- 7,200) displacement events respectively. The number of displacement events in 1999 was substantially fewer, with approximately 28,100 (+/- 5,600) events.

13. Most displacements were local. Of all displacement events, 54.3% were within a sub-district, 15.6% were within a district, 17.4% were within a region, 9.3% were within Timor-Leste, and 2.4% were outside of Timor-Leste.* This finding may be limited by the restriction that people in refugee camps in West Timor were not interviewed. Many displacements occurred in rapid succession: 22.2% of displacement events lasted one month or less, and 50.1% lasted one year or less. However, other displacements were very long, so that the mean displacement period lasted 46.7 months.†

14. The institution that respondents reported most frequently as the group telling them to move was the Indonesian military (46.4%), followed by Fretilin/Falintil (15.0%) and militia groups (8.8%).‡ Respondents reported that "conflict" motivated 52.3% of all their displacements, with "forced by Indonesian military" contributing an additional 16.3%.

Non-fatal violations

15. The temporal pattern of reported non-fatal violations was similar to that for fatal violations: massive non-fatal violations during the initial invasion and occupation years were followed by relatively low-level violence during the consolidation and normalisation years and an increase of violations in 1999. Non-fatal violations around the time of the Indonesian invasion in 1975 were most intense in the western and central regions; after 1976 the focus of non-fatal violations shifted to the eastern region.

16. The observed statistical pattern of reported detention and torture suggests that over time (and particularly after 1984) the practice of arbitrary detention became more targeted and was used more regularly in combination with acts of torture. In the early invasion years there are approximately three reported cases of detention for each reported case of torture. After 1985 the two violations appear to be more closely linked, with approximately the same number of reported detentions and reported acts of torture each year.

17. Overall the Commission's quantitative findings are consistent with the hypothesis that individuals who were held in detention during the Commission's reference period were subject to increased vulnerability to torture or ill-treatment. Torture and ill-treatment were reported much more frequently among victims who were held in detention during the Commission's reference period: of the torture violations documented by the Commission, 83.6% (9,303/11,123) were suffered by victims who had experienced detention during the conflict. The abuses which were most often committed during known periods of detention were torture (46.9%, 4,267/9,094), ill-treatment (30.8%, 2,798/9,094) and threats (7.0%, 634/9,094).

* The nominal margin of error is +/- 10.4% for displacement within a sub-district, and 4.6% or less for the other estimates.

† The nominal confidence interval is 41-52 months.

‡ The nominal margin of error is +/- 4.2%.

18. The demographics of victims varied for different violation types. Relative to the overall East Timorese population middle-aged males experienced the highest rates of non-fatal violations such as detention, torture and ill-treatment. By contrast sexually-based violations were almost exclusively targeted against women, with 90.2% (769/853) of reported sexually-based violations being experienced by women.

19. The Commission's quantitative data suggest a notable difference in the pattern of responsibility for non-fatal violations between 1975 and 1998 relative to non-fatal violations in 1999. In particular, between 1975 and 1998, 51.7% (11,658/22,547) of acts of arbitrary detention are attributed to the Indonesian military acting alone relative to 8.4% (1,897/22,457) of acts of detention which were solely attributed to East Timorese auxiliaries or jointly to both the Indonesian occupying force and their East Timorese auxiliaries. However, of the acts of arbitrary detention in 1999 documented by the Commission, 75.7% (2,104/2,779) were attributed to either the East Timorese auxiliaries acting alone or in collaboration with the Indonesian military and police. 19.2% (534/2.779) of documented acts of detention which occurred in 1999 were attributed to the Indonesian military alone.

Overview of the Commission's information management and data collection methods

20. Most truth commissions base their empirical findings principally on databases derived from the large-scale collection of qualitative testimonies. In this, the CAVR was no different from the commissions in Haiti, South Africa or Peru. In other countries the truth commissions were able to draw on substantial additional information that had been collected by governmental and non-governmental human rights projects. Additional sources are important in order to "triangulate" or understand the patterns and magnitude of human rights events from perspectives other than a commission's own qualitative material. Without outside corroboration, the work of commissions could be dismissed as partisan.

21. The Commission did not have massive external sources available, so new sources were created. First, the Commission developed a Human Rights Violations Database (HRVD) from the narrative testimonies which it collected through direct witness and victim declarations. This was part of the Commission's community socialisation process, which sought to address truth-seeking objectives and to promote reconciliation and reception. The Commission used the HRVD narratives for both qualitative and quantitative research.

22. Second, the Commission developed a retrospective mortality survey (RMS) of 1,396 households that were randomly selected from Timor-Leste's approximately 180,000 households. Each sampled household gave information about their residence pattern and household members and relatives who died during the Commission's mandate period. Mortality surveys of this kind are common among governmental statistical offices to assess health conditions or to adjust censuses. Inter-governmental health authorities and academic demographers and epidemiologists also conduct surveys of this kind. However, no truth commission has ever before conducted a rigorously sampled household survey.

23. A third dataset collected by the Commission was the graveyard census database (GCD). Public cemeteries in Timor-Leste were visited, and the name, date of birth and date of death was recorded for every grave on which this information was present. Approximately 327,000 grave records were collected; after duplicate enumerations are removed, there are approximately 319,000 unique graves in the sample, of which about half have complete name and date information. Cemetery records have been used by historical demographers to reconstruct historical patterns of mortality, but no truth commission has ever used data of this kind before as part of the reconstruction of historical memory. In the world of human rights measurement these are valuable innovations which greatly enrich our understanding of the past.

Historical violation estimates in Timor-Leste and their limitations

Historical estimates of the conflict-related death toll in Timor-Leste (1974–1999)

24. The scale of conflict-related mortality during Indonesia's occupation of Timor-Leste has been the subject of considerable debate: estimates range from a low of 40,000 to more than 200,000.* The best-informed commentators have concluded their analyses by recommending that direct evidence be gathered and analysed to arrive at a more reliable estimate. For example, the historian Robert Cribb suggests that there are five techniques for measuring total deaths:

- perpetrators' accounts
- counting physical bodies or graves
- capturing historical memory through interviews
- indirect estimates via census records
- "intuitive" estimates projected from informed observers' understanding of local conditions.

25. Cribb laments that in 1999–2001, at the time that he published a series of papers on the subject, all the available estimates to date, including his own, were limited to the two weakest methods: indirect and intuitive estimates. In his extensive review of estimates of conflict-related mortality in Timor-Leste, John Waddingham writes: "We have to concede, however, that it is not yet possible to produce from available evidence, a quantitatively accurate, generally agreed figure on the death toll in Timor-Leste."[1]

* Estimates based on official Portuguese, Indonesian and Catholic Church data suggest an overall magnitude of approximately 200,000 deaths. See, for example, Ben Kiernan, "The Demography of Genocide in Southeast Asia: The Death tolls in Cambodia, 1975-79, and East Timor, 1975-80", Critical Asian Studies 35:4, (2003), pp. 585-597, and Geoffrey Gunn, East Timor and the United Nations: The Case for Intervention, Red Sea Press, Lawrenceville, NJ:1997, pp. 26-27. On the lower side, see Robert Cribb, "How Many Deaths? Problems in the statistics of massacre in Indonesia (1965–1966) and East Timor (1975–1980)", in Ingrid Wessel and Georgia Wimhoefer, eds. Violence in Indonesia, Abera-Verl, Hamburg: 2001. John Waddingham offers a review of estimates derived from "intuitive" and indirect methods: see John Waddingham, "Timor-Leste Death Toll Claims: a Proposal for Listing and Critical Commentary," Submission to CAVR, 14 July 2003.

26. The Commission was acutely aware of the sensitivity and importance of the estimation of total and disaggregated mortality patterns. Other truth commissions (particularly those in El Salvador, Guatemala and Peru) benefited from the existence of extensive, if still partial, registries of deaths that had been documented before the commissions began their work. Information of this kind was not available to the CAVR, and so three new datasets were created: a qualitative survey of respondents self-motivated to give testimony to the Commission; a probability sample of 1,396 households from which retrospective conflict-related mortality histories were taken; and a census of public graveyards in Timor-Leste. These sources fit Cribb's second and third definitions of data sources that could be used to analyse mortality.

27. While human rights activists sometimes cited the large variation in estimates as evidence of high mortality resulting from the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste, a possible explanation may be the lack of reliable population and demographic data for the period. The last population census in Timor-Leste before the Indonesian invasion was carried out by the Portuguese colonial administration in 1970. Censuses were conducted by the Indonesian authorities in 1980 and 1990, but their accuracy is questionable. The East Timorese population's suspicion, fear and general resistance to the government conducting the census combined with its frequent displacement introduced significant measurement challenges.

28. Even if the 1980 and 1990 census figures were accurate, their inclusion of only population counts without disaggregating by key demographic variables data (such as age and sex) substantially reduces social scientists' ability to apply standard demographic estimation techniques to the official population data. Non-governmental sources of population information are also of limited value due to the severely restricted access independent monitors and humanitarian groups had to Timor-Leste during the conflict. In the context of Timor-Leste, the demographer Terence Hull noted that "the variety of estimates in the BPS (Biro Pusat Statistik, Central Statistical Bureau) publications is not an indication of political manipulation of data, but rather the real difficulty of ascertaining mortality levels for small populations when using indirect demographic methods of estimation."[2] Given these limitations, the scientific debate about mortality in Timor-Leste has been unresolved.

29. Many of the problems facing earlier analysts were resolved by the publication of the preliminary results of the 2004 Timor-Leste census in March 2005. The Commission's mortality analysis has drawn heavily on the new census data to weight survey results appropriately.

Previous evidence on forced migration and displacement

30. Large sectors of the population were displaced during the conflict, especially during the early years of the occupation (1975-80) and in 1999. For example, according to Indonesian official figures, either 268,644 or 318,921 "displaced persons" were held in a total of 15 centres in December 1978.[3] Qualitative reports and the Commission's own research show that people were forcibly moved to resettlement camps where a highly restrictive security regime severely limited their opportunities for growing food crops and their access to food sources (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). As with the estimation of conflict-related fatalities, accurate demographic analysis of displacement in Timor-Leste, especially in the early invasion years is complicated because there are few existing data. This is largely due to the absence of a systematic, country-wide administrative registration system and the limited access to the civilian population permitted to international humanitarian and human rights organisations during the conflict.

Non-fatal violations in Timor-Leste

31. The extent and depth of information about the human rights situation in Timor-Leste during the Indonesian occupation varied over time. In particular, access to the territory by international human rights monitors was severely restricted by the Indonesian government. Furthermore, the access of international humanitarian agencies (such as the ICRC and Catholic Relief Services) to the territory was restricted to particular areas and particular time periods. International organisations' limited physical access to the territory significantly shaped the international community's knowledge about the human rights situation in Timor-Leste.

Fatal violations: analysis

Background and overview of statistical analysis of fatal violations

32. In the analysis of mortality due to conflict in Timor-Leste, various authors have used varying terms for the manner in which people died. For example, a 2002 essay notes that in Maubisse, 5,021 of the 9,607 inhabitants alive in 1975 were killed by April 1979.[4] However, the original source for this claim says that the village had "lost" these people, that is, they died in unspecified ways.[5]

33. The analysis presented here distinguishes between civilian deaths due to violence, called killings; deaths due to hunger and illness, some of which resulted from the conflict; deaths of combatants; and other deaths.* Only the patterns and magnitude of killings of civilians, deaths due to hunger and illness, and disappearances will be estimated and analysed.

34. The distinction between deaths due to hunger and illness and killings is useful for two reasons. First, the person who or institution which causes deaths due to deliberate violence has an immediate and obvious responsibility for those deaths,

* The "other" category included accidents and maternal mortality, among other causes. These deaths were not identified specifically in the questionnaire.

while responsibility for deaths due to hunger and illness is more complex. Second, there were substantially fewer killings than deaths by hunger and illness in Timor-Leste between 1975 and 1999. The methods used here to estimate the total number of killings were more precise and underestimate the total less severely than the estimates of the number of deaths due to hunger and illness.

35. In the sections below, estimates are presented rounded to the nearest hundred in order to signify that the estimates are always approximate and should be interpreted within margins of error. However, specific counts of documented deaths are listed precisely since these numbers are known exactly. The underlying statistical data have been made available so that scholars can continue to analyse the patterns of deaths due to killings and hunger and illness in Timor-Leste during the Indonesian occupation.*

36. Both killings and deaths due to hunger and illness were at higher levels in the immediate post-invasion period, from late 1975 until 1979, than in previous years or at any time until 1999. Both series peak again in 1999, though killing reaches its highest peak since 1975-79 then while hunger and illness have a much smaller peak than in the 1975-79 period. The Commission's analysis suggests that during the period 1975-99, approximately 18,600 non-combatants were killed. Furthermore, we estimate that more than 100,000 people died in excess of the peacetime baseline rates of death due to hunger and illness.

37. The two series – killings and deaths due to hunger and illness – follow the same pattern: the correlation coefficient between the annual estimates (described below) of the number of killings and deaths due to hunger and illness is 0.81, a very high level for most social science findings.† Analysis of patterns of displacement suggests that displacement was at its highest levels in the period 1975-79. The high correlation between estimated numbers of killings, deaths due to hunger and illness, and displacement suggests that they are responding to similar underlying conditions. That is, the three phenomena are likely to have a common cause. The pattern of rapid increase in killings, deaths due to hunger and illness, and displacement at the beginning of the Indonesian occupation is consistent with the claim that the occupation caused the increased mortality.

Objectives of analysis

38. The analysis begins with an overview of the data and methods relevant to the analysis of fatal violations and displacement. In Section 6.2.4, the estimates of the number of killings and deaths due to hunger and illness are presented. For each manner of death, RMS and MSE estimates are presented and compared. The displacement section reviews the estimated total displacement events and the number of displaced households over time and space. In Section 6.2.5 descriptive

* See http://www.hrdag.org/timor for copies of the statistical data. Note that there is no personally identifiable information about witnesses, victims, or perpetrators in these data.

† The correlation relates the MSE estimated annual number of killings to the RMS estimated number of deaths due to hunger and illness.

analysis of the deaths reported to the Commission in the HRVD is presented. The analysis considers the patterns over time, space, collective deaths, demography and political affiliation of victims, institutional responsibility, and the relationship between detention and conflict deaths.

Overview of data and methods

39. The estimates of the patterns and magnitude of mortality are based on the three original data sources collected by the Commission, including:

- The Human Rights Violations Database (HRVD) contained the narratives of 7,669 deponents about violations they suffered or witnessed during the 1974-99 period.* These narratives included information about deaths by deprivation [of food and medication] and killings of civilians. The respondents selected themselves to give reports to the Commission. Therefore, the results of this project may not represent the entire universe of all people who suffered human rights violations.
- The Retrospective Mortality Survey (RMS) recorded the mortality histories of a probability sample of 1,396 households. In each household, two adult respondents were chosen at random. For male respondents, the respondent's parents and siblings were enumerated, including whether they are living or dead. If they were dead, the date, place, and manner of death were recorded. For female respondents, the respondent's children were enumerated in a similar fashion. In 60% of the households, only respondents of one sex were available at the time of the interview, and so one respondent gave information about parents, siblings and children.
- A census of public graveyards in Timor-Leste, documenting more than 319,000 graves (denoted GCD).

40. Each data source documents only a small fraction of the total number of deaths in Timor-Leste during 1975-99. Even in the absence of conflict, not all of the dead are buried in public graveyards; some people are buried in remote locations or in private family graveyards. When mortality conditions are especially severe, relatively fewer people are buried with formal markers. Markers degrade over time, so that by the time the graveyard census was taken in 2003-04, many graves could not be documented because their information is illegible. Other markers were destroyed entirely in the period between the burial and the time the GCD was collected.

41. The RMS reflects the experiences reported in 1,396 households but omits the experiences of nearly 190,000 households not sampled. The HRVD reflects the experience of 7,669 respondents, but approximately 940,000 other East Timorese did not give testimonies to Commission. However, even if the HRVD and RMS did reflect the experience of every living person in Timor-Leste, many deaths would still remain undocumented because all the people who could remember them have died, left the country, or were psychologically or physically unable to recount the stories during the data collection period. In villages where mortality was especially heavy, there may have been no witnesses who survived until 2002-03. Other families may have left Timor-Leste entirely, taking with them their social memory of the deaths. Still other families may have decided to keep secret their past experiences, so it may not be possible to directly document deaths in their family directly. Social memory is always partial.

* Commission teams collected a total of 7,824 statements. Some of these (155 statements) were not entered into the HRVD because they either did not mention violations connected to the Commission's mandate, or the violations which they mentioned were not within the Commission's reference period.

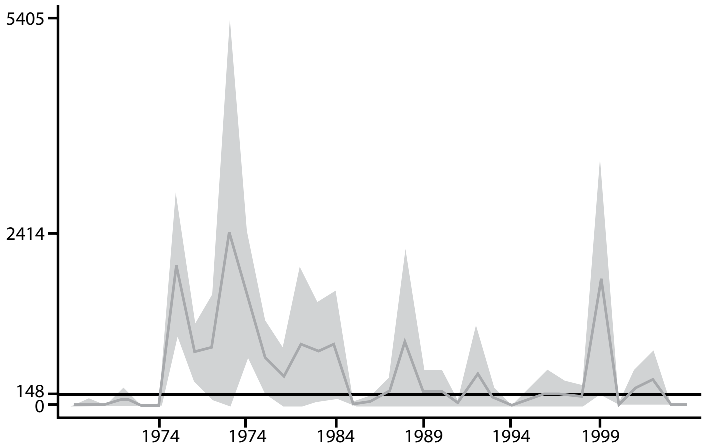
42. The RMS uses standard household survey techniques based on the reported deaths to estimate the total number of killings, deaths by hunger and illness, and combatant deaths. However, these totals are estimates of the total number of deaths that were possible to be remembered by current residents of Timor-Leste, which is a subset of the total deaths that actually happened. The ratio of the deaths remembered by current residents to all deaths is called the coverage rate.

43. An alternative method for estimating total deaths uses multiple systems estimation (MSE). This method is used to correct censuses by comparing coverage among different documentation projects. MSE estimates of the number of deaths due to hunger and illness and due to killings are presented and compared to the RMS estimates. For killings, the MSE estimates are more appropriate, while for the estimated total number of deaths due to hunger and illness, the RMS estimates are more appropriate.*



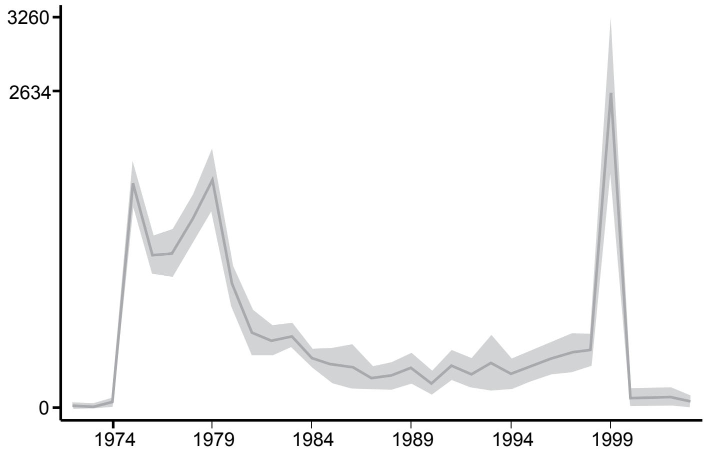
Estimates of killings, deaths due to hunger and illness, and displacement

Killings

44. The annual total number of killings can be estimated from the RMS, and the results are presented below. This figure follows relatively high levels of killings in the 1975-79 period, with additional peaks in the early 1980s and a spike in 1999. There are 16,000 total killings estimated by the RMS, with a margin of error of +/- 4,400. The RMS estimate of killings is based on only 235 reported killings. Consequently, the error is substantial, as seen by the many years for which the error bands touch zero. For these years, the hypothesis that the estimated number of deaths is zero cannot be rejected. Furthermore, the error bands are sufficiently wide that many different patterns could be possible.

* MSE is widely used in estimating the under-reporting levels in population censuses [see for example J. G. Robinson, B. Ahmed, P. Das Gupta and K. Woodrow, "Estimation of Population Coverage in the 1990 United States Census Based on Demographic Analysis", Journal of the American Statistical Association, 88 (423), 1992, pp. 1061-1071].

Estimated total killings in Timor-Leste based on RMS



- Total estimated deaths by deprivation: 16090 (+/– 4426)

Source: Retrospective Mortality Survey conducted by CAVR

45. As with deaths due to hunger and illness, it is possible to estimate the annual total number of killings using multiple systems estimation (MSE). For killings, the CAVR testimonies (denoted HRVD) document nearly one-third of the total estimated killings, whereas as mentioned above, there are only 235 documented killings in the RMS. Consequently, the MSE for killings combines the GCD and the HRVD data. The results are shown in the total Killing in Timor-Leste Figure. The MSE estimates 18,600 total killings (+/- 1000). The vertical axis notes the maximum of the error (3,260) and the maximum estimated value (2,634), both of which occur in 1999. The pattern over time is much clearer in the MSE than in the RMS survey estimate: the estimated total number of killings rises from nearly zero (no killing) in the pre-invasion period to peaks in 1975 and 1979. Killings decline thereafter and through the 1980s and 1990s. A spike in 1999 marks the highpoint of estimated killings, significantly greater than in any other year.

Estimated total killings in Timor-Leste using HRVD and GCD data

- Estimated total killings, 1975–1999: 18571 (+/– 982)

Source: MSE using HRVD+GCD, by CAVR

46. The killing estimates suffer from an important lacuna in the data: 1991 should have a small peak representing the Santa Cruz massacre, but insufficient reports of the event were captured to estimate the killings in that year correctly. The estimate for 1991 is actually slightly lower than the estimate for 1990. This illustrates a problem with all large-scale data collection: killings are relatively rare events across the entire population, so probability samples are unlikely to capture specific events (for example, there were no reports of Santa Cruz in the RMS). In qualitative reports such as the HRVD, investigative resources must be specifically devoted to specific events, or there is no guarantee the events will be documented. Although the HRVD received more than 20 reported deaths for this event, this is only a small fraction of the total. Much smaller events were more thoroughly covered, and so the estimates over time do not accurately reflect the importance of 1991.*

47. Unlike for deaths due to hunger and illness, killings are unlikely to be substantially underestimated. First, killings are less likely to affect entire families than hunger and illness deaths, so there are more likely to be surviving relatives to report these events. Second, the ratio of documented killings to estimated killings (the coverage rate) is 0.637, which is higher than the ratio of documented hunger and illness deaths to estimated hunger and illness deaths (0.513). The higher coverage rate for killings means that MSE itself could correct better for the unreported killings than for the unreported deaths due to hunger and illness. Furthermore, killings are relatively rare, and so the kind of speculative analysis using census-based crude death rates (CDR) conducted for

* Note that the margin of error specifically represents "holes" in the data of this kind. That is, by its nature sampling only captures information on a small number of the total events. Some large events (such as the Santa Cruz Massacre) may be missed. The estimated error of the estimated total number of events is designed to reflect the uncertainty around the estimated total, including the fact that some large events may be missed.

deaths due to hunger and illness is not possible for killings. On these grounds, we find that there were approximately 18,600 killings, with a margin of error +/- 1000.

Deaths due to hunger and illness

48. The analysis of the total number of deaths by hunger and illness begins with an analysis of the total estimated deaths from the RMS, and the results are presented below in the Total Deaths Due to Hunger or Illness in Timor-Leste Figure.* The estimated deaths are presented against a baseline of deaths projected from the 1972-74 death rates due to hunger and illness (described below). The number of deaths attributed by respondents to "hunger or illness" rises to its highest levels during the immediate post-invasion period, 1975-80. During the period 1983-98 the estimated total fluctuates around a median of 3,632 estimated annual deaths. The annual total rises slowly during the 1990s, reaching a final peak in 1999.†

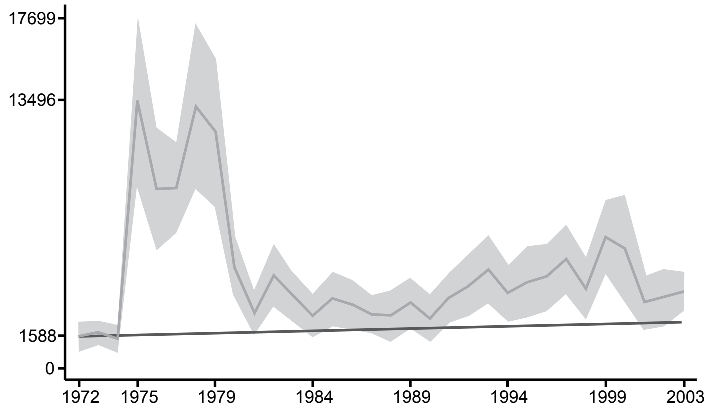
49. The total estimated number of deaths due to hunger and illness in 1975-99 is approximately 143,700, with a margin of error of approximately +/- 11,000.‡ Some of these deaths are natural in the sense that they would have occurred in the absence of conflict or famine. An assessment of deaths that could be attributed to the conflict must consider first how many deaths would probably have occurred as a result of hunger and illness in the absence of the conflict.

50. The immediate pre-invasion years 1972-74 provide a peacetime baseline of natural deaths due to hunger and illness. First, to create a baseline population, population estimates for 1971–2003 were interpolated between the total reported in the 1970 Portuguese census (609,477) and the 2004 census total (924,642). From the RMS, the estimated number of deaths due to hunger and illness in 1972-74 was approximately 1,686-2,252. Death rates for each year were computed by dividing the projected population for each year by the RMS estimated number of deaths for that year. Thus, the average of the 1972-74 annual death rates due to hunger and illness was calculated.

51. The estimated death rate (3.1 deaths per 1,000 people) was applied to the projected population for each year through 2003.§ These estimated death rates form the baseline shown in the Total Deaths Due to Hunger or Illness in Timor-Leste Figure. By subtracting the peacetime baseline projection from the annual RMS estimate, there are 84,200 excess deaths due to hunger and illness (+/- 11,000).¶ These deaths constitute

* The data are insufficient for a three-system estimation of the deaths by hunger and illness.

† As discussed in the methodological section, the slow rise in estimated deaths due to hunger and illness from the early 1980s through the late 1990s is a consequence of increasing population and a decrease in the number of deaths that are lost because no relatives survived until 2004 to be surveyed.



‡ The total margin of error is calculated by taking the square root of the sum of the variances of the annual estimates and multiplying by the conventional 1.96 to create a 95% confidence interval.

§ This baseline rate (3.1 deaths per 1,000 people) is low: the regional average for Southeast Asia in the early 1970s was 12-14 per 1,000. The methodological appendix addresses how the underestimates could be adjusted using census-based estimates of the crude death rate (CDR). However, adding the census-based measures requires many assumptions about the quality of the CDR estimates. The core findings presented here are based only on the 1970 and 2004 census estimates and the data collected by the Commission.

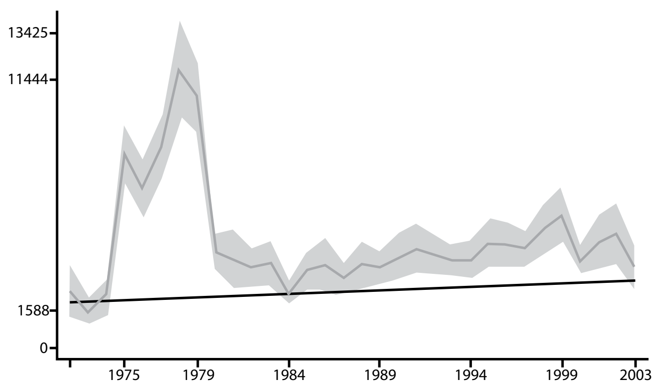
¶ The margin of error of the excess deaths is calculated in the same way as the total margin of error, including the standard error only of the years which contribute to the excess total.

the estimate from the RMS of the deaths which exceed the total that would be expected if the death rate due to hunger and illness had continued as it was in the pre-invasion peacetime period.

Estimated total deaths by hunger/illness in Timor-Leste based on RMS

- Total estimated deaths by hunger/illness, 1972–2003: 161098 (+/– 10962)
- Total estimated deaths by hunger/illness, 1975–1999: 135017 (+/– 10251)
- Deaths in excess of estimated baseline, 1975–1999: 86539 (+/– 10251)

Source: Retrospective Mortality Survey conducted by CAVR



52. An alternative method for estimating the approximate total number of excess deaths is to calculate a two-system MSE using the RMS and GCD. This should be approached with caution, for two reasons. First, the number of reported hunger and illness deaths in the RMS in 1974-99 (2,231) is small relative to the RMS total estimate of deaths due to hunger and illness (143,700). Second, two-system estimates can be biased as a result of uncontrolled correlation between the systems.* For example, if people who died who were unlikely to be buried in a public graveyard were also unlikely to be remembered by survey respondents, then the two systems would have a positive correlation. Note that this correlation is likely in the immediate post-invasion years when many people were living in very difficult conditions, at first moving constantly and later being held in resettlement camps. Both conditions would tend to lead both to catastrophic deaths of entire groups and to situations in which relatively few people were buried in public graveyards with permanent markers. The positive correlation between the GCD and RMS in extraordinary years would bias the two-system estimate downward, potentially significantly.

* As mentioned earlier, the data are inadequate for three-system models of deaths due to hunger and illness. There are 5,101 deaths due to hunger and illness reported in the HRVD, approximately twice as many as in the RMS, but this is nonetheless a small fraction of the expected total number of deaths due to hunger and illness. The RMS is used in preference to the HRVD because the RMS was collected by a probability sample. The HRVD is a convenience sample, and using it would require the assumption that all deaths in each year had the same probability of being documented. See the methodological appendix for an explanation of how the MSE was calculated.

53. The MSE estimates are shown in the Total Deaths Due to Hunger or Illness in Timor-Leste Figure. The total estimated deaths by hunger and illness in 1975-99 is approximately 123,500 (+/- 5,200).* The estimated deaths in excess of what would be expected by the peacetime baseline is 75,000 (+/-5,200). The MSE estimate is lower than the survey estimate, which is consistent with the hypothesis that there is positive correlation between the RMS and the GCD. The median number of deaths due to hunger and illness during the "normal" occupation years, 1983-98, as estimated by MSE (3,727) is similar to the value found by the survey (3,632). That is, the survey estimates and the MSE estimates for "normal" occupation years are similar, but the RMS has higher estimates for the extraordinary years. It is likely that during normal years, relatively fewer deaths occur in catastrophic events that eliminate entire families (causing survey underreporting), and relatively fewer people who died are left outside public graveyards. Consequently, during normal years, the MSE and the survey provide similar estimates. During extraordinary years, both methods underestimate total deaths due to hunger and illness, but the MSE underestimates slightly more because a small proportion of all people who died are buried in public graveyards during extraordinary years.

54. The pattern shown in the Total Deaths Due to Hunger or Illness in Timor-Leste Figure was similar to the RMS estimate, but the magnitude is lower; note that the maximum estimated value in the Total Deaths Due to Hunger or Illness in Timor-Leste Figure is 11,444 whereas in the RMS estimate it is 13,496. There was one difference in the patterns over time: the MSE estimated totals for 1975 were lower than the estimates for 1978 and 1979, whereas in the survey, the estimates for the three years were close together. In the RMS estimate, the error bands for the three years were large relative to the differences among the years, and therefore, the hypothesis cannot be rejected that the real totals in those years are equal.

Estimated total deaths by hunger/illness in Timor-Leste using dual system

- Total estimated deaths by hunger/illness, 1972–2003: 146232 (+/– 5753)
- Total estimated deaths by hunger/illness, 1975–1999: 123529 (+/– 5184)
- Deaths in excess of estimated baseline, 1975–1999: 64037 (+/– 5184)

Source: dual system estimate RMS–GCD, by CAVR

* For the MSE, only the named deaths reported in the RMS are included. The RMS sampling weights were not used. The GCD does not include the manner of death, so records from the GCD are allocated as described in the methodological Annexe.

55. The MSE estimates suggest that 1975 had fewer deaths than implied in the RMS estimates. Other than this difference, the MSE and RMS estimates are similar in magnitude and pattern. It should be emphasised that the two estimates are methodologically very different: magnitude in the RMS was driven by the survey weights, while the preponderance of the data in the MSE came from the number of graves with dates in each year and the matching of the deaths identified in the RMS to the names, dates and locations of graves.

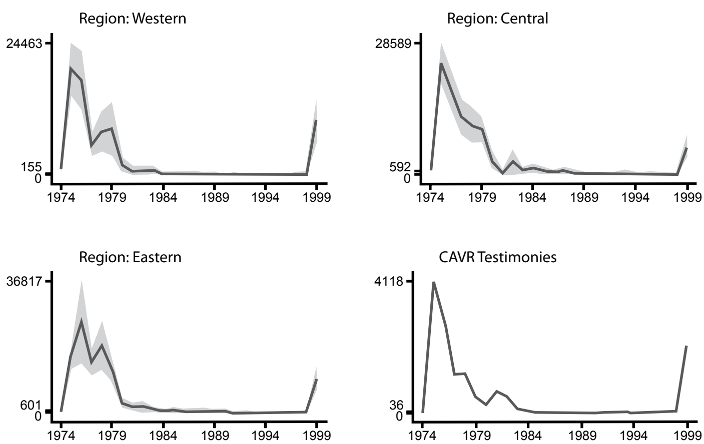
56. Combining the results from the two estimates, a highly conservative estimated minimum number of deaths by hunger and illness in excess of the peacetime baseline is between 75,000 and 86,500. These estimates draw only on the 1970 and 2004 censuses and the Commission's own data. These estimates should be explicitly understood as estimates of the total deaths due to hunger and illness which were possible to remember in 2004. This is a significant limitation on the calculations which can be made. Both the RMS and MSE estimates are substantially conservative because many deaths could not be remembered by 2004. Some deaths left no surviving family members available to report the death in 2004, and some people who died during extraordinary years were not buried in public graveyards. The years in which the survey is most likely to have been affected by the loss of entire families are also the years in which people are least likely to be buried in public cemeteries. This positive correlation between the GCD and RMS data creates an underestimation in the MSE.

57. In the methodological Annexe, a model is presented for adjusting the RMS and MSE estimates to correct for the loss over time of knowledge about deaths. This model uses additional census information, including crude death rates estimated by the US and Indonesian governments. If the assumptions in the underlying data and in the models were correct, the total deaths due to hunger and illness in excess of the peacetime baseline could be 103,000, with a possible (but improbable) high-end estimate of 183,300. Despite the uncertainty in these models, the Commission concludes that at a minimum, during the period 1975-99, 100,000 people died due to hunger and illness in excess of the peacetime baseline.

Displacement

58. The core findings from the analysis of displacement are outlined below:

- Displacement was widespread: 55.5% of surveyed households reported one or more displacement events, for a total of 2,011 reported displacement events between 1974 and 1999.*
- When projected to the total population, the surveyed results represent 108,200 displaced households† experiencing 282,800 displacement events.‡



* According to the 1990 census, there were approximately 4.5 people per household in that year. The figure increases to 4.75 people per household (924,642/194,943) in the 2004 census. The nominal confidence interval is 51.8-59.2% of households.

† The nominal confidence interval is 101,013-115,412 households.

‡ The nominal confidence interval is 251,631-313,990 events.

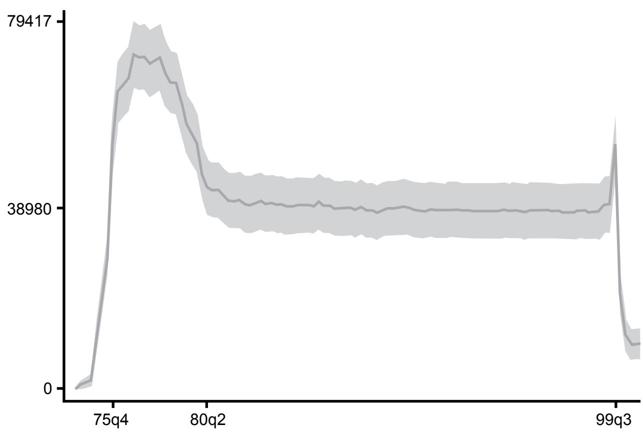
- Most displacements were local. Of all displacement events, 54.3% are within a sub-district, 15.6% are within a district, 17.4% are within a region, 9.3% are within Timor-Leste, and 2.4% are outside of Timor-Leste.[*] However, in 1999, the displacements that took households out of Timor-Leste increased to 9.3% (+/- 6.1%) of displacements in that period.
- Many displacements occurred in rapid succession: 22.2% of displacement events lasted one month or less, and 50.1% lasted one year or less. However, other displacements were very long, so that the mean displacement period lasted 46.7 months.[†] Tens of thousands of households considered themselves displaced from the immediate post-invasion period in 1975q4 (the 4th quarter of 1975) continuously until 1999q4 (the 4th quarter of 1999). [see the Total Displaced Households in Timor-Leste Based on Region Figure in paragraph 60 for more analysis].
- The institution that respondents reported most frequently as the group telling them to move was the Indonesian military (46.4%), followed by Fretilin/Falintil (15.0%) and militias (8.8%).[‡] Respondents reported that "conflict" motivated 52.3% of their displacements, with "forced by Indonesian military" contributing an additional 16.3%.
- Most displacements occurred in 1975-80. The maximum years are 1975 and 1976, with 61,400 (+/- 13,300) and 59,800 (+/- 7,200) displacement events, respectively. The events of 1999 were substantially fewer, with approximately 28,100 (+/- 5,600) events.

Estimated displacement events in Timor-Leste (with error bands)

Source: Retrospective Mortality Survey (Displacements Module), CAVR

Note: one displacement per household per year counted

* The nominal margin of error is +/- 10.4% for displacements within sub-districts, and 4.6% or less for the other estimates. This finding may be limited by the restriction that people in refugee camps in West Timor were not interviewed.



† The nominal confidence interval is 41-52 months.

‡ The nominal margin of error is +/- 4.2%.

59. The Displacement Estimates in Timor-Leste (with Error Bands) Figure above shows the number of displacement events by year in three regions of Timor-Leste, as well as the total displacement events reported to the Commission in qualitative testimonies. The vertical axes label the maximum values (at the top of the error band) for each region. The Total Displaced Households in Timor-Leste Based on Region Figure shows 1975 and 1976 as the peak years in overall displacements, with 1977-79 and 1999 at roughly equal lower levels. The Commission notes that 1975 and 1976 cannot be statistically distinguished from each other in any of the regional estimates; in formal language, it is not possible to fully reject the hypothesis that these years had equal numbers of displacement events. The Western and Central Regions show a decline from the 1975-76 peaks to lower levels through 1979; the decline is then toward zero. By contrast, the Eastern Region shows displacement levels in 1979 that are nearly the equal of the displacement intensity of the immediate-post-invasion period.

60. Another way to look at displacements is to consider how many households are displaced during each period. The Displacement Estimates in Timor-Leste (with Error Bands) Figure shows how many households were forced to move during each year. The Total Displaced Households in Timor-Leste Based on Region Figure shows how many households were forced to live in a place they did not consider their home during each period. That is, the Displacement estimates in Timor-Leste (with Error Bands) Figure shows how many "displacement events" were suffered in each period, while Total Displaced Households in Timor-Leste Based on Region Figure shows how many households are in the status of "displacement" in each period. The vertical axis notes the maximum value at the top of the error band and the median value from the third quarter of 1980 (1980q3) through to the second quarter of 1999 (1999q2).

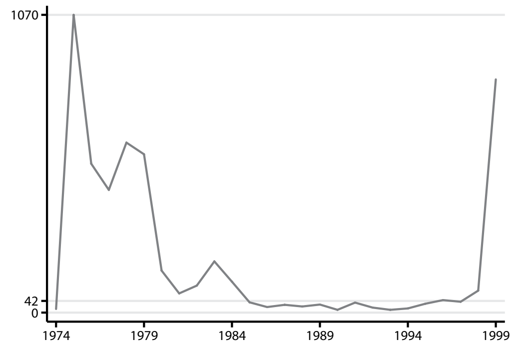
Total displaced households in Timor-Leste by region

Source: Retrospective Mortality Survey (Displacements Module), CAVR

61. People were displaced in late 1975 and early 1976, and they were unable to return to their homes for a long period. Additional displacements continued in 1977, with more in 1978, and people displaced earlier are still away from their homes. Not until 1979 do large numbers of households settle in places they consider "home". In every year between 1980 until 1999, an estimated 39,000 households continue to consider themselves displaced. An additional 15,000 households are displaced in the third quarter of 1999. However, in the fourth quarter, more than 32,500 households returned to their homes, and the estimated number of displaced households dropped to approximately 20,400 before falling again to 11,700 in the first quarter of 2000, and to 9,600 in the second quarter of 2000.

Descriptive statistical analysis of fatal violations reported to the Commission

62. This section describes the pattern of killings and disappearances reported to the Commission in the narrative statement-taking process (the HRVD). The magnitude and patterns described here do not represent the total magnitude and overall pattern of killings and disappearances. Rather, this analysis describes the pattern and trend of killings and disappearances known through the Commission's qualitative statements.[*]



The reported pattern of killings and disappearances of non-combatants over time

63. The pattern of reported killings and disappearances varied substantially over time. As can be seen in the Reported Killings of Civilians, 1974–1999 Figure 67.4% (3,451/5,120) of reported killings are concentrated in the period 1975-81. 16.4% (838/5,120) of reported killings occurred in 1999 before, during and after the UN-administered Popular Consultation. The highest counts of killings reported to the Commission were during the period of the invasion by the Indonesian military and the initial years of occupation. Although the year with the highest reported counts of non-combatant killings was 1975, the open-ended nature of the narrative statement-taking process was such that a considerable amount of date imprecision was encountered in statements which reported killings in the mid- to late-1970s.[†] It is therefore likely that some of the non-combatant killings which were reported to have occurred in 1975 may have actually occurred in 1976 or 1977.

* See section below for a detailed discussion of the nature and limitations of the data collected through the Commission's statement-taking process.

† See the Statistical Methodological Annexe for a more detailed description of date imprecision in the statement-taking process.

Number of reported acts of civilian killings, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

64. The counts of disappearances reported to the Commission are substantially lower than that of reported non-combatant killings: 5,120 non-combatant killings were reported to the Commission, whereas 835 disappearances were reported to the Commission. Furthermore, the reported pattern of disappearances is substantially different from that of non-combatant killings, as can be seen in the Reported Disappearances, 1974–1999 Figure. Whereas large-scale non-combatant killings were overwhelmingly concentrated in the initial invasion years, large-scale disappearances were mostly concentrated towards the end of the initial invasion period in 1979 and in 1983-84, just before the start of the "normalisation and consolidation" period of the Indonesian occupation: 40.0% (332/835) of individual disappearances reported to the Commission occurred either in 1979, 1983 or 1984. The reported pattern of disappearances and non-combatant killings is consistent with the hypothesis that the two violations phenomena were driven by different policies or practices of those responsible. In particular, disappearances appear to have been used in a more targeted fashion as a counter-Resistance tool by the Indonesian military.

Number of reported acts of disappearance, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

65. 20.9% (1,070/5,120) of killings documented by the Commission's statement-taking process occurred in 1975. As shown in Number of Civilian Killings Table, of the documented killings in 1975, 26.5% (283/1,070) of these killings do not contain information about the month in which they occurred. However, 19.5% (348/1,070) of these killings occurred during the time of the internal party conflict and the first major Indonesian cross-border incursions, and 32.7% (350/1,070) occurred in December at the time of the launch of the full-scale Indonesian military invasion of Timor-Leste.

Table 1: Count of reported acts of civilian killing, 1975
Year	Frequency	**%
January	4	0.4
February	6	0.6
March	6	0.6
April	20	1.9
May	3	0.3
June	3	0.3
July	6	0.6
August	194	18.1
September	154	14.4
October	30	2.8
November	11	1
December	350	32.7
Not reported	283	26.5
Total	1070	100

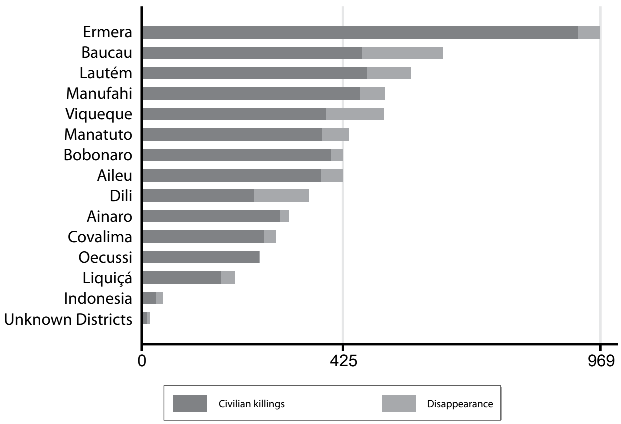
Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

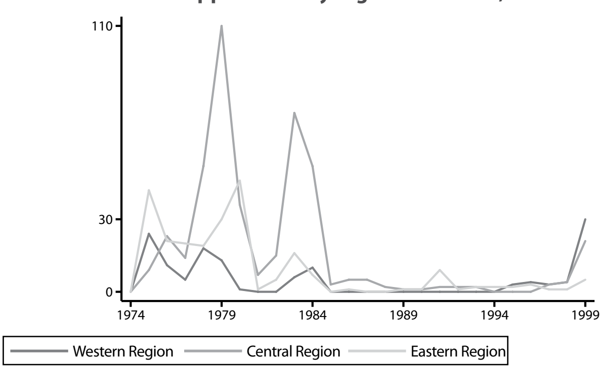


66. It is notable that only 3.8% (41/1,070) of documented killings in 1975 occur in October and November. Hence, the data from the Commission's statement-taking process are consistent with the hypothesis that large-scale killings occurred during the internal party conflict in August and September, then there was a relative lull in violence in the form of killings before large-scale killing resumed in December at the time of the Indonesian military's invasion of Timor-Leste.

The reported pattern of killings and disappearances of non-combatants over space

67. Data based on convenience samples (like these data) cannot be used to assess directly the differences in the magnitude of violations between regions and districts. Such data are representative only of the total extent of violence from region to region insofar as the deponents whose statements were taken are representative of their local population and were selected in proportion to the violence suffered in each district.

68. The Reported Violations, Based on Types and Districts Figure shows the counts of reported killings and disappearances by district in which the violation occurred, as reported in the Commission's statement-taking process. Ermera has substantially more reported killings than any other district, accounting for 18% (920/5120) of all reported killings. Relatively few non-combatant killings in Indonesia, Dili and Liquiçá were reported to the Commission.

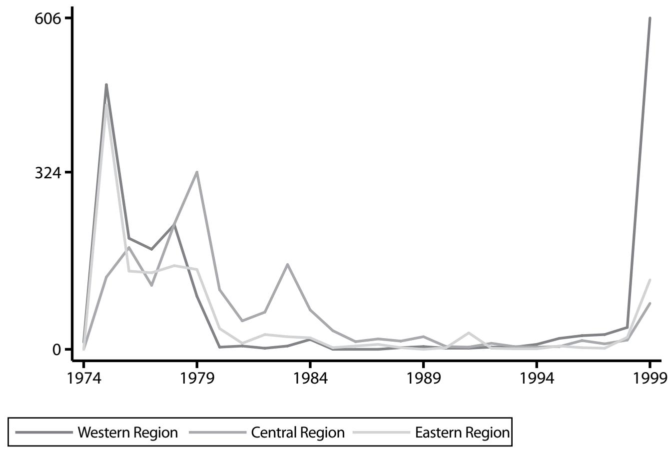


Count of reported violations, by type and district

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

69. The Disappearances Based on Regions Over Time, 1974–1999 Figure shows that reported disappearances were concentrated mainly in the Eastern and Central districts: in particular, of the disappearances reported to the Commission, 20.2% (169/835) occurred in Baucau, 14.7% (123/835) in Viqueque, 13.9% (116/835) were in Dili and 11.4% (95/835) were in Lautém.

Count of disappearance by region over time, 1974–1999



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

The reported pattern of killings and disappearances of non-combatants over time and space

70. As the Civilian Killings Over Time, 1974–1999 Figure shows, reported killings start in the Western and Central Regions at the time of the initial Indonesian invasion. Then between 1978 and 1981, most reported non-combatant killings are in the Eastern Region and Central Regions, with few reported non-combatant killings occurring in the Western Region. In 1999 72.3% of reported non-combatant killings occurred in the Western Region. The Commission's narrative statement data are consistent with the hypothesis that, between 1975 and 1984, large-scale individual non-combatant killings broadly tracked the movements across time and space of the invading Indonesian military.

Count of civilian killings by region over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

71. The pattern of reported disappearances over time and space is notably different to that of non-combatant killings, as can be seen in the Disappearances Based on Regions Over Time, 1974–1999 Figure. Although some disappearances are reported around the time of the Indonesian invasion and again in 1999, disappearances do not appear to be associated with large-scale military operations in the same way non-combatant killings are. Rather, two periods of large-scale disappearances were reported: the first period occurring from 1978 to 1980, in the aftermath of the completion of major military offensives against the Resistance, and the second period from 1983 to 1984 after the breakdown of the ceasefire between Indonesian forces and Falintil. During the first period of large-scale disappearances, 60.2% (198/329) of reported disappearances were concentrated in the Eastern Region, with 25.9% (95/329) occurring in the Central Region and 10.0% (33/329) in the Western Region and Indonesia. During the second period of large-scale disappearances, which occurred between 1983 and 1984, 72.0%

(126/175) occurred in the Eastern Region, 13.1% (23/175) in the Central Region and 13.1% (23/175) in Indonesia and the Western Region. This data on disappearances are consistent with the hypothesis that disappearances were used mostly in the Eastern districts as a counter-resistance tool against those suspected of being members or associates of the Resistance groups.

The reported pattern of killings and disappearances of non-combatants by attributed institutional responsibility

72. A number of different institutions were involved in acts of killing and disappearance over the course of the conflict. The main institutional groups were the Indonesian military, Falintil, East Timorese political parties (such as Fretilin, UDT and Apodeti), members of the East Timorese civil defence forces (such as Hansip, Wanra and Ratih), militias and other East Timorese auxiliaries. This section reviews the reported levels of responsibility for killings and disappearances reported during the Commission's statement-taking process.

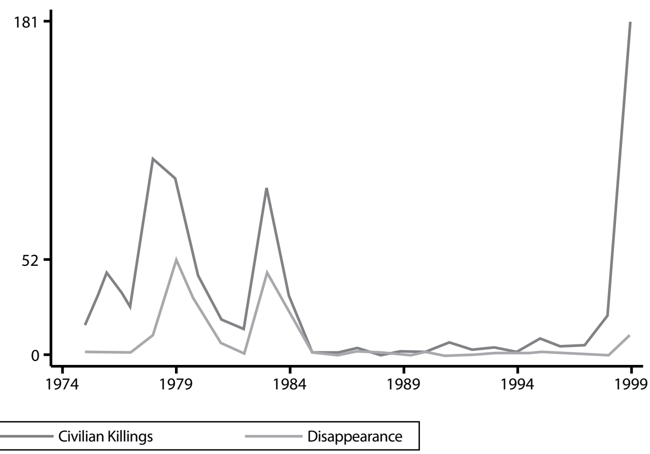
73. The majority of killings and disappearances reported to the Commission were attributed to the Indonesian military and their East Timorese auxiliaries, as shown in the table below: 57.6% (2,947/5,120) of the perpetrator involvement in fatal violations was attributed to the Indonesian military and police, and 32.3% (1,654/5,120) to their East Timorese auxiliaries (such as the militias, civil defence force and local officials who worked under the Indonesian administration). In 29.6% (1,514/5,120) of reported killings and disappearances, institutional perpetrator responsibility was attributed to Resistance groups and pro-independence forces.

Table 2: Reported acts of civilian killings and disappearances

Violation Type	Indonesian Military	Timorese Collaborators of TNI	Resistance Groups	Other	Civilian Population	Pro-Autonomy Groups	Un-known	Total
Civilian Killings	2947	1654	1514	1341	214	81	708	5109
Disappearances	642	245	80	72	21	2	111	833
	3589	1899	1594	1413	235	83	819	5942

Responsibility for violations may be shared among perpetrators, and therefore, columns may not be directly summed

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



74. The levels of attributed institutional responsibility for documented killings and disappearances varied over the course of the conflict. During the initial Indonesian invasion between 1975 and 1984, 62.3% (2,831/4,543) of documented killings and disappearances were attributed to the Indonesian military and police. Then during the period of "normalisation and consolidation" of the Indonesian occupation, between 1985 and 1998, 64.6% (317/488) of documented killings and disappearances were attributed to the Indonesian military and police. Then, in 1999 in the lead-up to and the aftermath of the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation, a significant structural change in the proportional responsibility of documented violations is observed. In particular, 9.5% (85/898) of killings and disappearances are attributed to the Indonesian military and police acting alone, 39.5% (355/898) are attributed to the Indonesian military and police acting in concert with the East Timorese militias and 42.9% (385/898) are attributed to the East Timorese militias acting alone.

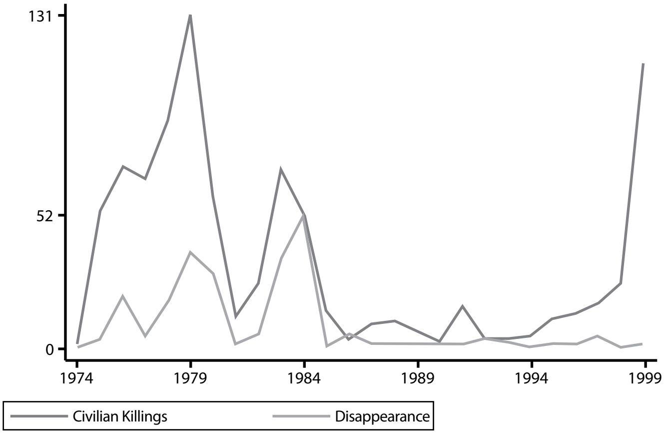
75. By contrast, while 49.0% (561/1,145) of documented killings and disappearances in 1975 were attributed to Fretilin, 16.6% (563/3,398) of documented killings and disappearances between 1976 and 1984 were attributed to Fretilin.* Furthermore, 3.7% (18/488) of killings and disappearances between 1985 and 1998 were attributed to Fretilin and then in 1999 0.6% (5/898) of killings and disappearances were attributed to Fretilin. The Commission's narrative statement data are consistent with the hypothesis that most killings and disappearances attributed to Fretilin were committed during the 1975 internal political party conflict.

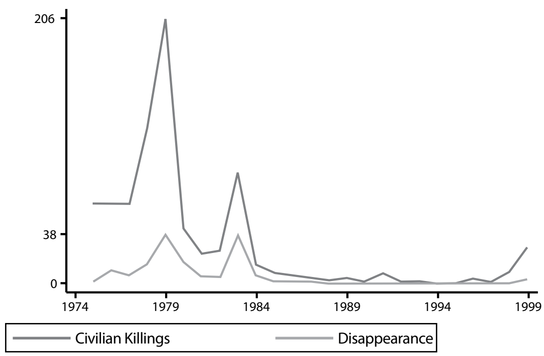
76. During different episodes of the conflict, deponents in the Commission's statement-taking process attributed substantial responsibility to specific units of the occupying Indonesian forces and their East Timorese auxiliaries at particular times during the conflict.



Fatal violations over time, 1974–1999, committed by territorial units

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

* Note that 42.2% (237/561) of documented killings and disappearances attributed to Fretilin in 1975 occurred during the internal political party conflict in August and September of that year and that 4.8% (27/561) of documented killings and disappearances attributed to Fretilin in 1975 occurred in December, but 43.3% (243/561) of killings and disappearances in 1975 attributed to Fretilin did not contain specific information about the month in which the violation occurred.



Fatal violations over time, 1974–1999, committed by non-territorial units

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

77. As the Fatal Violations Over Time, 1974–1999 by Territorial Units Figure and the Fatal Violations Over Time, by Non-territorial Units Figure show, the pattern of reported violations attributed to the territorial units (attached to the permanent local military structure) and non-territorial units (temporarily assigned to combat and other duties in Timor-Leste) of the Indonesian military are similar. Both reported killings and disappearances attributed territorial and non-territorial units are highly concentrated in the 1975-80 period, then the 1982-84 period and finally during 1999. The Commission's narrative statement data are consistent with the hypothesis that the territorial and non-territorial units of the Indonesian military used large-scale killings and disappearances in the initial occupation years, at the beginning of the consolidation phase of the occupation and then again around the time of the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation in 1999.

Fatal violations over time, 1974–1999, committed by Civil Defense Forces

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

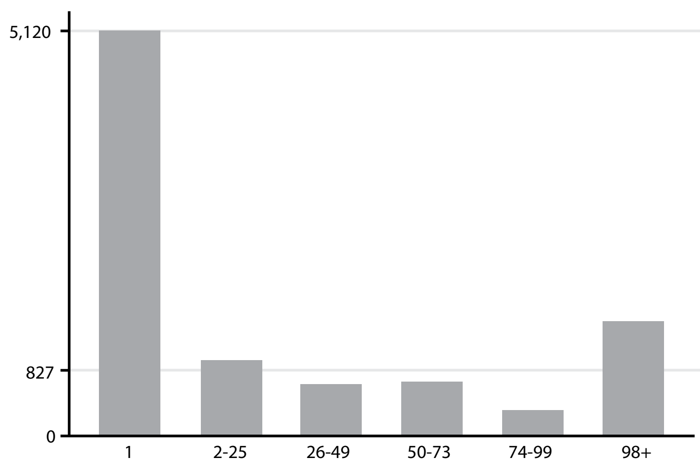
78. Reported killings and disappearances attributed to the civil defence forces, primarily Hansip, are concentrated during the initial occupation years between 1975 and 1979 and then again in 1983.

79. By contrast, reported killings and disappearances attributed to the Special Forces (Kopassandha/Kopassus) are concentrated during 1978 and 1980, 1982 and 1984, 1991 and then again in 1999. Hence the Commission's narrative statement data are consistent with the hypothesis that Kopassandha/Kopassus was used for specific military operations in the latter years of the early invasion period, and then targeted military campaigns in the consolidation years and lastly in 1999.

80. Sometimes fatal violations were attributed to the Indonesian military and police acting alone, other times to East Timorese auxiliaries acting alone and other times to the Indonesian military and police acting in concert with their East Timorese auxiliaries. The pattern of shared institutional responsibility between the Indonesian forces and their East Timorese auxiliaries and sole institutional responsibility varied over time, as can be seen in the Percentage of Responsibility on Reported Killings, Based on Period, 1975–1999 Figure. During the initial invasion years, and then subsequently during the consolidation years of the occupation, around 45% of reported killings were attributed solely to the Indonesian military and police. At around the time of the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation, 8.5% (71/838) of reported killings were attributed solely to the Indonesian military and police. As the Indonesian occupation progressed, an increasing proportion of reported killings were attributed to the Indonesian military and police acting in concert with their East Timorese auxiliaries. Hence the Commission's narrative statement data are consistent with the hypothesis that the during the initial invasion and the years of "normalisation and consolidation", the Indonesian military largely acted alone in carrying out killings of civilians, whereas in 1999 the Indonesian military aided and abetted their East Timorese auxiliaries (principally pro-autonomy militias) in carrying out killings of civilians.

Table 3: Percentage share of attributed responsibility for reported killings by phase, 1975–1999

Institution	1975–1984	1985–1998	1999	Total (1975- 1999)
Indonesian Military & Police Alone	46.3	43.3	8.5	39.9
Indonesian Military & Police together with Timorese Auxiliaries	12.7	18.8	41.4	18
Timorese Auxiliaries Alone	9.1	7.4	42.5	14.5



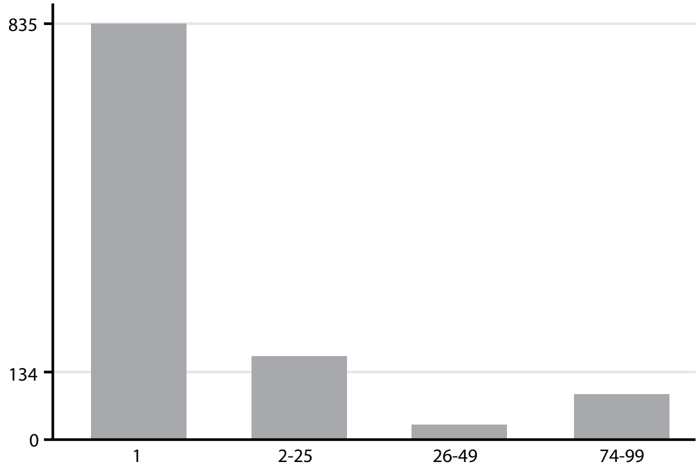
Other	31.8	30.5	7.6	27.7
Total (Frequency Count of Killings)	3,838	420	838	5,096

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

The pattern of reported killings and disappearances of non-combatants against individual and group victims

81. Some killings and disappearances were reported to the Commission as being perpetrated against a lone individual, whereas some others were reported as being perpetrated against multiple individuals at the same time. Civilian Killings Based on Group Size, 1974–1999 Figures and Civilian Disappearances Based on Group Size, 1974–1999 Figure show the distribution of violations by victim group size for killings and disappearances.*

Count of victims of acts of civilian killings by victim group size, 1974–1999



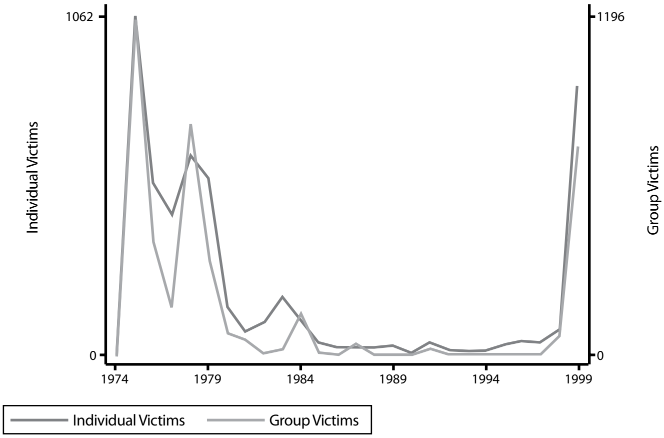
Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Note: This graph shows counts of unique victims in a group of a given size

* As is the case with reported violations against individual victims, violations against victims in groups can be reported by more than one deponent. Group victim records were matched to identify duplicate reports of the same violation and victim in multiple statements. The methods used for matching are described in the Statistical Annexe.

Count of victims of acts of disappearance by victim group size, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



Note: This graph shows counts of unique victims in a group of a given size

82. Both killings and disappearances show a similar pattern in the proportions of the violations that were committed against individuals one-by-one and collectively. As Civilian Killings Based on Group Size, 1974–1999 Figures and Civilian Disappearances Based on Group Size, 1974–1999 Figure show, 95.9% (5,120/5,339) of reported killings and 96.9% (835/862) of reported disappearances were perpetrated against people one-by-one. This empirical finding appears to be consistent with the hypothesis that killings and disappearances were both used as a form of oppression in a targeted fashion.

83. As the two Violations Over Time Figures show below, in statements given to the Commission, both killings and disappearances against individual victims and group victims are positively correlated over time. When reported killings against individuals increase, so do reported killings against group victims. The same is the case for reported disappearances.*
Hence, large-scale reported group killings are concentrated in the early invasion years between 1975 and 1979, as are large-scale reported individual killings. Large-scale reported group disappearances are concentrated during the period of counter-Resistance campaigns in 1979 and 1984, as are large-scale reported individual disappearances.

* The correlation coefficient between reported individual killings and reported group killings over time is 0.95, while the correlation coefficient between reported individual disappearances and reported group disappearances over time is 0.84.

Violations over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Violations over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

84. There are at least two possible explanations for the positive correlation between (i) reported individual killings and group killings, and (ii) reported individual disappearances and group disappearances:

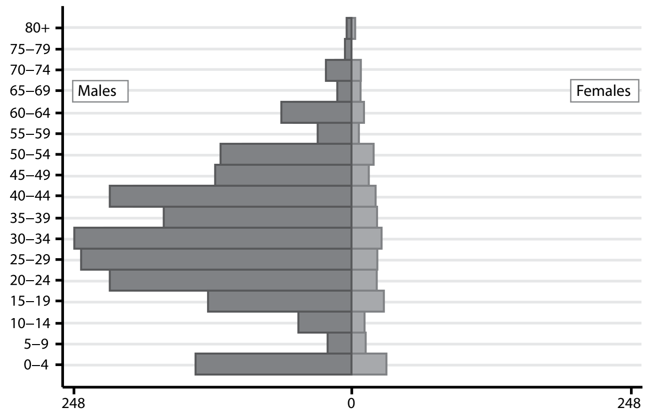
- Either individual killings and group killings are driven by the same practices or the same policies of those responsible for these crimes, as is the case for disappearances; or

- Some deponents to the Commission's statement-taking process had more difficulty than others specifically identifying individual victims of killings and disappearances during large-scale military offensives in the late 1970s and between 1983 and 1984. Consequently some deponents may have described these killings and disappearances as being suffered by anonymous groups of victims.

85. Whichever explanation is correct, the Commission's narrative statement data are consistent with the hypothesis that large-scale disappearances and large-scale killings were concentrated in time: large-scale killings being particularly concentrated in the early invasion and occupation years (1975-79), while large-scale disappearances are concentrated in 1978-79 towards the end of the invasion years and during the counter-Resistance crackdowns in the Eastern districts and, to a lesser extent, elsewhere in 1983-84.

The reported pattern of killings and disappearances of non-combatants across demographic characteristics and political affiliation

86. The Commission's research considered whether killings and disappearances were conducted in a systematic fashion and were targeted at victims with particular demographic characteristics (such as age and sex) or political affiliations. This section describes the reported extent and pattern of killings and disappearances according to the sex and age of victims and according to whether they were civilians, armed Resistance fighters or political activists.

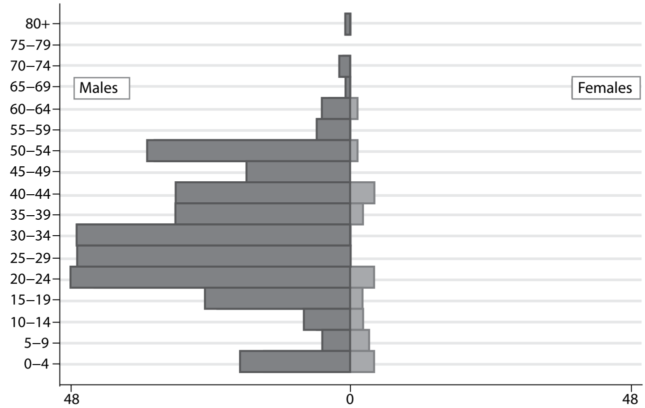


87. Killings and disappearances reported during the Commission's statement-taking process were overwhelmingly against male victims. 86.9% (4,451/5,120) of reported killings were of male victims and 90.5% (756/836) of reported disappearances were also of males. In addition, young adults between the ages of 20 and 34 were the most frequently reported age groups for victims of killings and disappearances: 37.4% (663/2,090) of killings victims whose ages were known were in this age group.[*] 40.0% (138/345) of disappearance victims whose ages were reported were between the ages of 20 and 34.[†]

88. As can be seen in the two Figures of Civilian Killings Rate Based on Age and Sex, 1974–1999, young males between the ages of 20 and 34 were the most frequently reported victims of killings and disappearances to the Commission's statement-taking process.

* Specific ages for 59.6% (3.030/5.120) of killing victims reported to the Commission's statement-taking process were either not known or not reported.

† Specific ages for 59.2% (490/835) of disappearance victims reported to the Commission's statement-taking process were either not known or not reported.

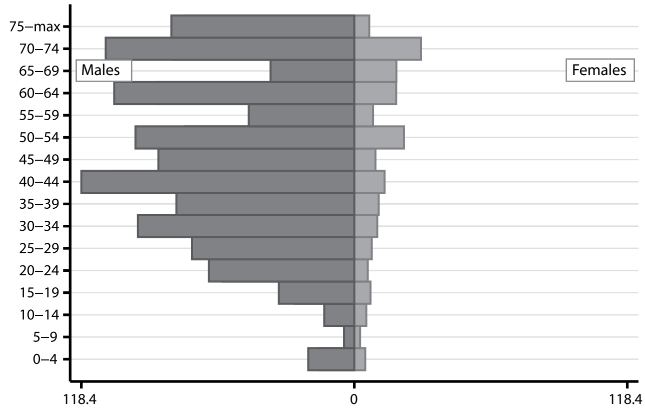


Number of reported acts of civilian killings, by age and sex, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

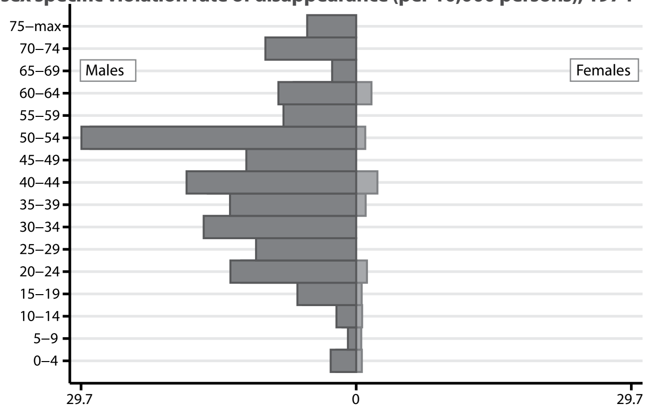
Note: 59.6% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

Number of reported acts of disappearance, by age and sex, 1974–1999



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

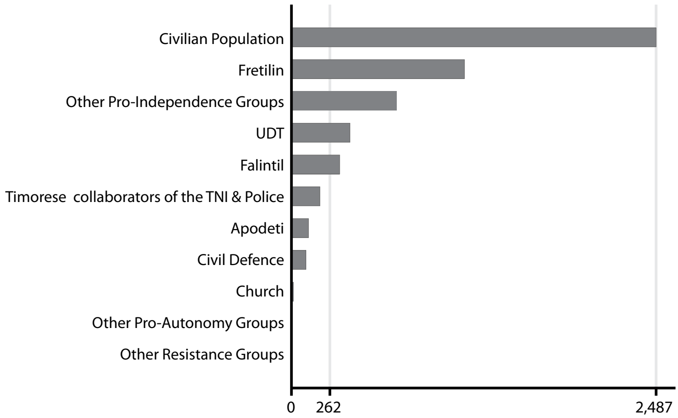
Note: 59.2% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim



89. Moving from simple violation counts of killings and disappearances to population-based violation rates, notable differences can be observed. Relative to the overall East Timorese population, middle-aged and elderly males experienced the highest rates (relative to their share of the population) of reported killings and males in the age group 50-54-years-old experienced the highest rates (relative to their share of the population) of reported disappearances. These patterns are shown in the two Figures of Level of Fatal Violations Toward Civilians Specifically Based on Age and Sex (per 10,000 individuals), 1974–1999.

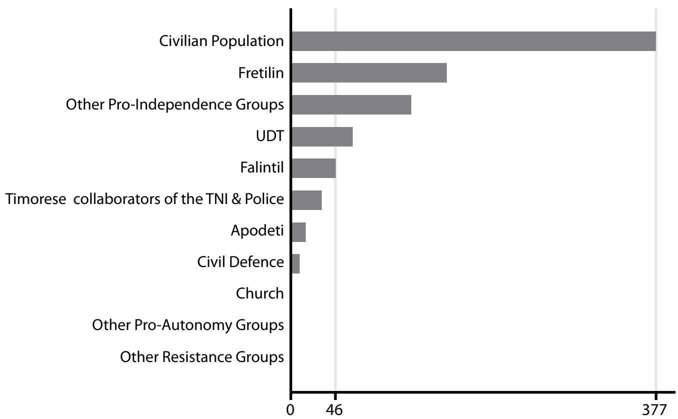
Age-sex specific violation rate of civilian killings (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999

Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia
Note: 59.6% of the violation records are missing age or sex of the victim



Age-sex specific violation rate of disappearance (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999

Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia
Note: 59.2% of the violation records are missing age or sex of the victim



90. 48.7% (2,487/5,120) of killings and 45.3% (377/835) of disappearances reported to the Commission were committed against the civilian population, including both those civilians who were not known to have a political affiliation and those who were formally part of a pro-independence group or political party, as can be seen in the two Figures on Level of Reported Civilian Killings Based on the Victim's Affiliation, 1974–1999.

Reported acts of civilian killings by victim affiliation, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR
Note: some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators

Reported Acts of Disappearance by Victim Affiliation, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR
Note: some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators

91. 40.9% (2,092/5,120) of killings reported to the Commission's statement-taking process were against victims who were either formally affiliated with Fretilin or a pro-independence group that was not directly involved in the armed struggle. 6.4% (329/5,120) of reported killings were against victims who were reported to be affiliated with Falintil.

92. 33.5% (280/835) of disappearances reported to the Commission's statement-taking process were against victims who were either formally affiliated with Fretilin or a pro-independence group not directly involved in the armed struggle. 7.6% (64/835) of reported disappearances were against victims who were reported to be affiliated with Falintil.

93. The Commission's narrative statement data are consistent with the hypothesis that the overwhelming majority of killings and disappearances were committed against members and suspected associates of the Resistance movement (even though those persons suspected of being associates of the Resistance movement may not have been formally associated with a political party or armed group).

The association between conflict-related deaths and periods of detention

94. The pattern of arbitrary detentions and civilian killings reported to the Commission are positively correlated over time.* In particular, both reported non-combatant killings and arbitrary detentions were overwhelmingly concentrated during the initial years of the Indonesian invasion and occupation as shown in the Figures of Reported Civilian Killings, 1974–1999 and Reported Civilian Disappearances, 1974–1999.

Number of reported acts of civilian killings, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

* The correlation coefficient for the two series is 0.83.

Number of reported acts of detention, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

95. Furthermore, of those civilians who were reported to have died for reasons related to the conflict (that is, due either to a civilian killing, death by hunger and illness or disappearance), 98.6% (10,659/10,809) were reported to have been arbitrarily detained at least once during the Commission's mandate period. As Table 5: Reported Fatal Violations & Their Detention Context by Violations shows, 3.5% (378/10,809) of these victims died while they were being held in detention. For 12.2% (1,314/10,809) of conflict-related deaths suffered by individuals who were also arbitrarily detained during the Commission's mandate period, the dates of their detention were not known. Hence the Commission was not able to discern whether or not these conflict-related deaths occurred while the individual was being detained. However, of the victims reported to have been arbitrarily detained during the conflict, 15.7% (1,692/10,809) died as a result of the conflict.

Table 4: Reported violations & their detention context by district, 1974–1999
	Victim detained at time of violation	% detained at time of violation	Victim detained but unknown dates	% detentions with unknown dates	Victim detained - but not at time of violation	% detained - but not at time of violation	Victim never detained	% never detained	Total
Lautém	455	19.7	1,307	56.6	479	20.8	67	2.9	2,308
Viqueque	401	13.0	1,371	44.4	1,245	40.4	68	2.2	3,085
Baucau	785	31.8	891	36.1	639	25.9	155	6.3	2,470
Manatuto	271	16.0	921	54.5	465	27.5	34	2.0	1,691
Manufahi	771	23.8	1,305	40.3	924	28.5	237	7.3	3,237
Aileu	477	26.6	867	48.3	412	23.0	38	2.1	1,794
Ermera	986	24.8	1,128	28.4	1,641	41.3	216	5.4	3,971
Liquiçá	695	42.8	448	27.6	405	25.0	75	4.6	1,623
Dili	1,504	40.3	1,267	34.0	646	17.3	314	8.4	3,731
Ainaro	457	21.6	1,005	47.5	582	27.5	72	3.4	2,116
Covalima	886	41.5	401	18.8	729	34.1	119	5.6	2,135
Oecussi	366	12.6	249	8.6	2,201	76.0	81	2.8	2,897
Bobonaro	992	32.7	793	26.1	1,133	37.3	116	3.8	3,034
Indonesia	48	9.0	76	14.3	390	73.2	19	3.6	533
	9,094	100.0	12,029	100.0	11,891	100.0	1,611	100.0	34,625

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

96. Of the fatal violations reported to the Commission which occurred while the victim was being held in detention, 96.6% (365/378) were civilian killings or disappearances and 3.4% (13/378) were deaths due to hunger and illness. Whereas, the distribution by cause of death for those individuals who died of conflict-related causes outside of detention was substantially different: 49.0% (4,390/8,967) of the victims documented by the Commission died as a result of killings or disappearances whereas the remaining 51.0% (4,577/8,967) were deaths due to hunger and illness. Hence, the Commission's quantitative data are consistent with the hypothesis that persons were at a relatively higher risk of being killed or of disappearing while being held in detention than when they were not being detained.

Table 5: Reported fatal violations & their detention context by violations, 1974–1999

	Victim detained at time of violation	% detained at time of violation	Victim detained but unknown dates	% detentions with unknown dates	Victim detained - but not at time of violation	% detained - but not at time of violation	Victim never detained	% never detained	Total
Civilian Killings	295	5.8	807	15.8	3,887	76.1	118	2.3	5,107
Death due to Deprivation	13	0.3	273	5.6	4,577	94.0	6	0.1	4,869
Disappearance	70	8.4	234	28.1	503	60.4	26	3.1	833
	378	100.0	1,314	100.0	8,967	100.0	150	100.0	10,809

Source: Database of Amnesty International Reports on East Timor

97. The pattern of conflict-related deaths and their relationship to detention-periods varied over the phases of the conflict. As shown in the Reported Fatal Violation and Detention, Based on Phases, 1974–1999 Table reported deaths in detention were overwhelmingly concentrated in the first and last phase of the conflict. Conflict-related deaths which occurred outside of detention (for those victims who had been arbitrarily detained during the Commission's mandate period) were overwhelmingly concentrated in the first phase of the conflict: 85.3% (7,651/8,967) of these conflict-related deaths occurred in the first phase of the conflict, whereas 8.5% (762/8,967) occurred in 1999.

Table 6: Reported fatal violations & their detention context by phase, 1974–1999
	Victim detained at time of violation	% detained at time of violation	Victim detained but unknown dates	% detentions with unknown dates	Victim detained - but not at time of violation	% detained - but not at time of violation	Victim never detained	% never detained	Total
Phase 1 (1974–1983)	216	2.4	1,172	12.8	7,651	83.8	88	1.0	9,127
Phase 2 (1984–1998)	48	6.5	114	15.3	554	74.6	27	3.6	743
Phase 3 (1999)	114	12.1	28	3.0	762	81.2	35	3.7	939
	378	100.0	1,314	100.0	8,967	100.0	150	100.0	10,809

Source: Database of Amnesty International Reports on East Timor

Non-fatal violations

Introduction

98. In this section we present an analysis of non-fatal violations which were reported to the Commission. This analysis does not include overall estimations of the total extent, pattern, and trend of non-fatal violations, as the analysis is based on a convenience sample of narrative statements collected by the Commission. However, the analysis presents the statistical patterns of non-fatal violations reported to the Commission and notes hypotheses which the data support. In addition we compare the statistical patterns and trends observed in the Commission's data on non-fatal violations to data collected contemporaneously by Amnesty International and also data collected by the East Timorese NGO, Fokupers, immediately after the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation.

Overview of statistical findings on non-fatal violations

99. This section summarises the main findings of the Commission's descriptive statistical analysis of the almost 8,000 narrative statements collected in all 13 districts of Timor-Leste.

- Non-fatal violations reported to the Commission were overwhelmingly concentrated in the period of the initial invasion and occupation by the Indonesian military forces and around the time of the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation: 56.3% (33,224/60,047) of documented non-fatal violations occurred between 1975 and 1984, and 21.0% (12,634/60,047) occurred in 1999.
- In almost all districts, except for Oecussi, detention, torture and ill-treatment were the most frequently reported violations, accounting for between 69.4% and 82.7% of the reported violation counts in districts. In Oecussi, physical integrity violations (such as detention, torture and ill-treatment) accounted for 43.0% of the district's violation count. Relative to other districts, in Oecussi, property and economic violations were reported in higher proportions, comprising 30.8% (1,271/4,133) of the district's total violation count.
- The patterns of non-fatal violations during the first and last phases of the conflict varied from region to region. While the initial violence around the time of the Indonesian invasion in 1975 was most intense in the Western and Central Regions, after 1976 the focus of non-fatal violations shifted to the Eastern Region.
- The documented age-sex distribution counts for arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment are remarkably similar, each showing that the most frequently documented victim group for these types of violations were young men of military age (between the ages of 20 and 39). Very few documented acts of detention, torture and ill-treatment were experienced by female victims. By contrast, women experienced the overwhelming majority of sexually-based violations: 90.1% (769/853) of the sexually-based violations documented by the Commission involved female victims.
- The Commission's data on non-fatal violations show a general upward trend in the ratio of adults to children over time, that is, the number of adult victims relative to child victims is larger in the latter part of the conflict.
- Contemporaneous reports from Amnesty International show three distinct waves of detentions of identified individuals in 1985, 1989-93 and 1994-99 of 402, 891 and 811 respectively, whereas retrospective narrative statements given to the Commission suggest that the bulk of arbitrary detentions occurred in 1999 and around 1975-84.
- The Commission's comparative analysis between its own statistical data and contemporaneous reports by Amnesty International show that although international human rights groups, such as Amnesty International, meticulously documented the human rights situation in Timor-Leste throughout the 1980s and 1990s, there was substantial underreporting of the overall magnitude of non-fatal violence at the time, especially during the initial invasion and occupation years.
- The Commission's statistical evidence is consistent with the hypothesis that the detention practices of the Indonesian military shifted from a focus on both individual and group victims in the early occupation years of 1977-84 to a more targeted strategy focused on individual detainees from 1985 to 1999. The Commission's statistical evidence also suggests a positive correlation between acts of torture committed against group victims and individual victims over time.

- The pattern of reported detentions and torture over time was strongly positively correlated. Over time violence became increasingly coordinated and the magnitude of reported acts of torture increased over time (between the late 1970s and mid-1980s) relative to the number of reported detentions. The Commission's statistical evidence also suggests that over time (and particularly after 1984) the practice of arbitrary detention became more targeted and was used more regularly in combination with acts of torture.
- The abuses which were most often committed during known periods of detention were torture (38.4%, 4,267/9,094), ill-treatment (33.2%, 27,998/9,094) and threats (21.3%, 634/9,094). Furthermore, torture and ill- treatment are reported much less frequently among victims who never have been held in detention: of the torture violations documented by the Commission, 16.4% (1,820/11,123) were suffered by victims who never experienced detention. The Commission's statistical evidence is consistent with the hypothesis that victims who are held in detention were at an increased level of risk of being subjected to torture or ill-treatment than individuals who had never been detained during the Commission's reference period.
- Districts which reported relatively higher proportions of torture and ill-treatment tended to also report higher proportions of abuse within detention.
- Children and older people were detained substantially less often, and when they were detained they were subjected to proportionally lower levels of abuse.
- Data collected independently by the Commission and Amnesty International confirm that large groups of people were detained on the island of Ataúro in the period between 1980 and 1984, in addition to continued large-scale detentions in other parts of Timor-Leste.
- 88.7% (68,943/77,748) of non-fatal violations reported to the Commission were violations against the civilian population. However, as the pro-independence movement grew more organised and open in the lead-up to the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation in 1999, increasing numbers of civilians with pro-independence affiliations appear to have suffered non-fatal violations.
- The overwhelming majority of non-fatal violations reported to the Commission were attributed to the Indonesian military and police: 62.2% (37,343/60,047) of documented non-fatal violations were attributed to the Indonesian military and police, 38.7% (23,253/60,047) to the East Timorese auxiliaries of the Indonesian occupation force and 11.9% (7,157/60,047) to the Resistance movement.*

* Note that for some reported violations, perpetrator responsibility was attributed to multiple institutions. Hence the percentage share of attributed institutional perpetrator responsibility does not sum to 100%.

- The Commission's quantitative analysis of arbitrary detentions is consistent with the hypothesis that coordination and cooperation between the Indonesian occupation force and their East Timorese auxiliaries was particularly strong after the Indonesian military had secured large parts of Timor-Leste and started consolidating its occupation of the territory, and then again in 1999 in the lead-up to and the aftermath of the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation.
- The Commission's statistical data is consistent with the hypothesis that in 1999 the Indonesian military and police aided and abetted their East Timorese auxiliaries (principally the pro-autonomy militias) in the widespread use of arbitrary detention in the lead-up to and the aftermath of the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation.

In-depth descriptive statistical analysis of non-fatal violations

Overall distribution of reported non-fatal violations

100. The overall statement-taking process implemented by the Commission was unprecedented in scale compared with all previous human rights documentation projects carried out in Timor-Leste.

101. As is shown in the Non-Fatal Violations Based on Data Sources, 1974–1999 Figure, the types of non-fatal violations documented by the Commission, Amnesty International and Fokupers differed significantly. This is reflective of both the differing nature of the three projects and the different social networks to which the three institutions' data collection strategies gave them access. Of all the non-fatal violations reported to the Commission, 42.3% (25,347/59,972) were detentions, 18.5% (11,123/59,972) were acts of torture and 14.1% (8,436/59,972) were acts of ill-treatment. By contrast, a substantially lower proportion of detentions (23.4% (184/788)) and tortures (7.5% [59/788]) were reported to Fokupers compared with those reported to the Commission, although approximately similar proportions of displacements and ill-treatments were reported to Fokupers as to the Commission.

102. As a women's rights NGO, Fokupers documented a significantly larger proportion of rapes than both the Commission and Amnesty International: 7.7% (86/1,115) of all their documented non-fatal violations were rapes. By contrast, of the violations documented in the available Amnesty International reports, 59.7% (3,272/5,479) were detentions, 18% (986/5,479) were unfair trials and 11.5% (631/5479) were acts of torture.

Table 7: Non-fatal violations by datasource, 1974–1999
Violation type	CAVR Statements Database	Fokupers Database	Amnesty Database	% CAVR	% Fokupers	% Amnesty	Total
Attempted Civilian Killing	1,966	49	215	3.3	6.2	3.5	2,230
Detention	25,383	184	3,672	42.3	23.3	60.1	29,239
Torture	11,135	59	666	18.5	7.5	10.9	11,860
Rape	393	84	12	0.7	10.6	0.2	489
Sexual Slavery	98	25	1	0.2	3.2	0.0	124
Sexual Violence	221	31	43	0.4	3.9	0.7	295
Ill-Treatment	8,443	98	0	14.1	12.4	0.0	8,541
Forced Marriage	131	4	0	0.2	0.5	0.0	135
Impediments to Reproductive Rights	10	1	0	0.0	0.1	0.0	11
Unfair Trial	213	0	1,155	0.4	0.0	18.9	1,368
Destruction of Homes	2,231	51	25	3.7	6.5	0.4	2,307
Destruction of Livestock	409	6	0	0.7	0.8	0.0	415
Extortion	2,095	44	19	3.5	5.6	0.3	2,158
Threats	2,987	136	64	5.0	17.2	1.1	3,187
Forced Recruitment	2,157	10	7	3.6	1.3	0.1	2,174
Forced Labour	2,175	9	0	3.6	1.1	0.0	2,184
Other	0	0	227	0.0	0.0	3.7	227
Total	60,047	791	6,106	100.0	100.0	100.0	66,944

Source: Database of CAVR, Fokupers and Amnesty International Statements and Reports

103. The broad relative distributions of victims per violation for the different violation types was fairly similar for the Commission, Fokupers and Amnesty International projects, as shown in Figures below. The Commission tended to document slightly more violations per victim than the Fokupers and Amnesty International projects. On average, 2.36 violations per victim were reported to the Commission, compared with 2.01 and 1.53 respectively for Fokupers and Amnesty International. This difference reflects the different character of the different projects. The Commission documented violations across the entire mandate period, including the initial invasion years, while Amnesty's work was concentrated mostly on the consolidation years of the occupation and was compiled during the conflict when communication between Timor-Leste and the rest of the world was limited. The Fokupers project focused almost exclusively on the third phase of the conflict around the time of the UN-supervised Popular Consultation. Fokupers relied exclusively on female deponents and was focused on documenting sexual violations.

Table 8: Relative distributions of victims per violation, CAVR data

Violation type	Count of violations	Percent of violations	Count of victims	Percent of victims	Violations per victim
Detention	25,347	42.3	17,169	67.4	1.48
Torture	11,123	18.5	8,508	33.4	1.31
Ill-Treatment	8,436	14.1	6,872	27.0	1.23
Property/ Economic Violations	4,735	7.9	3,851	15.1	1.23
Other	4,339	7.2	4,030	15.8	1.08
Threats	2,982	5.0	2,653	10.4	1.12
Forced Recruitment	2,157	3.6	1,988	7.8	1.09
Sexually-Based Violations	853	1.4	657	2.6	1.30
	59,972		25,460		2.36

Note: the victim proportions sum to more than 100% because the same victim may suffer more than one violation type
Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Table 9: Relative distributions of victims per violation, Fokupers data
Violation type	Count of violations	Percent of violations	Count of victims	Percent of victims	Violations per victim
Detention	184	23.4	168	42.7	1.10
Sexually-Based Violations	145	18.4	104	26.5	1.39
Threats	136	17.3	119	30.3	1.14
Property/ Economic Violations	99	12.6	86	21.9	1.15
Ill-Treatment	98	12.4	92	23.4	1.07
Torture	59	7.5	59	15.0	1.00
Other	57	7.2	54	13.7	1.06
Forced Recruitment	10	1.3	10	2.5	1.00
0	788		393		2.01

Note: the victim proportiotns sum to more than 100% because the same victim may suffer more than one violation type
Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to Fokupers

Table 10: Relative distributions of victims per violation, Amnesty International data
Violation type	Count of violations	Percent of violations	Count of victims	Percent of victims	Violations per victim
Detention	3,272	59.7	3,073	86.0	1.06
Other	1,412	25.8	1,383	38.7	1.02
Torture	631	11.5	600	16.8	1.05
Threats	61	1.1	59	1.7	1.03
Sexually-Based Violations	55	1.0	43	1.2	1.28
Property/ Economic Violations	44	0.8	43	1.2	1.02
Forced Recruitment	4	0.1	4	0.1	1.00
0	5,479		3,572		1.53

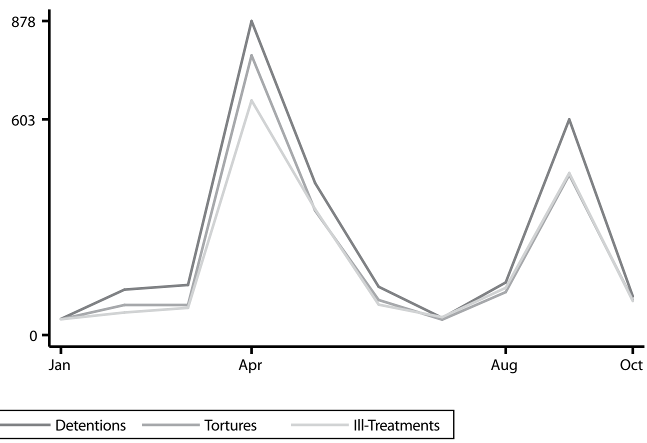
Note: the victim proportions sum to more than 100% because the same victim may suffer more than one violation type
Source: Database of Amnesty International Reports on East Timor

The three phases of large-scale violence in Timor-Leste

104. The Commission defines three phases of conflict during April 1974-September 1999. The first phase includes the initial Indonesian invasion and occupation of Timor-Leste, spanning 1975 to 1984. The second phase is the consolidation and normalisation of the occupation, from 1985 to 1998. The third phase of conflict includes the first three quarters of 1999, the period surrounding the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation process.

105. As can be seen in the Reported Number of Non-fatal Violations, 1974–1999 Figure, there were high levels of non-fatal violations during the initial invasion and occupation. During the second phase, in general there were relatively lower levels of non-fatal violations, and a concentration of acts of detention, torture and killings around the time of the 1991 Santa Cruz Massacre. The second phase of "normalisation" included a new wave of targeted detentions and physical abuse of suspected members and collaborators with the Resistance movement. Finally the last phase of the conflict, which includes the lead-up to the Popular Consultation and also the period between the Popular Consultation and the deployment of the multinational Interfet (International Force in Timor-Leste), produced two distinct waves of killing, displacement and looting and destruction of property. This final phase was characterised by large-scale violations concentrated in a short period of time overwhelmingly carried out by "pro-autonomy militias" supported, trained, armed and directed by the Indonesian military.

Number of reported acts of non-fatal violations, 1974–1999

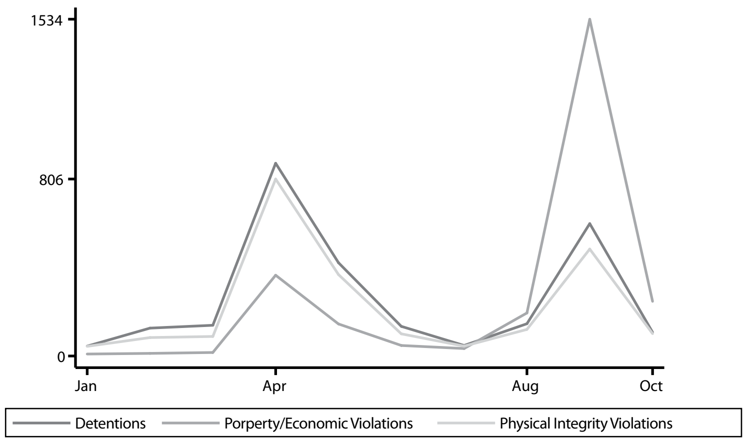


Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

106. The pattern of massive non-fatal violations during the initial invasion and occupation years, followed by relatively low-level violence during the "consolidation and normalisation" years and then an increase of violence in 1999 is also mirrored in the pattern of fatal violations over time, as discussed above.

107. During 1999, reported violations were overwhelmingly concentrated in April and September. As the Number of Reported Detentions, Tortures and Ill-treatments, 1974–1999 Figure shows, the reported pattern of detention, ill-treatment and torture are positively correlated over time, that is, when any one of the violations increases, the others also tend to increase, and vice versa. All three violation types have reported peaks in April with a slightly smaller peak being reported in September, although both peaks are of a similar magnitude. In 1999 reported violence was concentrated into two main bursts before and after the process leading to the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation. This pattern is consistent with the hypothesis that physical intimidation was used in a coordinated fashion to intimidate the East Timorese population in the lead-up to the arrival of the UN mission, UNAMET, that was authorised to conduct the Popular Consultation and as further intimidation and retribution in the immediate aftermath of the ballot.

Count of reported acts of detention, torture & ill-treatment, 1999



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Note: 4.4% of reported detentions, 3.4% of reported tortures and 4.3% of reported ill–treatments in 1999 were missing month information

108. There was a substantial shift in practice by the Indonesian-backed militias and the Indonesian military before and after the Popular Consultation (see also Vol. III, Part 7.9: Economic and Social Rights). As the Violations Over Time Figure shows, the most frequently used form of repression used before the ballot were physical integrity violations (such as detention, torture and ill-treatment). Immediately after the ballot, looting and forms of property and economic violations were used most frequently. After the ballot, physical integrity violations occurred at a slightly lower level compared with the pre-ballot period, but they are overshadowed by property violations. This pattern appears to be consistent with the hypothesis that the Indonesian military and militias switched from using violations of physical integrity before the ballot to pressure the population to vote for autonomy, to retributive acts after the ballot result consisting of large-scale looting and property destruction coupled with retributive acts of physical violence, which may also have been linked with a campaign to intimidate the population into transfer to West Timor, Indonesia.

Violations over time, 1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

109. The Commission's empirical data on non-fatal violation patterns over time in 1999 are consistent with the hypothesis that violence was coordinated in 1999.

Reported levels of institutional responsibility for non-fatal violations

Overall distribution of attributed institutional responsibility for reported non-fatal violations

110. A number of different institutions were involved in acts of violence over the course of the conflict. The main institutional groups were the Indonesian military, Falintil, East Timorese political parties (such as Fretilin, UDT and Apodeti), East Timorese members of the civil defence forces (such as Hansip, Wanra and Ratih), militias and other East Timorese auxiliaries. This section reviews the reported levels of responsibility for the main non-fatal violations across the main institutional perpetrator groups.

111. The majority of non-fatal violations reported to the Commission were attributed to the Indonesian military and their East Timorese collaborators, as shown in the figure below: 41.2% (37,298/90,635) of the perpetrator involvement in non-fatal violations was attributed to the Indonesian military, and 25.6% (23,230/90,635) to East Timorese auxiliaries (such as the militias, civil defence force and local officials who worked under the Indonesian administration). For 7.9% (7,146/90,635) of reported violations, institutional perpetrator responsibility was attributed to the Resistance groups and pro-independence forces.

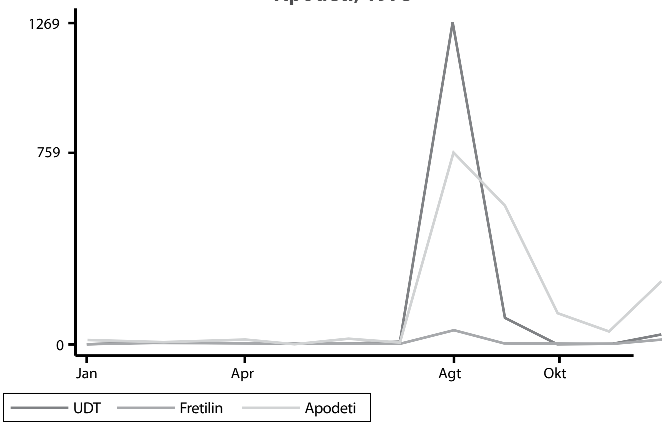
Table 11: Non-fatal violations reported to the CAVR

Violation Type	Indonesian Military	Timorese Collaborators of TNI	Resistance Groups	Other	Civilian Population	Pro-Autonomy Groups	Unknown	Total
Detention	17,749	8,675	3,303	3,792	771	222	3,268	25,347
Torture	7,130	3,903	1,172	1,228	293	61	2,463	11,123
Ill-Treatment	4,628	3,354	1,075	1,252	214	96	2,216	8,436
Property/ Economic Violations	1,802	3,058	416	346	129	65	2,319	4,735
Other	2,367	1,634	789	735	73	34	1,020	4,339
Threats	1,458	1,590	236	251	55	28	1,143	2,982
Forced Recruitment	1,556	740	122	131	47	12	456	2,157
Sexually-Based Violations	608	276	33	26	11	1	203	853
	37,298	23,230	7,146	7,761	1,593	519	13,088	59,972



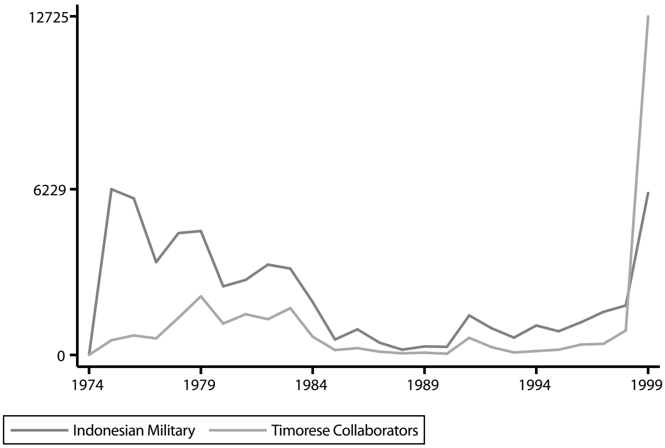
Responsibility for violations may be shared among perpetrators, and therefore, columns may not be directly summed.
Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Temporal patterns of attributed institutional responsibility for non-fatal violations

112. The levels of attributed institutional responsibility for documented non-fatal violations varied over the course of the conflict. During 1975, 51.0% (6,229/12,206) of perpetrator involvement in non-fatal violations documented by the Commission were attributed to the Indonesian military, whereas 29.9% (3,653/12,206) were attributed to East Timorese political parties.

113. Of the documented non-fatal violations which occurred in 1975, 31.2% (3,169/10,162) were attributed to Fretilin, 19.4% (1,972/10,162) to UDT and 2.6% (261/10,162) to Apodeti. As is shown in the Non-Fatal Violations Related to Fretilin, UDT and Apodeti, 1974 Figure, the overwhelming majority of documented non-fatal violations in 1975 (where the exact month of the violation is known) attributed to East Timorese political parties occurred in August and September.

Count of reported acts of non-fatal violations attributed to Fretilin, UDT and Apodeti, 1975

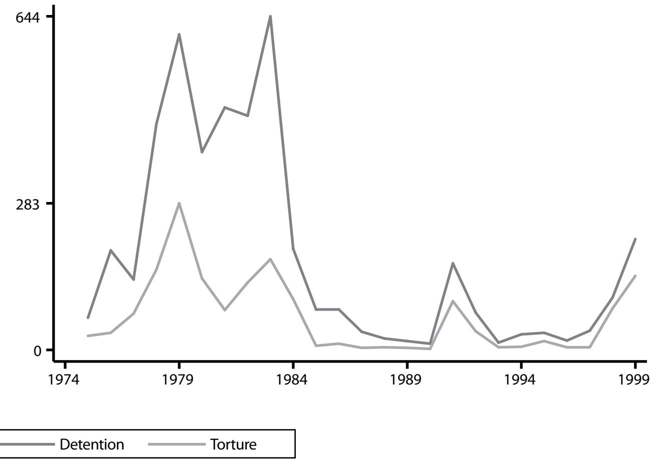


Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Note: 22.0%, 41.0% & 53.1% of non–fatal violations attributed UDT, Fretilin & Apodeti were missing month information respectively

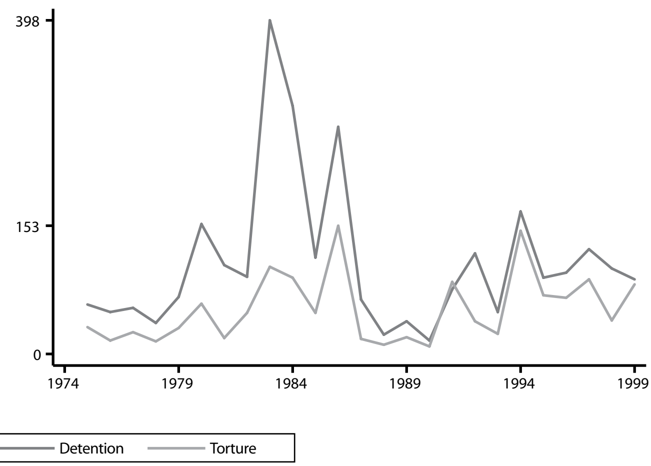
114. As is shown in the Violations Over Time Figure, during the period in which the Indonesian military occupation developed from 1977 to 1984, the pattern of non-fatal violations attributed to the Indonesian military and its East Timorese auxiliaries is positively correlated.* Furthermore, a substantially higher relative proportion of perpetrator responsibility is attributed to the civil defence units and other East Timorese auxiliaries of ABRI between 1977 and 1984 than during the initial invasion years (1975-76) or the consolidation years between 1985 and 1998. The Commission's statistical data are consistent with the hypothesis that the Indonesian military drew heavily on its East Timorese auxiliaries between 1977 and 1984 in containing Resistance activities and normalising the occupation through physical integrity violations. Of the non-fatal violations attributed to East Timorese auxiliaries between 1977 and 1984, 54.0% (4,660/8,633) were acts of detention, 16.6% (1,435/8,663) were acts of torture and 10.9% (938/8,633) were acts of ill-treatment.

* The correlation coefficient for reported non-fatal violations attributed to the Indonesian military and police and those attributed to its East Timorese auxiliaries is 0.88.



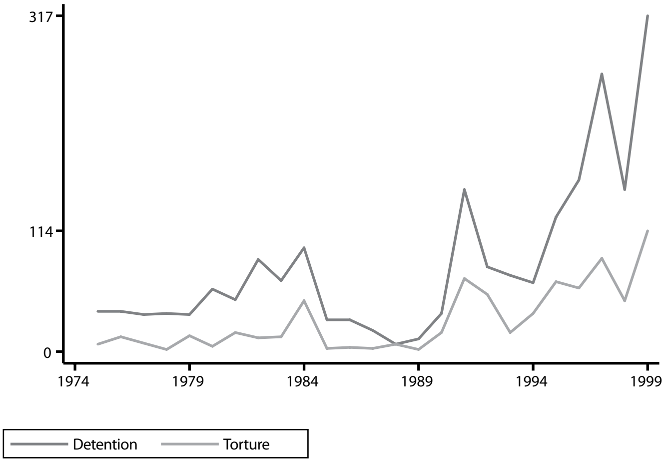
Violations over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



115. Deponents in the Commission's statement-taking process attributed substantial responsibility to specific units of the occupying Indonesian forces and their East Timorese collaborators at particular times during the conflict. As the Non-Fatal Violations by Civilian Defence Units Over Time, 1974–1999 Figure and the Violations by Kopassus Over Time, 1974–1999 Figure show, after the party conflict and initial invasion in 1975, there is a relative peak in attributed responsibility of detentions and tortures by the civil defence units between 1978 and 1983, after which Kopassandha/ Kopassus (Indonesian Special Forces) carried out several hundred reported detentions and acts of torture in 1984 and 1986. In the late 1990s, as can be seen in the Violations by the Police Over Time, 1974–1999 Figure, responsibility is attributed to the police for detentions and tortures. The reported magnitude of detentions and tortures attributed to the civil defence forces in 1983 is 1.6 times bigger than detentions and acts of torture attributed to Kopassandha in the same year and 2.0 times bigger than those attributed to the police in 1999.

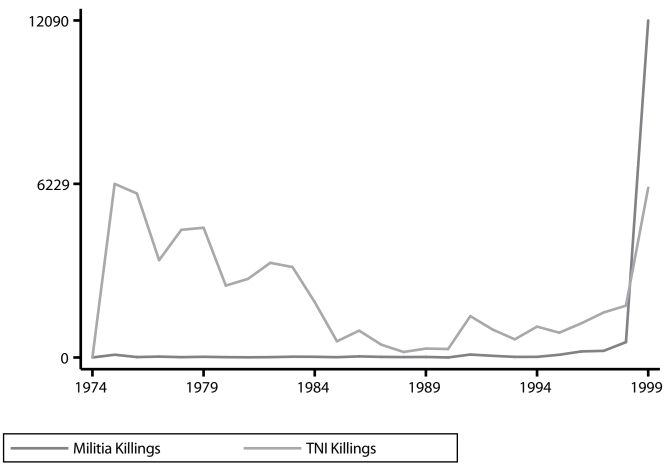
Non-fatal violations over time committed by Civil Defense Forces, 1974–1999



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

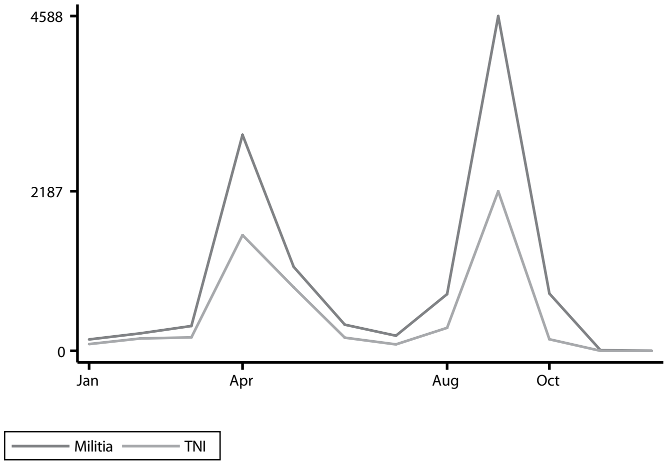
Violations over time committed by Kopassus, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



Non-fatal violations over time committed by Police, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

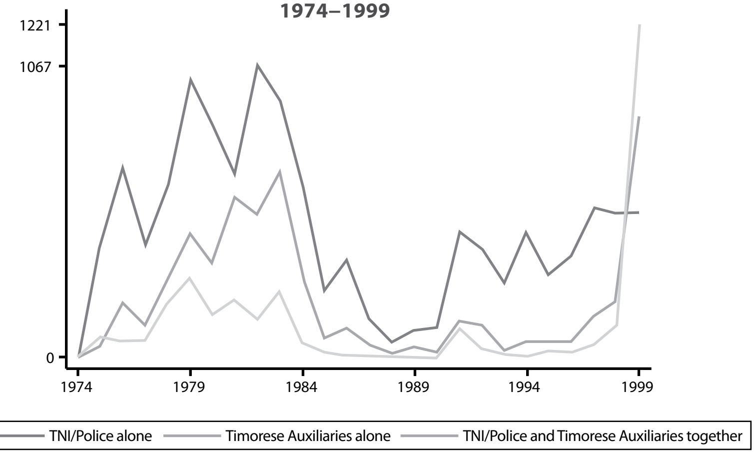


116. By contrast in 1999, overwhelming responsibility for non-fatal violations is attributed to the militias and the Indonesian military – with the militias being associated with more than twice as many non-fatal violations as the Indonesian military, as is shown in the Violations Over Time Figure, 1974–1999 and Violations Over Time Figure 1999.

Violations over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Violations over time, 1999



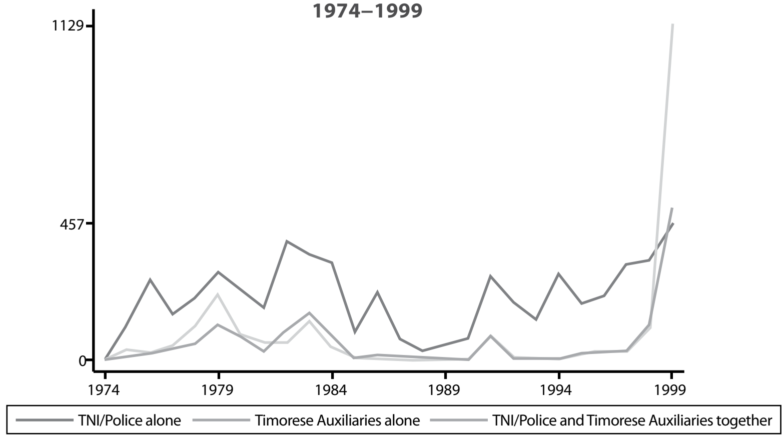
Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

117. Sometimes non-fatal violations were attributed to the Indonesian military and police acting alone, other times to East Timorese auxiliaries acting alone and other times to the Indonesian military and police acting in concert with their East Timorese auxiliaries. The pattern of shared and individual responsibility between the Indonesian forces and their East Timorese auxiliaries differed by violation type and varied over time.

118. Of the acts of arbitrary detention documented by the Commission, 82.3% (20,867/25,347) were attributed to the Indonesian security forces, their East Timorese auxiliaries or both. As the Acts of Detention Related to TNI, the Police, and Their East Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999 Figure shows, reported acts of arbitrary detention attributed to the Indonesian military and police alone, East Timorese auxiliaries, or both forces acting together, are positively correlated over time. In particular, periods in which substantial documented acts of detention are attributed to both forces acting together (as well as each acting individually) include the period of the initial invasion and occupation (particularly between 1978 and 1983) and around the time of the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation. Hence the Commission's quantitative analysis of arbitrary detentions is consistent with the hypothesis that coordination and cooperation between the Indonesian occupation force and their East Timorese auxiliaries was particularly strong after the Indonesian military had secured large parts of Timor-Leste and started consolidating its occupation of the territory and then again in 1999 in the lead-up to and the aftermath of the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation.

Reported acts of detention attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



119. Between 1975 and 1998, substantially more acts of arbitrary detention are attributed to the Indonesian military acting alone relative to acts of detention which were attributed solely to East Timorese auxiliaries, or jointly to both the Indonesian occupying force and their East Timorese auxiliaries. However, in 1999, most acts of detentions were attributed to East Timorese auxiliaries. Of the acts of arbitrary detention in 1999 documented by the Commission, 75.7% (2,104/2,779) were attributed to either the East Timorese auxiliaries acting alone or in collaboration with the Indonesian military and police, while 19.2% (534/2,779) of documented acts of detention which occurred in 1999 were attributed to the Indonesian military alone. Almost all these acts were reported to have occurred in the months of April, May and September of 1999, as shown in the Acts of Detention Related to TNI, the Police, and Their East Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999 Figure. The resulting statistical pattern is suggestive of prior planning and operational coordination between both forces in their use of arbitrary detention. During these months the Indonesian government was reassuring the United Nations that its military was trying to bring the violence in Timor-Leste under control. The Commission's statistical data, however, are consistent with the hypothesis that in 1999 the Indonesian military and police, rather than seeking to control their East Timorese auxiliaries (principally the pro-autonomy militias), aided and abetted them in the widespread use of arbitrary detention in the lead-up to and the aftermath of the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation.

120. The pattern of responsibility attributed both solely and jointly to the Indonesian security forces and their East Timorese auxiliaries has some notable similarities to arbitrary detentions, despite acts of ill-treatment and torture being used in a more targeted fashion.* A similar proportion (namely 82.5% (16,135/19,559) of the documented ill-treatments and tortures) are attributed to the Indonesian occupation forces and their East Timorese auxiliaries. Also, similar to acts of arbitrary detention, in 1999, 75.8% (3,278/4,324) of reported acts of ill-treatment and tortures were attributed to East Timorese auxiliaries (either acting alone or in collaboration with associates of the Indonesian military and police). However, a greater proportion of acts of ill-treatment and tortures were reported to have occurred in 1999 than between 1974 and 1998 relative to documented cases of arbitrary detention, as can be seen when comparing the Acts of Torture Related to TNI, the Police and Their East Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999 Figure, and the Acts of Ill-Treatment Related to TNI, the Police and Their East Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999 Figure to the Acts of Detention Related to TNI, the Police and Their East Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999 Figure.

* For a detailed explanation on the more targeted nature of torture and ill-treatment relative to acts of detention, refer to the section on the three phases of large-scale violence in Timor-Leste above.

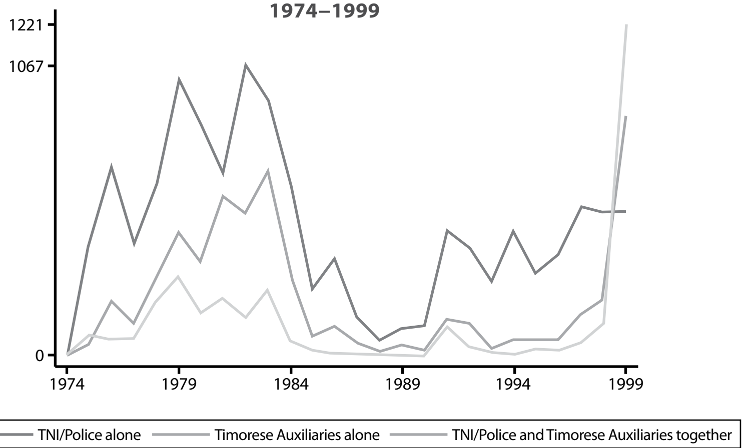
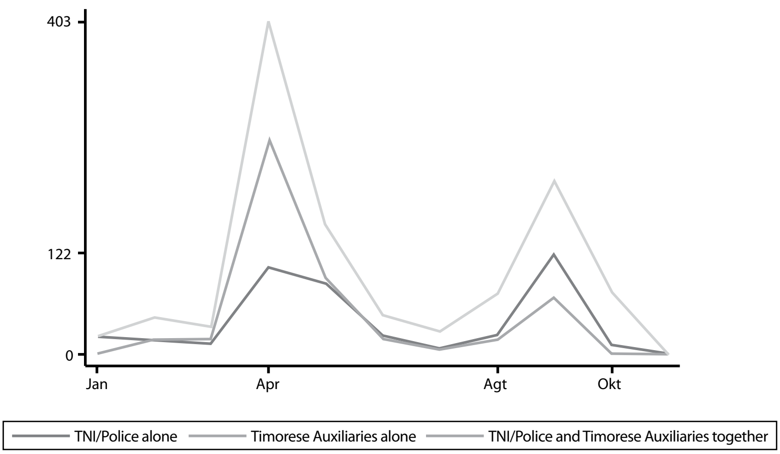
Reported acts of torture attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

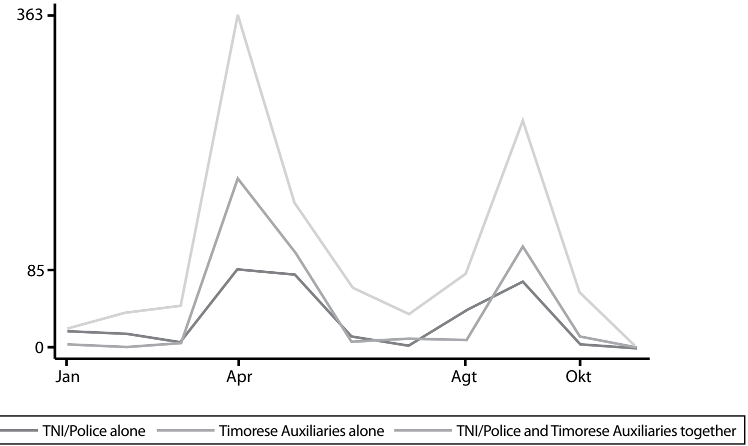
Reported acts of ill-treatment attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



Reported acts of detention attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

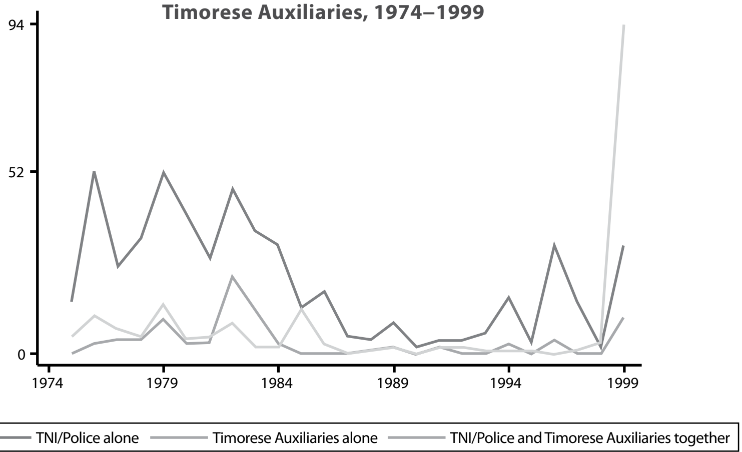


121. In 1999 the pattern and magnitude of documented acts of torture and ill-treatment attributed to the Indonesian occupying forces and their East Timorese auxiliaries both solely and jointly is similar to that of documented acts of detention in 1999, as can be seen in the Recorded Acts of Torture Related to TNI, the Police and Their East Timorese Auxiliaries, 1999 Figure and the Recorded Acts of Ill-Treatment Related to TNI, the Police and Their East Timorese Auxiliaries, 1999 Figure.

Reported acts of torture attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

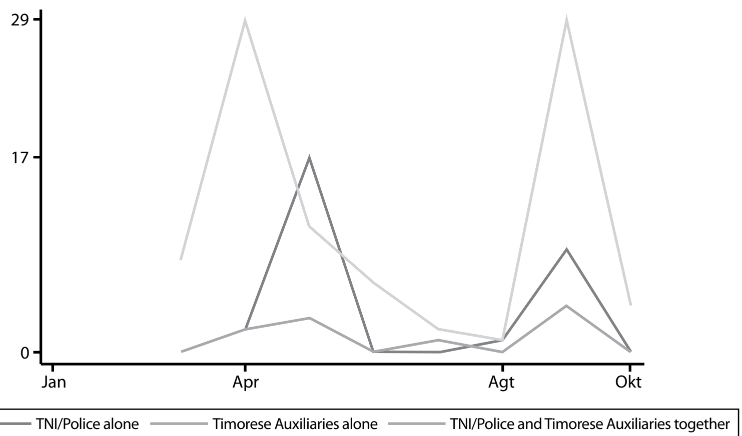
Reported acts of ill-treatment attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1999



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

122. Hence as is the case for arbitrary detentions, the Commission's statistical data on ill-treatment and torture are consistent with the hypothesis that coordination and cooperation between the Indonesian forces and their East Timorese auxiliaries was particularly strong after the Indonesian military had secured large parts of Timor-Leste and started consolidating its occupation of the territory, and then again in 1999 in the lead-up to and aftermath of the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation.

123. The nature and pattern of attribution of perpetrator responsibility for documented sexually-based violations and property/economic violations were both notably different than for documented detentions, tortures and ill-treatments.

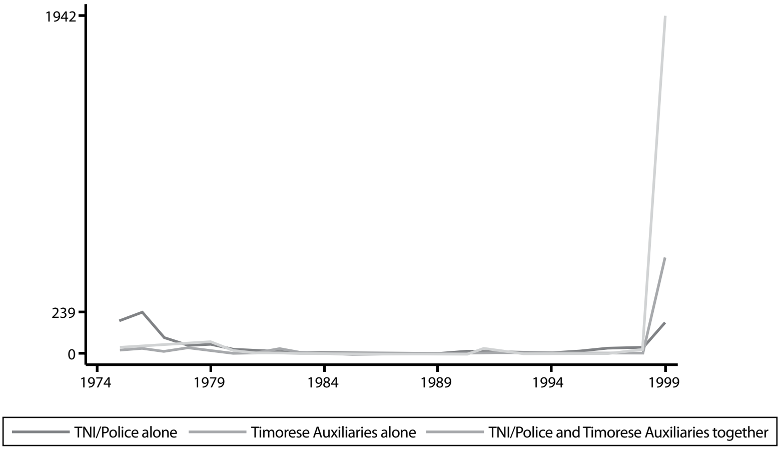


124. A higher proportion of sexually-based violations were attributed to the Indonesian military acting alone, whereas a much smaller proportion of sexually-based violations was attributed to the Indonesian occupation forces acting together with their East Timorese auxiliaries. In particular, 61.0% (520/853) of documented sexually-based violations were attributed to the Indonesian military and police acting alone, 22.0% (188/853) to East Timorese auxiliaries acting alone and 10.3% (88/853) to both forces acting together. As for all other non-fatal violations, the higher counts of sexually-based violations were attributed to Indonesian military alone between 1975 and 1998 than those attributed solely to East Timorese auxiliaries or jointly to both forces; whereas for 1999 the majority of sexually-based violations (66.2% (94/142) reported to the Commission were solely attributed to East Timorese auxiliaries. These temporal patterns are shown in the Recorded Acts of Sexually-Based Violation Related to TNI, the Police and Their East Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999 Figure and the Recorded Acts of Sexually-Based Violation Related to TNI, the Police and Their East Timorese Auxiliaries, 1999 Figure.

Count of reported acts of sexually-based violations attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Count of reported acts of sexually-based violations attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1999



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

125.Of the documented property/economic violations attributed to the Indonesian occupying forces and/or their East Timorese auxiliaries acting alone or jointly, 65.1% (2,673/4,105) occurred in 1999. As can be seen in the Recorded Economic/Property Violations Related to TNI, the Police and Their East Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999 Figure, 70.2% (1,942/2,766) of the documented property/economic violations in 1999 were attributed solely to East Timorese auxiliaries, 20.0% (553/2,766) were attributed to both forces acting together and 6.4% (178/2,766) to the Indonesian military and police acting alone. The Commission's quantitative analysis is consistent with the hypothesis that most property and economic destruction was carried out in 1999 and was usually carried out by the militias acting alone or in collaboration with the Indonesian military and police.

Count of reported acts of property/economic violations attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Variations in reported non-fatal abuses across space

126. The Commission's narrative data cannot be used to assess directly the differences in the magnitude of violations between regions and districts. Data based on convenience samples are representative only of the total extent of violence from region to region in so far as the deponents whose statements were taken are representative of their local population and were selected in proportion to the violence suffered in each district. As described above, the narrative information collected by the Commission, Fokupers and Amnesty International all are subject to a number of biases. Consequently, patterns of non-fatal violations across space are presented in this section in order to gain insight into the social processes of data collection by the Commission, Fokupers and Amnesty International, and to assess whether the reported patterns across space are consistent with relevant qualitative analysis and argument.

127. The Violations Based on Districts Figure shows the counts of each violation by district reported during the Commission's statement-taking process. Dili District has a significantly higher number of reported violation counts than any other district, comprising 14.0% (8,389/59,972) all violations in the country. The districts with other relatively high violation counts are Ermera, Manufahi, Viqueque and Lautém. In almost all districts, except for Oecussi, detention, torture and ill-treatment were the mostly frequently reported violations, accounting for between 69.4% and 82.7% of the reported violation counts in districts. In Oecussi, physical integrity violations accounted for 43.0% of the district's violation count. Relative to other districts, in Oecussi, property and economic violations were reported in higher proportions, comprising 30.8% (1,271/4,133) of the district's total violation count.* Property and economic violations in other districts were reported significantly less frequently, on average comprising 7.4% (3,464/56,574) of reported violations.

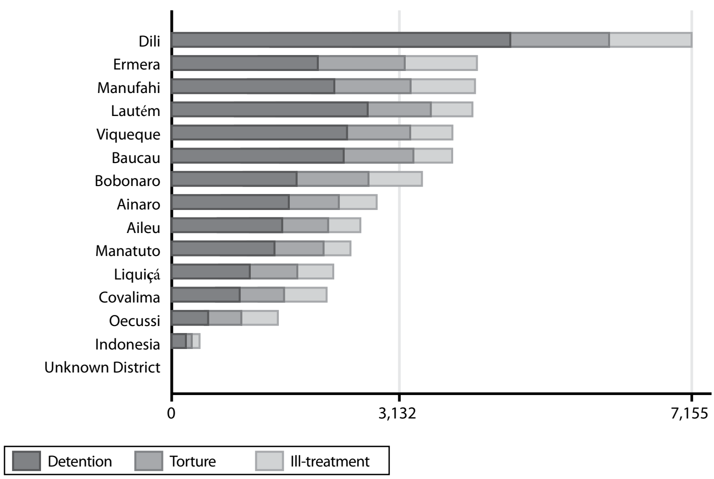
Table 12: Violations by district (1)

Violation	Lautém	Viqueque	Baucau	Manatuto	Manufahi	Aileu	Ermera	Total
Detention	2,696	2,412	2,366	1,414	2,237	1,520	2,010	14,655
Physical Integrity Violations	909	905	976	695	1,094	658	1,281	6,518
Property/ Economic Violations	80	610	289	103	189	123	578	1,972
	1,319	1,570	1,205	893	1,954	1,013	2,112	10,066
	5,004	5,497	4,836	3,105	5,474	3,314	5,981	33,211

Violations by district (2)



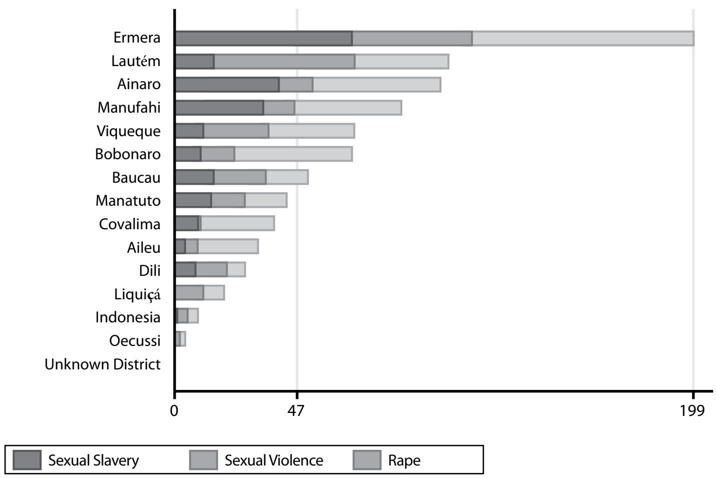
Violation	Liquiçá	Dili	Ainaro	Covalima	Oecussi	Bobonaro	Indonesia	Total
Detention	1,074	4,658	1,611	935	501	1,718	195	10,692
Physical Integrity Violations	662	1,367	743	641	460	1,035	90	4,998
Property/ Economic Violations	103	229	232	227	1,271	505	196	2,763
	858	2,135	1,141	1,267	1,166	1,494	247	8,308
	2,697	8,389	3,727	3,070	3,398	4,752	728	26,761

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

* 96.8% (1,230/1,271) of these property violations in Oecussi were reported to have occurred in 1999. Furthermore 94.0% (3,194/3,398) of reported violations in Oecussi occurred in 1999. Hence it appears that, unlike other districts, the violence in Oecussi was almost exclusively in 1999.

128. Although physical integrity violations reported to the Commission constituted 61.5% (36,911/60,047) of all documented non-fatal violations, detention, torture and ill-treatment were not documented in the same proportions in each district, as shown in the Recorded Violations Based on Types and Districts Figure. In particular Dili has a higher proportion of documented detentions relative to the number of its documented acts of ill-treatment and torture, whereas Bobonaro, Ainaro, Aileu, Manatuto, Liquiçá and Covalima have proportionally lower numbers of documented detention compared with their respective proportions of ill-treatment and torture. The Commission's data are consistent with the hypothesis that policies and practices of detention and physical abuse varied across regions. In particular the Commission's empirical analysis found that while detentions were used more often in Dili, ill-treatment and torture were used less frequently there relative to the rest of the country.

Count of reported violations, by type and district (1)



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

129. Sexually-based violations documented by the Commission comprised 1.4% (853/59,972) of all reported violations. However, in Ermera, Ainaro and Lautém the Commission found a relatively higher proportion of sexual violations at 3.3% (199/5,981), 2.7% (102/3,727) and 2.1% (105/5,004) of the total reported violations respectively. Sexual violations were reported less frequently in Dili and Oecussi representing 0.3% (27/8,389) and 0.1% (4/3,398) of the total respectively.

130. The types of documented sexually-based abuses varied across districts, as shown in the Recorded Violations Based on Types and Districts Figure below. Across Timor-Leste, of all the sexual violations documented by the Commission, rape accounted for 46.1% (393/853), other sexual violence 27.1% (231/853) and sexual slavery 26.8% (229/853). Rapes accounted for a higher proportion of sexual violations in Aileu and Bobonaro than the national average: 71.9% (23/32) and 66.2% (45/68), respectively; whereas sexual slavery accounted for a higher proportion of sexually-based violations in Manufahi and Ainaro than the national average: 39.1% (34/87) and 39.2% (40/102), respectively. Similarly, other sexual violence accounted for 57.9% (11/19) and 51.4% (54/105) of all documented sexual violations in Liquiçá and Lautém, respectively.

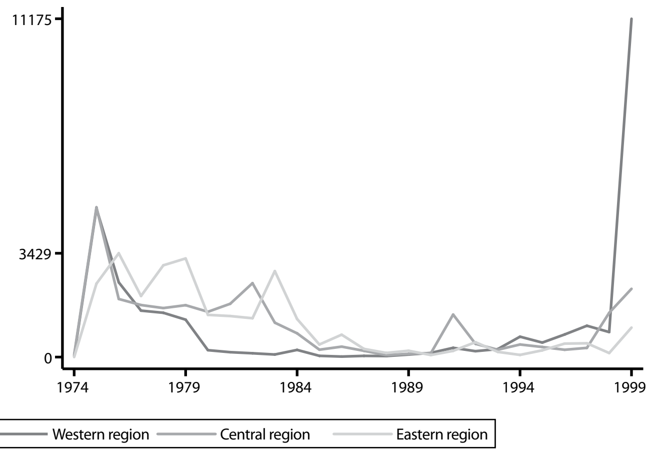
Count of reported violations, by type and district (2)



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Non-fatal violations over time and space

131. Broadly speaking, violence in Timor-Leste occurred in distinct phases, as discussed above. However, the patterns of non-fatal violations during the first and last phases of the conflict varied from region to region as shown in the Non-Fatal Violations Based on Regions Over Time, 1974–1999 Figure. In particular, violence associated with the initial Indonesian invasion and the East Timorese political party conflict in 1975 was more intense in the Western and Central Regions relative to the Eastern Region. However, as the occupation continued, reported non-fatal abuses in the Western Region decreased from its initial high levels in 1975 to a relatively low level by 1980, whereas in the Central Region violence also decreased after the initial invasion period to a level of intensity of about half that experienced in 1975. In the Eastern Region the level of documented violence in 1975 was only about as half as much in absolute terms as that reported in the Western and Central Regions. However, across Timor-Leste, throughout the late 1970s and early 1980s violence continued at around the same levels as was experienced in 1976 without any substantial decrease until 1984. While the initial violence around the time of the Indonesian invasion in 1975 was most intense in the Western and Central Regions, after 1976 the focus of non-fatal violations shifted to the Eastern Region.

132. Apart from the Santa Cruz Massacre and its aftermath in 1991 in Dili, reported violence during the "consolidation years" from 1984 through to 1998 took the form of sporadic low-level violence in all three regions. During the final phase of the conflict in 1999, 75.1% (9,494/12,634) of reported non-fatal violations occurred in the Western Region. The Commission's data are consistent with the claim that populations close to the West Timor border and in Oecussi in 1999 were subjected to higher levels of violence as the pro-autonomy militias and Indonesian military withdrew towards West Timor.

Count of all reported non-fatal violations by region over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Age-sex victim demographics of reported non-fatal violations

Reporting levels of age and sex information for victims

133. The Commission examined several hypotheses that might establish whether or not victims were targeted on the grounds of age and sex. This section describes the notably different demographic age-sex patterns for reported victims of the main non-fatal violations. This analysis includes only victims whose age and sex at the time of the violation was known.

134. Of the 60,047 non-fatal violations reported to the Commission, 34,047 (63.4%) contained exact age information of identified victims. Unfortunately there is no way of knowing what the distribution of unknown ages is for these data. Hence it is not possible to assess how representative the age distribution of victims with known ages is of the age distribution of all reported victims.

135. The Commission considered a child to be any person under the age of 18 years old. This definition conforms to the definition set out in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.[6] The majority, 89.8% (30,574/34,047), of non-fatal violations documented by the Commission, where the victim's age was known, were perpetrated against adults. 10.2% (3,473/34,047) of violations where the victim's age was known were suffered by child victims.

136. Of the 60,047 non-fatal violations documented by the Commission, 99.4% (59,715/60,047) were against victims whose sex was known. Of these violations 14.0% (8,355/59,715) were committed against females and 86.0% (51,360/59,715) were committed against males. 25,476 victims (including those whose sex was not known) experienced these documented violations, of whom 15.7% (4,002/25,476) were females and 83.6% (21,308/25,476) were male.

137. The Commission documented 3,473 violations against children, of which 3,451 violations have known information about the sex of the child. Of these violations, 27.5% (950/3,451) were against girl victims and 72.5% (2,501/3,451) were against boy victims. There were 22 children whose sex was either unknown or not reported by the witness. Of the 30,446 documented violations against adults where the sex of the victims is known, 12.7% (3,870/30,446) were females and 87.3% were males. Thus, the proportion of documented violations against female children is greater than the proportion of documented violations against female adults. Hence, both adult and child victims tended to be males. Relative to males, female victims tended to be younger.

Victim analysis by sex

138. The types of violations perpetrated against males and females are substantially different. In the Figure below, it is clear that females suffer the overwhelming majority of sexual violations: for every one sexually-based violation against a male, the Commission documented ten violations against females. Whereas for every act of torture and forced recruitment against a female victim, the Commission documented around 12 or 13 acts of torture and forced recruitment against males. Other types of violation, such as threats, property and economic violations, ill-treatment and detention were documented in an average proportion of about 5.8 male victims for each female victim.

Table 13: Pattern of victims by sex

Violation Type	Violations against Males	Violations Against Females	Violations against Unknown Sex	% Female Victims	Proportion Male to Female Victims	Total
Property/ Economic Violations	3,792	908	35	19.2	4.2	4,735
Physical Integrity Violations	10,205	1,247	64	10.8	8.2	11,516

	15,602	2,678	94	14.6	5.8	18,374
Detention	21,687	3,521	139	13.9	6.2	25,347
	51,286					59,972

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

139. In the Figure below, analysis of the pattern of victims by sex over time is provided. There is significant variation in the ratio of male to female victims across the different years of the conflict: the male-to-female ratio varies from a low of 2.7 in 1981 to a high of 43.1 in 1991. Higher than average male-to-female ratios are recorded in 1975, 1987 and 1999. These findings are consistent with the hypotheses that substantial numbers of females were transported to Ataúro in 1981 and that the nature of the post-Santa Cruz crackdown by the Indonesian military forces was that it was largely directed against males.

Table 14: Pattern of victims by sex over time

Year	Violations against Males	Violations Against Females	Violations against Unknown Sex	% Female Victims	Proportion Male to Female Victims	Total
1974	94	0	0	0.0		94
1975	5,526	489	29	8.1	11.3	6,044
1976	2,986	554	13	15.6	5.4	3,553
1977	2,287	352	30	13.2	6.5	2,669
1978	2,516	523	23	17.1	4.8	3,062
1979	3,471	633	23	15.3	5.5	4,127
1980	2,071	389	20	15.7	5.3	2,480
1981	1,768	664	7	27.2	2.7	2,439
1982	2,440	708	4	22.5	3.4	3,152
1983	2,949	679	41	18.5	4.3	3,669
1984	1,788	239	2	11.8	7.5	2,029
1985	532	128	0	19.4	4.2	660
1986	856	204	2	19.2	4.2	1,062
1987	430	41	0	8.7	10.5	471
1988	189	16	0	7.8	11.8	205
1989	311	20	11	5.8	15.6	342

1990	302	7	8	2.2	43.1	317
1991	1,658	185	6	100	9.0	1,849
1992	1,009	54	20	5.0	18.7	1,083
1993	551	84	2	13.2	6.6	637
1994	974	158	14	13.8	6.2	1,146
1995	927	38	6	39	24.4	971
1996	1,170	154	6	11.6	7.6	1,330
1997	1,580	123	1	7.2	12.8	1,704
1998	2,075	164	4	7.3	12.7	2,243
1999	10,826	1,748	60	13.8	6.2	12,634
	51,286					59,972

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

140. Although a district breakdown shows less variation across space in male-to-female victim ratios than over time, higher than average ratios were documented in Liquiçá (11.4), Oecussi (9.4), Aileu (8.3) and Dili (8.2), whereas Lautém (3.7), Ainaro (4.5) and Ermera (4.5) recorded lower than average male-to-female ratios. These findings are shown in the Figure below.

Table 15: Pattern of victims by sex between district

District	Violations against Males	Violations Against Females	Violations against Unknown Sex	% Female Victims	Proportion Male to Female Victims	Total
Lautém	3,915	1,069	20	21.4	3.7	5,004
Viqueque	4,766	685	46	12.5	7.0	5,497
Baucau	4,049	745	42	15.4	5.4	4,836
Manatuto	2,566	511	28	16.5	5.0	3,105
Manufahi	4,829	621	24	11.3	7.8	5,474
Aileu	2,934	352	28	10.6	8.3	3,314
Ermera	4,872	1,086	23	18.2	4.5	5,981
Liquiçá	2,475	217	5	8.0	11.4	2,697

Dili	7,441	906	42	10.8	8.2	8,389
Ainaro	3,034	681	12	18.3	4.5	3,727
Covalima	2,624	426	20	13.9	6.2	3,070
Oecussi	3,057	325	16	9.6	9.4	3,398
Bobonaro	4,097	631	24	13.3	6.5	4,752
Indonesia	627	99	2	13.6	6.3	728
	51,286					59,972

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Victim analysis by age

141. This section examines victims' age by violation types, time and space.

142. The counts of specific violations by adults and children are given in the table below. For almost all the violation types documented by the Commission, for every one violation suffered by a child, approximately 7-10 violations against adults are documented. However, for sexual violations the proportion of adult to child victims was substantially lower than other violation types: for every sexually-based violation documented by the Commission against a child, 3.4 violations against adults were documented. Hence, the adult-to-child ratio was about 2.5 times lower for sexual violations than for other non-fatal violations.

Table 16: Pattern of victims by age

Violation Type	Violations against Adults	Violations Against Children	Violations against Unknown Age	% Child Victims	Proportion Adult to Child Victims	Total
Property/ Economic Violations	2,882	323	1,530	6.8	8.9	4,735
Physical Integrity Violations	6,255	639	4,622	5.5	9.8	11,516
	9,543	1,088	7,743	5.9	8.8	18,374
Detention	11,849	1,427	12,071	5.6	8.3	25,347
			25,966			59,972

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

143. The figure below shows the counts of violations against adults and children by year. The Commission's data on non-fatal violations show a general upward trend in the ratio of adults to children over time, that is the number of adult victims relative to child victims is larger in the latter part of the conflict. However, since there is a substantially larger amount of victims' ages not recorded in the earlier part of the conflict, it is difficult to make comparisons between the adult-to-child victim ratio in the early and late periods of the conflict.

Table 17: Pattern of victims by age over time, 1974–1999

Year	Violations against Adults	Violations Against Children	Violations against Unknown Age	% Child Victims	Proportion Adult to Child Victims	Total
1974	5	0	89	0,0		94
1975	2,616	402	3,026	6.7	6.5	6,044
1976	1,582	293	1,678	8.2	5.4	3,553
1977	1,087	185	1,397	6.9	5.9	2,669
1978	1,302	226	1,534	7.4	5.8	3,062
1979	2,015	260	1,852	6.3	7.8	4,127
1980	1,155	173	1,152	7.0	6.7	2,480
1981	1,174	293	972	12.0	4.0	2,439
1982	1,381	199	1,572	6.3	6.9	3,152
1983	1,653	200	1,816	5.5	8.3	3,669
1984	1,017	78	934	3.8	13.0	2,029
1985	307	40	313	6.1	7.7	660
1986	527	93	442	8.8	5.7	1,062
1987	194	27	250	5.7	7.2	471
1988	121	6	78	2.9	20.2	205
1989	234	17	91	5.0	13.8	342
1990	196	45	76	14.2	4.4	317
1991	1,099	62	688	3.4	17.7	1,849
1992	509	28	546	2.6	18.2	1,083
1993	308	47	282	7.4	6.6	637

1994	568	53	525	4.6	10.7	1,146
1995	457	43	471	4.4	10.6	971
1996	680	39	611	2.9	17.4	1,330
1997	1,073	88	543	5.2	12.2	1,704
1998	1,070	55	1,118	2.5	19.5	2,243
1999	8,199	525	3,910	4.2	15.6	12,634
			25,966			59,972

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

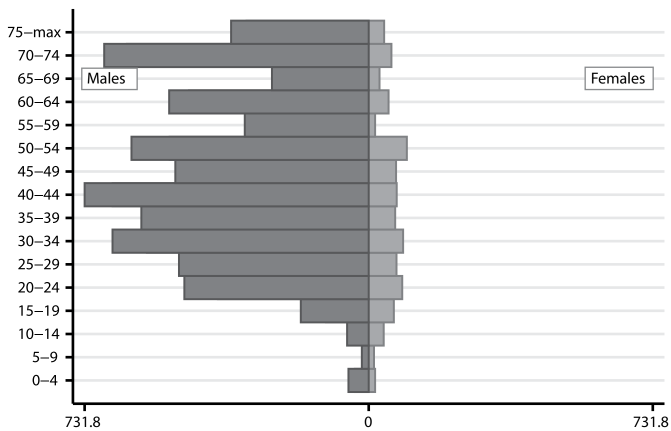
144. On average the Commission documented 8.8 adult victims for every one child victim. However, there is variation in the adult-to-child victim ratio between districts, as is shown in the table below. In Bobonaro a relatively high number of child victims were documented, as is shown by the reported adult-to-child victim ratio of 4.8, whereas in Covalima, Indonesia and Oecussi noticeably higher than average adult-to-child victim ratios were documented.*

Table 18: Pattern of victims by age between districts

District	Violations against Adults	Violations Against Children	Violations against Unknown Age	% Child Victims	Proportion Adult to Child Victims	Total
Lautém	2,498	347	2,159	6.9	7.2	5,004
	2,119	226	3,152	4.1	9.4	5,497
Baucau	2,597	314	1,925	6.5	8.3	4,836
Manatuto	1,347	191	1,567	6.2	7.1	3,105
Manufahi	2,505	246	2,723	4.5	10.2	5,474
Aileu	1,488	166	1,660	5.0	9.0	3,314
Ermera	3,107	315	2,559	5.3	9.9	5,981
Liquiçá	1,810	166	721	6.2	10.9	2,697
Dili	4,089	448	3,852	5.3	9.1	8,389
Ainaro	1,811	232	1,684	6.2	7.8	3,727
Covalima	1,942	112	1,016	3.6	17.3	3,070

* On average, the adult-to-child victim ratio documented by the Commission was 17.3 in Covalima, 15.3 in Indonesia and 14.1 in Oecussi.

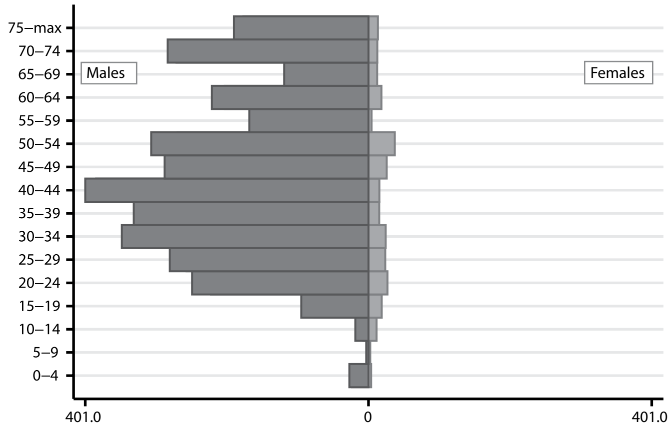
Oecussi	2,278	161	959	4.7	14.1	3,398
Bobonaro	2,510	525	1,717	11.0	4.8	4,752
Indonesia	428	28	272	3.8	15.3	728
			25,966			59,972



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

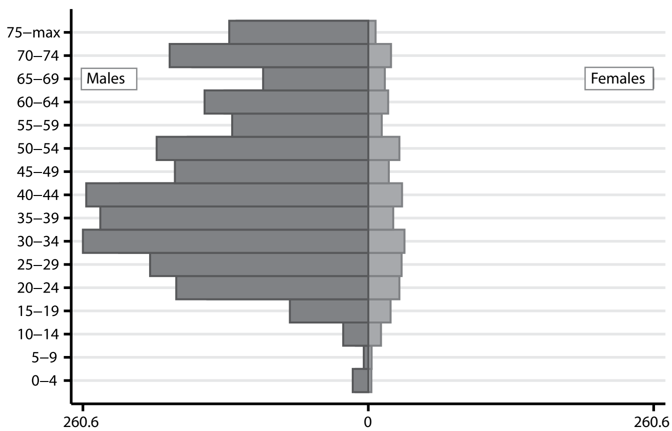
Victim analysis by age and sex

145. This section describes the distribution of victims by both age and sex. The analysis is presented as both counts and in terms of population-based rates of each violation's occurrence. The population-based rates are calculated using the 1990 Indonesian Population Census.[7]



146. The Age-Sex Specific Level of Detention (per 10,000 people), 1974–1999 Figure; the Age-Sex Specific Level of Torture (per 10,000 people), 1974–1999 Figure; and the Age-Sex Specific Level of Ill-Treatment (per 10,000 people), 1974–1999 Figure present counts of documented age-sex violations for detention, torture and ill-treatment. The documented age-sex distribution counts for these three violation types are remarkably similar, each showing that the most frequently documented victim group for these types of violations were young men of military age. Very few documented acts of detention, torture and ill-treatment were experienced by female victims.

Age-sex specific detention rate (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999

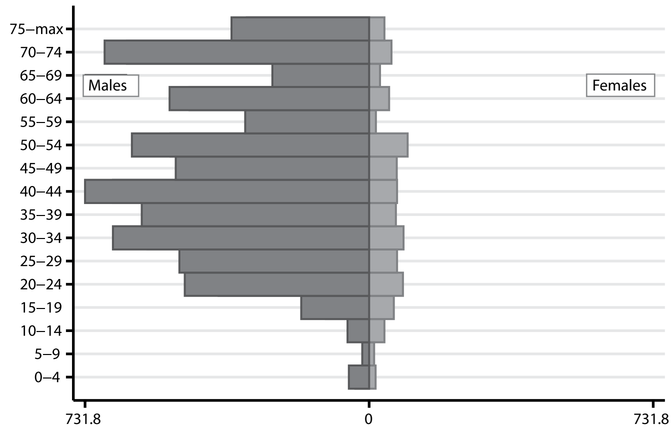


Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia
Note: 47.8% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

Age-sex specific torture rate (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999

Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia
Note: 40.6% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

Age-sex specific ill-treatment rate (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999



Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia
Note: 42.0% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

147. When analysis moves from simple violation counts to population-based violation rates, it can be seen that relative to the overall East Timorese population middle-age males experienced the highest rates of these forms of violence. Furthermore, old males above the age of 70 experienced these forms of violence at a similar rate to middle-aged males. These patterns are shown in the Age-Sex Specific Level of Detention (per 10,000 people), 1974–1999 Figure; the Age-Sex Specific Level of Torture (per 10,000 people), 1974–1999 Figure; and the Age-Sex Specific Level of Ill-Treatment (per 10,000 people), 1974–1999 Figure.

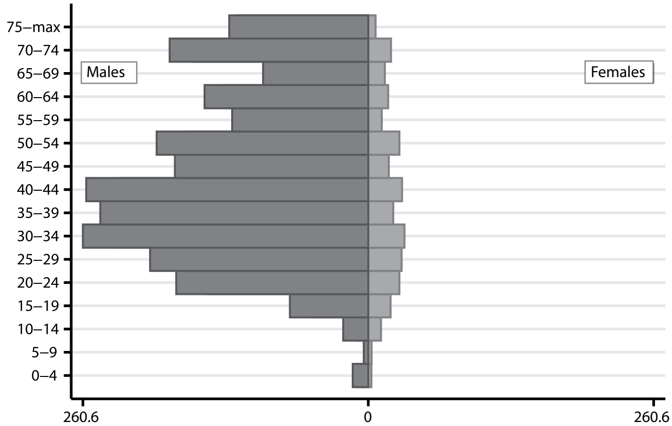
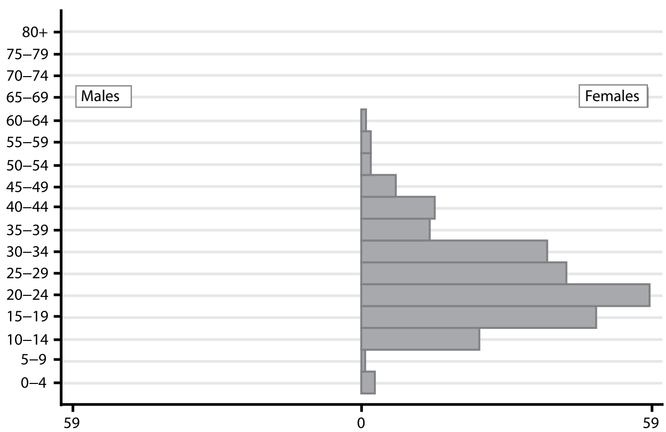
Age-sex specific violation rate of detention (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999



Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia
Note: 47.8% of the violation records are missing age or sex of the victim

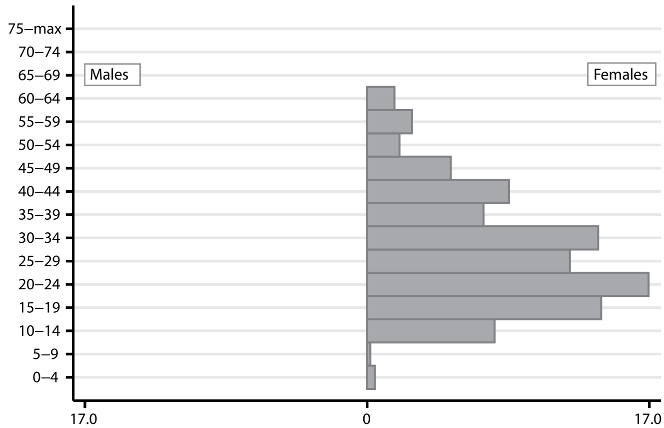
Age-sex specific violation rate of torture (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999

Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia
Note: 40.6% of the violation records are missing age or sex of the victim



Age-sex specific violation rate of ill-treatment (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999

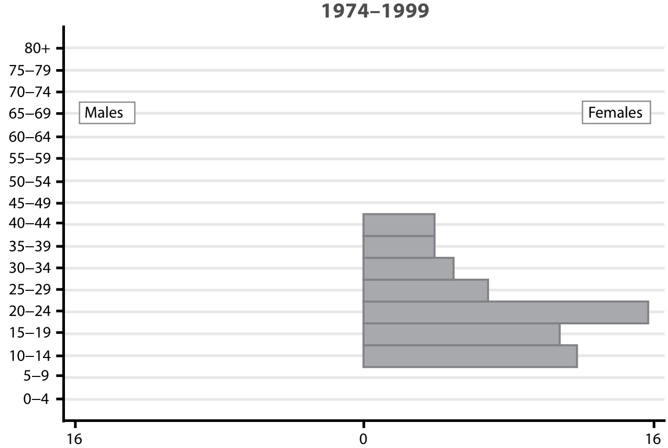
Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia
Note: 42.0% of the violation records are missing age or sex of the victim



148. The age-sex distributions of victims of sexual violations documented by the Commission are substantially different to those for physical integrity violations. This can be seen in the Recorded Acts of Rape Based on Age and Sex, 1974–1999 Figure; and the Age-Sex Specific Level of Acts of Rape (per 10,000 People), 1974–1999. Furthermore, there are notable differences in the age-sex distribution of victims for the different forms of sexual violations. The Commission documented rapes of women in all age categories under 65 years old. However, the highest frequency of documented rape and highest population-based rates of rape were for young women of reproductive age. 15-24 year-old women appear to have been the sub-population at most risk of rape.

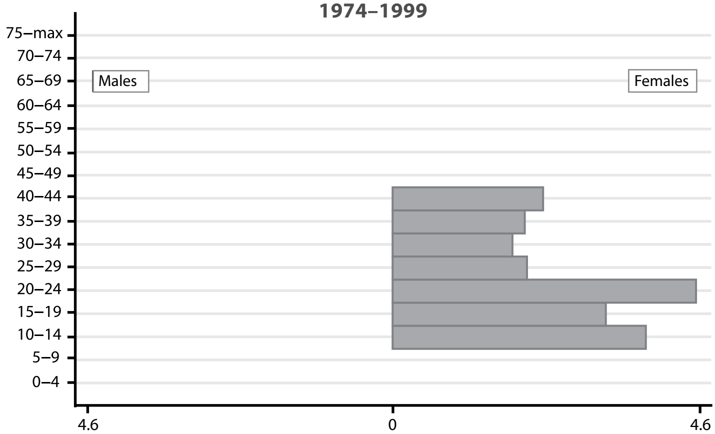
Number of reported acts of rape, by age and sex, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR
Note: 34.9% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim



Age-sex specific violation rate of rape (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999

Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia
Note: 34.9% of the violation records are missing age or sex of the victim

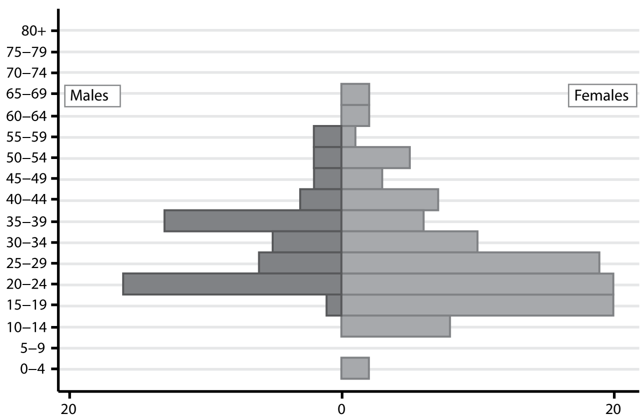


149. By contrast only women between the ages of 10 and 44 were among the documented victims of sexual slavery. Of these victims women between 20 and 24 years old experienced both the highest counts and highest rates of sexual slavery. As was the case for rape, no cases of sexual slavery of men were documented by the Commission.

Number of reported acts of sexual slavery, by age and sex, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR
Note: 39.8% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

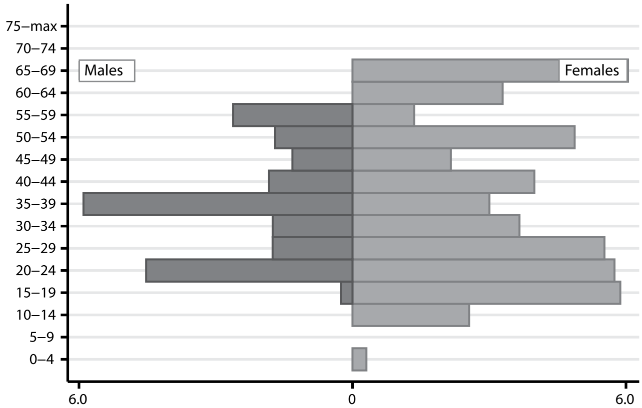
Age-sex specific violation rate of sexual slavery (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999



Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia

Note: 39.8% of the violation records are missing age or sex of the victim

150. However, the Commission documented cases of other sexual violence against both men and women. This form of violence was most commonly directed against men in the 20-24 and 35-39 age groups and women between the ages of 15 and 29 years-old.



Number of reported acts of sexual violence, by age and sex, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Note: 29.9% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

Age-sex specific violation rate of sexual violence (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999

Sources: (i) Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR, (ii) 1990 Population Census, Statistics Indonesia
Note: 29.9% of the violation records are missing age or sex of the victim

151. Hence, the Commission's quantitative analysis suggests that young women experienced the overwhelming majority of sexual violations. Furthermore, rape and sexual slavery were exclusively reported to have been suffered by women.

Comparison of retrospective and contemporaneous human rights monitoring

152. This section compares the extent and pattern of non-fatal violations reported by the Commission with the extent and pattern reported by Amnesty International. It shows how isolated Timor-Leste was from the international community and the paucity of information and limited extent to which knowledge of violations in Timor-Leste were known during the early and harshest periods of the conflict.

153. As discussed above, access to the territory during the Indonesian occupation was extremely limited, especially for international human rights groups such as Amnesty International. As a result the geographic coverage of contemporaneous reports by Amnesty International is significantly different to that reported to the Commission and Fokupers in their retrospective statement-taking processes.

154. 35.6% (1,953/5,479) of reported non-fatal violations documented by Amnesty International did not contain information about the location where the respective violation took place, as is shown in the Data Distribution Table below. This appears to be consistent with the limited information flow out of Timor-Leste during the occupation (particularly from remote, mountainous villages and sub-districts). Furthermore, the nature of contemporaneous reporting to the international community was more focused on reporting the nature of the human rights situation in Timor-Leste rather than describing the differing conditions in different parts of the territory. However, 32.3% (1,770/5,479) of the non-fatal violations reported by Amnesty International occurred in Dili; a higher proportion than was reported in the retrospective projects conducted by Commission and Fokupers, in which violations in Dili accounted for 14.0% (8,389/59,972) and 4.6% (36/788) respectively).

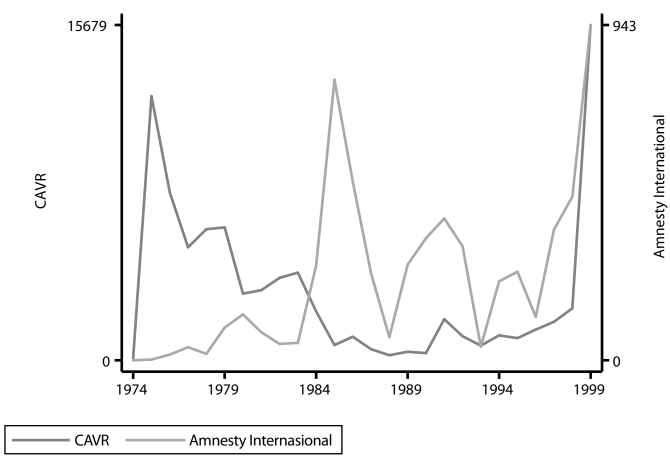
Table 19: Data distribution based on CAVR, Fokupers, Amnesty International databases



District	CAVR Statements Database	Amnesty Database	Fokupers Database	% CAVR	% Amnesty	% Fokupers
Lautém	5,004	6	111	8.3	2.0	0.8
Viqueque	5,497	6	114	9.2	2.1	0.8
Baucau	4,836	1	210	8.1	3.8	0.1
Manatuto	3,105	27	22	5.2	0.4	3.4
Manufahi	5,474	63	60	9.1	1.1	8.0
Aileu	3,314	18	57	5.5	1.0	2.3
Ermera	5,981	113	25	10.0	0.5	14.3
Liquiçá	2,697	88	246	4.5	4.5	11.2
Dili	8,389	36	1,770	14.0	32.3	4.6
Ainaro	3,727	84	54	6.2	1.0	10.7
Covalima	3,070	90	65	5.1	1.2	11.4
Oecussi	3,398	10	19	5.7	0.3	1.3
Bobonaro	4,752	190	184	7.9	3.4	24.1
Indonesia	728	52	589	1.2	10.8	6.6
Unknown Districts	0	4	1,953	0.0	35.6	0.5
	59,972	788	5.479	100.0	100.0	100.0

Source: Database of CAVR, Fokupers and Amnesty International Statements and Reports

155. As indicated in the Violations Over Time Figure below, contemporaneous reports from Amnesty International show three distinct peaks in detentions of identified individuals in 1985, 1989-93 and 1994-99 of 402, 891 and 811 respectively; whereas retrospective reports given to the Commission suggest that the bulk of arbitrary detentions occurred in 1999 and between 1975–1984. Furthermore, these reports suggest that at least 2,779 separate acts of arbitrary detention occurred in 1999 and at least 16,509 of such acts between 1975 and 1984. These comparisons are evidence of the difficulty of documenting human rights abuses in Timor-Leste during the Indonesian occupation. The Violations Over Time Figure shows that although international human rights groups such as Amnesty International meticulously documented the human rights situation in Timor-Leste throughout the 1980s and 1990s, there was substantial underreporting of the overall magnitude of non-fatal violence at the time. The Figure also shows the substantial difference in social understanding gained from retrospective reports compared with contemporaneous reports about the early invasion years: of the violations documented by Amnesty International, 10.9% (734/6,717) occurred in the early invasion years between 1975 and 1984. By comparison, of the violations reported to the Commission, 64.0% (47,390/74,024) occurred between 1975 and 1984. Given that retrospective reporting by the Commission is subject to notable "memory-loss" (due to some people who could have reported about violations in the early invasion years dying in the late 1980s and 1990s), the Commission's narrative statement data are themselves subject to a temporal bias against violations which occurred in the earlier years of the Commission's mandate. The Commission finds that, due to the limited access to Timor-Leste during the initial occupation years, contemporaneous reporting of violations between 1975 and 1984 were subject to notable underreporting of the overall pattern and magnitude of violations.

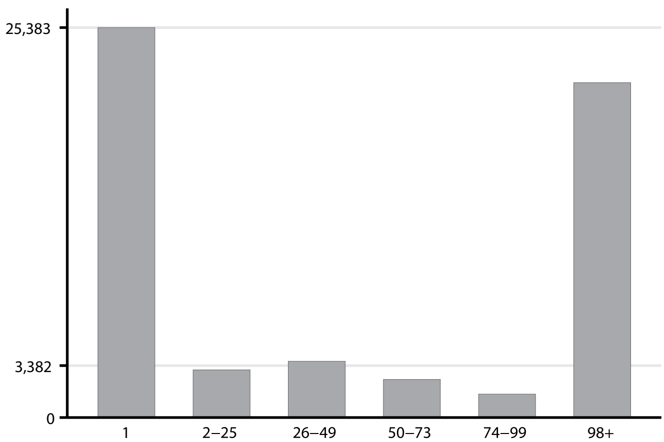
Violations over time, 1974–1999

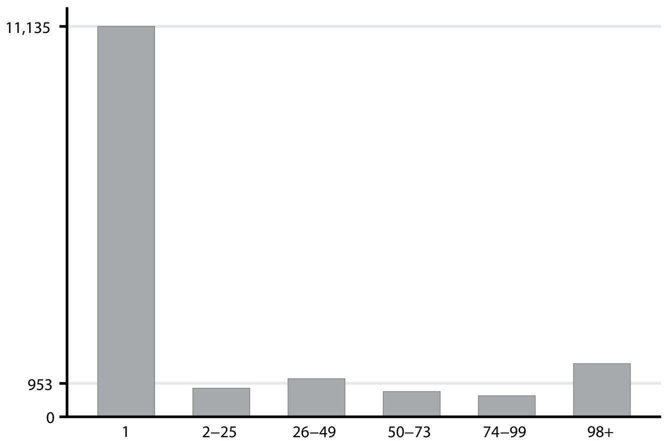


Source: Database of CAVR, Fokupers and Amnesty International Statements and Reports

The nature of abuses against individuals and groups

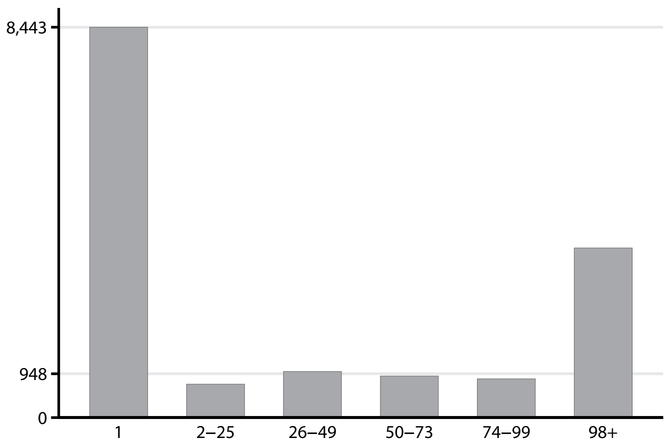
156. Some non-fatal violations were reported to the Commission as being perpetrated against a lone individual, whereas some other violations were reported as being perpetrated against several individuals at the same time. The Acts of Detention Based on Victim Group Size, 1974–1999 Figure; the Acts of Torture Based on Victim Group Size, 1974–1999 Figure; and the Acts of Ill-Treatment Based on Victim Group Size, 1974–1999 Figure show the distribution of violations by victim group size for torture, detention and ill-treatment.*

157. The nature of the abuses committed against single individuals tended to be distinct from the nature of those committed against groups. As The Act of Detention Victims Based on Victim Group Size, 1974–1999 Figure and the Act of Ill-treatment Victims Based on Victim Group Size, 1974–1999 Figure show, arbitrary detention and ill-treatment were more commonly reported as having been perpetrated against individuals or groups of 50 or more – with fewer people being detained or suffering ill-treatment in groups of 2-49 persons. Nearly all reported acts of torture were committed against individual victims one-by-one. This empirical finding appears to be consistent with the hypothesis that the use of torture as a form of oppression was used in a more targeted fashion (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).



Count of victims of acts of detention by victim group size, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



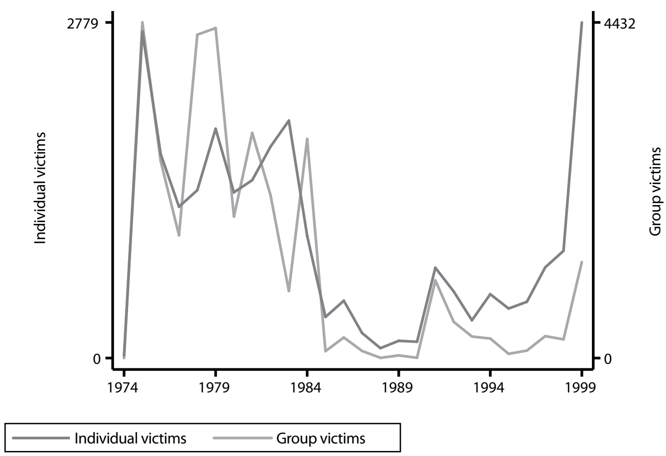
* As is the case with reported violations against individual victims, violations against victims in groups can be reported by more than one deponent. The Commission matched group victim records to identify duplicate reports of the same violation and victim in multiple statements. The methods used for matching are described in the Statistical Annexe.

Count of victims of acts of torture by victim group size, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Count of victims of acts of ill-treatment by victim group size, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



158. The Violations Over Time, 1974–1999 Figure shows that in statements given to the Commission, the detention of individual victims and groups of victims were positively correlated. When reported detentions against individuals increased, so did reported detentions against groups of victims.* Furthermore, there is a substantial difference between the extent of reported detentions of individual and groups of victims. Between 1974 and 1984, reported detentions against group victims are almost always substantially higher than detentions of individual victims.* Two possible explanations for this pattern are the following:

* The correlation coefficient for the two series is 0.74.

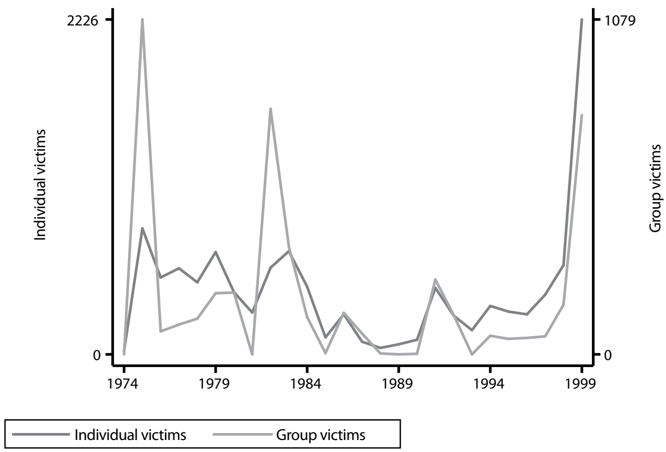
- The pattern could reflect the increasingly targeted nature of the Indonesian military's detention practices over the course of the occupation and its increased ability in the 1980s and 1990s to target individuals who were contributing to the Resistance movement's activities.
- Alternatively, deponents to the Commission's statement-taking process may have had more difficulty specifically identifying individual detainees detained in the earlier occupation years relative to detainees in later years. Consequently, deponents reporting on the earlier period may more frequently describe earlier detentions as anonymous groups.

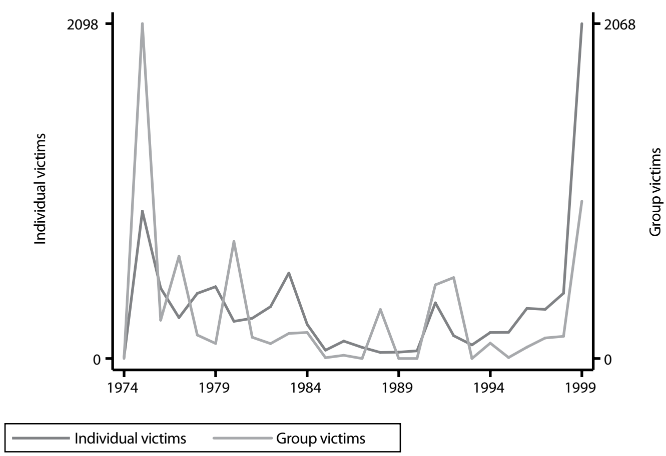
Violations over time, 1974–1999



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

159. However, it seems unlikely that the pattern among detentions is an artefact of respondent recall because none of the other violation types (namely torture, ill-treatments, threats and property violations) exhibits any evidence of such a recall bias – as is shown in the Recorded Act of Violations over Time, 1974–1999 Figure; Violations over Time, 1974–1999 Figure; Recorded Acts of Threat over Time, 1974–1999 Figure; Recorded Acts of Sexually-Based Violence over Time, 1974–1999 Figure. Hence the statistical evidence on detentions documented by the Commission is consistent with the hypothesis that the detention practices of the Indonesian military shifted from a focus on both individual and group victims in the early occupation years from 1977 to 1984 to a more targeted strategy focused on individual detainees from 1985 to 1999.

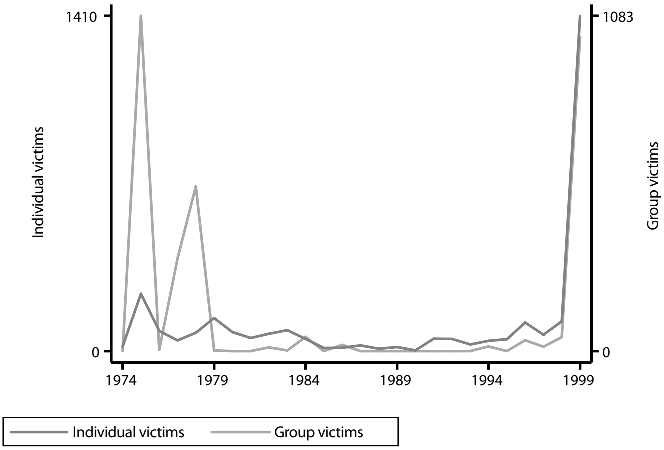
* The only year in this period where reported detentions against groups of victims were fewer than reported detentions against individual victims was 1983.



160. The Commission's statistical evidence also suggests a positive correlation between acts of torture committed against group victims and individual victims over time.* Furthermore, as shown in the Recorded Acts of Torture over Time, 1974–1999 Figure, peaks in reported acts of torture against group victims occurred in 1975, 1982 and 1999. Hence, the Commission's data suggest that the bulk of mass violence against groups was heavily concentrated in time.

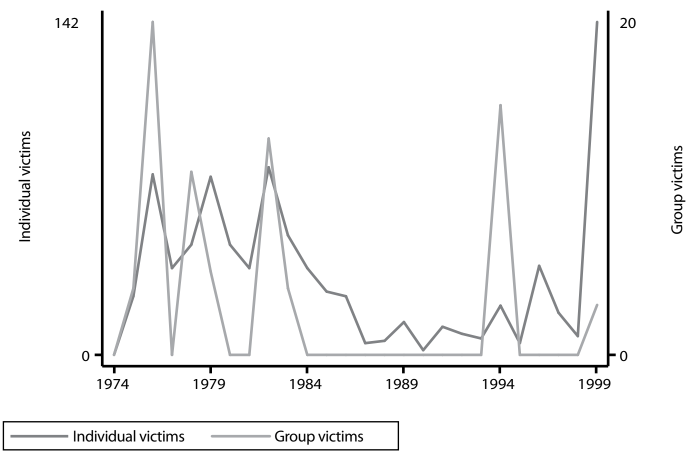
Reported acts of torture over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



Violations over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



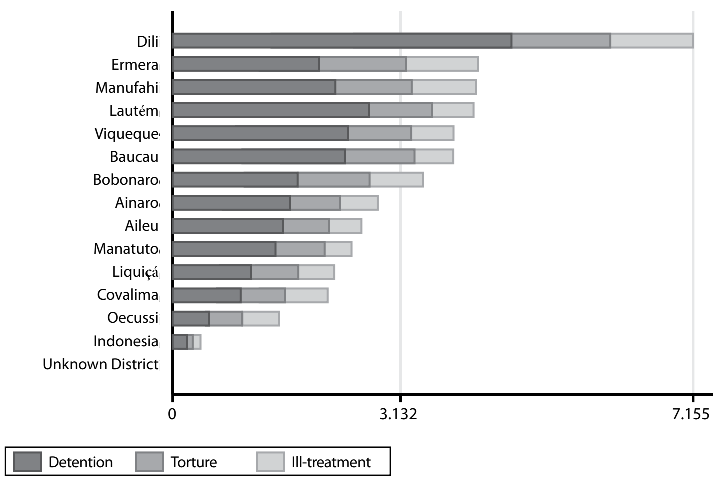
* The correlation coefficient for the series is 0.69.

Reported acts of threats over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Reported acts of sexual base violence over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



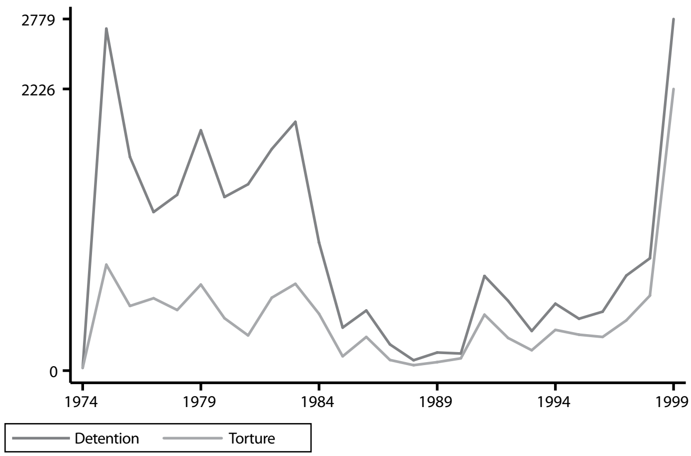
The use of detention and the nature of violations committed during detention periods

161. Throughout the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste arbitrary detentions and displacement were employed throughout the territory. As the phenomenon of displacement is discussed above, this section focuses on the nature and use of detention during the Commission's mandate period.

The relationship between detention and forms of physical abuse

162. In general, reported acts of detention, torture and ill-treatment appear to be positively correlated. Detentions often occurred in the same events with physical abuse throughout the territory. This is reflected in the Recorded Violations Based on Types and Districts Figure. The total number of reported acts of detention, torture and ill-treatment in Dili were higher than in any other district because the major detentions centres on the island of Ataúro and in the Comarca (Prison) Balide were both located in Dili.

Count of reported violations, by type and district



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

163. Furthermore, reported detentions and torture over time are strongly positively correlated.* The Violations over Time, 1974–1999 Figure also shows that, over time, violence became increasingly coordinated and the magnitude of reported acts of torture increased (between the late 1970s and mid-1980s) relative to the number of reported detentions. This pattern might reflect the perpetrators' increasing capacity to target

* The correlation coefficient between reported tortures and detentions by year between 1974 and 1999 is 0.81.

specific victims as the Indonesian occupation moved from its preliminary phase in the late 1970s and early 1980s to the consolidation phase from 1985 onwards. In the early invasion years there are approximately three reported cases of detention for each reported case of torture. After 1985, the two violations appear to be more closely linked, with approximately the same number of reported detentions and reported acts of torture each year. The resulting statistical pattern suggests that over time (and particularly after 1984) the practice of arbitrary detention became more targeted and was used more regularly in combination with acts of torture.

Violations over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Patterns of violations committed during periods of detention

164. Of all the documented violations reported to the Commission during its narrative statement-taking process, detentions were the most frequently reported, representing 42.3% (25,383/60,047) of documented non-fatal violations. However, the use of detention was often combined with other forms of abuse: of the main forms of physical abuse reported to the Commission, at least 28.3% (7,174/25,383) were committed while the victim was held in detention. This empirical finding indicates that during detention victims were often vulnerable to other forms of physical abuse. This section explores the patterns of non-fatal forms of physical abuse committed during periods of detention and those committed while the victim was not detained.

165. The Commission's information on detentions and non-fatal violations often contains imprecise location and/or date information. In particular, 33.9% (20,334/60,047) of non-fatal violations were missing information about the month and day on which the violation occurred, while 52.9% (31,739/60,047) were missing information about the day (date) on which the violation occurred. 2.3% (1,379/60,047) of non-fatal violations were missing information about the sub-district in which the violation occurred, while 31.2% (18,722/60,047) of non-fatal violations were missing information about the suco in which the violation occurred. Hence, the following analysis of forms of physical abuse and their relationship to the victim's status as a detainee is limited by the lack of precise dates and locations in the reported data.

166. Some forms of physical abuse were reported to have occurred more frequently in detention than others. In particular, the Recorded Violations and the Detention Context, Based on Types of Violations, 1974–1999 Figure shows that the abuses which were most often committed during known periods of detention were torture (38.4%, 4,267/9,094), ill-treatment (33.2%, 27,998/9,094) and threats (21.3%, 634/9,094). Furthermore, torture and ill-treatment are reported much less frequently among victims who never have been held in detention: of the torture violations documented by the Commission, 16.4% (1,820/11,123) were suffered by victims who never experienced detention. Of the acts of ill-treatment documented by the Commission, 26.4% (2,227/8,436) were suffered by victims who never experienced detention. This is suggestive of the increased vulnerability of victims who are held in detention to being subjected to torture or ill-treatment.

167. The statistical data alone cannot clarify whether the association between detention and physical abuse was part of a formal policy by perpetrators to combine physical abuse with arbitrary detention, or whether the correlation reflects opportunistic behaviour by military, police and other officials. However, the Commission's qualitative and historical research is informative in this regard. The Commission's qualitative research has identified evidence of policy and practice which encouraged the use of detention and special interrogation methods during detention (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).

Table 20: Reported violations and their detention context, based on types of violations, 1974–1999

	Victim detained at time of violation	% detained at time of violation	Victim detained but unknown dates	% detentions with unknown dates	Victim detained - but not at time of violation	% detained - but not at time of violation	Victim never detained	% never detained	Total
Torture	4,267	38.4	4,569	41.1	1,820	16.4	467	4.2	11,123
Ill-Treatment	2,798	33.2	3,061	36.3	2,227	26.4	350	4.1	8,436
	634	21.3	723	24.2	1,442	48.4	183	6.1	2,982
	166	7.7	851	39.5	1,049	48.6	91	4.2	2,157

Sexually-	109	12.8	354	41.5	367	43.0	23	2.7	853
Property/ Economic Violations	313	6.6	810	17.1	3,355	70.9	257	5.4	4,735
Other	807	18.6	1,661	38.3	1,631	37.6	240	5.5	4,339
	9,094	100.0	12,029	100.0	11,891	1000	1,611	100.0	34,625

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

168. The cases documented by the Commission indicate a change in the relationship between non-fatal violations and detention as the conflict moved into its last phase. As the Recorded Violations and the Detention Context Based on Phases, 1974–1999 Figure shows, 56.7% (5,592/9,855) of non-fatal violations in 1999 were committed against victims who were not in detention and had never been detained before. In 1999 the proportion of reported non-fatal violations which were committed outside places of detention is more than double that for the two earlier phases. Hence, it appears that in the first two phases of the conflict the use of detention had a stronger association with the commitment of other non-fatal violations.*

Table 21: Reported violations and their detention context, based on phases, 1974–1999

	Victim detained at time of violation	% detained at time of violation	Victim detained but unknown dates	% detentions with unknown dates	Victim detained - but not at time of violation	% detained - but not at time of violation	Victim never detained	% never detained	Total
Phase 1 (1974 – 1983)	2,963	18.8	8,006	50.8	4,357	27.6	446	2.8	15,772
Phase 2 (1984 – 1998)	3,407	37.9	3,011	33.5	1,942	21.6	638	7.1	8,998
Phase 3 (1999)	2,724	27.6	1,012	10.3	5,592	56.7	527	5.3	9,855
	9,094	100.0	12,029	100.0	11,891	100.0	1,611	100.0	34,625

Sumber: Basis Data Pernyataan Naratif yang Diberikan kepada CAVR

* It is difficult to make conclusive findings about the relative magnitude of non-fatal violations committed in detention in Phases 1 and 2 of the conflict, given that 50.8% (8,006/15,772) of detentions during Phase 1 and 33.5% (3,011/8,998) of detentions during Phase 2 lack sufficiently precise date information to determine whether they are associated with other violations suffered by the victim.

169. Of the reported violations committed during a known period of detention, 16.5% (505/9,094) occurred in Dili. Hence, relative to other districts, a notably higher proportion of the reported violations occurring in detention were committed in Dili. While 42.8% (695/1,623) of violations in Liquiçá were reported to have been committed during periods of detention, and 41.5% (886/2,135) in Covalima, the figure for Dili is 40.3% (1,504/3,731); whereas, of the non-fatal violations suffered by persons in Oecussi and Indonesia, 76.0% (2,209/2,897) and 73.2% (390/533) respectively were suffered by victims who had never been detained. Hence, districts which reported relatively higher proportions of torture and ill-treatment tended to also report higher proportions of abuse within detention.

Table 22: Reported violations and their detention context, based on districts, 1974–1999

	Victim detained at time of violation	% detained at time of violation	Victim detained but unknown dates	% detentions with unknown dates	Victim detained - but not at time of violation	% detained - but not at time of violation	Victim never detained	% never detained	Total
Lautém	455	19.7	1,307	56.6	479	20.8	67	2.9	2,308
Viqueque	401	13.0	1,371	44.4	1,245	40.4	68	2.2	3,085
Baucau	785	31.8	891	36.1	639	25.9	155	6.3	2,470
Manatuto	271	16.0	921	54.5	465	27.5	34	2.0	1,691
Manufahi	771	23.8	1,305	40.3	924	28.5	237	7.3	3,237
Aileu	477	26.6	867	48.3	412	23.0	38	2.1	1,794
Ermera	986	24.8	1,128	28.4	1,641	41.3	216	5.4	3,971
Liquiçá	695	42.8	448	27.6	405	25.0	75	4.6	1,623
Dili	1504	40.3	1,267	34.0	646	17.3	314	8.4	3,731
Ainaro	457	21.6	1,005	47.5	582	27.5	72	3.4	2,116
Covalima	886	41.5	401	18.8	729	34.1	119	5.6	2,135
Oecussi	366	12.6	249	8.6	2,201	76.0	81	2.8	2,897
Bobonaro	992	32.7	793	26.1	1,133	37.3	116	3.8	3,034
Indonesia	48	9.0	76	14.3	390	73.2	19	3.6	533
	9,094	100.0	12,029	100.0	11,891	100.0	1,611	100.0	34,625

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

170. Male victims experienced the bulk of detentions, constituting 85.6% (21,273/25,383) of the total. Relative to female victims, males were twice as likely to be subjected to another violation during their detention. As the Recorded Violations and the Detention Context Based on Sex, 1974–1999 Figure shows, of the male victims of detention, at least 28.1% (8,323/29,599) suffered another non-fatal violation, compared with 14.8% (716/4,833) for females who suffered another violation while detained.

Table 23: Reported violations and their detention context, based on sex, 1974–1999

	Victim detained at time of violation	% detained at time of violation	Victim detained but unknown dates	% detentions with unknown dates	Victim detained - but not at time of violation	% detained - but not at time of violation	Victim never detained	% never detained	Total
Females	716	14.8	1,671	34.6	2,304	47.7	142	2.9	4,833
Males	8,323	28.1	10,303	34.8	9,505	32.1	1,468	5.0	29,599
Unkonown	55	28.5	55	28.5	82	42.5	1	0.5	193
	9,094	100.0	12,029	100.0	11,891	100.0	1,611	100.0	34,625

Sumber: Basis Data Pernyataan Naratif yang Diberikan kepada CAVR

171. According to the non-fatal violations data documented by the Commission, people of different ages suffered different levels of abuse while in detention. In particular, of those victims who suffered a known non-fatal violation during a period of detention, 55.5% (5,044/9,094) were young or middle-aged adults (that is, persons between 15 and 49). Children and older people were detained substantially less often, and when they were detained, they were subjected to proportionally lower levels of abuse.

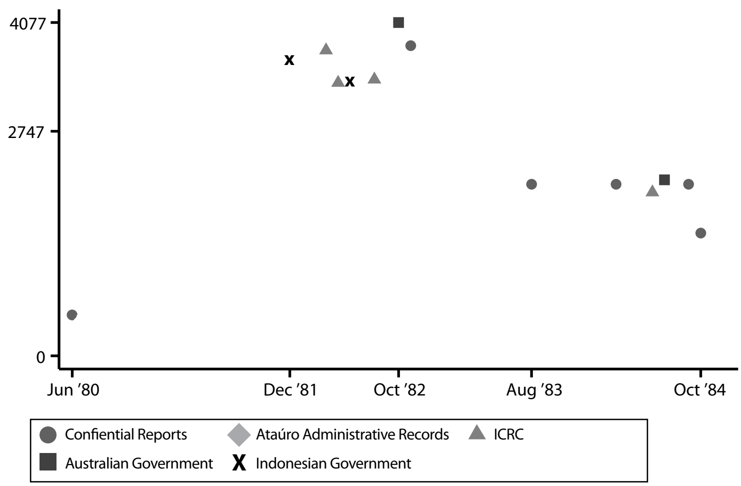

Table 24: Reported violations and their detention context, based on age, 1974–1999
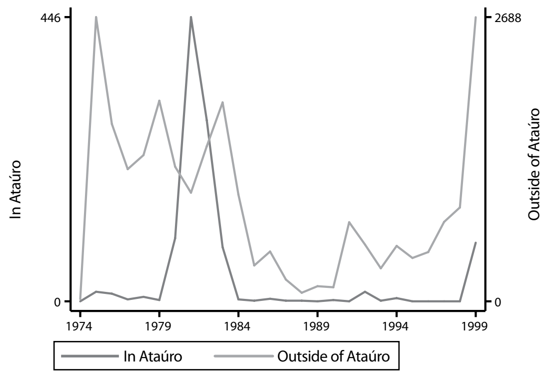
	Victim detained at time of violation	% detained at time of violation	Victim detained but unknown dates	% detentions with unknown dates	Victim detained - but not at time of violation	% detained - but not at time of violation	Victim never detained	% never detained	Total
0-4	89	15.4	202	34.9	277	47.8	11	1.9	579
5-9	20	10.9	45	24.6	113	61.7	5	2.7	183
10-14	62	11.7	219	41.2	241	45.4	9	1.7	531
15-19	384	26.4	564	38.7	451	31.0	58	4.0	1,457
20-24	942	32.4	1,070	36.8	725	24.9	171	5.9	2,908
25-29	1,080	34.4	924	29.4	960	30.6	174	5.5	3,138
30-34	1,058	31.8	1,049	31.5	1,049	31.5	173	5.2	3,329
35-39	719	28.2	789	30.9	889	34.8	154	6.0	2,551
40-44	564	26.4	704	33.0	755	35.4	111	5.2	2,134
45-49	315	23.0	512	37.4	450	32.9	91	6.7	1,368
50-54	235	19.7	513	43.1	402	33.8	40	3.4	1,190
55-59	82	17.4	176	37.3	188	39.8	26	5.5	472
60-64	93	20.9	188	42.2	147	33.0	17	3.8	445
65-69	32	17.7	78	43.1	67	37.0	4	2.2	181
70-74	18	9.7	95	51.4	64	34.6	8	4.3	185
75-79	12	19.7	23	37.7	24	39.3	2	3.3	61
80+	12	18.5	23	35.4	29	44.6	1	1.5	65
	3,377	24.4	4,855	35.1	5,060	36.5	556	4.0	13,848
	9,094	100.0	12,029	100.0	11,891	100.0	1,611	100.0	34,625

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Reported statistical patterns of detention on Ataúro

172. While arbitrary detention was used throughout the conflict in Timor-Leste, detentions on the island of Ataúro were reported to have been used mainly between 1980 and 1984. This is consistent with information collected by the Commission directly through its statement-taking process and in the secondary source reports collected from various sources by Amnesty International. However, there is a considerable difference in the level of documented detentions between these two data sources. The sources gathered by Amnesty International suggest that the detainee population on Ataúro grew from about 500 in mid-1980 to around 4,000 in September 1982 before declining to around 1,500 in October 1984, as shown in the Reported Detainees in Ataúro, June 1980-October 1984 Figure.

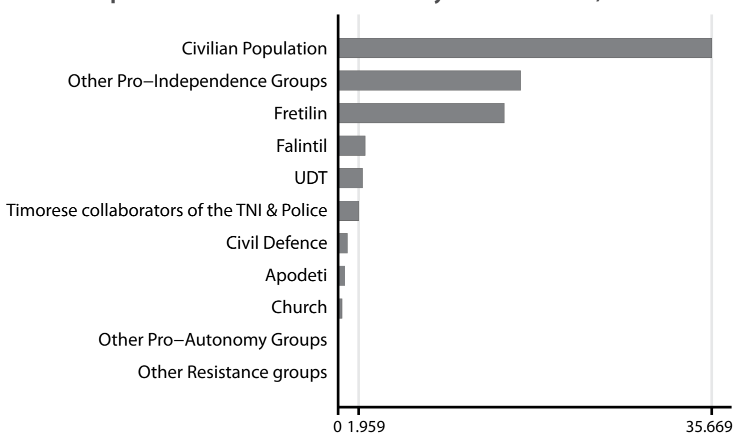


Reported number of detainees on Ataúro, June 1980–October 1984

Reference: Amnesty International, 'East Timor – Violations of Human Rights' (1985)

173. According to the Commission's data, reported detentions on Ataúro peak at 446 detainees in 1982, as is shown in the Reported Detainees in Ataúro. June 1980-October 1984 Figure. Given that Amnesty International's data were collected from multiple sources, including by the International Committee of the Red Cross, Australian government officials and Indonesian administrative records, it is likely that the Commission's data significantly underreport detentions on Ataúro. However, both the Amnesty International and Commission data confirm that large groups of people were detained on the island of Ataúro in the early 1980s, in addition to continued large-scale detentions in other parts of Timor-Leste.

Count of reported detentions, in and out of Ataúro, 1974–1999



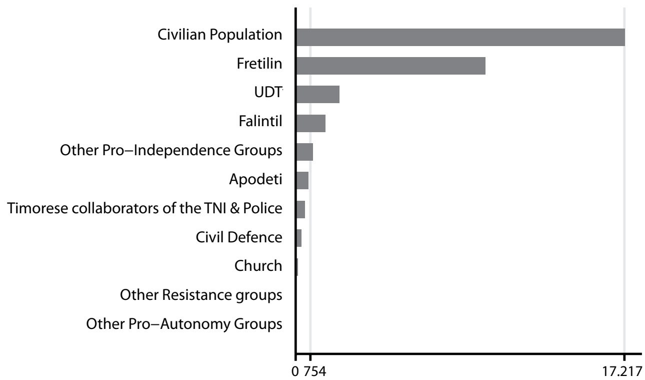
Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Patterns of violations by political affiliations of reported victims

174. A number of hypotheses examined by the Commission considered whether systematic and targeted campaigns were based on the victims' political affiliations. This section describes the reported extent and pattern of violations against civilians, armed-Resistance fighters and political activists.

175. 88.7% (68,943/77,748) of non-fatal violations reported to the Commission were violations against the civilian population, including both those civilians who were not known to have a political affiliation and those who were formally part of a pro-independence group or political party, as can be seen in the Reported Non-Fatal Violations Based on Victims' Affiliations, 1974–1999 Figure.

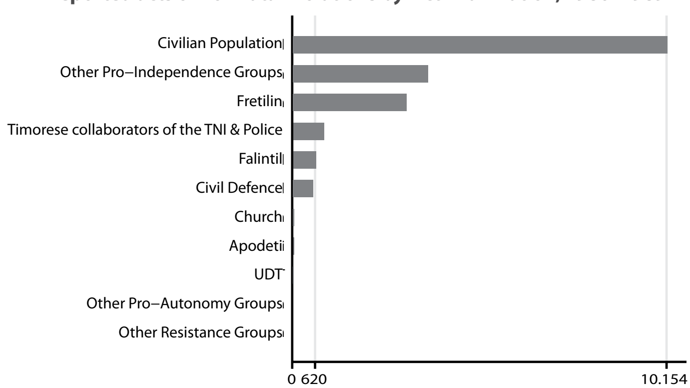
Reported acts of non-fatal violations by victim affiliation, 1974–1999



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Note: some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators

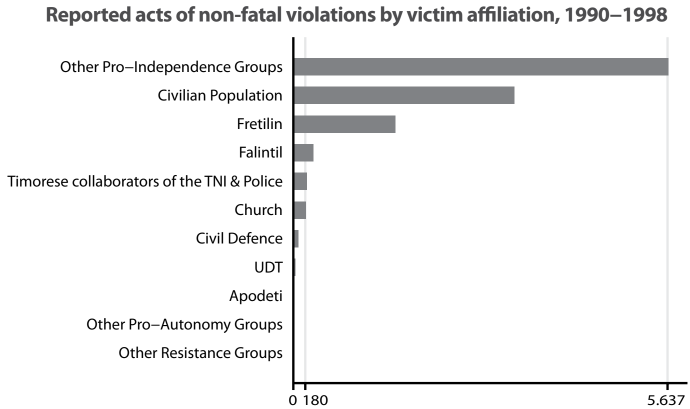
176. As the pro-independence movement grew to be more broadly-based during the 1990s, increasing numbers of civilians with pro-independence affiliations appear to have suffered non-fatal violations, as is seen in the Reported Non-Fatal Violations Based on Victims' Affiliations, 1974–1979 Figure; the Reported Non-Fatal Violations Based on Victims' Affiliations, 1980–1989 Figure; the Reported Non-Fatal Violations Based on Victims' Affiliations, 1990–1998 Figure; and the Reported Non-Fatal Violations Based on Victims' Affiliations, 1999 Figure.*



Reported acts of non-fatal violations by victim affiliation, 1974–1979

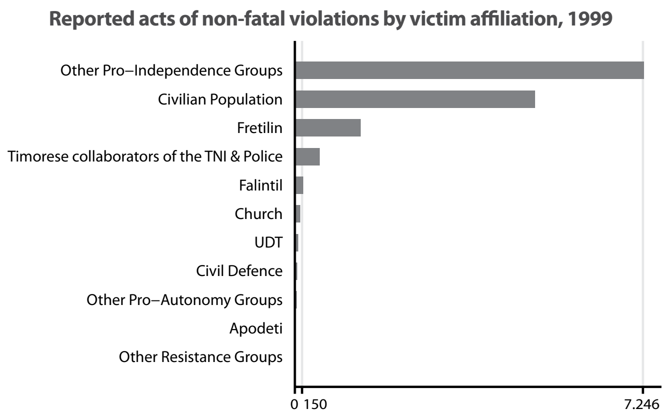
Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Note: some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators



Reported acts of non-fatal violations by victim affiliation, 1980–1989

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

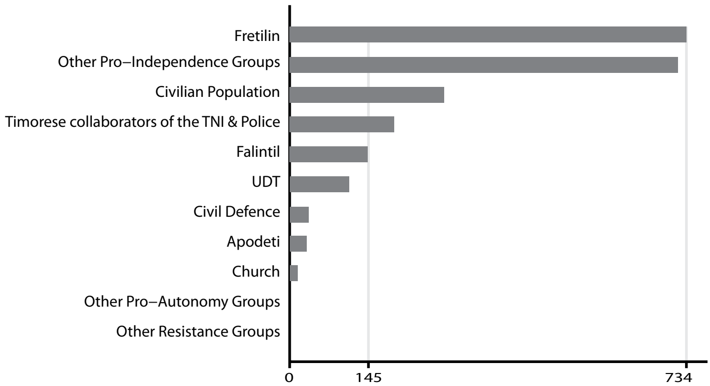


Note: some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators

* It must be noted, though, that only 87 statements were collected in West Timor refugee camps, and the Commission's district-based socialisation process was often convened in collaboration with local officials. As a result, people with pro-autonomy political affiliations may be under-represented in the Commission's statement-taking process.

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Note: some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Note: some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators

177. For the major non-fatal violation types (detention, torture, ill-treatment, forced labour, threats and property/economic violations), there are no substantial differences in the proportion of documented victims with political/social affiliations, as shown in the Reported Non-Fatal Violations Based on Victims' Affiliations Figure, Reported Acts of Torture Based on Victims' Affiliations Figure, Reported Acts of Ill Treatment Based on Victims' Affiliations, 1974–1999 Figure; Reported Acts of Property/Economical Violation Based on Victims' Affiliations, 1974–1999 Figure: civilians without any known political affiliations accounted for between 40% and 48% of the documented victims, whereas persons with a pro-independence affiliation accounted for between 43% and 55% of documented violations. For sexual violations, civilians without a known political affiliation accounted for a slightly higher proportion (56%, 441/770, of sexually based violations) than civilians known to be aligned with pro-independence groups and parties (43.1%, 427/770).

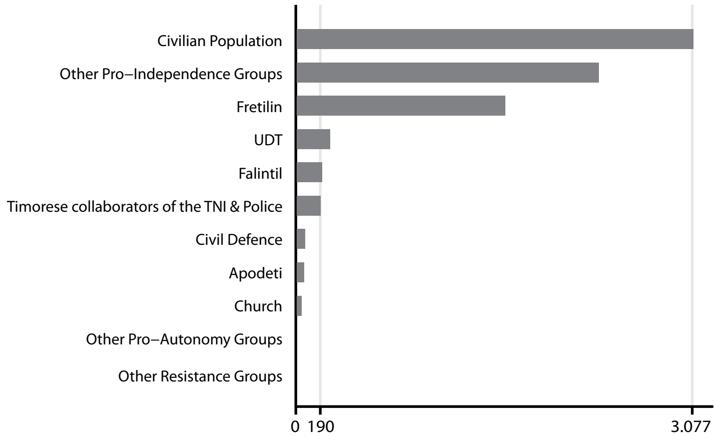
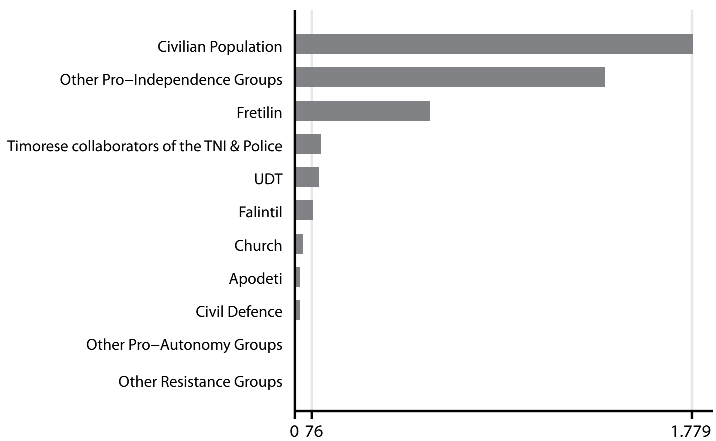
Number of reported acts of detention, by victim affiliation



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Number of reported acts of torture, by victim affiliation

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR



Reported acts of ill-treatment by victim affiliation, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Note: some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators

Reported acts of property/economic violations by victim affiliation, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Note: some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators

Mau Chiga case study

Introduction

178. This section presents a detailed case study on the nature and pattern of violations experienced by the people of Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) in the early 1980s. The case study takes the form of a descriptive statistical analysis based on data collected by two village leaders from Mau Chiga.

Background to documentation effort

179. Over a period of 18 years village leaders from Mau Chiga documented displacements, detentions and killings arising from a crackdown by the Indonesian military in connection with attacks organised by the Resistance in the area in August 1982. The Mau Chiga Documentation Project was completed in August 2004 when village leaders handed over tabulated lists compiled from their narrative interviews to the Commission during a Public Hearing held by the Commission in Mau Chiga.

180. The purpose of the project was to develop an accurate historical record of the extent, pattern, trend and nature of violations experienced by members of the community of Mau Chiga during the early 1980s. Deponents were invited and encouraged to talk about any displacement, detention or fatal violation experienced by anyone they knew in connection with the August 1982 uprising (levantamento).

Limitations of the data

181. The data on which this case study are based were collected through a convenience sample of persons willing to report and share their experiences of human rights violations (namely displacements, arrests and detentions and conflict-related deaths) connected to the August 1982 uprising and counter-Resistance crackdown. Abilio dos Santos and Olga da Silva collected this data in two separate phases of data collection.* The first phase of data collection, from February 1986 until April 2003, involved Abilio dos Santos and Olga da Silva periodically carrying out narrative interviews in the different aldeias in the village of Mau Chiga. The two visited the following aldeias during their data collection and documentation work: Mau Chiga, Hatuquero, Goulora, Leotelo-1 and Leotelo-2. Deponents were selected based on the interviewers' own social networks and referrals by other interviewees. The second phase of data collection, from May 2003 to July 2004, consisted of the compilation of lists of victims of detention, displacement, and conflict-related deaths. During this second phase, a number of respondents who had given information in the first phase of data collection were re-interviewed to fill in gaps in the narrative information which had been collected.

* Abilio dos Santos is the Village Secretary of Mau Chiga. Olga da Silva is a teacher at the primary school in Mau Chiga. The Commission has chosen to follow the official RDTL spelling of "Mau Chiga", though it is known to many also as "Mauxiga".

182. The project restricted the information it collected to the specific violations of arbitrary detentions, displacement and conflict-related deaths which were directly connected to the events of 20 August 1982 and the crackdown that followed. It therefore did not document other forms of abuse, such as property destruction and sexual violence, nor did it document abuses which were connected to events other than those that occurred in connection with the 20 August uprising.

183. Provision was made for duplicate reporting on the same victim by multiple deponents at two stages in the documentation process. First, the data collection team periodically scanned their lists for duplicate reports of victims. Second, once the data was entered into an electronic database, computerised searches and analytical tests were conducted to identify names which could be duplicate reports of the same victim.*

Historical background

184. On 6 July 1982, members of Falintil and of the local clandestine movement began planning a series of attacks on Indonesian military posts in the area surrounding Mau Chiga. An informer betrayed their plans to the Indonesian military. On 10 July, members of the Indonesian army and Hansip from Hato Builico began house-to-house searches in Goulora, Mau Chiga and Hatuquero. They arrested over 30 people, including 13 who had attended the 6 July meeting. Those arrested were taken directly to the district military headquarters (Kodim) in Ainaro Town. Over the following days, the Indonesian military arrested more people, whom they brought to the Hato Builico Sub-district headquarters (Koramil).

185. Despite the arrests, on 20 August 1982, at about 4.30am Falintil, together with a number of men from Dare and Mau Chiga, attacked several ABRI posts around Mau Chiga, including the Dare Koramil. The same day ABRI soldiers and Hansip from the posts that had been attacked as well as other posts in the area retaliated. During the following days additional ABRI troops from outside the area, including units of Battalions 745 and 746, were also deployed around Mau Chiga. Between 20 August and 24 August Indonesian troops and Hansip destroyed and looted property. A large proportion of the population of the village of Mau Chiga were either forcibly displaced or fled the village out of fear for their safety. The Indonesian military forcibly transferred villagers to several different locations, including the island of Ataúro (Dili), Dotik (Alas, Manufahi) and Dare (Hato Builico, Ainaro).

* This process uncovered seven duplicated reports of fatal violations.

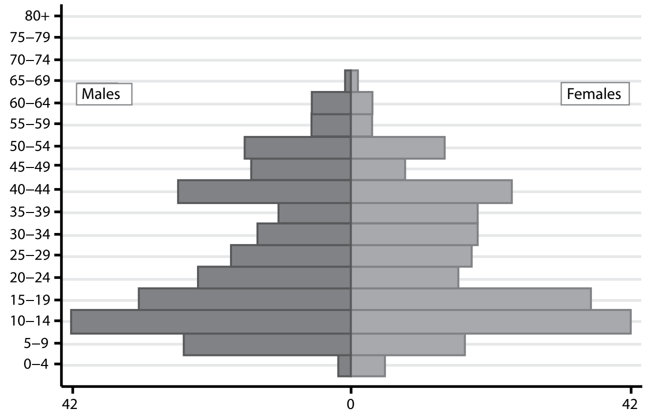
Descriptive statistical analysis of violations reported to Mau Chiga Documentation Project

Reported displacements and detentions suffered by Mau Chiga residents

The demographic profile of victims of reported displacements and detentions

186. The project documented 1,803 acts of displacement involving Mau Chiga residents between July 1982 and January 1986. These 1,803 displacements were experienced by 464 individual residents of Mau Chiga: 48.7% (226/464) of whom were females and 38.8% (180/464) were children.*

187. These 464 victims of displacement and detention amounted to approximately 20.4% (464/2,269) of the total population of Mau Chiga Village.† Hence, the project's findings are consistent with the hypothesis that displacement was widespread in Mau Chiga during the 1980s.



188. Of the reported victims of displacement, 80.0% (371/464) of reported victims were initially arrested and displaced with their families. The remaining 20% (93/464) of documented victims of displacement were initially detained by themselves (and not along with their families).‡ As the Recorded Displacement Victims Based on Age and Sex, 1974–1999 Figure shows, 41.2% (191/464) of the displaced were between the ages of ten and 24. As was and still is the case in most parts of Timor-Leste, the population of Mau Chiga was over-represented by persons under 25. Hence the findings of the Mau Chiga Documentation Project are consistent with the hypothesis that the Indonesian military actively sort to eliminate the social and operational base of the resistance movement in Mau Chiga by forcibly deporting the general population (including women, children and the elderly).

* The Commission used the internationally-recognised standard that defines children as persons under the age of 18 (see Article 1 of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child [UN Doc A/44/49 (1989)], which was adopted by General Assembly Resolution 44/25, 20 November 1989 (entered into force on 2 September 1990).

† The 2001 Timor-Leste Suco Survey was used for the population base for Mau Chiga.

‡ Those who were deported as individuals were displaced in this manner, as they were captured by the Indonesian military while they were alone, usually either in their agricultural gardens, or in other places away from their place of residence.

Number of reported displacement victims, by age and sex, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR
Note: 0.4% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

Accountability for the large-scale displacement and acts of detention of Mau Chiga residents

189. All of the reported acts of displacement of these 1,803 individuals, documented by the Mau Chiga Documentation Project, were attributed to the Indonesian military. In some specific cases, deponents reported the involvement of specific units of the Indonesian military or of the civil defence forces. The Hato Builico Hansip were reported to have taken part in 31.7% (571/1,803) of reported acts of displacement involving Mau Chiga residents. In these same acts of displacement it was reported to the Mau Chiga Documentation Project that the Hato Builico Hansip were working in collaboration with and under the direction of the Sub-Regional Command (Korem) in Dili, the District Military Command (Kodim) in Ainaro and the Hato Builico Sub-district Military Command (Koramil). All of these acts occurred either on 7 July 1982, 29 August 1982 or 30 August 1982.

The pattern of reported acts of displacement and detention over time

190. Reported acts of displacement are concentrated in two main time-periods: the third quarter of 1982, when 51.0% (919/1,803) of displacements were reported, and in the fourth-quarter of 1985 when 40.6% (732/1,803) of displacements were reported. It was during these two periods that most of the Mau Chiga residents who were interned on Ataúro were transferred from Mau Chiga to Ataúro and sent back to Mau Chiga from Ataúro. At both of these times, individuals were first temporarily transferred to transit locations for short periods of time varying between one day and a few weeks.

The pattern of reported acts of displacement and detention over geographic space and by duration of detention

191. As can be seen in the Figure below, the duration of detention periods reported to the documentation project varied widely, lasting from one day to 1,005 days. Around 41.0% (739/1,803) of all reported displacements lasted for ten days or less, 22.1% (399/1,803) of displacement events lasted between 101 and 300 days, and 20% (368/1,803) between 701 and 900 days. The data collected by the Mau Chiga Documentation Project are consistent with the hypothesis that although Mau Chiga residents were displaced several times (on average each individual was displaced 3.9 times), around half of these displacements were short-term (of duration less than a week), whereas the other half were substantially longer (ranging from three to 33 months).

Table 25: Distribution of reported duration periods of displacement events of Mau Chiga residents, 1982–1985

Duration	Count	% Share
1 day	192	10.7
2-10 days	547	30.3
11-100 days	113	6.3
101 – 300 days	399	22.1
301-500 days	87	4.8
501-700 days	8	0.4
701-900 days	368	20.4
901-1005 days	87	4.8
Unknown	2	0.1
Total	1.803	100.0

Source: Data collected by the Village Secretary of Mau Chiga.

192. The Indonesian military held Mau Chiga residents in long-term detention in a number of locations, including the island of Ataúro, Dotik, Ainaro Town and Dare. 79.3% (368/464) of the Mau Chiga residents documented by the Mau Chiga Documentation Project were held in long-term detention on Ataúro.* Smaller groups of Mau Chiga residents were reported to have been held in long-term detention in Dotik and Ainaro Town: 80 individuals were held for two years and six months years in Dotik starting in November 1982, and seven individuals were held for two years and nine months in Ainaro Town starting in April 1983. Follow-up interviews conducted by the Commission with Mau Chiga residents in 2005 in Mau Chiga indicated that those individuals who were held in long-term detention in Dotik and Ainaro were held there due to overcrowding on Ataúro.*

* The Indonesian military sent 360 of these 368 Mau Chiga residents to Ataúro on 30 August 1982. The remaining eight Mau Chiga residents were sent to Ataúro on 5 September 1982 after being interrogated for one week in Lesuhati.

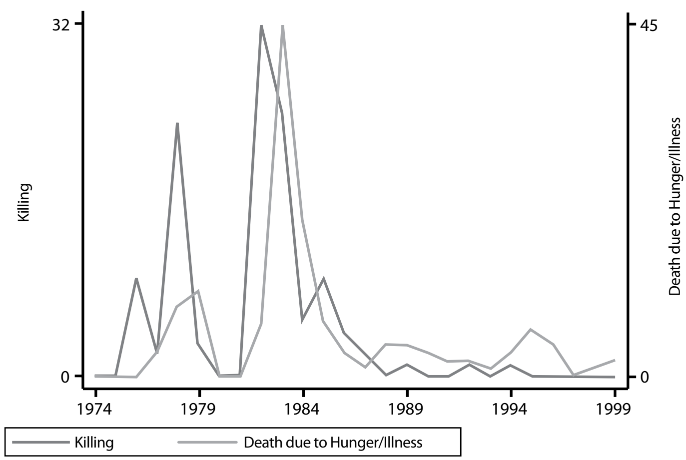
193. The broad reported pattern of displacement to and from long-term detention locations for Mau Chiga residents was as follows: victims were usually arrested and detained in Mau Chiga and then deported to nearby locations where they were kept for anywhere between one day to ten days. Because these locations were usually transit stops en route to long-term detention centres or back to Mau Chiga, periods of detention in them usually occurred in quick succession. The places where people were held for these short periods included Ainaro Town, Bonuk (Hato Udo, Ainaro), Dare (Hato Builico, Ainaro), Lesuhati (Hato Builico, Ainaro), Same (Manufahi) and the Comarca prison in Dili. Others were held in other locations, such as Dotik, Ainaro Town and Dare, before or after their long-term detention periods. Mau Chiga residents were also detained for several months in Dare, Dotik, Same, Ainaro Town and Bonuk en route to or from their long-term internment locations.

Table 26: Cross-tabulation of reported duration periods of displacement events of Mau Chiga residents by location, 1982–1985

	1 day	2 – 10 days	11-100 days	101-300 days	301-500 days	501-700 days	701-900 days	901-1005 days	Not known	Total
Ainaro	2	0	16	22	0	0	0	7	0	47
Ataúro	0	0	0	0	0	8	368	0	1	377
Bonuk	0	355	22	0	0	0	0	0	0	377
Comarca	13	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	13
Dare	172	0	0	377	80	0	0	0	1	630
Dotik	0	0	6	0	7	0	0	80	0	93
Lesuhati	1	182	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	183
Same	4	10	69	0	0	0	0	0	0	83
Total	192	547	113	399	87	8	368	87	2	1,803

194. The data collected by the Mau Chiga Documentation Project are consistent with the hypothesis that the Indonesian military used long-term detention on Ataúro and in Dotik and Ainaro Town of supporters and suspected supporters of the Resistance movement as a strategy to eliminate the social and operational support base of the Resistance in Mau Chiga. These data also show that Mau Chiga

* CAVR Interviews with Olga da Silva, Abilio dos Santos, Xavier do Amaral and Antonio Pires, Mau Chiga, 16 April 2005.



residents experienced a series of displacements and detentions before and after their long-term period of detention on Ataúro, or in Dotik and Ainaro Town.

Reported fatal violations suffered by Mau Chiga residents

The distribution of reported fatal violations suffered by Mau Chiga residents over time and by cause-of-death

195. The Mau Chiga Documentation Project documented 262 unique conflict-related deaths of Mau Chiga residents during the Commission's reference period: 44.7% (117/262) of these were killings, and the remaining 55.3% (145/262) were deaths due to illness or hunger. As the Fatal Violations over Time, 1974–1999 Figure shows, 68.3% (179/262) of these fatal violations occurred during the period of Indonesian military's initial invasion and occupation between 1978 and 1984. Furthermore, the reported patterns of killings and illness/hunger-related deaths of Mau Chiga residents are positively correlated.* Hence the data documented by the Mau Chiga Documentation Project are consistent with the hypothesis that conflict-related killings and illness/hunger deaths in Mau Chiga were overwhelmingly concentrated during the Indonesian military's counter-Resistance operations.

Fatal violations over time, 1974–1999

Source: Data collected by the Village Secretary of Mau Chiga

196. While the pattern of killings and illness/hunger-related deaths are correlated over time, there are some notable differences between the two phenomena. Documented killings are concentrated mostly in 1978 and 1982-83 (with 19.7% [23/117] occurring in 1978 and 47.9% [56/117] in 1982-83), whereas 44.8% (65/145) of illness/hunger-related deaths are concentrated in 1983-84 when Mau Chiga residents experienced mass deportations from their homes.

* The correlation coefficient for these two series is 0.57.

The pattern of attributed responsibility for reported fatal violations of Mau Chiga residents

197. Of the killings documented by the Mau Chiga Documentation Project, 83.8% (98/117) were reported to be the sole responsibility of the Indonesian military, 6.0% (7/117) the sole responsibility of East Timorese auxiliaries and for 10.3% (12/117) institutional perpetrator responsibility was not reported. No reported killings were attributed to the Indonesian military and East Timorese auxiliaries acting together, nor were any killings attributed to individuals associated with the Resistance. This pattern of attributed responsibility appears to distinguish Mau Chiga from other parts of Timor-Leste, where a substantial proportion of killings were attributed to Indonesian forces and East Timorese auxiliaries acting together (see above).

198. Of the documented killings of Mau Chiga residents attributed to the Indonesian military, 66.3% (65/98) were suffered by individuals associated with the Resistance and the remaining 33.7% (33/98) by members of the civilian population.

The pattern of fatal violations against Mau Chiga residents by the victim's political affiliation

199. The distribution of documented killings and illness/hunger-related deaths varied substantially by the political affiliation of victims. As is shown in the Table below, 64.1% (75/117) of killings were reported to have been committed against individuals formally associated with the Resistance. By contrast all but one death due to illness or hunger was reported to have been experienced by an unarmed civilian. This is consistent with the hypothesis that that although killings were mostly targeted against Resistance and clandestine members, the Indonesian military and its associates killed a substantial portion of civilians during its counter-Resistance operations.

Table 27: Distribution of reported fatal violations by political affiliation of victim, 1974–1999

Victim's affiliation	Killings		Illness/Hunger-Related Deaths
	Count	%	Count	%
Unarmed civilian	42	35.9	144	99.3
Resistance/ Clandestine member	75	64.1	1	0.7
Total	117	100.0	145	100.0

Source: Data collected by the Village Secretary of Mau Chiga.

200. The geographic distribution of reported killings of Mau Chiga residents differed from that for deaths from hunger and illness. As the table below shows, documented illness/hunger-related deaths were almost uniformly distributed between the sub-districts of Ainaro Town (Ainaro), Alas (Manufahi) and Ataúro (Dili), whereas reported killings were mostly concentrated in Ainaro Town (Ainaro), Alas (Manufahi) and Same (Manufahi).

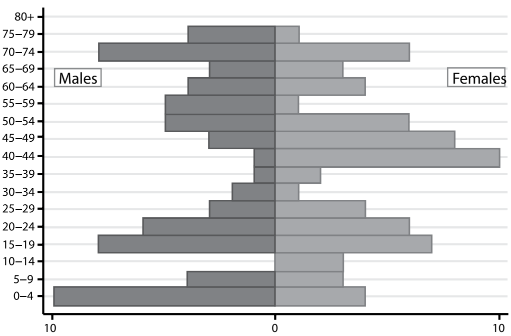
Table 28: Distribution of reported fatal violations by political affiliation and geographic location, 1974–1999

Sub-district in which violation occurred	Killings		Illness/Hunger related deaths		Total
	Count	%	Count	%	Count	%
Ainaro, Ainaro	45	38.5	43	29.7	88	33.6
Maubisse, Ainaro	4	3.4	0	0	4	1.5
Bobonaro, Bobonaro	1	0.9	0	0	1	0.4
Alas, Manufahi	31	26.5	47	32.4	78	29.8
Fatuberliu, Manufahi	4	3.4	0	0	4	1.5
Same, Manufahi	31	26.5	0	0	31	11.8
Laleia, Manatuto	1	0.9	0	0	1	0.4
Ataúro, Dili	0	0	55	37.9	55	21.0
Total	117	100	145	100	262	100

Source: Data collected by the Village Secretary of Mau Chiga.

The pattern of reported fatal violations against Mau Chiga residents by the age and sex of the victim

201. As was the case for killings throughout Timor-Leste, males in Mau Chiga suffered the overwhelming majority of killings reported to the Mau Chiga Documentation Project (92.3% [108/117] of reported killings were against males and the balance of 7.7% [9/117] was against females). When we move from simple violation counts to population-based violation rates, it can be seen that, on average, relative to their share of the population of Mau Chiga Village, the population-based rate at which men were killed was more than ten times higher than that for women. Ninety-five men per 1,000 were reported to have been killed during the Commission's reference period compared with eight women per 1,000.*



* These population-based rates are derived using population figures from the 2001 Timor-Leste Suco Survey.

202. 41.0% (48/117) of documented killings were against young males between the ages of 15 and 29. This is consistent with the hypothesis that as part of its counter-Resistance strategy the Indonesian military targeted young males of military age.

203. By contrast documented deaths due to illness and hunger were more evenly distributed across the sexes: 50.3% (73/117) of these were male deaths and 49.7% (72/117) were female deaths. In terms of population share, equal population-based rates of deaths due to illness/hunger were observed for males and females: 64 per 1,000 males in Mau Chiga were reported to have died due to hunger/illness during the Commission's reference period, as was also the case for females.*

204. As can be seen in the Figure below, the residents of Mau Chiga who were most frequently reported as suffering deaths due to hunger and illness were young infants and the elderly. This pattern of vulnerability to famine-related deaths of the very young and the elderly is similar to that which was documented by the Commission throughout Timor-Leste.

Number of reported hunger/illness deaths, by age and sex, 1974–1999

Source: Data collected by the Village Secretary of Mau Chiga

Note: 1.4% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

Summary and conclusion

205. The Commission collected and utilised a wide array of empirical data sources. It collected nearly 8,000 narrative statements from East Timorese people regarding their experiences over 25 years of conflict, conducted a household survey which inquired into mortality and displacement from almost 1,400 households, conducted a census of public graveyards in all 13 districts of Timor-Leste, and developed datasets from information collected from other organisations and groups.† The purpose of this statistics chapter has been threefold:

* These population-based rates are also derived from population figures in the 2001 Timor-Leste Suco Survey.

† External information which was compiled into datasets included reports and other material from Amnesty International, narrative interviews collected by the East Timorese women's rights organisation Fokupers and lists tabulated by village leaders in the village of Mau Chiga.

- To present multiple, independent, scientific estimates of the total extent, pattern and trend of mortality and displacement which were experienced during the Commission's reference period;
- To outline and interpret the descriptive statistics regarding the nature and extent of violations, the behaviour of perpetrators, and the characteristics of victims that were gathered from multiple independent data sources; and
- To document the statistical methods employed in reaching the Commission's statistical findings.

206. In order to achieve this depth and breadth of analysis, the Commission and the Benetech Human Rights Data Analysis Group jointly developed multiple data projects which involved large-scale data collection, data coding, database representation, record linkage and statistical analysis. The resulting statistical analysis helps to uncover and clarify social and historical knowledge of political violence in Timor-Leste between 1974 and 1999. However, as one part of its overall findings, the Commission's statistical findings need to be combined and integrated with its qualitative, historical and legal findings.

End notes

1. John Waddingham, "Timor-Leste Death Toll, 1975–1999", Submission to CAVR, 22 July 2003.
2. Terence Hull, "From Province to Nation: The Demographic Revolution of a People", in James J Fox and Dionisio Babo Soares (eds.), Out of the Ashes: The Destruction and Reconstruction of East Timor, Crawford House Publishing, Bathurst, Australia, 2000, p. 38.
3. Arnold Kohen and John Taylor, An Act of Genocide: Indonesia's Invasion of East Timor, Tapol, London, 1979, p. 58.
4. John G Taylor, "'Encirclement and Annihilation': The Indonesian Occupation of East Timor," in Robert Gelletely and Ben Kiernan (eds.), The Specter of Genocide: Mass Murder in Historical Perspective, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 2003.
5. "Report on Timor-Leste," East Timorese Church document, 12 July 1979, cited in C Gilbert and J Waddingham, "Timor-Leste – How many people are missing?" A report by the Timor Information Service to the Australian Senate Standing committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence, 28 March 1982.
6. Article 1of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UN Doc A/44/49 (1989)).
7. Biro Pusat Statistik, Sensus Penduduk Indonesia, 1990, Jakarta, 1994.

After looking at forty truth commissions world-round, I concluded that the truth commission of East Timor was among the five strongest. It was an impressive, passionate and scrupulous exercise. And its report, Chega!, stands in testament to this careful and rigorous exercise, honestly re ecting the victims' stories as well as the far-reaching conclusions that emerged from this work. It is wonderful that this will now be available, in full, in English; it will be an important reference for others embarking on a similar path.

Priscilla Hayner,
Author, Unspeakable Truths: Transitional Justice and the Challenge of Truth Commissions (2nd ed., 2011)

"The extensive CAVR Report is an encyclopedia of our history, rich in both teachings and suffering. We must utilise its great teachings to better understand today's crisis and to help prevent future crises."

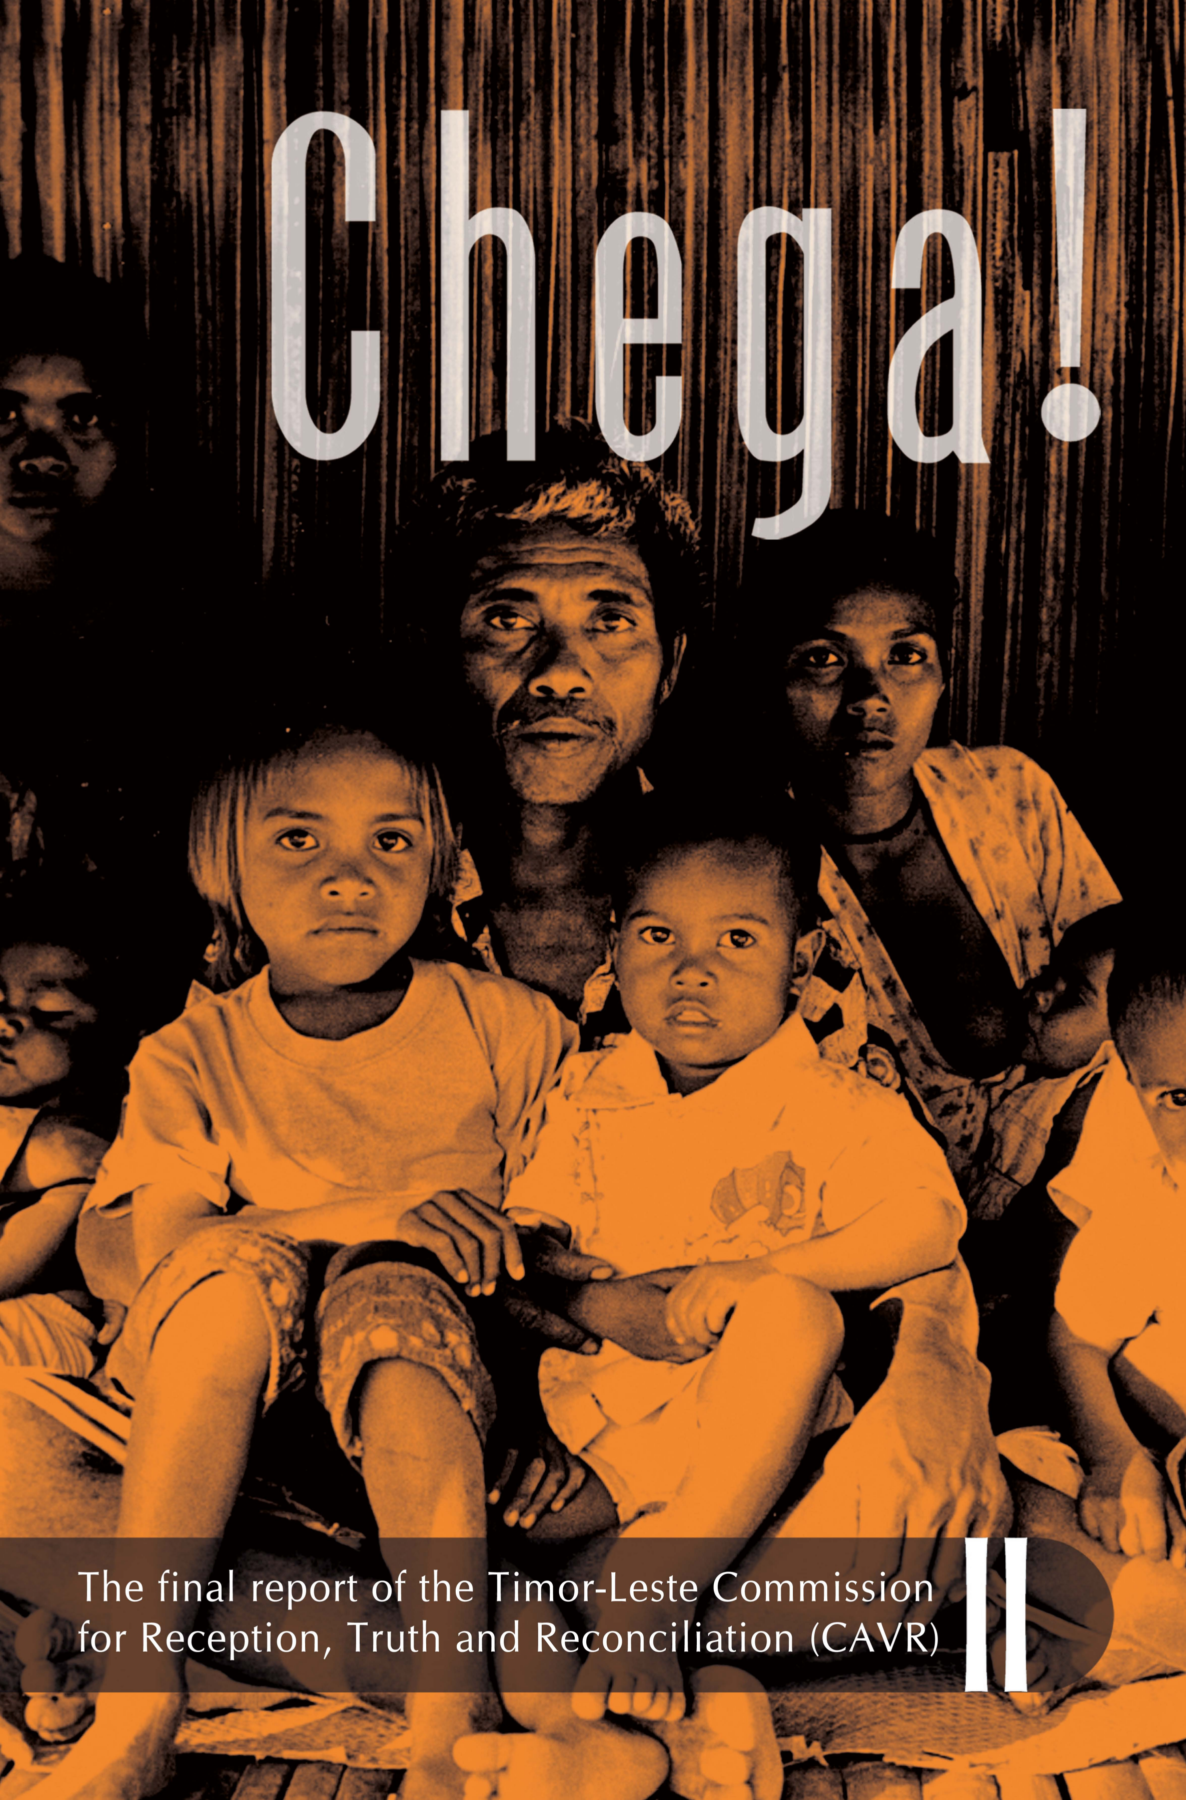
Jose Ramos-Horta,
Nobel Peace Laureate, former President and Prime Minister of Timor-Leste (July 2006)

"Chega! is troubling testimony. This report will jolt Indonesian readers who think that under the Soeharto regime everything was peaceful in Indonesia's then 27th province. Page after page recounts the stories of victims of massacres, rape, forced disappearances, torture and other unimaginable crimes ... Indonesia can learn from Chega! This report is an important contribution to democratisation and security sector reform in Indonesia."

Ifdhal Kasim,
Chair, Indonesian Commission on Human Rights (August 2010)

"The CAVR Report constitutes an important milestone in the search for justice, truth and reconciliation in Timor-Leste. It is my sincere hope that (it) will be an enduring contribution to building the Timorese nation and will help to prevent the recurrence of such tragic events in Timor-Leste and elsewhere."

Kofi Annan,
UN Secretary-General (July 2006)



KPG (KEPUSTAKAAN POPULER GRAMEDIA)
Gedung Kompas Gramedia, Blok 1 Lt. 3
Jl. Palmerah Barat 29-37, Jakarta 10270
Telp. 021-53650110, 53650111 ext. redaksi 3366
Fax. 53698044, www.penerbitkpg.com
redaksi.kpg@gramediapublishers.com
Facebook: Penerbit KPG; Twitter: @penerbitkpg

cavr-timorleste.org

timor-leste.gov.tl

KPG: 901 13 0738
ISBN: 978-979-91-0643-8
9 789799 106438

Chega!

The final report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

II

Chega!

Volume II

OTHER CAVR PUBLICATIONS

CAVR report – Chega!

Indonesian version of Chega! plus summary (2010)
Comic book version of Chega! (Tetum, Portuguese)
Chega! exhibition

Public hearing books

Women and the Conflict
Massacres
Forced Displacement and Famine
Political Imprisonment
Internal Political Conflict 1974–1976
Self-Determination and the International Community
Children and the Conflict

Other titles

Hear Our Voices
The Balide Comarca Prison
History of Timor-Leste in Posters
Dalan ba Dame (dvd with sub-titles)

Website

www.cavr-timorleste.org

Chega!

The Final Report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

Volume II

JAKARTA
KPG IN COOPERATION WITH STP-CAVR

Chega!

The Final Report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

Volume II

KPG 901 13 0739
First printing, November 2013

Author:
The Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

Cover photo:
Poriaman Sitanggang

Editors:
Rani Elsanti, Mirna Adzania, Ninus D Andarnuswari,
Mariana Hasbie, Ining Isaiyas, Pat Walsh

Design and layout:
M. Roniyadi, Rio Ardani, Dadang Kusmana,
Fernandus Antonius, Wendie Artswenda

Project management:
Rev. Agustinho de Vasconselos, Ligia Hermenegildo da Costa,
Candra Gautama, Christina M. Udiani

Library of Congress Cataloguing-in-Publication Data

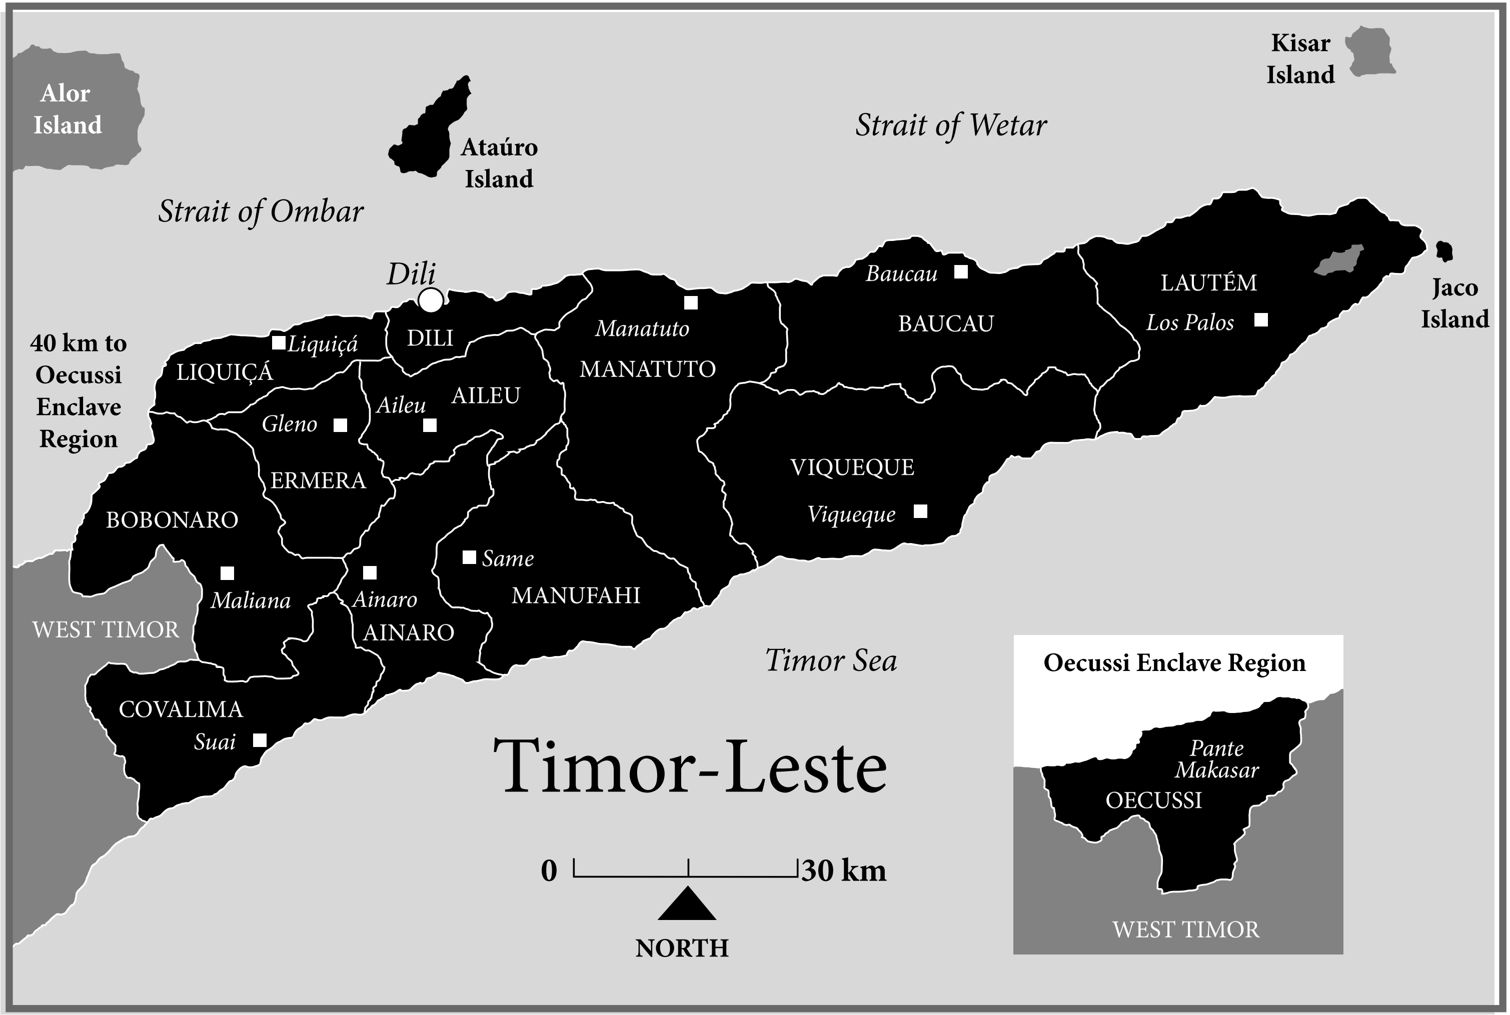
The Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)
Chega!: the final report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR): full report / author, CAVR.—Jakarta: KPG in cooperation with STP-CAVR, 2013. 5 volumes; vol. II: xii + 770 pages; 15 cm x 23 cm

ISBN-13: 978-979-91-0644-5

1. Timor-Leste—History—Autonomy and independence movements. 2. Human rights—Timor-Leste. 3. Crimes against humanity—Timor-Leste. 4. Truth commissions--Timor-Leste. 5. Indonesia—Politics and government—1966-1998. 6. Comissão de Acolhimento, Verdade, e Reconciliação Timor-Leste. I. Comissão de Acolhimento, Verdade, e Reconciliação Timor-Leste.

DS649.6 .C3913 2013 2013451418

Funding for this publication was provided by the Government of Timor-Leste.



Every effort has been made to ensure that the contents of this English language version are faithful to the approved Indonesian version entitled Chega! Laporan Komisi Penerimaan, Kebenaran, dan Rekonsiliasi (CAVR) di Timor-Leste (KPG, 2010).

Printed by PT Gramedia, Jakarta
The printer is not responsible for the content of this publication.

Content

Tables:

Graphics:

Alor Island
Ataúro Island
Kisar Island
Strait of Wetar
Strait of Ombar
Dili
40 km to Oecussi Enclave Region
Jaco Island
LAUTÉM
Los Palos
Baucau
BAUCAU
Manatuto
MANATUTO
DILI
Liquiçá
LIQUIÇÁ
Aileu
AILEU
Gleno
ERMERA
VIQUEQUE
Viqueque
BOBONARO
Maliana
Same MANUFAHI
Ainaro
AINARO
WEST TIMOR
COVALIMA
Suai
Timor Sea
Timor-Leste
0
30 km
NORTH
Oecussi Enclave Region
Pante Makasar
OECUSSI
WEST TIMOR

Chega!

Part 7.1.

The Right to Self-Determination

Part 7.1 The Right to Self-Determination

Table:

744 | Table 1: UN General Assembly Resolutions on Timor-Leste: How countries voted, 1975–1982

7.1 The Right to Self-Determination

Introduction

Preface

1. This part focuses on the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination and the extent to which that right was upheld or denied particularly within the international community.

2. The right to self-determination is a fundamental and inalienable human right. It forms Article 1 of the two major human rights instruments (the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights) because of its importance to the international order and the protection of individual rights. The International Court of Justice has recognised the right to self-determination as one of the most important human rights, and as "the concern of all states".[1]

3. Self-determination is fundamental because it is a collective right of a people to be itself. The struggle to enjoy this right above all others was the central defining issue of the CAVR mandate period. This period began with the decision of the colonial power in 1974 to recognise this right after 14 years of denial and ended with the decision of the occupying power to recognise it in 1999 after 24 years of denial. In the interim, the people of Timor-Leste made extraordinary sacrifices to realise this right. It was essential to the survival, identity and destiny of Timor-Leste.

4. This part examines the record of key international institutions and governments in meeting internationally agreed obligations to protect and promote the right to self-determination of the people of Timor-Leste. These comprise the three main external stakeholders in the issue – Portugal, Indonesia and Australia – plus the United Nations Security Council and its five Permanent Members, namely China, France, Russia, the United Kingdom and the United States. Japan is also examined because it was an elected member of the Security Council in the crucial years 1975 and 1976 and was Indonesia's principal regional economic partner. This part also reports on the important role of the Vatican and on the decisive contribution to the realisation of self-determination by Timor-Leste's diplomats and diaspora carried out in partnership with international civil society.

The right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination

5. The right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination was clear-cut and formally acknowledged by the international community. The United Nations Security Council and General Assembly affirmed the existence of this right and the responsibility of all states to respect it on many occasions from 1960 on.[2] The acknowledgment of this right established the legitimacy of the "Timorese cause" in international law and sharply distinguished it from disputed claims to self-determination by some other peoples.

6. Self-determination is a collective right that "all peoples" have to determine their destinies. This right entitled the people of Timor-Leste to three things: a) to freely decide their political status; b) to freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development; and c) to freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources.[3]

7. The right to self-determination entitled the Timorese people to bring their colonial situation to an end by choosing freely between independence, free association with an existing state, or integration with an existing state. This decision was required to be made through a free and genuine expression of their will. To be internationally acceptable and valid, a people's decision about its future must be the outcome of an informed, fair and democratic process, free of outside intervention and threats, conducted impartially and preferably supervised by the United Nations. Because this right belonged collectively to all the people of Timor-Leste and not a particular group, its exercise was also required to be representative. The people of Timor-Leste also had the right to struggle for self-determination and to seek and receive support for their struggle. States were entitled to respond to such requests for moral and material assistance.[*] States are not permitted to use inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness as a pretext to delay independence.[4]

8. The right of the Timorese people to self-determination also encompassed a right to be free from foreign subjugation and entitlement to freely determine how their natural resources should be dealt with and disposed of.

* These two assertions are based on General Assembly Resolution 2105, 20 December 1965 and the UN Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation Among States in Accordance with the Charter of the UN, General Assembly Resolution 2625 (XXV), General Assembly Plenary Session 1883, 24 October 1970. See Suzannah Linton, Consultant Legal Advisor to CAVR, "The Right to Self-Determination in International Law", a submission made to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

Obligations of states

9. As a result of the right held by the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination, certain obligations fell on state members of the United Nations. As the administering power, Portugal had particular obligations. It was required under Article 73 of the UN Charter to accept as a "sacred trust" its obligation to promote to the utmost the well-being of the Timorese people and:

- to ensure the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the East Timorese people, and protect them from abuses;
- to develop self-government, take account of the political aspirations of the people and assist them in developing free political institutions; and
- to regularly transmit information to the UN Secretary General regarding the situation in the territory.

10. In addition, all states have certain obligations in respect of the right to self-determination. All states must respect and promote the right of peoples to self-determination[5] and to take positive action to facilitate its realisation.[6] In particular all states "must refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of other States and thereby adversely affecting the exercise of the right to self-determination."[7] States must refrain from any forcible action that deprives a people of its right to self-determination.[8]

11. Where the right of a people to self-determination is being denied, all other states are obliged to recognise that situation as unlawful, and must not take any action that aids or assists in its maintenance.[9]

12. In 1975, and again in 1976, the UN Security Council called upon "all states" to respect the inalienable right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination and the territorial integrity of Portuguese Timor.[10] All members of the United Nations are bound to comply with these resolutions of the Security Council.[11] The Security Council also imposed specific obligations on Indonesia and Portugal, which were both bound by those resolutions. It called upon Indonesia to withdraw its troops from East Timor,[12] and on Portugal to co-operate with the United Nations to enable the Timorese people to freely exercise their right to self-determination.[13]

13. The Commission concludes that the obligations on states were as follows:

- To respect the right to self-determination and to promote its realisation.
- Not to use force to suppress the right to self-determination.
- Not to do anything that may weaken the right of a people to self-determination.
- To provide assistance to peoples engaged in struggles for self-determination.
- Not to provide assistance to a state that is involved in suppressing the right to self-determination.
- Not to recognise as lawful a situation arising out of the denial of a people's right to self-determination.

The international context

14. The international community had agreed on the principles and procedures that should govern the decolonisation of Portuguese Timor but many key governments took a different approach to the issue in the 1970s than they did in the late 1990s.

15. A number of external factors worked against Timor's interests and due process in the 1970s. These included preoccupation with unprecedented ideological conflict at the international level and domestic crises of varying degrees of significance within the countries most closely involved with Timor-Leste. These issues were immensely important in their own right and affected countless human lives. However, they also impacted on Timor-Leste by diverting attention from the issue and colouring, if not distorting, official attitudes.

16. The dominant issue of the day was the Cold War. This was the open, yet restricted, rivalry that developed after the Second World War between the US and its Western allies and the Soviet Union and its allies, until the collapse of the Soviet Union (USSR) in 1991. This East-West rivalry was an ideological contest between the capitalist and communist systems, but was also commercial and military. It divided Europe, symbolised most vividly by the Berlin Wall that isolated West Berlin from communist-controlled East Berlin and East Germany. It also divided the Third World, after it became an arena of superpower competition following the establishment of a balance of power in Europe. The Soviet Union championed decolonisation. The competition did not result in direct military conflict between the US and the USSR, but it did involve military action or proxy wars in a number of countries, including in the Asian region. The rivalry generated great tension that was felt at every level of society in many countries and influenced public opinion on many questions. It also led to massive military expenditure and an arms race which included a build up of missiles and nuclear weapons that threatened the future of the world. The international community divided into Eastern, Western and Non-Aligned blocs around the issue and voted on many questions at the UN in line with geopolitical dictates rather than the merits of the issue under consideration.

17. Against this background, communist gains in Asia, which peaked in 1975 with the defeat of the US in Vietnam and communist victories in Laos and Cambodia, alarmed the US and its allies and worked against Timor-Leste's interests. Indonesia and other strongly anti-communist governments in the region, including Australia, New Zealand and members of ASEAN, were determined to work together to contain further advances. Left-wing developments in Portugal and Portuguese Timor were viewed with varying degrees of apprehension, particularly in Indonesia. But they also worked in favour of Indonesia which was able to exploit the issue against Fretilin, to maximise Indonesia's importance to the West as a bulwark against communism and to gain strong political, military and commercial backing from the US and the West.

18. The political ferment of the 1960s and 1970s also indirectly benefited Timor-Leste. The period witnessed the emergence of new political and civil society movements for peace, human rights, disarmament, development and social justice – due in large part to disillusionment with the Soviet Union and Cold-War related tragedies such as US involvement in the Vietnam War. They demanded a say or participatory democracy and were motivated by concern for the future of the planet if decision making was left to the superpowers and big government and business. This search for alternatives was also felt in faith communities across the world, including in the Catholic Church following the Second Vatican Council in the 1960s. These movements became the backbone of international civil society support for Timor-Leste.

19. Lack of official enthusiasm for Timorese independence was compounded by a sense that mainstream decolonisation had run its course. Most of the large colonies of the European powers – Britain, France, the Netherlands, Germany, Italy and Belgium – were already independent or, in the case of Portugal, in the process of becoming independent. Decolonisation started in the Middle East in the 1920s and was followed by a second wave in Asia in the 1940s and 1950s when India gained independence from Britain and Indonesia from the Netherlands. The process peaked in the 1960s with the third wave of emancipation when no fewer than 42 countries, mostly in Africa, gained independence and membership of the United Nations. In this context, issues like Timor and Macau were seen in some quarters as vestiges of colonialism that were unsustainable as independent states and best dealt with through incorporation into a larger entity, in some cases former colonies, with which they shared a border and other features. Goa's absorption into India was often referred to in this connection. From this perspective, Timor's future was historically inevitable and only conceivable as part of Indonesia even though, in reality, the territory was larger than some of Portugal's African colonies and many newly independent states.

20. At the level of national politics, the three key stakeholders – Portugal, Indonesia and Australia – experienced varying degrees of internal challenge and instability during this critical 1974-75 period. These domestic issues added to the preoccupations of key policy-makers and, at least in the case of Portugal, were demonstrably harmful to Timor-Leste.

21. During this period, Portugal experienced a left-wing military coup, attempted counter-coups and several changes of government. In addition to being deeply preoccupied with its own fate, it was also very engaged with the decolonisation of its major colonies in Africa. Indonesia was threatened with economic collapse due to the Pertamina crisis over many months at this time. This occurred when Pertamina, Indonesia's state-owned oil company headed by Lieutenant General Ibnu Sutowo, had trouble repaying substantial foreign borrowings. The crisis threatened the oil-dependent Indonesian economy and foreign investor confidence. Rising oil prices had brought Indonesia from poverty to modest prosperity and were crucial to President Soeharto's political programme. Presidential advisers said that Timor was of relatively minor importance compared to the Pertamina crisis and that the latter absorbed ninety per cent of the President's time in the months before the Indonesian invasion.[14] President Soeharto's health, always an issue in a highly centralised government, was also problematic towards the end of 1975 when he had a gall bladder removed. Australia, too, experienced some uncharacteristic political instability during this period. The Labour Government of Gough Whitlam was dismissed in November 1975 following a constitutional crisis leaving a caretaker government in power at the time of the Indonesian invasion. Foreign policy was a marginal issue in the bitter general election held on 13 December 1975.

Sources

22. The Commission based its research on primary sources as far as possible. The Commission advised most of the governments and institutions referred to in this part of its inquiry and sought their input. The Commission wrote to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the President of Indonesia, the Prime Ministers of Portugal and Australia, and the Governments of Japan, the United States of America, France, the People's Republic of China, and the United Kingdom. No official replies were received but the Commission received considerable assistance from a number of the representatives of these Governments based in Timor-Leste. The Commission also made inquiries in Moscow and the Vatican regarding access to documentation.

23. A general problem faced by both the Commission and Governments was the challenge of finding records dating back some 30 years. Locating and accessing records from the pre-computer 1970s is an administrative and financial challenge, compounded by the need to provide precise identification of particular documents and dates. In most cases, a comprehensive search remains to be done and in cases where freedom of information legislation does not exist or access is heavily restricted, this may not succeed.

24. However, the decision of some governments to release at least some of their confidential records on Timor-Leste greatly assisted the Commission to fulfil its responsibility to establish the truth. The documentation released by the Australian Government for the period 1974-76 was particularly valuable as was the two-volume Relatórios da Descolonização de Timor on 1974-75 made available by the Government of Portugal. The Commission also benefited from declassified records released to The National Security Archive by the US Government and Ford and Carter Presidential Libraries, four volumes of declassified material from the Government of New Zealand, and documents released by the United Kingdom and provided to the Commission by Hugh Dowson. The Commission also drew extensively on the records of informative debates and hearings on Timor held by the UN, the US Congress and the Australian Parliament and the collection of basic documents on the Timor question edited by Heike Krieger and published by the University of Cambridge. These were enriched by a report on self-determination prepared for the Commission by Professor Geoffrey C. Gunn, Nagasaki University, Japan and written and oral testimony given to the Commission by former diplomats who served in the UN and the US and Australian Governments.*

25. These records are an important part of Timor-Leste's patrimony which most East Timorese are only seeing now for the first time. The Commission is grateful for the co-

* The Commission is also deeply grateful to John Waddingham, Julia Davey and Peter Carey for their advice and contributions to the research for this part.

operation it has received in assembling this material and, in keeping with its mandate, has preserved and organised these archives for future reference. The Commission hopes that Governments which have not yet done so will either contribute their records or allow Timorese and other researchers access to official archives for this purpose.

The United Nations and the three major stakeholders

> Indonesia had undertaken a study of likely international reaction to Indonesian intervention in Portuguese Timor… It had been concluded that the other ASEAN countries would not protest. There would be no significant reaction from the United States or the Soviet Union. Relations with Portugal were not important to Indonesia. Any reference of the matter to the United Nations would be handled by Indonesia satisfactorily. The Black African countries would react but this would not be serious for Indonesia. Only two countries would protest vigorously – China and Australia. In China's case, the protest would be routine and stereotyped ("an obligatory reaction"). As for Australia, certain groups and the press would create a commotion. The Australian Government would feel compelled to protest. This would be regretted by Indonesia. But it would all die down in due course.[15]

The United Nations

26. The United Nations (UN) was established in 1945 after the Second World War to maintain international peace and security, to develop co-operation between nations and to promote social progress and human rights. Its members are bound by the UN Charter, an international treaty that spells out their rights and duties as members of the international community.

27. The UN Charter recognises the principle of self-determination and, under Chapter XI, requires members with responsibility for non-self-governing territories or colonies to accept as a "sacred trust" the obligation to promote the advancement of these peoples and their political institutions and to report to the world community on steps to prepare for self-determination.

28. The movement against colonialism gathered extra momentum following the Second World War. Both captive peoples and colonial powers concurred that colonialism, as a system based on domination and inequality, was inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the UN and unsustainable in a changing world. In 1960, to accelerate the process, the UN promulgated the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. It was adopted by the overwhelming majority of UN members. The Declaration states:

> All peoples have the right to self-determination; by virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.*

29. The importance of this document for Timor-Leste is clear from the fact that it was to introduce every General Assembly and Security Council resolution on the issue.

30. The same day, the General Assembly enunciated the different ways in which a full measure of self-government could be achieved by non-self-governing territories. Resolution 1541 (XV) provided three options: independence, free association, or integration with an independent state. It required that integration could only occur when the territory in question had advanced free political institutions and integration was the result of the people's freely expressed wishes based on universal adult suffrage.†

31. In 1961 the UN created a Special Committee on Decolonisation to reinforce the Declaration.‡ Its principal role is to advise the General Assembly on ways to promote decolonisation and independence and to alert the Security Council to developments in non-self-governing territories that could threaten international peace and security. It has no powers to enforce its resolutions or recommendations, but is mandated to travel widely, to hold hearings and to gather first-hand information about the situation in territories, including the wishes of the people about their future. Deliberation on decolonisation is also conducted in the General Assembly's Fourth Committee.

32. As a result of these initiatives, the decade of the 1960s is often described as the decade of decolonisation and independence. No fewer than 42 countries, mostly in Africa, gained independence and membership of the UN during the 1960s, more than any other decade during the history of the UN. However, Timor-Leste was not to join them for another 40 years.

33. The right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination was recognised on 15 December 1960, when the UN General Assembly listed Portuguese Timor by name as a non-self-governing territory, along with Portugal's other colonies.[16] This was the first time that the East Timorese were expressly recognised by the General Assembly as a people with a right to self-determination. Portugal refused to accept the decision and remained intransigent in the face of international challenges until the change of regime in 1974. The UN decision, however, was profoundly significant. Although it took time to be implemented in practice and was obstructed in many ways until 1999, the decision radically redefined Timor's relationship with Portugal and the international community. It elevated the fate of a small people from colonial obscurity to an issue of international responsibility and made the UN and its organs the primary forum of accountability for their future.

* GA Resolution 1514 (XV). UN Doc. A.RES/1514 (XV) Nine members abstained: Australia, Belgium, Dominican Republic, France, Portugal, Spain, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom and the United States.

† Principles which should guide members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73e of the Charter of the United Nations, Principle IX, Annexed to GA Resolution 1541 (XV), 15 December 1960.

‡ The Committee is also referred to as the Committee of 24 in reference to the number of members. Its full title is Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

Portugal

34. Portugal joined the UN in 1955. An amendment in 1951 to the Portuguese Constitution of 1933 abolished the Colonial Act of 1930 and incorporated the colonies as "overseas provinces". The indigenous inhabitants were not consulted about this change in their de jure status. Portugal abstained when the General Assembly adopted the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in 1960, refused to report to the UN under Chapter XI of the UN Charter, and resisted other UN initiatives including Security Council resolutions in 1963 which criticised it for non-compliance and upheld Portuguese Timor's right to self-determination. The Salazar-Caetano regimes insisted that Portugal was a "pluri-continental" state in which its peoples exercised self-determination through participation in the Portuguese political process. The Portuguese Prime Minister, Dr António de Oliveira Salazar, also believed that the global decolonisation process was being driven by Third World and communist countries intent on the disintegration of Western Europe and that the West was appeasing the majority through the UN.[17] This stalemate continued until 1974.

35. The socio-economic situation in Portuguese Timor was backward and largely stagnant during this period. Australia's consul to the territory, James Dunn, reported in 1963:

> Portuguese Timor is a poor and extremely under-developed territory. It has no secondary industries, poor mineral resources and low-level subsistence production in agriculture. Very little has been done by the Portuguese to remedy these weaknesses and there is no evidence of any genuine effort to overcome them in the foreseeable future.

36. Dunn believed the situation was so alienating that Timorese might prefer to join newly independent but impoverished Indonesia. He wrote:

> The Portuguese in Timor have little real support from the indigenous population… the majority would probably favour Indonesian rule as the alternative to the continuation of Portuguese rule.[18]

37. Some improvements occurred in the early 1970s under Governor Fernando Alves Aldeia. But the system was essentially bankrupt, leading José Ramos-Horta to comment on his return from exile in Mozambique:

> I found my beloved country much the same as I had left it (in 1970). East Timor, under the Portuguese, seemed to sit still in history. The clock of development didn't tick there.[19]

38. In November 1975 the UN described the socio-economic situation in similarly depressing terms.

> According to an official Portuguese publication, among factors hindering the development of the territory are a low per capita income, inadequate transport and energy infrastructures, lack of a commercial tradition among the indigenous population, shortages of technically qualified personnel at all levels in both the public and private sectors, lack of financial means, a trade deficit, and heavy concentration of production on a single product, namely coffee.[20]

39. The depressed condition of the people was given further currency in international circles by diplomats who visited the territory after 1975. Following a visit to the island in early 1976 by Vittorio Winspeare Guicciardi, Special Representative for Portuguese Timor of the UN Secretary-General, the Australian Government reported:

> Winspeare expressed surprise at the 'backwardness' of the limited number of people he saw in rural areas near towns and said it was hard to imagine them understanding the issues involved in an act of self-determination. He had been 'amazed' at how 'primitive' the conditions were of some people, for example, whom he saw in Enclave of Oecussi. He said he believed their lives would have been fundamentally unchanged by 500 years of Portuguese rule.[21]

40. Following the change of regime on 25 April 1974, the new Portuguese Government accepted its obligations under the UN Charter, and on 24 July 1974 annulled Article 1 of the 1933 Constitution which classified Timor-Leste as national territory, and acknowledged its right to self-determination and independence. Portugal formally communicated this radical change of policy to the UN four times between August and December 1974.[22] In its resolution adopted in 1974, the General Assembly welcomed the acceptance by Portugal "of the sacred principle of self-determination and independence and its unqualified applicability to all the peoples under Portuguese colonial domination".[23]

41. In keeping with the central tenet of this policy, viz respect for the free choice of the people, the Portuguese Governor, Colonel Mario Lemos Pires, consistently attempted to treat each of the political parties equally during 1975. He disapproved of the actions of Colonel Maggiolo Gouveia, the Portuguese Police Commander, in joining UDT at the beginning of the civil war and on two occasions declined to recognise Fretilin as the sole legitimate representative of the Timorese people – in September after Fretilin became the de facto administration and again in November after Fretilin declared independence. For the same reason, Portugal also did not recognise the four party declaration of integration with Indonesia.[24]

42. Following its admission in November that it lacked "the means to assure normalisation of the situation in Timor",[25] Portugal referred the issue to the UN to be dealt with according to UN principles and procedures. After the Indonesian invasion it cut diplomatic relations with Indonesia and appealed to the Security Council to obtain an immediate cessation of Indonesia's military intervention and a "peaceful and negotiated settlement of the conflict and of the decolonisation process under the auspices of the United Nations".[26] Though physically withdrawn from Timor, it acknowledged its duty as administering power to promote self-determination and laid this down explicitly in the Constitution.[*]

43. This principle was maintained throughout the conflict[†] and was endorsed on several occasions in the face of political pressures to the contrary. Two examples can be given. In June 1976, the Portuguese General, Morais da Silva, held secret negotiations with representatives of the Indonesian Government, General Benny Moerdani and Harry Tjan, over the release of 23 Portuguese prisoners held in Indonesia since the civil war, an issue of public concern in Portugal. In exchange for the prisoners, Morais da Silva offered the possibility of recognition by Portugal of Indonesian sovereignty in Timor. He was over-ruled by President-elect, General António Ramalho Eanes, and the incoming Prime Minister, Mario Soares, who insisted that negotiation on sovereignty was conditional on an internationally acceptable act of self-determination.[27] On another occasion, in 1987, consideration was given by both Portugal and the United Nations to observing the Indonesian general elections in Timor-Leste as a way of measuring Timorese attitudes towards integration. After a protest campaign by civil society, Portugal instead renewed its commitment to self-determination.

44. In 1991 Portugal further confirmed its commitment to the principle when it instituted proceedings against Australia in the International Court of Justice (ICJ) on the grounds that Australia's Timor Gap treaty with Indonesia infringed, inter alia, on Timor-Leste's right to self-determination. The Court ruled that it could not adjudicate the dispute, but noted that in the view of both Portugal and Australia the territory of East Timor remained a non-self-governing territory whose people had the right to self-determination.[28]

45. Portugal's decision to decolonise Timor, to maintain in principle support for self-determination and to withhold recognition of Indonesian sovereignty over 25 years were of critical importance to Timor-Leste's fate. However, despite its repeated policy commitments from 1974 on, Portugal generally failed to translate its principles into sustained practical support until late in the conflict. It mismanaged the decolonisation process in 1974 and 1975 and was generally ineffective as the "administering power" for a significant part of the Indonesian occupation.

* Article 307 of the Constitution of the Portuguese Republic, 2 April 1976, stated: "Portugal shall remain bound by its responsibility, in accordance with international law, to promote and safeguard the right to independence of Timor-Leste." On 7 July 1989, Article 293 was amended to read "to promote and safeguard the right to self-determination and independence of East Timor", Krieger, p. 36.

† Portugal's acceptance of its international obligations for Timor-Leste contrasted with its acceptance of India's takeover of Goa in 1961 and Spain's relinquishment of Western Sahara to Morocco in November 1975. Both occurred without a process of self-determination.

46. Lieutenant-Colonel Lemos Pires testified to the Commission that many factors were involved in the breakdown of the decolonisation process in 1974-75, including aggression by Indonesia and political immaturity on the part of Timor's new political parties. A key underlying factor, however, was Portugal's failure to engage the international community both before and after 1974.

47. The former governor explained that the decision to decolonise was a sudden revolutionary event that took both Portugal and Timor-Leste by surprise. Both were unprepared and ill-equipped for their respective roles and thrown into turmoil by the decision. This was due in large part to the Salazar-Caetano regime's failure to comply with its international obligations to prepare itself and its colonies for self-government in a systematic, positive way as explained above. Its neglect of its responsibilities and obstinate maintenance of the status quo in violation of UN policy frustrated legitimate decolonisation and contributed to its own downfall and to upheaval both at home and in its overseas territories. It also contributed to the view in Portugal that independence was not a viable political and economic option for Timor-Leste and that the territory should integrate with Indonesia, albeit through a process of self-determination.

48. Although its decision to decolonise was made according to international principles, Portugal declined to internationalise the process by seeking the assistance of the United Nations. In February 1975, for example, a delegation of the Portuguese Government in Timor met with the National Commission for Decolonisation in Lisbon and stressed "the urgent need to clearly define a policy [and] defended the internationalisation of the Timor issue through the UN, especially an appeal to the Third World countries as the only safeguard against Indonesian military intervention".[*] The Commission decided that an appeal to the UN to dissuade Indonesia should only be used as a last resort. Portugal opted instead to proceed to a third round of secret talks with Indonesia.[†] This refusal to engage with the United Nations, at least until after the Indonesian invasion, was a costly error. The former Governor Mario Lemos Pires told the CAVR:

> The United Nations should have been the principal player in this process… I think it would have been better for Portugal [and] for the East Timorese decolonisation process if Portugal had internationalised the problem from the moment that the need for self-determination was recognised in 1974… The Portuguese Government did not ask the United Nations to be present in the territory… I think that was a mistake.[‡]

* João Loff Barreto, The Timor Drama, 1981, pp. 25-26. In June 1975 the Commission again declined to internationalise the issue and in September, Portugal assured Indonesia it would only go to the UN as a last resort. Barreto, p. 53. Lieutenant-Colonel Lopes Pires, a military observer at meetings of the National Decolonisation Commission, wrote: "I understood this (internationalisation) to be the only course capable of avoiding what we all desired to avoid, given the systematic deterioration of the situation." Barreto, p. 63. The Australian Minister for Foreign Affairs, Don Willesee, told Parliament on 8 October 1975: "As of this moment, the Portuguese Government… has not put forward any formal proposal for UN mediation in Portuguese Timor."

† Portuguese and Indonesian officials met secretly in Lisbon on 14 October 1974, in Paris on 14 November 1974 and in London on 9 March 1975.

‡ Mario Lemos Pires, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974–1976, 15–18 December 2003. The UN followed the process and held a meeting of its Special Committee on Decolonisation in Lisbon in June 1975, but Portugal did not hand over the issue until December 1975.

49. Instead of seeking international assistance, Portugal opted to manage the process on its own with few military and financial resources, without a plan and while overwhelmed with the break-up of its African empire and conflict at home. Due to endemic political instability in Portugal, Timor suffered for want of decisive leadership at times of crisis. Government in Portugal was effectively crippled, for example, during the August UDT coup and again in November on the eve of the Indonesian invasion. Lieutenant-Colonel Lemos Pires told the Commission:

> There was not a decolonisation policy for Timor-Leste. The financial support that was given was very limited… The military forces that were allocated were minimal…[29]

50. The shortage of Portuguese troops was understandable in the context of the Movement of the Armed Forces' (Movimento das Forcas Armadas, MFA) revolution, but it left the Governor relatively helpless at the time of the civil war and left the territory more vulnerable to Indonesian aggression.[*] The hapless situation in which Portugal found itself was vividly highlighted by the Governor's retreat, first to Ataúro then to Portugal.

51. Portugal was fully aware of Indonesia's increasingly aggressive plans to integrate Timor and sought to moderate its actions through diplomatic channels. Throughout this period, however, it appeared to regard Indonesia as part of the solution rather than part of the problem. Its dealings with Indonesia until the invasion on 7 December 1975 were generally secret and co-operative, with an understanding of Indonesia's interests, including assurances that the issue would not be internationalised, and notably devoid of public criticism of Indonesian military objectives and interference in Portuguese Timor's internal affairs.

52. Foreign Minister Melo Antunes reportedly did not use the opportunity of the Rome talks with Indonesia on 1–2 November 1975 to present evidence provided by the Portuguese journalist, Adelino Gomes, that Indonesia had massed troops in West Timor and crossed into Portuguese Timor.[30] The communiqué from the meeting described the talks as "frank" but made no mention of Indonesian military activity. It focused instead on the need for talks with the Timorese political parties "aimed at ending armed strife" and safeguarding "the interests of Indonesia". In statements issued on 28 and 29 November 1975, Portugal blamed Fretilin for the situation and did not mention Indonesia by name.[31] Only after the full-scale invasion on 7 December 1975, when it was too late, did Portugal directly protest Indonesia's military actions, sever diplomatic relations and take the issue to the Security Council.

53. The former Governor, Lemos Pires, told the Commission that he believed Australia should have been more helpful to Portugal and Timor at this time. He, members of the Australian Parliament, UDT and Fretilin made repeated requests in 1975 for the Australian consulate, which was closed in 1971, to be re-opened in Dili in order to provide an international presence and direct reporting to Australia on the situation. David Scott testified to the Commission that this request was refused on six occasions by the Australian Government.[32] According to Gough Whitlam who was Australian Prime Minister at the time, "at no stage did (Portugal)… make specific proposals to Australia or other regional powers".[33]

* Portugal downsized troop levels from about 3,000 in 1974 to about 200 by mid-1975. José Ramos-Horta has written: "In my view, the troop reduction was the single most damaging error committed by the Portuguese in 1974." Funu: The Unfinished Saga of East Timor, Red Sea Press, Trenton, New Jersey, 1987, p. 48.

54. Portugal was relatively passive in the international arena during the 1970s and early 1980s. Richard Dalton, an official in the UK Mission to the UN, observed in 1976:

> Portugal remains quiet. They indicate privately that they will accept anything that is acceptable to the UN as a whole. They are not trying to get anything done.[34]

55. This lack of initiative contrasted sharply with Indonesia's diplomatic aggression and contributed to a loss of votes at the UN and a weakening of support for Timor-Leste. The Portuguese Government was sometimes slow or unresponsive to critical events in Timor-Leste. It failed, for example, to protest the Indonesian military offensive in Timor-Leste that followed the breakdown of the ceasefire in 1983. This provoked withering criticism from José Ramos-Horta:

> [Portugal's] criminal negligence and political cowardice is what have contributed in the last eight years to the erosion of the voting block in support of the right of the people of East Timor to self-determination and independence. After a brief period of one year, under the Government of Prime Minister Pinto Balsemão, during which the Portuguese Government did make some serious efforts to alert the international community to the tragedy of the people of East Timor, we are now returning to the silence and desertion that has been the attitude of the Portuguese authorities from 1974 until 1981.[35]

56. Some late but positive signs of commitment appeared in the 1980s and gathered momentum in the 1990s. In 1982, under President Ramalho Eanes, Portugal began to address the question systematically and to mobilise its foreign office and diplomats. Also in 1982, the Portuguese National Assembly created the Special Committee for the Accompaniment of the Situation in East Timor. Apart from demonstrating cross-party consensus on the issue, the Committee facilitated the internationalisation of the Timor-Leste question by Portuguese deputies in various fora, including the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation.

57. A major step forward occurred in June 1986 when Portugal joined the European Economic Commission (EEC) and the European Parliament the following year. This was Portugal's first involvement in a significant supra-state organisation. Led by President Mario Soares, and encouraged by the developing unity within the Timorese Resistance, Portugal took advantage of these opportunities to develop support amongst its European partners, particularly Ireland,* Greece and Italy. Official activity increased during the 1990s, stimulated inter alia by the public response in Portugal to the demonstrations that accompanied the visit by Pope John Paul II, the emotional impact of young Timorese praying in Portuguese during the 1991 Santa Cruz massacre and the award of the Nobel Peace Prize in 1996. In 1993, for example, Portugal was largely responsible for the adoption of a positive resolution on Timor-Leste by the UN Commission of Human Rights. In what was described by a US diplomat as "one of the most dramatic moments of this year's session", Portugal, with the help of its former colonies, gained the support of the US, Canada and Australia for the resolution. The US mission in Geneva reported:

> The passage of the East Timor resolution represents the successful culmination of a tremendous effort by the Portuguese Government, which played a very tough role in the EC-Indonesia dialogue fending off considerable pressures – including from its closest friends – to accept compromise language.[36]

58. Portugal returned to centre stage alongside Indonesia in the negotiations leading up to the 5 May 1999 Agreements. Talks between Portugal and Indonesia based on General Assembly Resolution 37/30 had made little progress since 1983, but following Kofi Annan's decision to activate the process in 1997, Portugal worked closely with the Secretary-General's Personal Representative for Timor-Leste, Jamsheed Marker, and held firm to its oft-repeated policy of self-determination. According to Ambassador Marker, Prime Minister Guterres and Foreign Minister Jaime Gama insisted that "they could not accept a solution that was not based on the freely expressed choice of the East Timorese people".[37] This was achieved through the Agreements of 5 May 1999 and the August ballot in both of which Portugal played a significant role.

59. Portugal did not formally sign off as "administering power" in Timor-Leste. After some debate in Lisbon it was decided not to make an issue of the matter lest it jeopardise or delay the sensitive negotiations preceding the 1999 act of self-determination. Instead, it was agreed that Portugal's endorsement of the juridical and internationally accepted acts that led to independence would together constitute the termination of its status as "administering power". These were the signing of the 5 May 1999 Agreements (conditional on due process being observed), support for the establishment and functioning of UNTAET as the transitional administration,[38] and recognition of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste.

60. On 8 May 2002 the General Assembly decided "to remove East Timor from the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories upon its accession to independence."[39]

* Following television footage of the Santa Cruz massacre and community activity led by the East Timor Ireland Solidarity Campaign (ETISC), which was established in Dublin in 1992, Ireland rallied to the Timor-Leste cause from the president down. The Irish Foreign Minister, David Andrews, played an active role in the EU and was appointed as the EU special envoy to Timor-Leste.

Conclusion

61. Portugal had principal responsibility to prepare and facilitate decolonisation in Timor consistent with its obligations to the United Nations and the Timorese people. Its failure under the Salazar-Caetano regimes to discharge this responsibility and prepare the Timorese for a future without Portugal was reprehensible and a violation of the right to self-determination. This also undermined the right to independence by contributing to the widely held view that an independent Timor-Leste was not economically or politically viable and could only subsist through incorporation with Indonesia.

62. Portugal's change of policy in 1974 to support self-determination was critical to the fate of Timor-Leste as was Portugal's adherence to this principle throughout the Indonesian occupation. However, Portugal failed to discharge its responsibilities to the people of Timor-Leste during the critical period 1974-75 and beyond. Although the third largest of Portugal's six territories, Timor was low on the list of Portuguese priorities. For Portugal, this period appeared to mark the end of its role rather than the active assumption of new responsibilities. The central government did not provide adequate resources to its local representatives, did not secure the territory in the face of clear external aggression, was too accommodating of Indonesia's position, and declined to internationalise the issue. The human cost of these mistakes was severe. This passivity and ambivalence continued to characterise its diplomatic activity until the mid-1980s despite its constitutional and international obligations and constant petitioning by the people of Timor-Leste and Portuguese civil society for a more credible defence of its former colony's interests.

63. Mario Lemos Pires, the last Portuguese Governor of Timor-Leste, discharged his duties in 1974 and 1975 in an honourable and principled manner in the face of extraordinary challenges. The Commission wishes to acknowledge his role during this critical time.

Indonesia

64. Indonesia received UN support in its struggle for independence from the Netherlands and joined the world body in 1950. Under President Sukarno, it was a vocal champion of decolonisation. The preamble to the 1945 Indonesian Constitution reads:

> That in reality, Independence is the right of every nation and, therefore, colonialism in this world must be abolished because it is not in conformity with humanity and justice. (Bahwa sesungguhnya Kemerdekaan itu ialah hak segala bangsa dan oleh sebab itu, maka penjajahan di atas dunia harus dihapuskan, karena tidak sesuai dengan peri-kemanusiaan dan peri-keadilan).*

* This is taken from President Soeharto's address to representatives of the Provisional Government of East Timor in response to their petition to integrate with Indonesia, 7 June 1976. Krieger, p. 48.

65. The Indonesian Government under both President Sukarno and President Soeharto officially supported the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination and disavowed any territorial claims to the colony.

66. In a series of statements to the General Assembly between 1954 and 1962 relating to the dispute over West Irian between Indonesia and the Netherlands, Indonesian officials stressed repeatedly that the national boundaries of Indonesia were those of the former Netherlands East Indies. In 1961, for example, the Indonesian Foreign Minister, Mr Subandrio, stated:

> In regard to the large island of Borneo…whose northern part is British territory, and likewise as regards one-half of the island of Timor, which is Portuguese, we have no territorial claims at all; because what we consider to be Indonesian and Indonesian territory is nothing else but the entire territory of the former colony: the Netherlands East Indies.[40]

67. In 1960 Indonesia voted in support of both the UN Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and the General Assembly resolution recognising Portuguese Timor as a non-self-governing territory. It supported subsequent UN resolutions critical of Portugal's colonial practices and its failure to comply with its obligations under the UN Charter. The deputy chief of President Sukarno's Advisory Council, Roeslan Abdulgani, told a rally held in Jakarta in 1961:

> "Fill your hearts with hatred not only for Portuguese colonialism, but for all colonialism still existing on Asian and African soil," adding that Indonesia's "eyes and heart are directed towards Portuguese Timor and Goa (which) are still under the power of colonialism."[41]

68. The Australian Government was convinced that the continuing presence of a colonial regime within the Indonesian archipelago would provoke President Sukarno to eliminate this last vestige of colonialism in his neighbourhood, and urged Portugal to develop the territory and Indonesia not to use force. However, Sukarno's interest in Timor was largely rhetorical and did not compare with his "crush Malaysia" or West Irian campaigns. During a visit to Lisbon in 1961, he reportedly told the Portuguese Prime Minister, Dr Salazar, that Indonesia respected Portuguese sovereignty in the territory.[42]

69. These policies were continued under President Soeharto (1966-98). In October 1974, during the first debate in the UN Fourth Committee since the change of regime in Portugal, the Indonesian representative stated:

> Indonesia would like to see the people of Portuguese Timor exercise their right to self-determination in an orderly and peaceful manner in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

70. He added that Indonesia was open to integration but that "such an association should be in conformity with the 1945 Constitution of Indonesia which, inter alia, laid down that Indonesia was a unitary state".[43] The Indonesian Ambassador to the United Nations, Anwar Sani, reiterated these sentiments at a meeting of the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation held in Lisbon in June 1975.

71. In reality, however, Indonesia decided before the end of 1974 that only one outcome from self-determination was acceptable. In December, the Indonesian Foreign Minister, Adam Malik, was quoted in the official Indonesian news agency Antara as saying that the Timorese had only two options: "remain under the Portuguese or combine under Indonesia". He then ruled out remaining with Portugal because that choice "besides adding to Portugal's burden, would also constitute a new form of colonialism" and stated that independence was "not realistic" because of "the backwardness and economic weakness of the population".[44]

72. A key Soeharto adviser, Harry Tjan, confirmed this decision to the Australian Government. In February 1975 he informed an Australian Embassy official that:

> A decision had been taken by the Indonesian Government that sooner or later Portuguese Timor must form part of Indonesia. This was a unanimous decision by all the leading Indonesian personalities involved, including the President. All that remained to be decided was when, and how, this should be brought about. As he had said, it would not happen in the very near future. But it would happen. The Indonesian Government would first try every conceivable means before turning to a military solution. He described this as the 'ultimate act'.[45]

73. The Australian Ambassador to Indonesia, Richard Woolcott, reiterated this in a major confidential analysis of the issue written in January 1976 for the new Australian Prime Minister, Malcolm Fraser. He wrote:

> Indonesia will not be deterred from this fundamental policy objective (of incorporation). Indonesia has held this attitude consistently since some months before I arrived at this post last March.[46]

74. This was a fateful decision. It conflicted with the Soeharto Government's public commitment to respect the freely expressed wishes of the Timorese people. It also set Indonesia on a potential collision course with the two major Timorese parties, UDT and Fretilin, both of whom advocated independence, and presented the international community with a major diplomatic challenge.

75. The implementation of this objective was entrusted to Special Operations (Operasi Khusus, Opsus), the military intelligence body which established a covert Timor project for the purpose code-named Operasi Komodo. This operation was directed by Major-General Ali Moertopo, the head of Special Operations, and Lieutenant-General Yoga Sugama, the head of Bakin (the Intelligence Coordinating Body). Its main executive was Liem Bian Kie (Moertopo's private secretary) and its principal adviser was Harry Tjan from the Centre for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), an Opsus think tank. This was not a new challenge. Special Operations, under Ali Moertopo, managed the 'Act of Free Choice' in West Irian in 1969 and successfully ensured that the process resulted in a pro-integration vote. Several other figures in the campaign to integrate Timor also had experience in the takeover of West Irian. They included President Soeharto, then a Major-General who commanded the 1962 Mandala military campaign to liberate West Irian from Dutch control, General Benny Moerdani and Colonel Dading Kalbuadi.* As it evolved, Operasi Komodo developed a number of functions, including international diplomacy (directed mainly at Portugal), intelligence, subversion and later preparation for the use of military force (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict).

76. At the end of August 1975, Indonesia hardened its position and decided on military intervention to secure integration. This followed Fretilin successes in the civil war and vague intimations by the Portuguese Minister for Inter-territorial Coordination, Dr António de Almeida Santos, that Portugal might hand over power to Fretilin. At a meeting on 5 September, President Soeharto and General Moerdani canvassed seven possibilities ranging from an invitation to Indonesia from Portugal to intervene directly, to United Nations involvement in which Indonesia would participate. The President ruled out all options except the Special Operations plan which he described as the "classical way". Under General Moerdani's command, the Special Operations plan would provide well-armed "volunteers" to back up UDT and other anti-Fretilin Timorese forces in a bid to prevent a complete Fretilin takeover of Timor.[47]

77. Indonesia, however, explained its military intervention to the United Nations in terms of its obligation to uphold Timor-Leste's right to self-determination. In a statement to the Security Council on 15 December 1975, Indonesia's representative, Anwar Sani, reiterated that Indonesia had no claim on the territory, that Timor was in a state of anarchy, and that it had intervened at the request of political parties who represented the majority of the people "to restore peaceful conditions to the Territory in order to enable the people freely and democratically to exercise its right to self-determination".[48]

78. The General Assembly and the Security Council rejected Indonesia's justification. Both bodies deplored Indonesia's military intervention, called for it to withdraw without delay, and urged Portugal as the administering power to co-operate with the United Nations "so as to enable the people of East Timor to exercise freely their right to self-determination". The Security Council also requested that a UN representative be sent to the territory, inter alia, to establish "contact with all the parties in the Territory and all States concerned in order to ensure the implementation of the present resolution".[49] The Secretary-General appointed Mr Vittorio Winspeare Guicciardi for this task.

79. Indonesia's initial response to the UN resolutions was to declare, inter alia, that Portugal had forfeited the right to carry out a decolonisation program in the territory and that a plebiscite was not necessary since self-determination had already taken place in the form of the 30 November declaration of integration with Indonesia. This position,

* An account of then Captain Moerdani's involvement in West Irian and Timor-Leste can be found in Julius Pour, Benny Moerdani: Profile of a Soldier Statesman, The Yayasan Kejuangan Panglima Besar Sudirman, Jakarta, 1993. Moerdani was responsible for the military role of Operasi Komodo. Kalbuadi was field commander of the Indonesian assault inside Portuguese Timor on 16 October 1975.

which was clearly at odds with the UN resolution and Indonesia's own commitment, was abandoned in response to Guicciardi's mission. The Indonesian-appointed Provisional Government of East Timor (PGET) told the UN envoy that "in deference to the wishes of the United Nations the first task of the (People's Representative) Council will be to ratify the decision of the people for complete integration with the Republic (of Indonesia)" and that representatives of the United Nations would be invited to observe the process.[50]

80. A four-stage programme was instituted by Indonesia in the hope that a credible process would legitimise integration in the eyes of the international community and remove the question of Timor-Leste from the UN agenda.

81. The first and most important step was to hold an act of self-determination. This took the form of a Popular Representative Assembly held in Dili on 31 May 1976 and resulted in a unanimous petition to integrate with Indonesia. This was followed by a visit to the territory on 24 June by an Indonesian Government fact-finding mission to verify that the request accurately represented the wishes of the people. Following the positive report of this mission, the Indonesian Parliament approved a bill of integration on 15 July 1976. As a fourth and final step, the statute of integration was signed into law and formally promulgated by President Soeharto on 17 July 1976.

82. In his address accepting the petition on 7 June 1976, the Indonesian President sought to justify integration in cultural and historical, rather than legal terms and as a triumph over European colonialism consistent with Indonesia's Constitution. Speaking more to the Timorese delegation than the international community, he said the petition was an "historic occasion" because it represented reunion and reintegration after generations of separation by artificial borders:

> I do not feel as though I am greeting strangers today. I feel that I am meeting my own brothers again, who were separated for…hundreds of years by the artificial barriers of the colonial Governments.[51]

83. The integration process enabled Indonesia to claim that the East Timorese people had expressed their will once and for all and that the territory was now legally and constitutionally a province of Indonesia. From this point, calls by Portugal and others for self-determination were rejected as interference in Indonesia's internal affairs. This was also the basis for Indonesian resistance to any direct involvement of East Timorese political leaders in negotiations.

84. The international community did not recognise the 1976 process. Though little was said by individual states at the time, it was generally agreed that the Assembly failed to meet the fundamental test of freedom of choice due in particular to the presence of Indonesian troops, the absence of alternative options and the doubtful representative status of participants. General Assembly resolution 31/53, adopted on 1 December 1976, rejected "the claim that East Timor has been integrated into Indonesia, inasmuch as the people of the Territory have not been able to exercise freely their right to self-determination and independence".[52] The People's Assembly did not comply with the procedures laid down in UN General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) of 15 December 1960, which emphasise that the process must be informed, free and democratic. A US Government legal adviser, George H. Aldrich, told the US Congress:

> We actually know very little about the selection process for these delegates, although the process itself took place at a time of military occupation by Indonesia during which considerable fighting was still going on.[53]

85. Alison Stokes, who represented the New Zealand Embassy in Jakarta at the event, reported that foreign observers were allowed less than two hours in Dili and the session lasted about one hour. She wrote:

> My assessment is that the People's Representative Council of East Timor, in a serious, business-like and formal way, unanimously endorsed integration with Indonesia. But for the outside observer there were two serious flaws in this act of self-determination. (A) Who were these representatives taking this decision, how had they been elected and did they indeed represent the wishes of the people of East Timor. (B) Only one option for future political status, that of integration, was ever mentioned. I was told that in Dili the district election has been on the basis of one man one vote and a journalist told me that in Baucau it had also been on that basis. Elsewhere they had been in accordance with local traditional practice of village elders making the selection.
>
> When I asked the Indonesians with us why the Popular Assembly addressed itself to only one option, that of integration, they said that the choice must be seen in the whole context of events in recent months during which the other options of links with Portugal or independence had been discarded by the East Timorese. In addition, there were disappointing aspects to the day: (A) On the plane we were given a leaflet entitled 'East Timor' put out by the PGET which inter alia stated that 'The East Timor people are fully behind the Provisional Government in the preparation for full integration of East Timor into the Republic of Indonesia…': this prejudgement struck the wrong note. (B) The Assembly's proceedings were in Portuguese and only parts were translated into English. A Timorese sitting near me provided me at my request with a running commentary in English on the proceedings but this was second best to an official translation. (C) We did not meet any members of the PGET or the Popular Assembly. There was no press conference. (D) The street carnival and cheering were over-organised and lacked spontaneity.[54]
>
> Few of the international community attended. Indonesia expressed regret that invitations to the Secretary-General, the Security Council and the Special Committee on Decolonisation were not accepted and > that only seven UN member states sent observers.* Among those invited who did not accept were Australia, Japan, the Philippines, Singapore and the US. Fretilin denounced the Assembly as unrepresentative and asserted that it represented the majority of the people.[55]

86. Despite the invalidity of the process, over 30 UN member states explicitly or implicitly recognised Timor-Leste as part of Indonesia by 1990 while at the same time acknowledging that Timor-Leste had not exercised a genuine act of self-determination. Some, such as Australia, India, Papua New Guinea and the US, recognised the incorporation through explicit public statements. Australia was alone in explicitly expressing its support for de jure recognition, a practice it abandoned in 1990s. Others confirmed their recognition by way of explanation of their vote at the UN General Assembly. These included Bangladesh, Canada, Jordan, Malaysia, Oman, the Philippines, Singapore, Sweden and Thailand. A third cluster of countries can be said to have effectively given recognition, in some cases confirming an existing endorsement, by signing treaties with Indonesia after 1976 which did not exclude Timor-Leste from the definition of 'Indonesia'. These included Austria, Brunei, Bulgaria, China, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Japan, South Korea, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Arab Emirates.†

87. Francesc Vendrell, who had worked on the Timor-Leste question within the UN Secretariat, explained to the Commission how it was possible for Indonesia to gain such diverse international backing despite its violation of due process in Timor. He told the Commission at its public hearing on Self-determination and the International Community:

> Although the immediate reaction of most countries was to condemn the annexation of East Timor, bit by bit, and fairly fast, within a couple of years most countries were no longer willing to be critical of what was happening in East Timor.[56]

88. Mr Vendrell explained that Indonesia's political and economic links with a number of key groupings influenced this pragmatic shift in attitude. Indonesia under President Soeharto had support in the West as "an anti-communist country". It also enjoyed support in ASEAN and the Islamic world, in both of which it was the largest member, and within the non-aligned movement of which it was a founding member.[57]

89. The Indonesian Government continued to defend the validity of the 1976 process against a rising international challenge to its presence in Timor-Leste, particularly in the aftermath of the Santa Cruz massacre. In 1992 the Foreign Minister, Ali Alatas, felt obliged to take Indonesia's case to the National Press Club in Washington. In a speech

* The seven states represented were: India, Iran, Malaysia, New Zealand, Nigeria, Saudi Arabia and Thailand. UN Secretariat report, Annexe 1. A/AC.109/L.1098 and Add. 1.

† A listing of States whose signing of taxation and other treaties with Indonesia could be construed as recognition of integration can be found in Krieger, pp. 291-297.

entitled "De-bunking the Myths around a Process of Decolonisation" he reiterated the oft-stated position that Indonesia had had no territorial claim to Timor-Leste and had abided by the decision of the East Timorese about their future given in a proper and fair process.[58]

90. On 21 May 1998, B.J. Habibie became the third President of Indonesia. His agenda of urgent reforms included addressing the issue of Timor-Leste which the Foreign Minister Ali Alatas had openly acknowledged was "a pebble in Indonesia's shoe", an impediment to development. The President is reported to have told colleagues:

> Why do we have this problem when we have a mountain of other problems? Do we get any oil? No. Do we get any gold? No. All we get is rocks. If the East Timorese are ungrateful after what we have done for them, why should we hang on?[59]

91. In June he announced that Indonesia would consider a "special status" for Timor-Leste, a policy change that President Soeharto had repeatedly rejected including as recently as 1997. On 27 January 1999, concerned that autonomy would inevitably lead to independence at great cost to Indonesia, President Habibie gained Cabinet approval for a clear-cut resolution of the issue through a choice between autonomy and independence. Following the Cabinet meeting, the Information Minister, Yunus Yosfiah, announced that:

> A regional autonomy plus will be awarded to East Timor. If this is not accepted by the mass in East Timor we will suggest to the new membership of the People's Consultative Assembly (MPR), formed as a result of the next elections, to release East Timor from Indonesia.*

92. On 30 August 1999 the East Timorese people freely exercised the right to self-determination under UN auspices that they had first been promised in 1960. The Indonesian military continued the policy of subversion that had characterised their approach from 1974, but their attempts at sabotage and intimidation were offset by democratic forces in the Indonesian government and civil society. The result was clear cut: 21.5% in favour of special autonomy, 78.5% against.

93. In his statement announcing the vote result, the UN Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, counselled:

> Those who voted to accept the proposed special autonomy must not consider this outcome a loss. Nor indeed should the majority consider it a victory: for there are no winners and no losers today. Rather, this moment heralds the opportunity for all East Timorese to begin to forge together a common future in what is to become an independent East Timor.[60]

* Quoted in East Timor in Transition 1998–2000: An Australian Policy Challenge, Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade, Canberra, 2001 [henceforth, East Timor in Transition, DFAT], p. 38. A number of prominent Indonesians had been calling for this policy change for some years (see section on Indonesian civil society in this part, paragraphs 500-522). After Habibie became President, people such as Adi Sasono, Dewi Fortuna Anwar and Ginanjar Kartasasmita also influenced his thinking. See Clinton Fernandes, Reluctant Saviour, Scribe Publications, Carlton North, Victoria, 2004, pp. 40-41. A recommendation in favour of self-determination from the Australian Prime Minister, John Howard, was also an important factor.

Conclusion

94. The Soeharto Government violated the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination. This was also a breach of international law and the spirit of Indonesia's Constitution, anti-colonial tradition and policies. The Indonesian military was principally responsible for this violation. The Indonesian people were not consulted or informed and bear no responsibility.

95. The Soeharto Government had a legitimate interest in the outcome of Timor's decolonisation and proper channels were available to communicate these interests, but it chose to ignore due process.

96. This violation followed a high level, secret decision taken in 1974 to integrate the then Portuguese colony into Indonesia. Publicly the Soeharto Government supported the Timorese right to a free choice between three options as provided for by UN General Assembly Resolution 1541 (XV) of 1960, and presented itself as a good international citizen. In practice it worked to engineer only one of those choices, that of integration, and to undermine and deny the right to independence that was the goal of Timor-Leste's two major political parties. It attempted to justify its takeover on the grounds of humanitarian responsibilities, regional security, self-defence, pre-colonial cultural, historical and ethnic ties, and Timor-Leste's lack of economic viability. These claims were not valid reasons to override the East Timorese people's inalienable right to self-determination and were incompatible with the 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples which Indonesia professed to uphold.

97. This process of subversion became progressively aggressive. President Soeharto made it clear to his advisers and to foreign governments that he preferred to bring about integration by political means but he did not rule out military force. He authorised the use of force in 1975 when it became clear that developments in Timor-Leste favoured independence. Although influential sections of the international community accommodated this decision, the United Nations condemned Indonesia's intervention and rejected the validity of the subsequent annexation. It continued to uphold the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination and independence despite official Indonesian claims to the contrary.

98. The Soeharto Government's military intervention and mismanagement of Timor-Leste were a disaster for the people of Timor-Leste and for Indonesia itself, including for thousands of young Indonesian soldiers and their families and loved ones. The continuing local violence caused the failure of diplomacy at the international level. It led to the very outcome – an independent Timor-Leste led by Fretilin – that Indonesia and its neighbours had sought to avoid in 1975.

99. President Habibie's decision in 1999 to free Indonesia from Timor-Leste through a UN supervised act of self-determination, and the honouring of that process by President Abdurrahman Wahid, were the actions of true statesmen that accorded with international law and helped restore Indonesia's standing in the international community.

Australia

100. Australia was not a party principal to the Timor-Leste conflict, but successive Australian Governments took a close interest in the issue and Australia was viewed as a key player by Portugal and Indonesia, and also by the East Timorese Resistance. Australia's proximity to Timor and middle power status in the region, combined with active civil society, parliamentary and media interest in Timor-Leste's situation, made involvement unavoidable despite attempts by government at various times to distance itself from the issue.

101. The major Western powers also expected Australia to play a key role. Following the Second World War, the US and Britain pressed Australia to take more responsibility for regional affairs, including Portuguese Timor after it became an international issue in 1960. Cabinet discussions in 1963 on the future of the territory made reference to "proposals by the United States Administration to the effect that Australia should take more defence and diplomatic initiative in South-East Asia, thus sharing responsibility more, rather than, as at present, limiting itself to the support of leads of the United States or Britain".[61]

102. After Portugal's decision in 1974 to decolonise the territory, Western governments looked to Canberra for intelligence and policy advice on the issue. Aware of its European neighbour's influential role, the Soeharto Government paid special attention to its relationship with Australia and kept Australian officials closely informed about Indonesia's developing position.* This included discussions on the issue between President Soeharto and Australian Prime Minister, Gough Whitlam, on two occasions in 1974 and 1975. The importance of Australia's role to both Indonesia and Western governments is well illustrated by the impact of Australia's decision to vote against Indonesia on the question at the UN General Assembly in December 1975. At the time, Harry Tjan, a key adviser on Timor-Leste to President Soeharto, angrily informed the Australian government that its vote was damaging because so many countries had looked to Australia for a lead. The Americans, he said, had already told the Indonesian

* In addition to its official communication links with Bakin (the Intelligence Coordinating Body) and the Indonesian Department of Foreign Affairs, Australia had a privileged link through Harry Tjan to the inner workings of Operasi Komodo. A communication from an embassy official in July 1975 described how much Australia valued Tjan's openness and connections: "He frequently reads to us from the actual records of secret meetings on Portuguese Timor. He has in his possession classified documents on the subject. He sometimes receives phone calls from leading personalities (Ali, Yoga) while we are in his office…Tjan respects us, and is confident in us. He speaks to us as he speaks to no one else." Document 157, Jakarta, 21 July 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor 1974–1976, Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (henceforth, DFAT), Melbourne University Press, Victoria, 2000, p. 295.

Government that Australia's voting intentions had played a large part in their own consideration of how they should vote. Indonesia had also learnt that the Nine (including Britain) had been similarly influenced by Australia. No doubt there were many others. Australia's general approach in the United Nations on this issue had been 'extremely harmful' to Indonesia.[62]

Australian policy to 1974

103. The main features of Australia's policy on the question were developed in the 1960s after Portuguese Timor was listed by the UN as a non-self-governing territory. The policy emerged not as a response to Timor's newly acknowledged right, but out of concern that Portugal and Indonesia were on a collision course over the issue and this might lead to conflict in Australia's near north. Policymakers in Canberra believed that Salazar's refusal to co-operate with the United Nations and to make even minimal concessions to Third World sentiment would provoke Sukarno to take military action against the Portuguese similar to his response to the British over the formation of Malaysia and the Dutch over West Irian. The Australian Prime Minister, R G Menzies, wrote to the Portuguese Prime Minister, Dr António de Oliveira Salazar, several times between 1961 and 1964 in a bid to head off this predicted crisis.

104. The clash did not eventuate, but in response to the prospect a number of key policy positions were developed. In one or other form, these policies and concerns, which were taken before the advent of the Soeharto Government or the establishment of Fretilin, were to characterise Australia's handling of the Timor problem throughout the conflict.

105. As formulated by the Minister for External Affairs, Garfield Barwick, they included the following:[63]

- Australia supports the principle of self-determination.*
- Timor has no future under Portugal.
- The territory is not capable of political independence.
- Australia would accept incorporation by Indonesia provided it was peaceful and in accordance with the freely expressed wishes of the Timorese people.
- Australia would oppose Indonesian military aggression in the territory and support action by the UN in response.
- Australian public opinion would not accept violence by Indonesia against Timor.
- Any Australian initiative on the issue must take into account the importance of good relations between Australia and Indonesia. The 1963 Cabinet Minutes referred to above stated:

* How self-determination might be implemented was the subject of debate in the official circles. A departmental Working Group reported: "…the Government would certainly wish cession (by Portugal) to be accompanied by some process of self-determination. Moreover, we would expect that the Indonesians themselves would want some expression of self-determination to protect them from the accusation of neo-colonialism by making deals with a colonialist power. Perhaps in theory the problem of self-determination is not insurmountable and might be overcome by a West New Guinea type of arrangement." "The Future of Portuguese Timor" in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 31.

> Cabinet indicated that (it would not) wish to take initiatives which might lead to the point where Australia came to be seen by Indonesia or other countries as a standing adversary. The objective in relations with Indonesia must be to achieve the greatest available degree of mutual understanding.[64]

106. Barwick ruled out a proposal advanced by US Assistant Secretary of State Harriman that Portugal be assisted to establish a ten-year development programme which would culminate in a Timorese act of self-determination.

107. The fate of Portuguese Timor was not an issue during the early years of the New Order. The Soeharto Government showed little interest in the territory and Australia shut down its consulate in Dili in 1971. Australia welcomed the New Order and was highly appreciative of its emphasis on stability, anti-communism, economic growth, domestic issues and positive regional relations which, in its view, contrasted sharply with the aggressive foreign policy and domestic turbulence of the Sukarno Government. Strengthening and broadening Australia's relationship with Indonesia became a priority objective. The Australian Embassy reported in 1973:

> President Soeharto…is very well disposed towards Australia…This provides a unique opportunity for Australia, with its own national interests to the forefront, to develop closer relations with a country in which we have a great stake.[65]

108. During this period, Australian officials continued to counsel in favour of the incorporation of Timor into Indonesia. In 1970, the Australian Prime Minister, William McMahon was informed:

> There is no early prospect that Indonesia would seek to take over Portuguese Timor…(but) in the long term the sensible disposal of the colony would be by incorporation in Indonesia.[66]

109. In 1973, the Australian Prime Minister, Gough Whitlam, was informed:

> The people of Portuguese Timor would probably be marginally better off under Indonesian rule than under any other conceivable dispensation (the Indonesian half of the island is better run than the Portuguese colony and its prospects as a separate entity would be poor).[67]

Australian policy, 1974–1975

110. Australian policy on Timor-Leste after the Carnation Revolution in Portugal was chiefly determined by the Australian Prime Minister, Gough Whitlam (1972-75). His Labour Government, the first after more than two decades, introduced a range of important domestic reforms, but also gave paramount importance to Australia's place in Asia and its relationship with Indonesia.

111. Mr Whitlam's policy on Timor-Leste was similar to that inherited from the Menzies Government, with one notable difference. It placed a higher priority on co-operation with Indonesia and particularly with President Soeharto himself whose replacement of Sukarno and positive attitude towards Australia were welcome new factors. Mr Whitlam decided the policy without discussion in Cabinet.[68] However, the broad thrust of the policy was shared by leaders on both sides of politics. The Secretary of the Department of Foreign Affairs, Alan Renouf, told Malaysian officials in October 1975:

> The Prime Minister (Whitlam), most of the Cabinet, as well as Mr Fraser (Leader of the Opposition) and Mr Peacock (Shadow Foreign Minister), sympathise with Indonesia's integrationist aspirations.[69]

112. Mr Whitlam discussed Timor policy face-to-face with President Soeharto on two occasions: on 5-8 September 1974 in Yogyakarta, Indonesia, and on 4 April 1975 in Townsville, Australia. President Soeharto made it clear that he gave the first meeting special status and expected to hear an authoritative statement on Timor-Leste from the Australian Prime Minister.

113. In summary, Mr Whitlam made three main points to the Indonesian President:

1. He reduced the three options available to the Timorese people under international law to one, namely incorporation into Indonesia, provided that this was freely chosen by the Timorese people. According to the official record of the meeting:

   > The Prime Minister said that he felt two things were basic to his own thinking on Portuguese Timor. First, he believed that Portuguese Timor should become part of Indonesia. Second, this should happen in accordance with the properly expressed wishes of the people of Portuguese Timor.

2. Independence was not an option. He told the President:

   > Portuguese Timor was too small to be independent. It was economically unviable. Independence would be unwelcome to Indonesia, to Australia and to other countries in the region, because an independent Portuguese Timor would inevitably become the focus of attention of others outside the region.

   He told the President that Australia would support Indonesia's position in Lisbon:

   > Our own objective in Lisbon would be to put to the Portuguese Government the view that Portuguese Timor was part of the Indonesian world.

3. He emphasised the importance of protecting bilateral relations and not alienating Australian public opinion:

> He hoped that the President would keep in mind the need for support from among the Australian public for the incorporation into Indonesia of Portuguese Timor, based on respect for democratic expression of the wishes of the people.[70]

> He repeated this point at a second meeting with the President on the same day.

114. President Soeharto expressed essentially the same position. Major-General Ali Moertopo, the head of the covert Special Operations project for Timor, told the Australian Ambassador to Portugal on 14 October 1974 that the meeting had confirmed Indonesia's commitment to integration:

> Ali said that until Mr Whitlam's visit to Djakarta, they had been undecided about Timor. However the Prime Minister's support for the idea of incorporation into Indonesia had helped them to crystallise their own thinking and they were now firmly convinced of the wisdom of this course.[71]

115. Mr Whitlam's policy formulation reversed the priorities set out in the briefing on self-determination approved by the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Senator Willesee, before the Whitlam-Soeharto meeting. This emphasised a process of self-determination open to each of the three options available rather than the outcome of the process. It also did not rule out independence on economic grounds.[72] The Foreign Minister and the Secretary of his department, Alan Renouf, shared Mr Whitlam's belief that ultimate integration with Indonesia was the best outcome, but believed that priority should be given to Timorese self-determination. In their view, this would be more acceptable to Australian public opinion and would ensure that unacceptable features of the "Act of Free Choice" in West Irian were not repeated in Timor. In November 1991, Mr Willesee acknowledged his disagreement with Mr Whitlam:

> I believed we ought not to play God, but let the Timorese decide.*

116. Mr Whitlam repeated his position at a further meeting with President Soeharto in Townsville on 4 April 1975. In reply, President Soeharto said he was aware of speculation in Australia about the possibility of an Indonesian invasion of Portuguese Timor but that "Indonesia would never contemplate such a course of action."[73]

117. Following the outbreak of the civil war in August, the Australian Ambassador to Indonesia, Mr Richard Woolcott, advised that the Prime Minister should not write another letter on Timor-Leste to President Soeharto. He wrote:

* David Jenkins, "Whitlam can't maintain outrage over East Timor", The Sydney Morning Herald, 30 November 1991. Mr Whitlam and Senator Willesee agreed on the need to prepare Timor for self-determination. In July 1975, the Foreign Minister approved an Australian aid program for Timor-Leste, but it was not implemented due to the UDT-Fretilin civil war. (Australian Senate Report, East Timor, December 2000, p. 140.)

> Soeharto will be looking to Australia for understanding of what he, after very careful consideration, decides to do rather than what he might regard as a lecture or even a friendly caution…From here I would suggest that our policies should be based on disengaging ourselves as far as possible from the Timor question; getting Australians presently there out of Timor; leave events to take their course; and if and when Indonesia does intervene act in a way which would be designed to minimize the public impact in Australia and show privately understanding to Indonesia of their problems.

118. The Ambassador suggested that the gap in Australia's Timor sea border could be more easily finalised with Indonesia than with Portugal or independent Timor-Leste and concluded:

> I know that I am recommending a pragmatic rather than a principled stand but this is what national interest and foreign policy is all about.[74]

119. Following this advice, Mr Whitlam told the Australian Parliament on 26 August 1975 that Australia was not a party principal in Portuguese Timor:

> We have no national obligations or interest in getting re-involved in colonial or postcolonial affairs in Portuguese Timor…We continue to hold that the future of the territory is a matter for resolution by Portugal and the Timorese people themselves with Indonesia also occupying an important place because of its predominant interest.[75]

120. Indonesia made known to Mr Whitlam its appreciation of his assistance and understanding:

> General Moerdani said that he, the President and others owed Mr Whitlam a great debt for the understanding he had shown of Indonesia's position and for the helpful position he had adopted. The President greatly valued this. But he also appreciated the difficulties the Government faced. If the Australian Government could not support Indonesia publicly in the months ahead, then he hoped that we would adopt the third option and keep quiet.[76]

121. Australia did not formally protest Operasi Flamboyan, the Indonesian incursion into Portuguese Timor which resulted in the deaths of five Australian-based newsmen on 16 October 1975. Mr Woolcott had advised from Jakarta:

> Although we know it is not true, the formal public position of the Indonesian Government is still that there is no Indonesian military intervention in East Timor. If the Minister (Senator Willesee) said or implied in public the Indonesian Government was lying we would invite a hurt and angry reaction.[77]

122. Mr Whitlam was replaced as Prime Minister on 11 November 1975, but his successor, Malcolm Fraser, continued the same policy line.* At Mr Fraser's request, Ambassador Woolcott met secretly with President Soeharto at his residence on 25 November 1975 to reassure him that the caretaker Australian leader placed the same high importance on Australia's relations with Indonesia and personal ties with the President as Mr Whitlam had, that he would be "seeking to build up further those relations" and would not receive José Ramos-Horta or any Fretilin representatives should they come to Australia.

123. Mr Fraser also asked the Ambassador to tell the President "that he recognizes the need for Indonesia to have an appropriate solution for the problem of Portuguese Timor". Mr Woolcott reported that the President was very pleased to know of Australia's understanding and that when he asked the Ambassador to clarify the Prime Minister's meaning, Mr Woolcott had replied:

> I would assume that by appropriate solution the Prime Minister would have in mind a solution which accommodated Indonesia's policy interests.

124. Neither the Prime Minister nor the President made any direct reference to the use of force.

> The President made no reference to direct Indonesian involvement although I assume he must be aware that I know of it.†

125. Out of office Mr Whitlam campaigned privately on behalf of Indonesia. Following a visit to Timor-Leste in 1982, on which he reported directly to President Soeharto, he was instrumental in having Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes removed as the head of the Catholic Church in Timor-Leste and later that year he appeared before the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation and petitioned it to have the question of Timor-Leste removed from the UN agenda.

126. Throughout the 1970s Australian Governments followed a policy of 'business as usual' in dealings with Indonesia, including defence co-operation. The Whitlam Government initiated a defence co-operation program with Indonesia in July 1972 worth A$20m which included provision of 16 sabre jets, training and intelligence co-operation. This was renewed in 1975 and increased by the Fraser Government. The aid was provided on the proviso that it could not be used in Timor-Leste or for internal repression.

* Malcolm Fraser was appointed caretaker Prime Minister following the dismissal of the Whitlam Government on 11 November 1975. The role of a caretaker government is essentially to maintain the ordinary process of administration without introducing any new policies. Fraser became Prime Minister after his Liberal Party won a general election in a landslide on 13 December 1975 and continued in office until 1983. His Government's pre-election Timor policy was maintained.

† Document 343, Canberra, 20 November 1975 and Document 344, Jakarta, 25 November 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, pp. 579-80. Mr Fraser told ABC TV on 12 September 2000 that he was not briefed as caretaker Prime Minister by the Department of Foreign Affairs about Indonesia's invasion plans. (Alan Ramsey, "East Timor the secret that never was", Sydney Morning Herald, 16 September 2000.)

Australian policy, 1975–1998

127. Australia's two-pronged policy created a political dilemma when Timor-Leste was debated at the UN General Assembly in response to the Indonesian invasion. Australia elected to uphold the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination, consistent with UN principles and Indonesia's own position, but tried to have references to Indonesia deleted from the resolution. This failed and the resolution adopted on 12 December 1975 deplored Indonesia's military intervention and called for the immediate withdrawal of its troops. To Indonesia's annoyance, Australia was its only neighbour to vote in support of the resolution.*

128. Australia continued to acknowledge Timor's right to self-determination and to note its disapproval of the way in which Indonesia incorporated the territory. It declined an invitation from Indonesia to attend the People's Representative Assembly in Dili on 31 May 1976 and did not recognise the assembly as a valid act of self-determination. This policy was continued throughout the conflict. In its official account of the issue, the Government states:

> Through to 30 August 1999, Australia's position was that the people of East Timor had yet to exercise their right to self-determination.[78]

129. However Australia did not uphold the right in practice. It did not support succeeding resolutions in favour of self-determination at the UN General Assembly between 1976 and 1981 and voted against the mild 1982 General Assembly Resolution which did not reaffirm the right and instituted talks under UN auspices to resolve the conflict. Australia also indirectly suppressed the right. In January 1978 Australia gave de facto recognition to Indonesian control over Timor-Leste. This was extended to de jure recognition from 14 February 1979 when Australia began negotiations with Indonesia over the seabed boundary with Timor-Leste. These policies and the programme of co-operation with Indonesia which followed, including military co-operation, had the effect of consolidating and legitimising Indonesia's sovereignty in Timor-Leste.

130. This policy of recognition, given first by the conservative Fraser Government, was continued by the Labour Government. On 17 August 1985 – Indonesia's national day – the Australian Labour Prime Minister, Bob Hawke, confirmed unequivocally that Australia recognised the sovereign authority of Indonesia in Timor-Leste and considered the people of Timor-Leste to be citizens of Indonesia. On 11 December 1989 his Foreign Minister, Senator Gareth Evans, and the Indonesian Foreign Minister, Ali Alatas, signed the Timor Gap Zone of Co-operation Treaty despite objections by Portugal that it violated the right of the Timorese people to self-determination.

* The New Zealand Embassy in Canberra had reported in October how the Australian Government planned to deal with the issue once "the invasion becomes public knowledge". They informed Wellington: "They (Indonesia) will also be told that the Australian Government has no choice but to be critical, but that the bilateral relationship with Indonesia is of primary importance. In other words 'we have to clobber you but please understand us and sit it out'. It follows that any Australian statement, both here and, if necessary, in the UN, will be cast in the mildest terms the Government feels it can get away with." 17 October 1975, in New Zealand Government East Timor Official Information Act (OIA) Material (henceforth NZ OIA Material), Volume 1.

131. The Labour Government led by Prime Minister Paul Keating from December 1991 maintained and developed the policies of the Hawke Government. Following a visit to Indonesia, Mr Keating told the Australian Parliament:

> I deliberately chose Indonesia for my first overseas visit to demonstrate that it is at the forefront of our priorities.[79]

132. He recommended that human rights abuses in Timor-Leste be addressed through long-term reconciliation.

133. Since 1975, sections of the Australian Labour Party (ALP) had been critical of the party leadership for either ignoring party policy which supported self-determination for Timor-Leste or diluting that policy. In opposition, the ALP Foreign Affairs spokesperson, Laurie Brereton, conducted a review of party policy on Timor-Leste in the context of the emergence of an indigenous democracy movement in Indonesia and other developments, including the UN-sponsored talks, Portugal's advocacy on the issue and strengthening public concern in Australia. His policy paper concluded that "no lasting solution to the conflict in East Timor is likely in the absence of negotiation through which the people of East Timor can exercise their right of self-determination".[80] The revised policy was adopted at the 1998 ALP National Conference and within the Federal Caucus. Mr Brereton used the policy to challenge the status quo policy of the Howard Government, which came to power in March 1996, at every opportunity.

Australia's policy shift

134. The political demise of President Soeharto was immediately recognised by the Australian Government as an opportunity for progress on the question of Timor-Leste but within the framework of continuing Indonesian sovereignty.

135. Following President Habibie's offer of autonomy on 9 June 1998, the Australian Foreign Minister, Alexander Downer, held talks in Jakarta on the issue and, in a sharp break with past practice, authorised direct consultations with the East Timorese. These included visits to Timor-Leste by Ambassador John McCarthy, meetings with the gaoled Resistance leader Xanana Gusmão and a call for his release, and, based on a suggestion by the UN envoy Jamsheed Marker, a survey of Timorese opinion both inside and outside Timor-Leste. Australia's Ambassador to the UN, Penny Wensley, and Ambassador McCarthy became key members of core groups established by Jamsheed Marker in New York and Jakarta to take the issue forward.

136. The survey of Timorese opinion was conducted in July–August 1998 and was instrumental in redirecting Australian policy. It covered all sides of the political debate and found that most Timorese respondents were in agreement that the status quo was not acceptable, that any solution, including autonomy, should ultimately receive the people's endorsement, either through a referendum or some other consultative process, and some international guarantee, and that Xanana Gusmão was essential to a resolution. Australia shared the results with the Indonesian Government.[81]

137. On 19 December 1998 the Australian Prime Minister, John Howard, wrote to President Habibie and emphasised the urgency of talking directly to the East Timorese to secure their support for autonomy within Indonesia. He also noted the growing support in Timor-Leste and internationally for self-determination and suggested that an act of self-determination might be held following a substantial period of autonomy, similar to the approach agreed to in New Caledonia.

138. President Habibie took offence at the suggestion that Indonesia's presence in Timor-Leste was comparable to France's colonisation of New Caledonia, but acknowledged Australia's proposal of self-determination. At a Cabinet meeting on 1 January 1999, it was agreed that Indonesia would consult the people of Timor-Leste about their future and allow them to become independent if they rejected the offer of special autonomy.

139. Prime Minister Howard's intervention was intended to promote reconciliation and to confirm Timor-Leste as part of Indonesia through the free consent of the people. The initiative had the opposite effect. It became a trigger for independence and the end of the integrationist policy which had been the central plank of Australian policy on Timor throughout the decolonisation process. The Deputy Secretary of the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade, John Dauth, told an Australian Senate Committee on 6 December 1999 that the Government only finally abandoned its declared preference for Timor-Leste to remain as an autonomous territory within Indonesia when the people of Timor-Leste voted for independence:

> We made clear always to the Indonesian government throughout the course of this year that we respected their sovereignty until such time as the processes which President Habibie put in train delivered a different outcome.[82]

140. The Australian Government and its diplomats played a leading role in promoting and backing the act of self-determination politically, financially and organisationally. Following the ballot on 30 August 1999 and the eruption of violence, Australia organised and led the Security Council mandated International Force in East Timor (Interfet) which assisted in bringing the UN process back on track and ensured that the decision of the people for independence was respected and implemented.

Conclusion

141. The people of Timor-Leste had high expectations of Australia based on its proximity, its presence during the Second World War, its relationship with Indonesia and its reputation as a good and influential international citizen.

142. These expectations were not fulfilled until 1999. Australia gave nominal support to the principle of self-determination throughout the decolonisation process, but did not uphold it for most of this period. It favoured only one option, that of integration with Indonesia, even though the weight of evidence from 1974 was that an act of self-determination would oppose integration. Mr Whitlam's comment to Foreign Affairs officers in 1974 that "I am in favour of incorporation but obeisance is to be made to self-determination" was true for each of the five Australian governments that held office during the Soeharto era.*

143. Australia made it known to Indonesia at the highest levels that it opposed the use of force in Timor-Leste but once the decision to use force was made in mid-1975 it knew and accepted it. It was quick to acknowledge the Indonesian military's occupation of Timor-Leste and to offer legitimacy through de jure recognition of Indonesian sovereignty. Apart from one occasion, Australia voted against Timor-Leste at the United Nations, was dismissive of Portugal's responsibility as administering power,† and by its stance and actions undermined international support for Timor-Leste.

144. The former Australian foreign affairs official, Dr Kenneth Chan, testified to the Commission:

> While I have sought to give a balanced account of the developments of Australian policy towards East Timor, my overall assessment of that policy during the 25 years under consideration is that it was mostly a failure. There was failure to support an underlying principle of the United Nations and of international law and justice: the right of all people to self-determination. And there was failure to work to restrain Indonesia from the path of military intervention and aggression in 1975, especially after Fretilin took control of East Timor and made its unilateral declaration of independence.‡

145. The people of Timor-Leste welcomed and benefited from Australia's strong practical support for a genuine act of self-determination in 1999.

The Security Council, its permanent members and Japan

The Security Council

146. The Security Council, based in New York, is the most powerful organ of the

* In a private conversation, Mr Whitlam told Foreign Affairs officers: "I am in favour of incorporation but obeisance is to be made to self-determination. I want it incorporated, but I do not want this done in a way which will create argument in Australia which would make people more critical of Indonesia", Document 37, Canberra, 24 September 1974, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 111.

† Australia argued before the International Court of Justice that Portugal had no status as the administering power over Timor-Leste because it had abandoned the territory in 1975, was not referred to as the administering power in General Assembly resolutions 1976, 1977 and 1978, and had maladministered the territory before 1974. Krieger, pp. 371-477.

‡ Testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination, 15–17 March 2004. Dr. Chan served in the Australian Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade from 1972 to 1993. He represented Australia at the UN from 1979–1982 where he dealt mainly with decolonisation issues. He was Administrator of the Cocos (Keeling) Islands when the people of that territory voted in 1984 to become part of Australia.

United Nations. It is charged with maintaining peace and security between nations in accordance with the UN Charter. It has 15 members. Five are permanent, namely the five countries which were victorious in the Second World War: the People's Republic of China, France, the Russian Federation (formerly the Soviet Union), the UK and the US. The other ten members are elected by the General Assembly for two-year terms.

147. Portuguese Timor was the subject of Security Council deliberations in the 1960s in which Portugal was criticised for failing to comply with its obligations under the Charter. This changed after 1974 and, in response to a request by Portugal, the Security Council convened on 15 December 1975 to debate Indonesia's intervention in the territory.

148. On 22 December 1975, the Council adopted a resolution which called on all states to respect the territorial integrity of Portuguese Timor as well as the right of its people to self-determination.[83] The resolution deplored Indonesia's military intervention and regretted that Portugal did not discharge fully its responsibilities under Chapter XI of the UN Charter. It called on Indonesia to withdraw all its forces from the territory without delay and on Portugal, as administering power, to co-operate fully with the UN to enable the people of Timor-Leste to exercise freely their right to self-determination. The resolution also called on all states and other parties to co-operate with the UN to achieve a peaceful solution to the present situation and to facilitate decolonisation and requested the Secretary-General to send a special representative to the territory as a matter of urgency to make an on-the-spot assessment and contact all parties and states to ensure implementation of the resolution.[84] The resolution was adopted unanimously.

149. The Security Council did not condemn Indonesia for aggression or the unlawful use of force. It described Indonesia's action as an "intervention" not an "invasion", limited itself to calling on Indonesia to withdraw and did not recommend or impose sanctions for its behaviour.

150. The Special Representative of the Secretary-General (SRSG), Vittorio Winspeare Guicciardi, visited Timor-Leste and the region in January. Due to Indonesian obstruction he was unable to meet Fretilin representatives and his report was inconclusive.[85]

151. Following receipt of the report, the Security Council met on 22 April 1976 and adopted a further resolution. Its contents were essentially the same as the December text, including a request for the SRSG to continue his assignment, except for two omissions: the paragraphs "deploring" Indonesia's armed intervention and "regretting" Portugal's failures were dropped.[86] It was passed 12 votes to one with two abstentions: Japan and the US.*

152. Indonesia failed to comply with both Security Council requests to withdraw its troops and no sanctions were imposed for this refusal. The request for the SRSG to return to Timor-Leste and pursue consultations with the parties concerned was not acted on by the Secretary-General, Kurt Waldheim. A British diplomat at the UN,

* One member (Benin) did not participate in the voting.

Richard Dalton, reported that José Ramos-Horta challenged the Secretary-General for failing to implement Resolution 389. Dalton wrote:

> Winspeare is under orders not to take any initiatives. He has indicated that he is available if the parties want to talk to him, but he is not making any efforts to bring them together. According to Schlittler-Silva, the Brazilian who accompanied Winspeare and who is still concerned with the subject in the Secretariat, if the Secretary-General is challenged as to why he has not followed up Resolution 389, he is quite prepared to argue that it is because none of the members of the Council has yet urged him to do so.*

153. The Security Council remained "seized of the situation" but did not return to the issue until 1999.

154. In 1982 the Secretary-General was again called on to play a direct role. General Assembly Resolution 37/30 requested Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar "to initiate consultations with all parties directly concerned, with a view to exploring avenues for achieving a comprehensive settlement of the problem…"† Under his good offices, talks between Indonesia and Portugal began in July 1983. They made little progress and the Timorese Resistance was not included as one of the "parties directly concerned". Nevertheless, the persistence of the Secretariat with what appeared to be an intractable issue was a signal in the symbolic world of diplomacy that, though dormant, the issue remained alive on the UN agenda.

155. In late 1992 the talks between Portugal and Indonesia resumed after they had been broken off by Portugal following the Santa Cruz massacre. At the same time, the experienced UN diplomat, Francesc Vendrell, became Director for South-East Asia and the Pacific and subsequently Director for Asia and the Pacific in the UN Secretariat. His involvement and the appointment of Tamrat Samuel to the Timor-Leste dossier significantly strengthened the Secretary-General's capacity between 1993 and 1999.‡

156. The two officials focused on promoting East Timorese participation in the negotiations. At their suggestion the Secretary-General obtained permission from Indonesia for a Special Envoy, Amos Wako, then Attorney-General of Kenya, to meet

* 11 June 1976, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 7.25, Secretary-General Waldheim did not rule out a West Irian style act of self-determination for East Timor. He informed Mr Luard, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs that: "He could envisage some kind of act of self-determination under UN auspices but it was not clear what form it would take. The Indonesians clearly wished the UN to legalise their Anschluss…A process similar to that employed in West Irian could be considered if the Indonesians would accept it." British FCO Record of Conversation, 15 May 1976, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 4.

† 23 November 1982, in Krieger, p. 128. Javier Perez de Cuellar engaged in separate bilateral contacts with Indonesia and Portugal from early 1982 when he became Secretary-General. He was assisted in this work by Under-Secretary-General Rafeeuddin Ahmed.

‡ Arnold Kohen describes Francesc Vendrell as "the UN official who has played the most significant role on the East Timor issue since 1975". From the Place of the Dead: Bishop Belo and the Struggle for East Timor, Lion Publishing, Oxford, 1999, p. 289.

Xanana Gusmão who was in prison and was said to have agreed to integration. Francesc Vendrell told a CAVR public hearing:

> I can now tell you that when Mr Wako and Mr Tamrat Samuel, who was also with him, went to the prison to meet Xanana, Xanana smuggled a letter addressed to the Secretary-General in which he declared and reiterated his commitment to the self-determination and the freedom of his homeland.[87]

157. Commenting on whether it was appropriate for a UN official to bear such a document, Mr Vendrell said he believed that it was his duty to ensure that the views of the Timorese found their way into the negotiations. He told the hearing:

> People might say that the team was not being neutral. However, we saw ourselves as objective. Objectivity is not the same as neutrality. The issue of East Timor went to the core of the values and principles of the United Nations and of international law and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. If you are working for the United Nations you cannot be neutral on these issues…We were working for the right of the Timorese people to exercise their right to self-determination…The two parties to the negotiation were Indonesia, the occupying power, and Portugal, the legal administering power. The people of East Timor were not represented.[88]

158. In keeping with this objective, Vendrell and Tamrat Samuel met Bishop Belo, priests and nuns in Dili in 1994 and were impressed by the degree of support for self-determination and faith in the United Nations:

> One of the most moving things was the enormous faith that everybody had in the United Nations. Tamrat and I had a feeling of responsibility that we had to do our best on behalf of a people who could only turn to the UN for support.[89]

159. The UN-sponsored ^IAll-Inclusive Intra-East Timorese Dialogue (AIIETD) resulted from this experience. Francesc Vendrell and Tamrat Samuel suggested to the Secretary-General that he ask the Foreign Ministers of Portugal and Indonesia to accept the idea of the dialogues to bring together Timorese from inside Timor-Leste and Timorese in exile:

> The idea was if they came together and they were left on their own, they might find that they had a great deal in common and might reach a joint proposal on East Timor.[90]

160. This was agreed and with the support of the Government of Austria a series of meetings was held. They did not have a political outcome, but in Franscesc Vendrell's judgment the meetings did help the Timorese who participated to realise they had more in common than what separated them.

161. On assuming his post as Secretary-General in 1997, Kofi Annan gave increased attention to the question of Timor-Leste. Coming soon after the award of the Nobel Peace Prize to José Ramos-Horta and Bishop Carlos Ximenes Belo in December 1996, his appointment of Jamsheed Marker of Pakistan as his Personal Representative for Timor-Leste further invigorated the UN's efforts. In what was an innovation by Kofi Annan, Ambassador Marker and his associates formed a "core group" of countries to work on the Timor issue. The group comprised Australia, Japan, New Zealand, the UK and the US. The officials also engaged in intense shuttle diplomacy between New York, Jakarta, Lisbon and Timor-Leste that involved consultations with all the main actors and increased in tempo after the fall of President Soeharto and the decision by President Habibie in June 1998 to grant Timor-Leste "wide-ranging autonomy".

162. Jamsheed Marker has paid the following tribute to Kofi Annan for his decision to give priority to the Timor issue within the UN:

> Thinking back on this sequence of events, I am reaffirmed in my conviction that without Kofi's initial decision to activate a negotiating process on East Timor and not only to keep it alive but to vigorously push it at all times, the United Nations would not have been in a position to seize the opportunities offered by the devolution of political events in Indonesia. In other words, we kept the ball in our possession, and ran with it as soon as we got the chance.[91]

163. The UN got its chance to run with the ball when the Habibie Government announced on 27 January 1999 a "second option" for the people of Timor-Leste: the choice between autonomy and independence. On 11 March the Secretary-General met with the Foreign Minister of Indonesia, Ali Alatas, and the Foreign Minister of Portugal, Jaime Gama, and agreed on a direct, UN-administered Popular Consultation on the "second option", then dispatched a UN assessment mission to Timor-Leste headed by Francesc Vendrell, Jamsheed Marker's deputy, throughout the negotiations.

164. In view of the violent situation prevailing in the territory, the most critical issue for the UN was security and how to ensure that the Popular Consultation was carried out peacefully and freely. At the next tripartite meeting on 22 April, the Indonesian Foreign Minister, Ali Alatas, flatly rejected UN proposals that Indonesian troops be cantoned or confined to designated areas one month before the consultation. At their summit in Bali on 27 April, President Habibie similarly rejected a proposal by the Australian Prime Minister to accept an international peacekeeping presence.

165. On 5 May 1999 a final tripartite meeting was held in New York between Kofi Annan and Foreign Ministers Alatas and Gama and three Agreements relating to the Popular Consultation were signed. Inter alia, the Agreements allowed for a direct, secret and universal ballot and the establishment of a UN mission to carry out the consultation, and entrusted security to Indonesia.[92] They were endorsed by the Security Council on 7 May 1999, the first time it had discussed the question of Timor-Leste since April 1976.[93] On 11 June, the Security Council established the UN Mission in East Timor (UNAMET). Ian Martin was appointed Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General for East Timor and head of UNAMET.*

* Ian Martin was Secretary-General of Amnesty International 1986-92. Before serving as head of UNAMET, he occupied various UN human rights positions in Haiti, Rwanda and Bosnia-Herzegovina.

166. Though historic, the Agreements received a mixed reception. On the one hand, they were a triumph of international diplomacy and, against the background of the 1969 bogus "Act of Free Choice" in West Irian and the East Timor Popular Assembly of May 1976, welcome evidence that Indonesia was democratising. On the other hand, there were grave misgivings that leaving Indonesia in charge of security was a recipe for disaster. In the weeks before the ballot, which was postponed twice on security grounds, José Ramos-Horta predicted violence and called on the international community to take preventative steps:

> The worst-case scenario – which is real – is that there is violence, that the violence is targeted at the UN, that they extract themselves and there is a catastrophic bloodbath in East Timor. They – not only the UN but countries that really matter, like Australia – must create the conditions to ensure this does not happen.[94]

167. In his testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, Ian Martin, the head of UNAMET, acknowledged that the major criticism made of the Agreements was that security was left in the hands of the Indonesian military. Though not part of the negotiations, he said:

> I have reflected a great deal on that. I share the judgement of the negotiators that no amount of pressure on President Habibie in early 1999 could have brought about acceptance of an international peacekeeping force. If so, it was right to take the risk involved in the Agreements, rather than lose the opportunity for self-determination which had been closed for 24 years, and which might not remain open after Habibie.[95]

168. In his testimony to the Commission, Ian Martin also addressed the criticism that UNAMET was allegedly biased in favour of an independence outcome to the ballot and that the violence which followed was provoked by the anger of pro-integration East Timorese at an unfair process and result. He said:

> I think this view exists exclusively within Indonesia and East Timorese pro-integration groups and has no credibility elsewhere, but it is important that it is answered. In my opinion not enough has been done to answer it in Indonesia, especially when it has been advanced at the trials before the Ad Hoc Human Rights Court in Jakarta, by the prosecution as well as the defence. TNI witnesses at those trials have gone unchallenged when they told the most blatant falsehoods, saying, for example, that UN civilian police had taken over responsibility for security in East Timor, that ballot boxes were discovered at the house of Bishop Belo, and so on.

169. Mr Martin explained:

> UNAMET was not pro-independence: it was committed only to enabling the East Timorese to exercise (their) internationally-recognised right to self-determination …The registration and polling procedures we put in place and operated were highly scrutinised by an Independent Electoral Commission, which held a public hearing of the complaints in the days after the ballot, and by a wide range of international observers. All impartial observers judged the ballot to have been fairly and efficiently conducted, despite difficult conditions and time constraints.

170. He then stated that aspects of the Popular Consultation were unfair to supporters of independence.

It was biased against the supporters of independence because the Indonesians failed to fulfil the commitments they had been given. These required that Indonesian government officials should remain neutral, and that East Timorese government officials should campaign only in their personal capacity, without use of public funds or government resources, or "recourse to pressure of office". These requirements were flagrantly violated, despite UNAMET's protests.[96]

171. The ballot was conducted relatively peacefully and was a day of subdued triumph for most East Timorese. Following the outbreak of violence, President Habibie, under intense international pressure, agreed to invite the UN to dispatch an international force to restore order. This was authorised by the Security Council on 15 September 1999.[97]

172. On 20 October 1999, Indonesia's supreme legislative body, the Indonesian People's Consultative Assembly (Majelis Permusyawaratan Rakyat, MPR), recognised the result of Timor-Leste's Popular Consultation and revoked the MPR decree of 1978 which incorporated Timor-Leste into Indonesia.* The same day, President Habibie, the man who let Timor-Leste go its own way, stepped down from the presidency to make way for Abdurrahman Wahid.

173. On 25 October 1999, the Security Council welcomed the MPR decision and established the UN Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET). The resolution was passed unanimously and empowered UNTAET to exercise all legislative and executive authority, including the administration of justice, and to assist Timor-Leste to prepare for self-government. Kofi Annan appointed Sergio Vieira de Mello of Brazil as his new Special Representative for East Timor and head of the Transitional Administration.†

* Some Indonesian legislators believe that it was for the legislature, not the President, to take decisions relating to matters of sovereignty and that in authorizing the 5 May Agreements President Habibie did not follow proper procedure.

† At the time of his appointment, Sergio Vieira de Mello was UN Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief. He had previously served as UN Assistant High Commissioner for Refugees. He was serving as SRSG in Iraq when he was tragically killed on 19 August 2003 during a bombing assault on the UN offices.

174. The passage of the Security Council resolution on 25 October 1999 marked the transfer of authority over Timor-Leste from Indonesia to the UN. (Regarding the formal end of Portugal's role, see section on Portugal in this part; paragraph 59.)

China

175. The People's Republic of China (PRC) joined the United Nations in 1971 and is one of the five permanent members of the Security Council.* Reflecting its own often humiliating colonial background, China has traditionally taken a very strong position on issues of sovereignty, self-reliance, self-determination and the rights of the Third World. China is particularly sensitive to what it regards as undue Western influence on the international system, including outside interference in a country's internal affairs in the name of humanitarian intervention and human rights, and the imposition of an overly individualistic interpretation of human rights.

176. China opposed Portuguese colonialism in Africa and planned to absorb Macau,† but was and remains firmly opposed to independence for Taiwan and Tibet.

177. Indonesia recognised the People's Republic of China in 1950 and China-Indonesia relations during the Sukarno period were generally positive. They deteriorated sharply after 1965 when Indonesia broke off diplomatic relations with China after the pro-Beijing Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) allegedly attempted a coup in Jakarta. Under President Soeharto, Indonesia imposed discriminatory restrictions on Chinese cultural and religious practices which included suppressing the use of Chinese names and the banning of Chinese texts and the teaching of Chinese in schools. The Soeharto Government's support for pro-Moscow Vietnam also rankled China.

178. The Soeharto Government worried that China might intervene in Portuguese Timor. In 1974-75 President Soeharto and his advisers repeatedly expressed concerns that an independent, left-leaning, but economically weak Timor-Leste would look to China for support. Indonesian officials agreed when the Secretary of the Australian Department of Foreign Affairs, Alan Renouf, told them in October 1974 that:

> He expected China's intentions would be of particular concern to Indonesia. He noted that there are 10,000 Chinese in Portuguese Timor and that although they were presently oriented towards Taiwan, their allegiance might be changeable.[98]

179. President Soeharto raised the issue of China on both occasions that he discussed Timor-Leste with the Australian Prime Minister, Gough Whitlam.

180. Mr Renouf and Mr Whitlam both sought to allay Indonesia's concerns. In a letter to President Soeharto, Mr Whitlam wrote:

---

* Following the Chinese communist revolution in 1949 and the emergence of the Cold War, Taiwan occupied the 'China' seat in the UN. In 1971, the UN recognised the PRC as the sole legitimate representative of China and it replaced Taiwan in the UN.

† Portugal transferred Macau to China in December 1999. It is now called the Macau Special Administrative Region (SAR) and has autonomy except in matters of foreign affairs and defence.

> We know of no evidence to support anxiety on this score. At present we have the impression that there is little interest in Portuguese Timor on the part of China or the Soviet Union, or indeed of other great powers; and our judgment is that those powers which might be tempted to meddle there would hesitate to jeopardise their relations with Indonesia.[99]

181. Diplomats in other countries and the UN agreed with this judgment and made known their views to the Soeharto Government.*

182. Fretilin included China in its international strategy to gain recognition and support, but the initiative was used by Indonesia to support its claim that the Fretilin was communist. The government-controlled press and the military newspaper Berita Yudha carried stories claiming Communist Chinese infiltration into Timor, funding of demonstrations and Maoist involvement, including talk of a secret visit by four Chinese Generals to Timor-Leste via Australia. The President of UDT, Francisco Lopes da Cruz, claimed in April 1975 that UDT's "agents in Indonesia and Taiwan" had confirmed China's links with Timor.†

183. The PRC was the only significant country in Asia to support Fretilin and the only permanent member of the Security Council to recognise the unilateral declaration of independence and the establishment of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste in November 1975. China supported the two UN Security Council resolutions adopted in response to the Indonesian invasion and strongly condemned Indonesia's actions. China's representative, Huang Hua, told the Security Council in December 1975:

> The Indonesian Government's naked aggression against the Democratic Republic of East Timor has fully revealed its wild ambition to exterminate the patriotic forces of the people of East Timor, strangle the new-born Democratic Republic of East Timor and thus realize its long-premeditated scheme of annexing East Timor. The above acts of the Indonesian Government constitute a gross violation of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations. The Chinese delegation cannot but express indignation at this and condemns it."[100]

184. China's recognition of the RDTL meant that it accepted that Fretilin's unilateral declaration of independence was an act of self-determination. This did not prevent it, however, from giving its support, with one exception, to General Assembly resolutions on Timor-Leste between 1975 and 1982.

* The Chinese Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs, Trusteeship and Decolonisation in the UN, Tang Ming-Chao, told Mr Whitlam during a visit to Canberra in September 1975 that although he was an international civil servant, he could confirm "that China had no interest in Portuguese Timor". Document 227, Canberra, 12 September 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, pp. 406-408.

† Document 131, Jakarta, 12 May 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 259. James Dunn dismisses these stories from November 1974 as propaganda. He is particularly critical of the "outright lies" circulated by Francisco Lopes da Cruz in September 1975 such as, for example, his claim that 20 North Vietnamese "military trainers" had been instructing Fretilin soldiers. James Dunn, East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, Longueville Books, 2003, pp. 72, 183.

185. China also provided practical assistance to Fretilin. José Ramos-Horta has written:

> While Moscow kept Fretilin at arm's length, Beijing extended lavish hospitality and active diplomatic support. I personally visited the People's Republic of China early in 1976, as did other Fretilin representatives. China provided us with strong words of support at the United Nations, as well as financial contributions.[101]

186. This did not include military assistance, although Fretilin requested it through its Minister of Defence, Rogério Lobato, who visited China soon after the Indonesian invasion and met with General Ch'en His-lien, a senior commander in the People's Liberation Army (PLA), and visited a PLA unit. The Australian Ambassador to China, Stephen Fitzgerald, was asked by Canberra to verify claims of military assistance with Chinese officials and concluded that:

> The present Chinese stand seems dictated by the moral imperative that Indonesia should be condemned for open aggression, where previously China had no wish or intention of becoming involved. Once the Indonesian invasion forced them, reluctantly, to take a stand and issue statements, Fretilin was apparently the indigenous party most easily identified with, as it allowed consistency with their own policies.*

187. Ambassador Fitzgerald believed that China had not ruled out military assistance at that point, but decided that the remarks of the Chinese Foreign Minister, Ch'iao Kuan-hua, at the welcoming banquet on 29 December 1975 that "the East Timorese people…would surely win the final victory on national independence so long as they persevere in self-reliance and hard struggle" meant "no".

188. The British Government believed that China's strong language in the Security Council should not be taken at face value. In a cable to London on 2 January 1976, the British Ambassador to Indonesia, John Ford, wrote:

> Apropos the Fretilin delegation's visit to Peking and the Chinese ostensible support of Fretilin, the Chinese had apparently commented to the effect that too much notice should not be paid to their support of Fretilin: there were occasions when cannons need to be fired even if only paper balls were shot.[102]

189. In July 1976, China gave the Australian Prime Minister, Malcolm Fraser, an assurance that it would not interfere in Indonesia's internal affairs.[103]

---

* Document 396, Peking, 7 January 1976, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, pp. 663-64. This understanding of China's position is confirmed by the SRSG Winspeare Guicciardi who said that before he left New York for his visit to Timor-Leste and the region in January 1976 he had been told by Tang Ming-Chao, the Under-Secretary-General for Decolonisation, that as far as China was concerned "Winspeare's mission would have value only insofar as he told the Indonesians to 'scram'." Report by Australian Government official, 10 February 1976. Documents, op.cit. p. 705.

190. Indonesia benefited from the relationship with China though it denounced Fretilin for seeking the same thing. China's support for Timor-Leste weakened during the 1980s due to gradually improving relations with Indonesia and a sense that independence was a lost cause. Indonesia reduced its pro-Vietnam position and China adopted a more neutral stance on Timor-Leste. In 1985, Indonesia relaxed restrictions on trade relations with China which resulted in spectacular financial flows to its benefit and increased bilateral exchanges. In August 1990 the two countries normalised relations and, as evidence of the dramatically improved relations, President Soeharto made a state visit to Beijing in 1991. To accommodate objections from nationalist and military quarters, the Soeharto Government obtained agreements from China that it would not provide aid for subversive activities or interfere in Indonesia's internal affairs.

191. China supported Security Council Resolutions in 1999 that authorised the UN administered act of self-determination. In line with its in-principle opposition to intervention on humanitarian and human rights grounds, China rallied the Asian bloc in support of Indonesia in 1999 to oppose an inquiry by the UN Human Rights Commission into violations committed in Timor that year. This was unsuccessful. China succeeded, however, in eliminating some references to human rights investigations before allowing the Security Council to authorise the Interfet intervention in September 1999.

France

192. France is a founding member of the United Nations, a permanent member of the Security Council and a major donor to the organisation's budget. The French Government is committed to co-ordinating its foreign policy with the purposes and principles of the UN which have much in common with France's republican tradition.

193. France did not support decolonisation initiatives taken by the UN in the 1960s. It abstained from supporting both the historic Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples on 14 December 1960 and its related principles for reporting on colonies. During the same period, France joined Portugal in opposing the listing of Timor by the General Assembly as a non-self-governing territory.

194. The French Government supported Security Council Resolution 384 which was adopted unanimously on 22 December 1975 in response to the Indonesian invasion of Timor-Leste. France upheld the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination and independence and called on Indonesia to withdraw its troops, but took a conciliatory approach to the issue. Speaking in the Security Council debate on 18 December, the French representative, M LeCompt, urged co-operation rather than laying blame:

> The mission of the Council in this case is not to lay blame, and even less to attribute it to a single one of the parties involved. We know that historic situations are rarely simple enough for good and evil to be discerned from a single vantage point. Timor is no exception to that rule.[104]

195. France also voted in favour of the second Security Council resolution, adopted on 22 April 1976. It again upheld the right to self-determination and independence, but regretted that the resolution did not include recommendations from Japan to recognise Indonesia's goodwill and undertaking to withdraw its troops. In an ambiguous statement of explanation, the French representative, M Travert, told the Council:

> Rather than dwelling on the past and apportioning blame here or there, it is to the future that we must now look. The future of East Timor must be characterised by national reconciliation, subject to a total cessation of hostilities and to a coming together of the various parties, whose divergencies seem to us less fundamental than their common aspiration, namely, the accession of the people of Timor to well-being and independence.[105]

196. In keeping with this position, France abstained from supporting the first General Assembly Resolution adopted following the Indonesian invasion because the resolution was not even-handed and put all the blame on Indonesia.[106] The French Government abstained on all subsequent General Assembly resolutions stating that the resolutions "ignored the reality of the situation in Timor-Leste".[107] In 1979, the Giscard d'Estaing Government signed a tax treaty with Indonesia. In the view of the Australian Government this implied de jure recognition of Indonesian sovereignty over Timor-Leste because the treaty was signed after the 1976 annexation and contained a clause defining Indonesia as the territory determined by Indonesian law.[108]

197. Military equipment supplied to Indonesia by the Giscard d'Estaing Government was employed in Timor-Leste, including tanks and Puma and Allouette helicopters. The Puma helicopters were produced in Indonesia in 1979. More Allouettes were supplied by France in 1982. The Timorese Resistance claimed this equipment was used in battle. José Ramos-Horta wrote:

> The Allouette is Fretilin's major fear. Its versatility and speed allows it to operate effectively in jungle and mountain areas to chase retreating guerrilla forces or flush them out of their bases.[109]

198. The New Zealand Embassy in Jakarta confirmed in January 1978 the presence of Puma and Allouette helicopters in Dili but believed these were not armed.

> The Army and Air Force are currently operating about ten light helicopters (BO-105, Puma and Allouette), which are based at Dili. From what we saw they are used for reconnaissance and limited evacuation only. None appeared to be fitted for use as gunships.*

* Report by Ambassador Roger Peren and Col MacFarlane, Defence Attaché, 13 January 1978. New Zealand Documents on East Timor, Vol. 1. MacFarlane was the first Western defence attaché permitted to visit Timor-Leste after the invasion.

199. The East Timorese Resistance and French civil society organisations hoped that France would support Timor-Leste at the UN after Francois Mitterrand became the country's first socialist president in 1981. In opposition, the socialists had vigorously criticised the silence of the conservative Giscard d'Estaing Government (1974-81) on the issue as morally unacceptable and Mitterrand had referred to the "abandoned Timorese people, victims of forces that would wipe them out".[110] Mitterrand was president from 1981 to 1995 and, under the French Constitution, had a major role in shaping foreign policy. In December 1981, he told Portuguese television that the East Timorese were undergoing "an extremely harsh repression…that it was unacceptable for the strong to crush the weak and undertake physical eliminations which could end up wiping out a people" and that "if the UN did not take the initiative to defend Timorese rights, France would take on this duty."[111]

200. In practice, France under Mitterrand continued the policy of the previous government and even abstained from supporting the mildly worded 1982 General Assembly Resolution which only called for the Secretary-General to try and find a solution through dialogue. In 1983 the French Government formally notified Portugal that it would oppose a vote that year if the issue came up.[112] Answering a question on human rights in Timor-Leste in 1986, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Roland Dumas, said that information on the issue was fragmentary and contradictory and that in 1982 most East Timorese had voted for the Soeharto Golkar party. France made a brief reference to Timor-Leste in the debate on self-determination at the UN Human Rights Commission in February 1987. East Timorese activists sought asylum in the French Embassy in Jakarta three times in 1995-96; their requests to leave for Portugal were respected.

201. France was a major donor to Indonesia during the Soeharto period. In 1991 it ranked as the second largest bilateral donor and maintained its support during the Asian economic crisis from 1997 on. Contrary to some expectations, France increased its military co-operation with Indonesia under President Francois Mitterrand. Indonesian purchases in the 1990s included cannons and amphibious scout vehicles. From 1994, driven by an aggressive government-business strategy, French sales to Asia eclipsed traditional markets such as the Middle East for the first time and the Thompson group of companies, for example, supplied a range of military and communications material to Indonesia. Co-operation also included exchanges of military personnel. In 1997, France awarded B.J. Habibie a medal for his role in promoting French-Indonesian relations and industrial development in Indonesia.

202. France intervened on the question of Timor-Leste for the first time in 1999. Under President Jacques Chirac, France supported the self-determination process in keeping with its previous policy statements and was one of 22 nations that contributed to the International Force for East Timor (Interfet), particularly enhancing its aerial and maritime capability.

Russia (USSR)

203. The former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR)* was a self-professed friend of colonial peoples, superpower and permanent member of the Security Council. Indonesia and the West feared it might intervene in Timor-Leste and monitored its activity closely. In reality, it played a minor role and, like other powers, took a pragmatic approach based on its strategic interests in Indonesia.

204. Following the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, the Soviet Union promoted itself as the champion of colonial peoples and revolutionary movements. This activity increased after the Second World War and the collapse of European empires and peaked in the 1970s with, inter alia, Soviet intervention in Angola in 1975, the Ogaden War (1976-78)† and the ill-fated invasion of Afghanistan (1979-89).

205. In 1960 the USSR proposed and drafted the original text of the historic UN Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The text was substantially modified, but the initiative was an important contribution to decolonisation, including for Timor-Leste. The USSR supported the two Security Council Resolutions on Timor-Leste adopted in response to the Indonesian invasion and all General Assembly Resolutions on the question between 1975 and 1982.

206. Soviet interest in Timor-Leste was not as strong as this voting pattern suggests or some anticipated. In the highly-charged context of the Cold War, and following the fall of Vietnam to the Viet Cong, fears were held in many quarters, including Indonesia and Timor-Leste, that the Soviets might intervene and establish an "Asian Cuba" in Timor-Leste, possibly even with Soviet-supplied missiles targeting Jakarta. The UN envoy Jamsheed Marker has referred to a "persistent view" that Washington pushed Soeharto to intervene in Timor to pre-empt such a possibility. According to this scenario, observes Marker, "the acquisition of Dili would supplement the existing Soviet facilities in Cam Ranh Bay and provide Moscow with a significant strategic naval presence in the region".‡

207. The Commission has not been able to access Russian archives, so it is difficult to determine the truth of these dramatic, but important, beliefs.§ Available evidence strongly suggests, however, that these claims were often politically motivated on the Indonesian side and had no basis in reality because the Soviet Union was more interested in its relationship with Indonesia than Timor-Leste's fate.

* The USSR dissolved in 1991 when 15 of its members became independent. It is now known as the Russian Federation or Russia.

† Somalia and Ethiopia fought this war for control of the Ogaden region of Ethiopia. The USSR initially backed Somalia then switched its support to Ethiopia.

‡ Jamsheed Marker, East Timor: A Memoir of the Negotiations for Independence, McFarland & Company, Inc., London, 2003, p. 9. The USSR provided military assistance to North Vietnam in its war with South Vietnam and the US, and after North Vietnam's victory in 1975 became Vietnam's largest donor of military and economic aid. Based on a treaty in 1978, Vietnam granted the Soviet Union access to facilities in Da Nang and Cam Ranh Bay thereby significantly increasing Soviet naval presence in the region which until then had been limited to the Soviet Far East.

§ One possible source of documentation is the Storage Centre for Contemporary Documentation (TKhSD) in Moscow.

208. Governments well disposed to Indonesia rejected the claims. In a report on 8 October 1975, the New Zealand defence attaché in Jakarta, Colonel AG Armstrong wrote:

> The Indonesians have claimed on a number of occasions that Fretilin is receiving outside help but they have been able to produce no hard evidence of this.

209. His report refers to an Indonesian navy (TNI-AL) claim to have located "a Red Chinese submarine cruising off Dili" and that its identity as a Russian-built submarine then used by China was confirmed from the "signature" of its motors. The Colonel reported that his informant doubted that the Indonesian navy was "capable of identifying the class of submarine from its engine noise" and that the alleged make of the vessel post-dated the Sino-Soviet split. He concluded:

> A submarine may well have been sighted, but its positive identification as Chinese, Russian or otherwise must be discounted.[113]

210. Australian officials were also sceptical about alleged communist designs on Timor-Leste. The Australian Prime Minister, Gough Whitlam, personally told President Soeharto on several occasions that there was no basis to such claims. The Department of Foreign Affairs correctly predicted in November 1974 that the Soviet Union would not "have any ambitions there, for the…reason that this could damage what must be assessed by Moscow as a more important relationship with Indonesia."[114]

211. The Soviet attitude towards Timor-Leste is well illustrated by the following episode recounted by the Australian Ambassador to Indonesia, Richard Woolcott:

> I recall asking the Soviet ambassador how the Soviet Union would react if Indonesia moved to incorporate East Timor. We went through a revealing charade. Taking me over to the map of Indonesia on his office wall, he said: "Where is East Timor?" Playing my part, I pointed to it on the map. "It is very small and surrounded by Indonesia, isn't it?" he said, and then changed the subject.[115]

212. Mr Woolcott commented that the episode revealed an ugly aspect of great power attitudes and noted that the USSR acquiesced in India's invasion of Goa in 1961.

213. Statements at the UN by Soviet representatives supported the East Timorese right to self-determination but were worded in general terms and refrained from direct criticism of Indonesia.[116] José Ramos-Horta reported that Soviet diplomats gave little encouragement to the Fretilin delegation:

> Unlike the hospitable Chinese, the Russians never invited our delegation to their Mission for a meeting, let alone a meal.[117]

214. Writing in February 1976, the British Ambassador to Indonesia, John Ford, commented about the Russian attitude:

> This has been notably pianissimo and I have the impression that the Russians decided from the very beginning that the Indonesians would get away with their action and were not going to risk their growing influence in Indonesia. Had they led the pack against Indonesia they might well have found themselves booted out and their magnificent new Embassy premises a white elephant.[118]

215. Moscow turned down repeated requests by Fretilin representatives to visit the USSR. They did not grant a visa until 1985, ten years after the invasion, and then only to take part in a cultural event.

216. The USSR and Indonesia established diplomatic relations in 1953. The Soviet Union backed Indonesia in the dispute over West Irian and from 1960 Indonesia was the largest non-communist recipient of Soviet bloc military aid. The relationship survived the suppression of the political left by the Soeharto forces in 1965 and, though ideological opposites, both sides saw mutual advantage in its continuation. The Soviet Union particularly valued the strategic utility of the relationship and worked to ensure it diminished the influence of the US and China in South-East Asia. In its cold war with the US, Moscow appreciated that Indonesia, unlike South Korea and the Philippines, did not host US military bases and allowed Soviet nuclear submarines passage through its archipelago. The relationship also served to counter-balance China's growing regional influence which threatened the interests of both countries in different ways.

217. Apart from keeping its support for self-determination pianissimo, the Soviet Union reportedly softened its position on Timor-Leste further in 1979 in return for Indonesia's support for the replacement of the pro-China Khmer Rouge by the pro-Soviet Heng Samrin Government as Cambodia's representative at the UN. It is also claimed that the Soeharto Government made the repayment of some US$2bn from the Sukarno period conditional on Soviet acceptance of Indonesian sovereignty in Timor.[119]

218. Soviet foreign policy changed direction when Mikhail Gorbachev became President in March 1985. He emphasised conflict resolution through negotiation rather than force, which should have favoured Timor-Leste, but Timor's remoteness from the USSR's focus and Indonesia's importance worked against this. President Soeharto visited Moscow in September 1989 and Indonesia relaxed restrictions on Soviet trade and visits resulting in improved economic ties.

219. The break-up of the Soviet Union in 1991 and liberation of the "captive nations" was a source of great inspiration to the East Timorese Resistance. The boost to morale derived not from a wish to see Indonesia similarly disintegrate but because it demonstrated that the status quo was not immutable even where a superpower was involved. This was immensely empowering for Timorese who had been subjected to relentless indoctrination from all sides that the cause of self-determination for a small people was futile.* In speeches at the time emphasising that nothing is irreversible, José

* Indonesia claimed in a publication in 1980 that: "There is no power in this world which is capable of dividing the people of East Timor from Indonesia." in The Province of East Timor: Development in Progress, Department of Information, Republic of Indonesia 1980, p. 8.

Ramos-Horta often told the story of the Soviet cosmonaut whose return to earth had to be delayed because the landing site designated by mission control was no longer part of the Soviet Union.

220. Russia's support for the UN administered Popular Consultation in 1999 and for Interfet was critical in view of its veto powers in the Security Council. This support was given making it possible for Timor-Leste to exercise the right of self-determination that the former Soviet Union had championed several decades before.

United Kingdom

221. The United Kingdom is a permanent member of the UN Security Council and a close ally of both Portugal and Indonesia based on a long history of relationships with both peoples dating back several hundreds of years. However, successive British Governments took only a limited interest in the question of Timor-Leste during most of the territory's nearly 40-year history of decolonisation.

222. Britain has a 600-year old alliance with Portugal and did not actively challenge the Salazar regime's failure to develop or decolonise Portuguese Timor in accordance with the UN Charter. It abstained when the UN General Assembly adopted the Declaration on Decolonisation and classified Timor as a non-self-governing territory in 1960. It also abstained in 1964 when the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation criticised Portugal for failing to implement General Assembly and Security Council resolutions from the previous three years.[120]

223. Following Portugal's decision to decolonise in 1974, British Embassy officials in Jakarta reported on developments to the government in London. An embassy official visited the territory in July 1975 and based on his report, the British Ambassador, John Archibald Ford, made the following recommendations to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) in London:

> Even without Soviet or Chinese intervention the territory seems likely to become steadily more of a problem child, and the arguments in favour of its integration into Indonesia are all the stronger…Certainly as seen from here it is in Britain's interest that Indonesia should absorb the territory as soon as and as unobtrusively as possible: and that if it comes to the crunch and there is a row in the United Nations, we should keep our heads down and avoid siding against the Indonesian Government.[*]

224. The Australian Embassy confirmed the British approach. In a secret letter to Canberra on 21 July 1975, an official wrote:

* 21 July 1975. Quoted by Australian Ambassador, Richard Woolcott. Brian Toohey and Marian Wilkinson, The Book of Leaks, Angus and Robertson, London, 1987, p. 176. Ford was Britain's Ambassador to Indonesia 1975-78.

> The British Embassy's views are…interesting…They know what is inevitable, and they attach a higher importance to their long term interests in Indonesia. They want to stand at a comfortable distance. [121]

225. Australia confirmed to the British Government in October 1975 that President Soeharto had decided on military intervention. Ambassador Ford reported this to London:

> Australian Embassy have now confirmed (but have asked us not to play this back to them in Canberra or to tell others) that President Soeharto has authorised the stepping up of clandestine operations (including the use of ships and aircraft)…The aim is a total encirclement of Dili by 15 November.[122]

226. His cable concluded with a further recommendation of non-involvement:

> The American Ambassador said at Sir Michael Palliser's dinner on 21 October that Timor was high on Kissinger's list of places where the US do not want to comment or get involved. I am sure we should continue to follow the American example.[123]

227. His recommendation was adopted by the Labour Government's Foreign Secretary, James Callaghan.*

228. The British Government took no action on the deaths in Balibó on 16 October 1975 of Nine Network television reporter Malcolm Rennie and cameraman Brian Peters, both of whom were British subjects.[124] Ambassador Ford informed London on 24 October that:

> We understand that the newsmen were killed, almost certainly inadvertently, in the course of an attack by Indonesian/UDT forces and that their bodies were immediately disposed of by the local commander, probably by burning…Since no protests will produce the journalists' bodies I think we should ourselves avoid representations to the Indonesians about them. They were in the war zone of their own choice.[125]

229. Britain's policy in the event of an Indonesian takeover of Portuguese Timor by force was reported to Canberra by the Australian High Commission in London:

> Male (Deputy Under-Secretary, FCO) said today, that if Indonesia were to take over Timor by force, the British Government would wish to resist pressures which would inevitably and quickly build up here not only for oral condemnation of Indonesia but also for practical measures such as cutting off aid. To help contain such pressures, a British Government > statement would quickly be issued at the time (a) drawing attention to Indonesia's long and remarkable display of patience and forbearance, (b) disclaiming any notion that Timor was even in a marginal sense Britain's problem, and (c) observing that those countries in the region who did have real reason to be interested in Timor were not too concerned by developments.[126]

* Callaghan was foreign secretary from 1975-76, then prime minister from 1976-79.

230. Britain's decision to keep "our heads down" was largely dictated by the importance it attached to its long-standing commercial interests in Indonesia. These date back to the 17th and 18th centuries when the English East India Company competed with the Dutch East India Company for control of the spice trade in the archipelago. In the early 20th century, British investments in the Netherlands Indies were second only to the Dutch. Britain headed the Allied Command in the region during the Second World War, restored the Dutch colonial government in Java, then helped mediate a settlement between the Netherlands and the Indonesian republican forces before independence. Relations deteriorated in the early 1960s when Sukarno challenged British plans for Singapore and Malaysia. Soeharto quickly ended Sukarno's policy of konfrontasi, and economic relations revived under Soeharto who hosted a visit by Queen Elizabeth II in 1974. Deregulation in the 1980s led to the entry of many of Britain's biggest companies and Britain again became Indonesia's second largest investor.[127]

231. Ambassador Ford advised his Government in London of his view that Indonesia's actions were justified on security grounds. In a confidential memo after the invasion, he wrote:

> My guess is that had the Indonesians allowed Fretilin to establish a hostile government in East Timor and make East Timor a home for dissidents from the Maluccas (sic) and outer islands, this would have been much more costly. I suspect that the Indonesians have in fact bought security at a not unreasonable price though they could have had it cheaper had they been more efficient.[128]

232. In February 1976, the Foreign Office recommended against the British Minister, Lord Goronwy-Roberts, meeting José Ramos-Horta:

> It has been the policy of HMG to avoid becoming involved in the Timor issue as far as possible. Our role at the UN has been devoted primarily to restating our support for the principle of self-determination. We decided in late November not to grant recognition to Fretilin's UDI. To receive a call by Mr Ramos-Horta (a) would imply a greater degree of British interest in the problem than we have; (b) would give a degree of recognition to Fretilin's "government" that we have not in the past been prepared to bestow; (c) would almost certainly damage our relations with Indonesia, relations which in any case are inevitably slightly strained as a result of our support for the recent UN Security Council resolution.[129]

233. At the same time British representatives were supporting aspects of Indonesia's campaign by meeting with and advising Indonesian officials on the management of the issue. Ambassador Ford reported in January 1976:

> I told them (Indonesian officials) that we had tried to do our best for Indonesia in the UN and that I thought that we had successfully managed to keep the heat out of the Timor business in New York.[130]

234. The cable goes on to report the Ambassador's advice on how to handle reports of atrocities emanating from the Indonesian invasion. Other cables were critical of Indonesia's ineptitude and bungling, not from concern for Timor, but because incompetence made it more difficult for Britain and others to defend Indonesia.

235. Based on its low-profile policy, the British Government abstained on all General Assembly resolutions on the question of Timor-Leste between 1975 and 1982. It supported UN Security Council Resolutions 384 (1975) and 389 (1976) which recognised Timor-Leste's right of self-determination and called on Indonesia to withdraw its troops. On 22 April 1976 the British representative, Mr Murray, informed the Security Council that Britain had voted for Resolution 389 "because of the great importance we attach to the principle of self-determination."[131] He also stated that Britain did not accept that an act of self-determination had taken place in Timor-Leste because three essential requirements had not been satisfied: peace and order, absence of pressure from outside forces, and appropriate procedures.

236. In line with this policy, Britain did not endorse the Indonesian-organised "act of self-determination" conducted by the People's Representative Assembly in Dili on 31 May 1976. The prospect of being invited to Dili for the occasion caused considerable consternation among Western diplomats in Jakarta who were reluctant to endorse what they knew was a spurious process. A Foreign Office official wrote:

> The Indonesian aim is clearly to acquire a veneer of respectability for a speedy takeover of East Timor by associating distinguished foreigners with the "act of choice".[132]

237. To avoid upsetting the Indonesian Government, Ambassador Ford elected to inform officials that he had another engagement that day. When the Indonesian Government sent another invitation requesting his participation in a mission to verify popular support for the integration petition, the British Foreign Secretary, Anthony Crosland, added another reason for ruling out any association with the process:

> For reasons connected with our interests in the Falkland Islands, Belize and Gibraltar, we attach importance to maintaining the principle of UN involvement in self-determination exercises. We are strongly inclined, therefore, to instruct you to decline the invitation.[133]

238. The British Government reiterated its recognition of Timor-Leste's right to self-determination on a number of occasions. In a statement to the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly in 1982, the British representative confirmed his government's support for the principle and went on to say that Portugal and Indonesia "alone could settle the problem" and that Britain, as a friend of both, hoped this could be done in accord with the wishes of the East Timorese people.[134] In 1992 the Government repeated the commitment in the context of the UN Secretary-General's search for a settlement. Baroness Trumpington told the House of Lords on 16 July 1992:

> The United Kingdom has not recognised the annexation of East Timor, nor has the Community. The United States, Canada and Australia have recognised it. We firmly believe that East Timor's future is best addressed through bilateral contacts between those directly involved – Portugal and Indonesia. The UN Secretary-General's efforts to bring them together with a view to reaching a settlement deserve and receive our support.[135]

239. This policy allowed the British Government to separate the Timor issue from its bilateral relationship with Indonesia while leaving open the possibility of self-determination should the opportunity arise. Britain maintained a significant aid and military co-operation programme with Indonesia during Indonesia's occupation of Timor-Leste. The Government expressed concern over human rights abuses in Timor-Leste, including at the time of the Santa Cruz massacre in 1991, but argued that dialogue would achieve more than "facile gestures, such as cutting off aid."[136] Calls to have the human rights situation in Indonesia and Timor-Leste included on the agenda of the aid consortium, the Inter-Governmental Group on Indonesia (IGGI), were rejected.

240. Indonesia has only a small arms industry and has been obliged to import most of its military equipment. Britain became a major arms supplier during the occupation of Timor-Leste and in the period 1994–2004 most of Indonesia's military equipment came from Britain.[137] Much of this trade was conducted after the international arms race associated with the Cold War had ended. The British Government approved export licences for British companies to sell a range of equipment to Indonesia, including combat aircraft and vessels, armoured vehicles, large and small calibre guns, ammunition, bombs, rockets, missiles, riot control agents and equipment for military training. Senior Indonesian military officials were also given training in British military establishments.

241. The British Government defended military co-operation with Indonesia. Baroness Trumpington of Sandwich told the House of Lords in 1992 that Indonesia had a right to protect its independence, that military training by Britain improved respect for democracy and human rights, and that applications for export licences were rejected if the military equipment in question was likely to be used for repression. She stated:

> We do not believe that British military equipment sold in the past to Indonesia has been used against the East Timorese.[138]

242. The military attaché at the Indonesian Embassy in London admitted in 1999 that British made Saracen and Saladin armoured vehicles were deployed in Timor-Leste.* The Timorese resistance claimed that Indonesian forces also used British-supplied Hawk attack aircraft, particularly at the height of the war in 1978-79. The British Embassy in Jakarta confirmed to CAVR in July 2003 that eight Hawk aircraft were supplied to Indonesia in 1978 but said they were older models suitable only for training, not air-to-ground combat. Both the British Government and British Aerospace (BAe) have denied the planes were used for counterinsurgency.† The issue generated controversy in Britain, particularly after the Government authorised further sales in the 1990s (see paragraphs 431-499 on International Civil Society, below).

243. Whether or not British-made military equipment was used in specific violations in Timor-Leste, the provision of military assistance helped Indonesia upgrade its military capability and freed up the potential for the Indonesian armed forces to use other equipment in Timor-Leste. More importantly, the provision of military aid to Indonesia by a major Western power and member of the Security Council was a signal of substantial political support to the aggressor in the conflict, and outraged and bewildered Timorese who knew of Britain's professed support for self-determination. In May 1976, the then British Ambassador to Jakarta, John Ford, commented that Timor-Leste was too backward for western-style self-determination. East Timorese are entitled to ask what was so civilised about Britain's support, whether direct or not, for Indonesian aggression.[139]

244. Under the leadership of the Foreign Secretary, Robin Cook, the British Labour Government made amends to some extent by actively supporting the negotiations which culminated in Timor-Leste's act of self-determination in August 1999. Jamsheed Marker, the Secretary-General's Personal Representative for Timor-Leste, paid tribute to the British Ambassador to the UN, Stewart Eldon, and the British Ambassador to Indonesia, Robin Christopher, for their contributions to the core group of countries which collaborated with the UN process. Ambassador Christopher sheltered Xanana Gusmão at the Embassy in Jakarta after his release from detention in September 1999. Both as British Foreign Secretary and as representative of the EU, Robin Cook was part of the decision taken at the APEC meeting in Auckland on 9 September 1999 in favour of an urgent international force to restore order in Timor-Leste after the ballot. On 11 September 1999, Jeremy Greenstock, Britain's representative on the Security Council, visited Timor-Leste as part of the Security Council mission that preceded the international force and described Dili as "hell on earth". Britain contributed Ghurkha troops and funds to the Interfet force.

* 29 January 1999. Mark Thomas Show, Channel 4. Hendro Subroto reported that Ferret Mk.2 Scout cars, VF 603 Saracen-armoured personnel carriers and VF 603 Saladin (with 76 mm guns) vehicles were used in the 1975 Indonesian invasion. Eyewitness to Integration of East Timor, Pustaka Sinar Harapan, Jakarta, 1997.

† In December 1995, the New Zealand Embassy in Jakarta reported allegations that Hawks were used in bombing raids against Fretilin at the beginning of 1995. The British defence attaché and British technicians who helped maintain the aircraft made checks of log books and for evidence that bombs had been fired, and concluded in the negative. New Zealand, OIA Material, Vol. 4, 13 December 1995.

United States

245. The US, once a colony itself, was a key architect and founding member of the UN in 1945 following the Second World War and is a permanent member of the Security Council and superpower. The name "United Nations" was coined by US President Franklin D Roosevelt. Its forerunner, the League of Nations, was established in similar circumstances following the First World War (1914–1918). It owed much to US President Woodrow Wilson's reaction of shock that an advanced civilisation could have engaged in the extreme savagery and devastation that characterised the Great War. In his famous Fourteen Points speech in 1918, President Wilson listed what he considered were the basic premises for the peaceful resolution of conflict. In addition to the creation of an association of nations, these included an early formulation of the principle of self-determination which was later adopted into the UN Charter.*

246. The US did not support the adoption of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples by the UN in 1960, but it reversed its position in 1961 and also recognised Portuguese Timor as a non-self-governing territory with the right to self-determination.

247. US policy on Timor-Leste was further developed during this period in response to fears of a clash between Portugal and Indonesia over the territory. Like Australia, the US was concerned that Prime Minister Salazar's rejection of UN demands to decolonise would lead to intervention by President Sukarno in the name of anti-imperialism. To avoid a clash, the US Department of State proposed that the US should refer the issue to the UN Decolonisation Committee and should also oppose the possible use of force by Indonesia on the grounds that force could not be justified by Portugal's failure to decolonise and would harm the United Nations. A Department of State policy document in 1963 stated:

> The one failure does not justify the other…We ought not to view such Indonesian action as the second act in a drama which began with Goa and which will end with the death of the UN…We cannot condone any effort to take over territory by force. Such action would be a violation of the UN Charter obligations that Indonesia has undertaken. We would have to oppose Indonesia diplomatically and in the UN in such a circumstance.[140]

248. The Department of State also expressed the view that Portuguese Timor was not capable of self-determination and should unite with Indonesia:

* Point V of President Wilson's Fourteen Points refers to colonial claims and the need for "a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight". Other Points included the need for the reduction of armaments by countries "to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety".

> We and the Portuguese have to recognise that self-determination for Portuguese Timor is meaningless for the indefinite future…Realistically, it has only one possible future, as a part of Indonesia.[141]

These policy guidelines did not have to be acted on because the predicted conflict did not materialise. The Department of State's pessimistic analysis of Timor-Leste's limited options was understandable at the time given the refusal of the Salazar regime to prepare the territory for independence. However, when the issue resurfaced a decade later the view that Timor-Leste's only option was integration with Indonesia became, in conjunction with Cold War factors, the dominant policy determinant that overrode all other considerations. The other recommendations from the 1960s were to be effectively ignored until the end of the Cold War towards the end of the 1980s.

249. Gary Gray, a former official in the US Department of State, testified to the Commission that US policy on Timor-Leste from 1974 was significantly shaped by the global and regional context of the times and the desire on the part of both Indonesia and the US to strengthen their relationship following communist gains in Indochina. He said:

> One could plausibly see 1975 as the peak of communist power in the world and the perception of threat to the US and what was then called the free world…communist regimes had been installed in Laos, Cambodia and Viet Nam in March and April 1975, active communist insurgencies still plagued Thailand and Malaysia, and the concept of a monolithic communist threat to South-East Asia and the domino theory remained very much alive. At the same time there was a strong consensus in Washington that the counterweight of an anti-communist Indonesia was vital against the expansion of communism in Asia, both in regional terms and in Indonesia itself.[142]

250. The mutual importance of the relationship was already well established from early in President Soeharto's term and emphasised at the highest level. This included US support for the Indonesian takeover of West Irian and the bogus "Act of Free Choice" there in 1969.* In a memo to President Gerald Ford in September 1974, the US Secretary of State, Henry Kissinger, recommended that he meet the Indonesian

* The US Embassy in Jakarta reported in July 1969: "The Act of Free Choice (AFC) in West Irian is unfolding like a Greek tragedy, the conclusion preordained. The main protagonist, the Government of Indonesia, cannot and will not permit any resolution other than the continued inclusion of West Irian in Indonesia. Dissident activity is likely to increase but the Indonesian Armed Forces will be able to contain, and, if necessary, suppress it." President Nixon visited Indonesia just before the Act of Free Choice. His National Security Adviser, Henry Kissinger, told him: "You should tell (Soeharto) that we understand the problem they face in West Irian". Brad Simpson (Ed.), Indonesia's 1969 Takeover of West Papua Not by "Free Choice", posted 9 July 2004, http://www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/NSAEBB/ NSAEBB128/index.htm, at July 2005. Dr Kissinger became a director and stockholder in the US Freeport McMoran gold and copper mine after it won concessions in West Irian in 1967.

Foreign Minister, Adam Malik "to assure the Suharto Government that you attach great importance to Indonesia as a major regional power in East Asia and that you intend to continue US economic and military assistance to Indonesia".[143] The briefing then outlined Indonesia's "high strategic significance to us" by virtue of its geography, population, resources and constructive regional role, both in Vietnam and in ASEAN as a balance to pressures from the Soviet Union and China. For his part, President Soeharto wanted his Foreign Minister to meet the new US President to inform him of his wish to establish a close personal relationship, to invite him to visit Indonesia and to provide military and economic assistance. The two presidents met twice in 1975: in July when President Soeharto visited the US and again in December when President Ford visited Indonesia.*

251. The US government was aware of Indonesia's plans to incorporate Timor-Leste. From at least February 1975 it also knew that force might be employed and this would involve the use of US-supplied military equipment. For example, US officials agreed that Indonesian joint military exercises conducted in Lampung, South Sumatra on 11 February 1975 were almost certainly part of preparations to seize Timor-Leste. Commenting on the event, the US Consulate in Surabaya wrote:

> Political officer Zingsheim and I were both struck by similarities in terrain and style of this exercise, and what would be involved in Indonesian operation to seize Dili. Exercise included vertical envelopment of Branti airstrip, amphibious assault of nearby beach area, and naval bombardment and strafing…and rear area air drops.†

252. Indonesia denied at the time that the exercise was related to Timor-Leste, but the invasion of Dili ten months later followed the pattern described above. On both occasions, the shore bombardment was conducted by the US-supplied warship, KRI Martadinata. Cables between Australian and US officials at the time expressed fears that the forceful seizure of Timor-Leste using US and Australian equipment would damage relations with Indonesia.[144]

253. During this same period, the New Zealand opposition leader, Robert Muldoon, visited Jakarta and was briefed on Timor-Leste by Indonesian leaders. The US Embassy reported to Washington:

* It has been claimed that a major factor in the US decision to support Indonesia's takeover of Timor-Leste was to guarantee that the deep water strait between Timor and Wetar remained in friendly hands, as the strait allowed for unimpeded passage between the Pacific and the Indian oceans for US nuclear submarines. See Michael McGuire, "The Geopolitical Importance of Strategic Waterways in the Asian-Pacific Region", Orbis 19 (3), Fall 1975, pp. 1058-76 and Michael Richardson, "Jakarta Rules the Way: Why Indonesian Goodwill is Vital to America's Indian Ocean Submarine Force", The Age, 4 August 1976. The CAVR has not been able to confirm this specific claim. It is clear, however, that the US was concerned that the Soeharto Government's support for the "archipelago principle" in the law of the sea negotiations might restrict US transit through the archipelago. See Secretary H. Kissinger's memo to President Ford, 21 November 1975. National Security Archive (NSA) Declassified Documents, 124.

† US Consulate Surabaya, 20 February 1975. NSA Documents 23. Ships used in the exercise were based in Surabaya and troops were from Malang in East Java.

> Position Suharto and Malik took with Muldoon reinforces belief that GOI has decided it must incorporate Timor, is laying political groundwork for a takeover, and is hoping friendly powers will find a way not to oppose the move.*

254. In reply to a query in March 1975 from the US National Security Council about policy should Indonesia use force in Timor-Leste, Secretary of State Kissinger approved a policy of non-action. The query included a recommendation from the US Ambassador to Indonesia, David Newsom, favouring silence:

> Ambassador Newsom has recommended a general policy of silence. He has argued that we have considerable interests in Indonesia and none in Timor. If we try to dissuade Indonesia from what Suharto [sic] may regard as a necessary use of force, major difficulties in our relations could result.[145]

255. This policy was applied for the Ford-Soeharto summit at Camp David on 5 July 1975. Secretary Kissinger made no reference to Portuguese Timor in his briefing for President Ford before the meeting and the US did not raise the issue or warn about the use of force or US equipment during the meeting, although President Soeharto provided an opportunity when he volunteered that Indonesia would not use force. In reply to President Soeharto's presentation on the issue, the US President limited himself to asking whether Portugal had set a date for the Timorese people to make their choice. Earlier in the meeting, the US President announced a package of military assistance to Indonesia.

256. US officials told Indonesia through diplomatic channels that the US preferred peaceful integration through self-determination and expressed concerns that force and the use of US equipment would generate an adverse reaction in Congress and harm relations.† Official policy, however, was to remain publicly aloof and non-committal. Informed at a meeting on 8 October 1975 that Indonesia had begun military operations in Timor-Leste, Secretary Kissinger responded:

---

* US Embassy Jakarta, 25 February 1975. NSA Documents 28. According to the US communication: "Adam Malik told Muldoon that administration of Portuguese Timor is communist-influenced and that pro-independence Timorese have offered USSR and PRC bases in return for support for independence movement. Malik said that refugees from leftist terror in Portuguese Timor fleeing across border into Indonesian territory…Soeharto said that, given the serious situation in Timor, GOI hopes friendly countries such as Australia and New Zealand 'will understand' Indonesia's position, which New Zealanders interpreted as a request that NZ 'understand' a possible Indonesian takeover of Portuguese Timor."

† Ambassador Newsom told the head of Bakin (the Intelligence Coordinating Body), Lieutenant-General Yoga Sugama, on 20 August 1975: "GOI should be aware if US equipment were used in forcible seizure of Portuguese Timor [since] this could call into effect sections of Foreign Assistance Act and could place military assistance program in jeopardy. Thus, the best solution would be peaceful incorporation of Portuguese Timor in Indonesia." US Embassy Jakarta, 21 August 1975. NSA Documents 73. In October, President Ford's National Security Adviser, Lieutenant-General Brent Scowcroft, was advised by staff to warn Ali Moertopo of political complications if US equipment was used. NSA Documents 104.

> I'm assuming you're going to really keep your mouth shut on this subject…on Indonesia. Also at the UN…make sure the US Mission doesn't make a statement.[146]

257. On 5 December 1975, in response to Indonesia's pre-invasion assaults, the President of both Fretilin and the newly proclaimed Democratic Republic of East Timor, Xavier do Amaral, sent an urgent telegram to the US president asking the US to intervene:

> My Government believes the voice of the US could prevent a war which would be long, bloody and destructive…For the sake of peace we implore you to intervene.

258. The US Government ignored the appeal. The National Security Council record of correspondence shows that on 15 December the letter was filed with a note:

> No action necessary. No reply should be sent – this is a sensitive matter.[147]

259. Presidents Ford and Soeharto met again in Jakarta on 6 December 1975, the day before Indonesia's full-scale invasion of Timor-Leste. According to Department of State records, the meeting took place at 8am and the American delegation left for the airport at 10:30am. Also present at the meeting were Secretary of State Kissinger, Foreign Minister Malik, Minister of State Sudharmono, Ambassador Newsom and an interpreter. In the course of their discussion, which focused principally on Indochina and the containment of communism, President Soeharto raised the situation in Timor-Leste which he presented as a threat to the security of Indonesia and the region following Fretilin's declaration of independence.

260. The Department of State account of the exchange records that the Indonesian President said to the Americans:

> We want your understanding if we deem it necessary to take rapid or drastic action.

261. President Ford replied:

> We will understand and will not press you on the issues. We understand the problem you have and the intentions you have.

262. The Americans said that the use of US-made arms could create problems, and Secretary Kissinger added:

> It depends on how we construe it: whether it is in self-defence or is a foreign operation. It is important that whatever you do succeeds quickly. We would be able to influence the reaction in America if whatever happens happens after we return. This way there would be less chance > of people talking in an unauthorised way. The President will be back on Monday at 2:00pm Jakarta time. We understand your problem and the need to move quickly but I am only saying that it would be better if it were done after we returned.

263. Secretary Kissinger asked a final question:

> Do you anticipate a long guerrilla war there?

264. President Soeharto replied:

> There will probably be a small guerrilla war.*

265. Both parties avoided making explicit reference to military intervention, but it is clear from the discussion and references to the use of US arms and guerrilla war that this is what the US President knew he was agreeing to. In giving his consent, he made no reference to the right of self-determination or the humanitarian consequences of war. Consent to the use of force also meant having to ignore advice from officials about the illegality of using US weapons, because most of the Indonesian armed forces equipment was American.† Indonesia ignored the request to wait: the invasion began in the early hours of Sunday morning, 7 December, over 24 hours before the designated time of President Ford's return to the US.

266. In a White House review of the visit on 10 December 1975, neither President Ford nor Secretary Kissinger made any reference to Timor-Leste. President Ford said:

> It was important to go there (Indonesia) in the aftermath of Vietnam to show we were still an Asian power. I was impressed with Suharto who is trying to keep the country together and maintain a viable government and uphold the cause of anti-communism there.[148]

267. On 13 December, he dispatched a personal gift of golf balls to the Indonesian President.‡

* US Embassy Jakarta, 6 December 1975. NSA Documents 148. In 1977, the Carter Administration was advised to turn down a request from Congressman Donald Fraser for a copy of this report on the grounds that it was privileged and would harm US foreign relations if it became public. NSA Documents 405.

† A memorandum from Secretary Kissinger to President Ford on 21 November 1975 stated: "Indonesia's use of US-supplied weapons in an overt occupation of the territory, however, would contravene US law." NSA Documents 124.

‡ National Security Council, 13 December 1975. NSA Documents 168. Dr Kissinger subsequently defended the Ford Administration's policy on Timor-Leste. At a public forum in 2001 he told the East Timorese activist Constancio Pinto: "Timor was never discussed with us when we were in Indonesia. At the airport as we were leaving, the Indonesians told us that they were going to occupy the Portuguese colony of Timor. To us that did not seem like a very significant event because the Indians had occupied the Portuguese colony of Goa ten years earlier and to us it looked like another process of decolonisation. Nobody had the foggiest idea of what would happen afterwards, and nobody asked our opinion, and I don't know what we could have said if someone had asked our opinion. It was literally told to us as we were leaving." Slate, Whopper of the Week: Henry Kissinger, 7 December 2001.

268. The US voted in favour of UN Security Council Resolution 384 which was adopted unanimously on 22 December 1975, upheld the right of self-determination and called on Indonesia to withdraw its troops. It kept a low profile during that session, but tried to help Indonesia behind the scenes without getting too offside with its NATO ally Portugal whose co-operation the US depended on to maintain the US base in the Azores and support on other issues in the UN. While pushing "for an accommodation at the UN in which Jakarta could save face", the US also offered to help Portugal secure the release of 23 soldiers held in Indonesian Timor.* The US abstained on Security Council Resolution 389 (1976) adopted on 22 April 1976 because, said the US representative, the resolution failed to recognise "the important statement of the representative of Indonesia that some forces have been withdrawn and that withdrawal is continuing". He said the US abstention should not be interpreted to mean that the US "is wavering in our support of the right of the people of East Timor or of any people anywhere in the world for equal rights and self-determination".[149] The US also abstained in the General Assembly vote on the issue taken on 12 December 1975, then voted against all subsequent General Assembly resolutions until 1999.

269. Both the Indonesian and US Governments knew that US weapons were used in the invasion of Timor-Leste. The US Congresswoman, Helen Meyner, told a Congressional inquiry in 1977 that General Moerdani confirmed the use of US equipment:

> When we met in Djakarta with some of the top Indonesian military men…John Salzberg asked General Moerdani whether US weapons had been used in 1975. He said, "Of course, these are the only weapons that we have. Of course there were US weapons".[150]

270. The US National Security Council was advised on 12 December 1975 that US equipment was used in the invasion.[151] The report to the NSC stated that US-supplied equipment included the following:

- At least nine ex-US navy ships, one of which, the KRI Martadinata, was involved in coastal shelling from 22 November and took part in the one-hour naval bombardment that preceded the 7 December assault on Dili
- 13 planes used in the assault on Dili and Baucau
- Equipment used by the 18th Airborne Brigade that made the para-drop on Dili on 7–December and the 17th Airborne Brigade involved in the drop on Baucau on 10 December; this comprised rifles, machine guns, grenade launchers, mortars, rocket launchers, parachutes and radios; their jump masters were US-trained
- Some US radio equipment was used by the communications centre at Atambua, Indonesian Timor, which controlled Timor operations.

* National Security Council, 19 December 1975. NSA Documents 178. The US Ambassador to the UN at the time, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, wrote: "The United States wished things to turn out as they did, and worked to bring this about. The Department of State desired that the United Nations prove utterly ineffective in whatever measures it undertook. This task was given to me, and I carried it forward with no inconsiderable success." A Dangerous Place, Little Brown, 1980, p. 247.

271. José Ramos-Horta told the Commission that in his opinion the US has the most to answer for: "The US was the worst. Worst because it was the only single power that could have told the Indonesians, after the invasion, not only before then but after then: 'You behave, stop these killings', but they wouldn't…and they knew what was right."[152]

272. Sections of the US Congress actively pursued the issue of the Indonesian use of US-supplied military equipment. Following inquiries by Senator Gary Hart in December 1975, Senators Hubert Humphrey and Clifford Case took up the issue and a series of Congressional hearings was held in 1977 after Jimmy Carter began his term as US President in January.

273. US officials told a Congressional inquiry in March 1977 that US weapons were used during the invasion. They also testified that, in response, the Administration "suspended administratively" the provision of additional assistance between January and June 1976 "to ensure that we were in compliance with the applicable statutes", but that only some members of Congress were told privately of the suspension and the decision was not publicly announced.[153]

274. This action, which was taken at Secretary Kissinger's direction, was primarily designed to ensure continued US military support for Indonesia, rather than legal compliance. It was not intended to protect human rights in Timor-Leste and, in practice, it made no difference to the reality of US military support for Indonesian aggression.* The inquiry was informed that military equipment already in the pipeline continued to be delivered, that military aid was resumed in late June 1976 because there had been a "significant reduction of hostilities in Timor" and that Congress continued to authorise military assistance for Indonesia after the defeat of a proposed amendment urging a cut-off. Relations with Indonesia were not affected because officials in Jakarta either did not know about the suspension or were confident it was only "administrative" in character. Brent Scowcroft was advised before a meeting with Adam Malik in June 1976:

> The Indonesians have not brought up our suspense of military equipment deliveries to them…Should they mention it, you could point out that our careful handling of this matter has enabled us to turn off Congressional critics such as Senator Humphrey and at the same time allow us to resume military assistance shipments to Jakarta.[154]

275. In October 1976 the US Government confirmed the continued use of US-weapons in Timor-Leste:

> We understand that the Indonesian government has, in recent months, been endeavouring to use non-US equipment in its Timor operations. Some US-equipped units have been withdrawn. However, indications are that US-supplied equipment – particularly transport

* NSA Documents 296. Even if the Congress had stopped military aid, the Administration was committed to finding a way around it and began developing contingency plans in early 1976 to continue the support. NSA Documents 235.

> and communication equipment – is still being used. The Indonesian Government has been made aware of our continuing concern in this regard.[155]

276. Military co-operation continued to be an integral component of US support for Indonesia for the next two decades.*

277. Successive US Administrations continued the basic position on Timor-Leste established by the Ford-Kissinger Administration. This was explained to a US Senate Hearing in 1992 in the following terms:

> In 1976 US policymakers decided to accept Indonesia's incorporation of East Timor as an accomplished fact. They judged that nothing the United States or the world was prepared to do could change that fact. Thus, to oppose Indonesia's incorporation would have had little impact on the situation. With such reality in mind, previous administrations fashioned a policy which has been followed consistently on a bipartisan basis: We accept Indonesia's incorporation of East Timor without maintaining that a valid act of self-determination has taken place. Clearly, a democratic process of self-determination would have been more consistent with our values; but the realities of 1975 did not include that alternative. Accepting the absorption of East Timor into Indonesia was the only realistic option.[156]

278. The Carter Administration (1977-81) continued to place heavy emphasis on the importance of Indonesia. Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's hawkish national security adviser, advocated deepening relations.[157] Vice President Walter Mondale visited President Soeharto in Jakarta in May 1978 and General Moerdani continued his regular visits to the US resulting in increased US military co-operation with Indonesia. Assistant Secretary Holbrooke summarised why the US was so positive about Indonesia at a Congressional hearing in 1981:

> The situation in East Timor is one of a number of very important concerns of the United States in Indonesia. Indonesia, with a population of 150 million people, is the fifth largest nation in the world, is a moderate member of the Non-aligned Movement, is an important oil producer – which plays a moderate role in OPEC – and occupies a strategic position astride the sea lanes between the Pacific and Indian oceans. President Suharto [sic] and other prominent Indonesian leaders have publicly called for the release of our hostages in Iran. Indonesia's position within the Association of South East Asian Nations – ASEAN – is also important and it has played a central role in supporting Thailand and maintaining the security of Thailand in the face of Vietnam's > destabilising actions in Indo-China. Finally, Indonesia has provided humane treatment for over 50,000 Indo-Chinese refugees and taken the initiative in offering an island site as an ASEAN refugee-processing centre. Indonesia is, of course, important to key US allies in the region, especially Japan and Australia. We highly value our co-operative relationship with Indonesia.[158]

* The US military assistance programme (MAP) to Indonesia concluded in 1978, but was succeeded by the foreign military sales (FMS) credit programme.

279. The Carter Administration added a stronger emphasis on human rights and humanitarian need to the Timor policy outlined above and this was adopted by succeeding administrations. During its time in office, international agencies were permitted to operate in Timor-Leste, US officials were permitted to meet with José Ramos-Horta and the annual Department of State Country Reports on Human Rights Practices, which began in 1977, included frequent reference to abuses in Timor-Leste.

280. At the same time, however, most of the deaths in Timor-Leste occurred during this period, Indonesian troop numbers reached new levels and the Timorese resistance was almost wiped out.* Arnold Kohen testified to the Commission:

> It is wrong to believe that the tragedy in East Timor can be placed exclusively at the doorstep of President Ford and Secretary of State Kissinger. There was a chance to change American policy toward the Indonesian occupation of East Timor in early 1977 when President Jimmy Carter took office…and called for greater emphasis on human rights in the making of US foreign policies…Such hopes were dashed.[159]

281. The Carter Administration also failed to address the basic issue of self-determination. It recognised Indonesia's sovereignty, made no mention of self-determination in its annual human rights reports and voted against UN resolutions on Timor-Leste.†

282. Following the end of the Cold War and the Santa Cruz massacre in 1991, pressures increased on the US to play a more active role in the search for a solution. Some engagement with Portugal followed. In January 1992, a group of well-known Portuguese political and academic figures, led by former President Ramalho Eanes, delivered a harshly worded open letter to President George Bush that charged the US with responsibility, through its inaction, for human rights violations in Timor-Leste.[160] Though it had opposed the General Assembly resolution in 1982 which requested the

* The Deputy Commander-in-Chief of the Indonesian Armed Forces, Admiral Sudomo, told Ambassador Masters in July 1978 that Indonesia had 29,000 military personnel in Timor-Leste. NSA Document 602. General Moerdani denied claims that napalm and herbicides were used in Timor-Leste during this period. US Embassy report, 3 January 1978. NSA Document 502. Similarly, US officials denied Fretilin claims that US personnel participated in military engagements in Timor during this period. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, 7 July 1978. NSA Document 599. Detail regarding Fretilin claims is found in NSA Documents 578 and 614.

† After each UN vote, Indonesia's ambassador to the UN wrote to the Carter Administration to express its "sincere thanks and appreciation for the support accorded to Indonesia's position". See, for example, NSA Documents 491 and 713.

Secretary-General to initiate consultations with all parties directly concerned, the US now stated its support for the Secretary-General's promotion of discussions between Portugal and Indonesia on the issue, and in 1992 and 1993 it supported initiatives by Portugal at the Commission on Human Rights.[161]

283. Ambassador Barry, the representative of the new Clinton Administration in Indonesia, visited Timor-Leste on 21–23 February 1993 to "have a fresh look". He reported that:

> a repressive and pervasive military presence is the main obstacle to the government's goal of integration…The Timorese resent the military's paternalism, corruption and domination of the local economy as well as their cruelty…The best description of Timorese aspirations comes from a Salesian priest who knows the situation well: "They want to be left alone."

284. The Ambassador concluded that "[i]ntegration will never be palatable as long as it is demanded at gunpoint…" but then ruled out the solutions that Indonesia itself came to a few short years later:

> Even if the Indonesians were prepared to offer self-determination (and they aren't), East Timor could not survive as a separate entity. Autonomy sounds good but is hard to define in a meaningful way in this very centralised country.[162]

285. The Clinton Administration actively supported the self-determination process in 1999, including through the Security Council. The US was one of the largest contributors to the establishment of UNAMET, and President Clinton, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, who had met previously with Xanana Gusmão in Jakarta, and Secretary of Defence William Cohen, each pressured Indonesian counterparts to contain the violence that threatened the ballot.* In welcoming the result on 4 September 1999, Secretary Albright said the US would continue to support strongly the UN-assisted process to transform Timor-Leste into an independent nation.[163] Following the outbreak of violence, President Clinton issued strong statements on 9 and 10 September 1999 stressing the need for an international security force in Timor-Leste and US support for such a force, if Indonesia could not restore order. The US stationed 1,000 marines offshore but restricted its direct contribution to Interfet to logistical support including heavy lift for the deployment of other participating forces.

Japan

286. Japan became a member of the United Nations in 1956. It is not a permanent member of the Security Council, but it was the only East Asian non-permanent member when the Council debated the question of Timor-Leste in 1975 and 1976.

* The head of UNAMET, Ian Martin, has written that the US did not press Jakarta to accept peacekeepers before the ballot in case this endangered the process and is doubtful that security provisions could have been strengthened further (Ian Martin, Self-determination in East Timor, The United Nations, the Ballot, and International Intervention, Lynne Rienner Publishers, London, p. 33).

287. In 1960 Japan supported the adoption of the UN Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and the related principles for reporting on colonies.[164] It abstained, however, on GA Resolution 1542 (XV) which listed Portuguese Timor as a non-self-governing territory.

288. Following the Indonesian invasion, Japan voted in favour of Security Council Resolution 384 (1975), which was adopted unanimously on 22 December 1975. The resolution upheld the inalienable right of the East Timorese people to self-determination, deplored Indonesia's armed intervention and called for it to withdraw without delay.

289. However, Japan lobbied to weaken this resolution. The Japanese Ambassador to the United Nations at the time, Shizuo Saito, has written:

> Japan always took an active and leading initiative…(and) particularly made inputs so that Indonesia's intention to withdraw its troops would be respected and the condemnation would not irritate Indonesia too much. Other governments co-operated with this position of Japan.[165]

290. Japan's role on the issue in the Security Council is confirmed by José Ramos-Horta who represented Fretilin at the meetings:

> All through both the 1975 and 1976 Security Council debates on Timor, the Japanese delegation was conspicuous in its efforts to soften criticism of Indonesia.[166]

291. Resolution 384 was the only UN resolution supported by Japan following the Indonesian invasion. Japan abstained from voting on Security Council Resolution 389 in April 1976 stating that it believed the Security Council should acknowledge that Indonesia had started to withdraw its forces from Timor-Leste in compliance with the previous resolution. On 15 April 1976, the Japanese representative, Mr Kanazawa, told the Security Council:

> Although it appears to us that peace and order in the Territory have not yet been fully restored, we consider it encouraging that armed strife now seems to be confined to isolated areas in the Territory, and that life is gradually returning to normal.[167]

292. Mr Kanazawa went on to welcome Indonesia's statement to the Security Council "that the armed volunteers started to leave the Territory in February and that the process of withdrawal is expected to be completed within a short time."

293. Indonesia's claim that the invasion comprised "volunteers" was no more credible than its claim of withdrawals. Both were known to be false at the time. The New Zealand defence attaché in Jakarta advised his government in January 1976 that the claim of "volunteers" was a "ridiculous fiction" and commented:

> Evasion and half-truths are accepted diplomatic coinage but outright lying is less easy to overlook.[168]

294. His report on the period January–March 1976 makes no mention of withdrawals and commented that "the military situation is still sufficiently volatile to make it imperative that considerable numbers of Indonesian troops are able to be deployed...."[169] The UN Envoy, Winspeare Guicciardi, was also sceptical of Indonesian claims. In his second report on Timor-Leste, written seven months after the invasion in June 1976, he wrote that when he raised the issue of compliance with Security Council Resolutions 384 and 389 Indonesia simply reiterated previous statements that the withdrawal of "Indonesian volunteers" would be completed in a short time.[170] In another twist, Indonesia's representative at the UN told his US counterpart that Indonesia had to respect the wishes of the East Timorese Provisional Government which did not want the troops to withdraw and was asking: "How can Indonesians be withdrawn from territory already incorporated into Indonesia?"[171]

295. In other remarks to the Security Council, Mr Kanazawa supported the right of Timor-Leste to self-determination and called for continued efforts to restore peace and order and an extension of the Special Representative's mandate. Though positive, these proposals had been agreed to by Indonesia and added nothing that was new or commensurate with Japan's capacity to influence events as Indonesia's major investor and donor.

296. Japan voted against all eight UN General Assembly Resolutions on Timor-Leste between 1975 and 1982. This included the mild 1982 resolution which delegated the issue to the Secretary-General to find a solution through dialogue. During his visit to Dili in 1976, Winspeare Guicciardi saw posters thanking Japan for its UN vote in support of Indonesia.[172]

297. According to the Australian Government, Japan implicitly gave recognition to Indonesian sovereignty over Timor-Leste when in 1982 it signed a tax agreement with Indonesia whose terms did not exclude Timor-Leste from the definition of Indonesian territory.[173] Japan denies that it formally recognised the incorporation. It did not attend the Popular Assembly of 31 May 1976 whose petition for integration Indonesia claimed was a legitimate act of self-determination.* In 1991, Japanese Parliamentarians told the UN:

> The Japanese Government never formally recognised the annexation of East Timor by Indonesia. Japan's official position has been the following: "Our basic position regarding the area of East Timor is that Japan continues to observe the negotiations between the parties concerned under the good offices of the United Nations Secretary-General" and that "we are not in a > position to judge on the jurisdiction of the island". The Japanese Government has therefore instructed publishers of school textbooks to draw the same type of line between East Timor and West Timor as the one drawn between Morocco and the West Sahara. This line indicates that an international conflict exists concerning the status of the area where it is drawn and that the conflict is still pending a settlement. The Diet Members Forum has repeatedly confirmed this position through questions on the Diet floor and through written questions to the Government.[174]

* Indonesia invited Japan to attend the Popular Assembly of 31 May 1976. In a cable on 28 May 1976, a British embassy official in Tokyo commented on the problem this created: "The Japanese are in a not unfamiliar dilemma. On the one hand they would rather have nothing to do with the invitation, but on the other they are afraid of upsetting the Indonesians. They do not wish to be represented in Dili unless they are in good company…." in UK unclassified documents, Dowson Files 7.19.

298. The overriding determinant of Japan's position on the Timor issue in the 1970s and 1980s was its economic relationship with Indonesia. Following its defeat in the Second World War, Japan focused on rebuilding its economy which has a low natural resource base and is heavily dependent on good international relations. These economic objectives dictated its foreign policy which was kept low-profile and essentially aligned with that of the US.

299. Indonesia and Japan established formal diplomatic relations in 1957, following protracted negotiations over Japan's reparations debt to Indonesia arising from its occupation of the former Dutch colony between 1942 and 1945. An expansion in Japanese investment, resource exploitation and aid followed. Indonesia, which has a vast market, natural resources and strategic location, became increasingly important to Japan's economy regardless of who holds power in Jakarta. A significant percentage of Japan's oil supplies and trade flowed through the Straits of Malacca. After the Soeharto regime took power, Japan helped establish the international aid consortium, the Inter-Governmental Group on Indonesia (IGGI), which held its first meeting in Tokyo in 1967. By the 1980s Japan was Indonesia's largest investor and aid donor, and very protective of the relationship. Japan's response to Timor-Leste was circumscribed by these priorities.

300. In 1979, Japan provided 100m yen to the joint Indonesian Red Cross-International Red Cross famine relief program in Timor-Leste. In 1991, the Government of Japan decided to make human rights and other factors such as military expenditure by the recipient country a consideration in the allocation of its massive aid programme. The Japanese Diet Members Forum on Timor-Leste welcomed the initiative stating that "if these criteria are honestly applied to Indonesia, the number one recipient of Japan's Overseas Development Assistance (ODA), discussion on the issue of East Timor will be inevitable".[175] This did not happen. The Government would appear to have backed away from this important commitment by signing, in 1993, the Bangkok Declaration on Human Rights, which stated that aid should not be linked to human rights. Although they rate Japan's domestic human rights record as the best in East Asia, Kenneth Christie and Denny Roy concluded that:

> In practice, the promotion of human rights has not been much of a factor in Japan's overseas development assistance.[176]

301. In the 1990s, Japan moved to play a relatively more positive role on the question of Timor-Leste. This was due in large measure to developments in Timor-Leste and domestic pressures, particularly from a cross-section of civil society organisations and members of the Japanese Diet committed to upholding the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination.*

302. An example of civil society advocacy was the testimony to the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation in 1987 by Mr Iwamura Shouhachi, a former Japanese army officer who served in Timor-Leste from 1942 to 1945. In his presentation, he called on Indonesia not to repeat mistakes made by Japan during the Second World War and to allow genuine self-determination:

> In Japan I am simply one elderly citizen, but I am determined never to forget the crimes Japan committed in the Second World War and to act on what I have learned from bitter experience.

303. Breaking down in tears, he told the Committee:

> It is painful to speak today of the sacrifices and burdens we forced upon the East Timorese, a people who had nothing to do with the war…The Japanese Government has never apologised or paid reparations to East Timor for what it did there in World War II: it should.†

304. In 1995, in response to persistent domestic pressure and developments in Timor-Leste, the Murayama LDP/Socialist Coalition Government changed Japan's position from one of detached observer to one of support for the UN process. At APEC conferences in 1995 and 1996 Japanese Foreign Ministers told their Indonesian counterpart, Ali Alatas, of Japan's interest in seeing the issue solved peacefully and quickly through the good offices of the UN Secretary-General.‡ This policy shift also opened the way for Japan to provide financial resources for the UN process, including

* Sister Monica Nakamura told the Commission that the principal objective of the Free East Timor Japan Coalition, the main Japanese national umbrella network, was "to support the East Timorese right to self-determination. As for humanitarian aid, we did [provide it] on some occasions, but we concentrated on the self-determination issue." CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004. The Coalition numbered some 40 groups nationwide.

† 13 August 1987, reported in The Australian, 15 August 1987. The Allies and Japan both occupied Portuguese Timor from 1942 to 1945 in violation of Portuguese neutrality. Japan's troops were responsible for extensive loss of life, violations of women, and physical destruction. According to a 1996 survey in Timor-Leste, at least 700 East Timorese women were sex slaves for Japanese soldiers (Japan Times, 14 December 2002). Since the war, Japan has paid war reparations to regional neighbours to ease its re-integration into the region and has explicitly apologised for wartime aggression and violations. Indonesia received US$223m from Japan, plus US$400m in aid and cancellation of a US$177m trade debt. Timor-Leste was not compensated for wartime losses because Portugal, due to its neutrality during the war, was not a signatory to the 1951 San Francisco Conference which determined Japan's reparations obligations. Japanese NGOs and the Japanese Catholic Church continue to call for an official apology and reparations, including from the Asian Women's Fund established in 1995 by then Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama, and have assisted East Timorese victims to testify in Tokyo.

‡ The meeting between Japanese Foreign Minister Kono and Ali Alatas took place during the Osaka APEC meeting in November 1995 while East Timorese youth were seeking asylum in the Japanese embassy in Jakarta. The 1996 meeting was between Foreign Ministers Yukihiko Ikeda and Ali Alatas and occurred in the Philippines after the Nobel Peace Prize was awarded to Bishop Belo and José Ramos-Horta.

the All-Inclusive Intra-East Timorese Dialogue (AIIETD) to which Japan contributed $100,000 in 1996.

305. At the same time, Japan was careful to quarantine the issue from its important economic relationship with Indonesia. Although nearly half of the Japanese Diet signed a petition criticising the Indonesian military for the 1991 Santa Cruz massacre, the Japanese Government refrained from direct criticism and limited its response to one of regret. It offered no official response to the granting of the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Carlos Belo and José Ramos-Horta in 1996. When José Ramos-Horta visited Japan in January 1997 at the invitation of civil society groups, the Foreign Minister was not available to meet him.* The Jakarta Post reported that Prime Minister Ryutaro Hashimoto, who was visiting ASEAN countries to discuss the Asian economic crisis, told President Soeharto that no Japanese senior officials would meet José Ramos-Horta.†

306. Following Kofi Annan's decision in 1997 to invigorate the question of Timor-Leste, Japan was one of a core group of five nations acknowledged for their supportive role by Jamsheed Marker, the Personal Representative of the Secretary-General for Timor-Leste.‡ The Japanese Government supported President Habibie's decision to allow a vote in Timor-Leste and the UN-organised Popular Consultation held on 30 August 1999. After the ballot, Japan called for the result to be respected by all parties and for Indonesia "to fulfil its responsibility for security (and) to take all necessary measures" to control the militia.[177] Japan announced it would provide as much assistance as possible for the transition, but refused to interrupt aid to Indonesia in response to the destruction and warned other donors that cutting off aid could destabilise Indonesia's economy and set back East Asia's economic recovery. Japan was prevented by its constitution from contributing troops to the International Force for East Timor (Interfet) but was the principal donor to Interfet with a contribution of $100 million to allow for troops from developing countries to participate. In line with previous undertakings, Japan also provided generous assistance to meet humanitarian and reconstruction costs in Timor-Leste.§

* José Ramos-Horta was told the Foreign Minister was occupied managing an emergency in Peru where militants had seized the Japanese Embassy.

† Japan-Indonesia economic relations suffered a setback in 1997 not because of Timor-Leste the country but "Timor" the car. When President Soeharto awarded monopoly rights for the franchise for a new Indonesian car to be called the "Timor car", Japan considered the move was detrimental to its automobile interests in Indonesia. It protested to the World Trade Organisation earning a rare rebuke from President Soeharto.

‡ The PRSG complimented Ambassador Yukio Takasu for his contribution (Jamsheed Marker, pp. 14, 74).

§ This included $2m for East Timorese refugees and substantial contributions to the Trust Fund (TFET) established for the reconstruction of Timor-Leste. Press Release, Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Japan, 4 October 1999.

Conclusion

307. It is clear from the preceding survey that for most of the mandate period the major powers, regardless of ideology, location or responsibilities for international order, shared more or less the same attitude towards the question of Timor-Leste. With the exception of China during the early years of the Indonesian occupation, governments of diverse political complexions in Europe, Asia and North America gave significantly more weight to Indonesia than Timor-Leste. Some of these governments worked harder than others to support and consolidate Indonesia's presence, but those who voted for Timor-Leste at the UN also continued to prioritise their relationship with Indonesia and were not active in support of self-determination outside the UN.

308. This attitude was widely shared by many other UN members. Western governments such as Canada and New Zealand, and Asian governments such as India, Malaysia, Singapore, Philippines, Brunei and Thailand all allied themselves strongly with Indonesia. Generally speaking, the only conspicuous exceptions to the rule were Portugal, its former African colonies and a scattering of smaller states.

309. Official international attitudes on the Timor-Leste question were coloured by a mind-set which emerged during the Salazar era and was further developed and entrenched in the 1970s. This mind-set was deeply negative in character and highly prejudicial to the aspirations and rights of the East Timorese people. Governments acknowledged the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination and stated that they did not condone the manner of Indonesia's incorporation, but the overall thrust of their approach, if not intention, was to legitimise and consolidate Indonesia's takeover. The main features of this mind-set can be summarised as follows:

1. Independence for Timor-Leste is not possible or desirable. The view that an independent Timor-Leste was not economically, socially or politically viable was considered self-evident in the 1960s and was widely shared in official circles in Portugal, Indonesia, Australia and the US at that time. It became a dogma in the 1970s and after Fretilin's emergence was highly coloured by the view that a potentially weak, left-leaning mini-state within the Indonesian archipelago would be a threat to regional stability. It is likely, however, that an independent Timor-Leste led by UDT would also have been unacceptable.*

2. The eastern half of the island of Timor is a natural part of Indonesia. This view was promoted as self-evident to anyone who examined Timor-Leste's location on the map in relation to Indonesia. President Soeharto and East Timorese advocates of integration stressed that in their view the peoples of Timor-Leste and Indonesia were brothers and that integration was a "natural" reunion after centuries of separation by European colonialism.* Western policy makers also chose to present integration, in Henry Kissinger's terms, as "the normal evolution of the end of colonial rule".[178]

* After visiting the territory in early 1978 following the Indonesian takeover, New Zealand's Ambassador to Indonesia, Roger Peren wrote: "In sum, the people are poor, small, riddled with disease and almost totally illiterate, very simple and, we were told again and again, 'primitive'…this is something that one has to think about when judging their capacity to take part in an act of self-determination or even to perform as responsible citizens of an independent country." 13 January 1978, in NZ…OIA Material, Vol. 1.

3. Indonesia was forced by circumstances to intervene. Starting in the 1960s, Indonesia constantly informed the international community that it had no legal claim or territorial ambitions in respect of Timor-Leste. The absorption of Timor-Leste would be more "a defensive reaction than a nationalistic imperative".[179] In addition to security reasons, Indonesia also sought to justify its takeover on humanitarian grounds. Yusuf Wanandi, an adviser to President Soeharto, told the Canadian press in 1984:

   "We woke up one day and realized what a mess we had right on our doorstep. The Portuguese had left a complete vacuum…The place was in chaos. I think we were more or less forced to do what we did."[180]

   This claim was echoed internationally throughout the conflict. As late as 1995, the New Zealand Foreign Minister, Don McKinnon, questioned calling Indonesia's annexation an "invasion" and stated that Indonesia intervened because of a "huge refugee problem" and to "support the weaker side" in a bloody civil war.[181]

4. Fretilin is not politically acceptable or legitimate. Indonesia and pro-integration East Timorese encouraged anti-Fretilin sentiment by demonising Fretilin as communist, terrorist, unrepresentative and power hungry. Although Western and other officials did not agree with many of the Indonesian claims, governments were often hostile to Fretilin and reluctant to deal with its representatives even though the UN accepted Fretilin as a legitimate spokesperson for Timor-Leste.

5. The Indonesian occupation is irreversible. This was considered to be mathematically self-evident because of Indonesia's overwhelming superior numbers and military strength and the word "irreversible" recurred like a mantra in official statements for many years.† Many

* This view gained currency in Indonesia and explains the sense of "hurt" felt in some quarters when the people of Timor-Leste chose independence from Indonesia. See, for example, Lela E Madjiah's book entitled Timor Timur: Perginya Si Anak Hilang [East Timor: The Departure of the Lost Child], Pustaka Antara Utama, 2002. Reporting on General Benny Moerdani's death in 2004, David Jenkins wrote: "Moerdani always thought East Timor belonged within Indonesia, and was consumed with bitterness when, in 1999, President Habibie, whom he'd always detested, allowed East Timor to vote itself out of the republic." Sydney Morning Herald, 10 September 2004.

† Jill Jolliffe proved to be correct when she observed in 1978 that "the only thing irreversible about East Timor was the killing", East Timor: Nationalism and Colonialism, University of Queensland Press, St. Lucia, 1978, p. 304.

governments voted against resolutions on Timor-Leste at the UN on the grounds that Indonesian sovereignty was a fait accompli. For the same reason, they reduced the issue in international terms to a residual bilateral problem between Portugal and Indonesia which the UN should help resolve.

The Vatican*

Preface

310. The Catholic Church was a major stakeholder in the Timor-Leste issue during the Commission's mandate period 1974-99. The struggle over Timor-Leste's decolonisation impacted deeply on the Church and it became involved at all levels, from the grassroots in Timor-Leste to the upper echelons of the Church hierarchy in Rome. The significance of the issue to the Church and the political importance of the Vatican to the Indonesian Government is clear from the fact that Pope John Paul II was the only world leader to visit the territory during the Indonesian occupation. This section examines how the Vatican responded to the robust advocacy of the East Timorese people's right to self-determination by the local Church.

Background to the Vatican

311. The Vatican has significant influence and outreach, both directly through its own official channels and indirectly through its vast membership of about one billion people and networks of institutions, many of which are strategically positioned. Based in Rome and headed by the Pope, the Vatican is the central authority of the Roman Catholic Church. Its political and diplomatic activities are directed by the Secretary of State, the most important official under the Pope. The Vatican has formal diplomatic relations with most countries and maintains about 100 permanent diplomatic missions abroad. These include Washington, Lisbon, Canberra and Jakarta where the nunciature was opened in 1965. The Vatican (or "Holy See") has had a permanent observer mission at the United Nations since 1964; as such it has a voice in UN deliberations, but not a vote. It also has diplomatic relations with the European Union and most UN Specialised Agencies. Its official radio station, Radio Vatican, is widely listened to in Europe. Its semi-official newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, is published daily in Italian and weekly in English, Spanish, Portuguese, German and French.

312. The Second Vatican Council, which concluded ten years before the Indonesian invasion, instructed that these networks and resources should serve truth, peace and justice, particularly for the poor and dispossessed. Church and state have different roles, and the Catholic Church, though highly centralised, is not monolithic. As the centre of a global institution, the Vatican is faced with many policy dilemmas and pressures from competing interests, both within and outside the Catholic community. On the other hand, it is also true that it has significant resources and influence at its disposal and, in the case of Timor-Leste, was particularly well-informed about the situation and the aspirations of the local Church for which it assumed direct responsibility.

* The Commission has drawn on numerous sources for this section, including direct testimony to CAVR. It wishes to express special appreciation to Arnold Kohen and Father Patrick Smythe for their submissions and advice. Arnold Kohen is the author of From the Place of the Dead – Bishop Belo and the Struggle for East Timor, Lion Publishing, Oxford, 1999. Patrick A Smythe is author of The Heaviest Blow – The Catholic Church and the East Timor Issue, Lit Verlag, Münster, 2004.

The Catholic Church in Timor-Leste

313. The Catholic Church in Timor-Leste had three leaders during the period 1974-99: Bishop José Joaquim Ribeiro, Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes and Dom Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo SDB. During the Indonesian occupation, each leader initially sought to bring an end to violence through dialogue and direct representation to the secular authorities. When this failed, each in turn took an increasingly vocal role to protect the rights of the people. From around 1983, the Church increasingly called for self-determination in the conviction that the proper exercise of this collective right was the key to long-term peace and the enjoyment of individual rights. It was the local Church's exercise of this prophetic role and its advocacy of the political right to self-determination that presented the Vatican with its biggest challenge on the issue, even though it too supported self-determination in principle.

Bishop José Joaquim Ribeiro (1966–1977)

314. Bishop Ribeiro, a Portuguese national, was head of the Church during the last two years of the Portuguese administration and the first two years of the Indonesian occupation.

315. Prior to the Indonesian invasion, the role and status of the Church in Timor-Leste was determined by the 1940 Concordat between the Vatican and Portugal. Based on this agreement, the Church in Timor-Leste enjoyed certain privileges including state subsidies, tax exemptions, and large land grants. It also had responsibility for education and was the principal agent of Portugal's 'civilising mission'.* This privileged relationship ended with the Carnation Revolution in Portugal. As an integral part of the old colonial system, the Church was deeply challenged by the changing political environment and a period of acute anxiety and confusion ensued, exacerbated by the violence of the civil war and the looming Indonesian invasion.

316. In Timor-Leste, Fretilin's program included a critique of the Church's role in colonialism and its large land holdings. Many clergy and religious favoured UDT and were concerned about communism. Bishop Ribeiro publicly denounced Fretilin as

* In the context of the ferment in Church thinking surrounding the Second Vatican Council (1962-65) and liberation movements in Africa and Latin America, some missionaries used their teaching role to critique colonialism and to introduce their students to new ideas. This was particularly true of the Jesuit seminary in Dare which became the alma mater for many of Timor-Leste's future nationalist leaders.

'communistic'. In a Pastoral Letter issued on 25 January 1975, he forbade Catholics to vote for Communists or Socialists, defended private property and warned that Marxism threatened 'to extinguish the positive values of the Timorese people'.* Though modified later, his views influenced Church perceptions of Fretilin and attitudes to the Timor-Leste question in the Vatican and in countries to which East Timorese refugees fled at the time of the civil war, particularly Indonesia, Portugal and Australia.

317. The Indonesian invasion and annexation of Timor-Leste took place towards the end of the pontificate of Pope Paul VI (1963-78). Paul VI played a central role in shaping and implementing the changes introduced by the Vatican Council, including its doctrine on social justice. He strongly opposed violence, making a memorable speech to the United Nations in 1963 in which he declared 'no more war, war never again'.[182] His Vatican Secretary of State, Jean-Marie Cardinal Villot (1969-79), was well-informed about the invasion and its humanitarian impact from several sources. These included Bishop Ribeiro, who expected that Indonesia's military intervention would be benign like India's actions in Goa, but was deeply disturbed by what he witnessed. Early in 1976 he told the Indonesian Government that "your Indonesian troops, with their murders, their violations and pillaging are a thousand times worse" (than Fretilin) and added that "the Indonesian paratroopers descended from heaven like angels but then behaved like devils".[183] He continued to make representations until, disillusioned, he retired to Portugal in 1977.

318. The Commission, however, has not been able to find any evidence that Pope Paul VI made public comment on the invasion or used his office to back calls by the UN Security Council for the withdrawal of Indonesian forces.

319. The Vatican Nuncio in Jakarta, Vincenzo Farano (1974-80), was also well-informed. He believed the Church had nothing to fear from incorporation into Indonesia but, like Bishop Ribeiro, was shocked by the violence. In response, he personally provided medical aid and made frequent visits to Timor-Leste, including to Fretilin-held areas, and to the civil war refugees in West Timor. Though further removed, the Papal Nuncio in Australia was also well aware of developments from the media and sources such as the Australian Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace which issued a series of statements about Timor-Leste in 1975 and 1976.

Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes (1977–1983)

320. Bishop Ribeiro resigned on 23 October 1977. Because of the disputed status of Timor-Leste, the Vatican then assumed direct management of the local Church rather than incorporate it into the Indonesian Church. After consultation with the local clergy, it appointed Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes as Apostolic Administrator, making him the first indigenous head of the Catholic Church in Timor-Leste. He was directly accountable to Rome through the Nuncio in Jakarta.*

* Patrick A Smythe, 'The Heaviest Blow' – The Catholic Church and the East Timor Issue, Lit Verlag, Münster, 2004, p. 36. The Bishop of Atambua in Indonesian West Timor, Theodore van den Tillart SVD, also described Fretilin as Marxist to Australia's Cardinal Knox and said it received help from international communism and was guilty of extensive human rights abuses. Cardinal Knox subsequently served in the Vatican. Smythe, p. 72.

321. This arrangement was politically significant. It signalled the Vatican's support for a UN process of self-determination rather than Indonesia's claim that the territory's political status had been resolved. Interviewed in Rome in 1980, Vatican officials stated that they regarded Timor-Leste as an 'occupied country' in which there had been no genuine act of self-determination. They added that the Vatican would not recognise Timor-Leste as part of Indonesia until it was clear this was the decision of the people endorsed by the United Nations.[184] Consistent with this policy, the Vatican maintained direct responsibility for the local Church throughout the conflict, thereby providing some protection and international access for its officials, and rejected pressures from Indonesia for ecclesiastical integration.† However, the Vatican did not publicise or promote its position internationally. Very few Catholics or the general international public were aware that the Vatican supported the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination.

322. Monsignor Lopes tenure was relatively brief. For the first three years, he adopted a co-operative approach in his dealings with the Indonesian authorities regarding the many violations communicated to him by the priests and people. He also kept the Indonesian Bishops and the Papal Nuncio in Jakarta informed. The Commission has not been able to find any record that the Vatican made any public or significant intervention in support during this period.

323. From 1981, Monsignor Lopes' relations with the Vatican and the Indonesian military soured, and in April 1983 he resigned under pressure from both bodies. The reasons for this unfortunate breakdown with the Vatican related to fundamentally divergent views on the issue and how to manage it. This was a period of intense crisis following severe Resistance losses, famine and, in mid-1981, a new military offensive against Fretilin. The Vatican was also concerned that escalating Church involvement in the conflict would harm the Church in Indonesia.

324. The Vatican Secretariat of State under Cardinal Agostino Casaroli (1979-90) shared the view of many governments that the Indonesian takeover was irreversible both internally and diplomatically and that continued resistance was futile and harmful. Pat Walsh informed the Commission that both the Papal Nuncio in Jakarta, Monsignor Pablo Puente, and his colleague at the UN in New York, Monsignor Ettore de Filippo, told him in 1980 that the Indonesian takeover of Timor-Leste was a fait accompli, that development under Indonesia was better than under Portugal, that the Vatican's responsibility was to protect the interests of the local Church and that this could best

* Monsignor Lopes was not ordained a bishop, but because of his position, East Timorese generally referred to him as Bishop.

† In their May 1980 report to the Vatican, the Indonesian Bishops, themselves under pressure from their government, asked 'that the Holy See weigh and consider the status of the Catholic Church in Timor-Leste so that it might enter fully into the Indonesian Bishops Conference'. Smythe, p. 59.

be achieved through co-operation with Indonesia.[185] The Vatican also believed that quiet diplomacy was more productive than public diplomacy.* Positive results from this approach could be pointed to in some areas, for example, the introduction of Tetum as the language of catechesis and liturgy – a significant contribution to cultural survival – and the granting of visas to missionaries. Monsignor Puente also believed that Indonesia had accepted that the heavy-handed military approach was wrong and that they were listening to his proposals for a substantial role for the Church.

325. Monsignor Lopes took a completely different point of view, which effectively cut across the Vatican strategy and was tantamount to insubordination. After six difficult and frustrating years, he did not share the Vatican's faith in the military and integration. In May 1981 he publicly denounced military excesses for the first time, and when reproached by ABRI for not coming to them in private he responded that previous direct approaches to senior military, including the Defence Minister, General Yusuf, had not resulted in any change.† He also criticised the Church. In July 1981, he co-signed a statement to the Indonesian Church which challenged it and the Vatican for their silence. Referring to the deaths of over 200,000 people over the previous six years, the statement lamented:

> We do not understand why the Indonesian Church and the Universal Roman Church have up till now not stated openly and officially their solidarity with the Church, people and religious of Timor-Leste. Perhaps this has been the heaviest blow for us…We felt stunned by this silence which seemed to allow us to die deserted.[186]

326. He disagreed that the East Timorese should give up. He advocated non-violence, but defended Fretilin's right to self-defence and collaborated with the Resistance leader Xanana Gusmão.‡

327. In 1981, the Vatican refused a request by Monsignor Lopes to meet the Pope. In 1982, the Vatican found fault with Monsignor Lopes after he became the centre of controversy over the extent of the food problem in Timor-Leste following the 1981 military offensive. Monsignor Puente criticised the Apostolic Administrator during a meeting with the former Australian Prime Minister, Gough Whitlam, who had visited Timor-Leste and did not believe there was a food crisis. The Australian Government

* The Vatican representative to the UN, Monsignor Renato Martino, told Patrick A Smythe: "The Holy See operates in a very quiet way, a silent way…There is no trumpet call, no intention for publicity." Smythe, p. 191. Monsignor de Filippo told Pat Walsh that at that time he had a passive brief on Timor-Leste at the UN.

† Rowena Lennox quotes the Apostolic Administrator saying about this time: "Taking into account the prophetic nature of my mission, I feel an urgent need to tell the whole world…about the genocide being practiced in Timor, so that, when we die, at least the world knows we died standing." Fighting Spirit of East Timor: The Life of Martinho da Costa Lopes, Pluto Press, London, 2000, p. 174.

‡ At Xanana Gusmão's request, Monsignor Lopes smuggled out of Timor-Leste for delivery to the Fretilin External Delegation literature damaging to the Indonesian military and tapes and photographs of the ceasefire talks in 1983. He told a seminar in Melbourne in October 1983: "José Gusmão Xanana says Fretilin is the people and the people is Fretilin. It's true." ACFOA East Timor Report, No. 5.

record of the meeting states that: "Puente spoke of the Administrator in measured, but very critical, terms. Mr Whitlam said he considered that the Administrator had behaved in a 'wicked' fashion. Puente did not demur."* In a communication to the Australian Bishops, the Vatican Secretariat of State criticised Monsignor Lopes for exaggerating the food situation and, in a veiled criticism of the Administrator, asked that the delicate question of Timor-Leste be treated with discretion and prudence. In March 1983, General Benny Moerdani, a Catholic, was appointed head of the Indonesian armed forces and pressed Monsignor Puente to replace Monsignor Lopes. This occurred in April, and on 17 May Monsignor da Costa Lopes flew out of Dili accompanied by the Papal Nuncio.† Fretilin rejected calls to surrender by General Moerdani in August and a new offensive was launched by the Indonesian military.

328. Monsignor Lopes' fellow priests were angered at his treatment. Writing in April to Catholic Bishops throughout the world, a group of priests commended him for often being "the only voice raised in defence of the people on whom silence and fear are imposed and for whom the exercise of freedom of expression will only result in imprisonment or disappearance". Their statement expressed "disappointment" and "profound hurt" at the "campaign of defamation" brought against him.[187]

329. On his way to Portugal, Monsignor Lopes was received by Pope John Paul II in Rome and spoke positively of the Pope's attitude. He also met with Cardinal Casaroli and told him "you are wrong about Timor-Leste". He later travelled extensively in Europe, North America and the Pacific advocating self-determination and independence and, though discounted in some quarters as a credible witness, contributed to the mobilisation of numerous Church agencies in support of Timor-Leste. He did not return to his homeland and died in Portugal in 1991.

Dom Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo SDB (1983–2003)

330. The Vatican's appointment of Dom Carlos Belo was made without proper consultation of the local clergy and was initially resented by them, particularly in the context of Monsignor Lopes' resignation. Monsignor Belo carefully avoided political partisanship, which damaged his relations with the Resistance, but like his two predecessors was gradually forced to become more outspoken. He explained the dynamics in a letter to the Papal Nuncio in Jakarta:

> Since 1983, the year I was appointed Apostolic Administrator, we have every year witnessed the same abuses. We have spoken to the authorities, but to no effect. The People are the ones who suffer.[188]

* Submission and additional information from Hon. E G Whitlam, Australian Senate Inquiry into East Timor, 1999, pp. 18, 97. Mr Whitlam publicised his criticisms of Monsignor Lopes widely, particularly in Australia.

† José Ramos-Horta recounts that Monsignor Lopes said his resignation was due to political pressures but that he accepted it "as God's design" and never criticised the Pope or Monsignor Puente (Funu, pp. 203-4). All accounts refer to General Moerdani's intervention, though it was clear that the Vatican had already lost confidence in its Administrator.

331. From early in his term, he committed himself to self-determination both as a right and as a formula for lasting peace. On 5 December 1984, he wrote to the Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace in France:

> Despite all forces against us, we continue to hold and disseminate that (the) only solution to the Timor-Leste conflict is a political and diplomatic one, and this solution should include, above all, respect for the right of a people for self-determination. We also want that the Pope John Paul's words to the Indonesian Ambassador to the Holy See, namely, respect for the cultural, ethnic and religious identity of the People of East Timor, be put into practice. As long as this is not implemented there will not be a peaceful solution for Timor-Leste.[189]

332. As a mark of its confidence, the Vatican made Monsignor Belo a Bishop in 1988. In February 1989, the new bishop repeated his support for self-determination in a private letter to the UN Secretary-General, Javier Perez de Cuellar. Similar letters were sent to the Portuguese President and the Pope. His letter challenged the Secretary-General to go beyond his contacts with Portugal and Indonesia and to consult the East Timorese people directly through a referendum. The letter explicitly rejected Indonesia's strongly held claim that Timor-Leste had fully exercised its right to self-determination and implied that claims by East Timorese political parties about Timor-Leste's status were also invalid. The Bishop wrote:

> The people of East Timor must be allowed to express their views on their future through a plebiscite. Hitherto the people have not been consulted. Others speak in the name of the people. Indonesia says that the people of East Timor have already chosen integration, but the people of East Timor themselves have never said this. Portugal wants time to solve the problem. And we continue to die as a people and as a nation.

333. In response to pressures to withdraw the letter, the Bishop stated that he was not advocating one political option over another, but affirming a democratic principle. The Papal Nuncio, Monsignor Francisco Canalini, distanced himself from the letter stating its contents were Bishop Belo's personal views only.[*] In 1987 he had stated the Vatican's official position in an interview with an Indonesian publication but indicated the policy was more a legal technicality than real. In 1990 he was asked to clarify the Vatican's position on Timor-Leste during a celebration in Dili but declined.

334. Bishop Belo's stand did much to strengthen his relations with the Resistance and earned him the Nobel Peace Prize in 1996. The prestigious award, which he shared with José Ramos-Horta, focused international attention on the primacy of self-determination and contributed to the momentum that culminated in the exercise of this right in August 1999. The President of Pontifical Justice and Peace Commission, Cardinal Roger Etchegaray, who had made a welcome visit to Timor-Leste in February that year, joined Bishop Belo at the award ceremony in Oslo.*

* The Reader's Digest reported that the Papal Nuncio told Bishop Belo to stay out of politics. Paul Raffaele, "Hero of a Forgotten People", Reader's Digest, March 1996. The edition was banned from newsstands in Jakarta.

335. The Vatican discouraged other Bishops from speaking out on Timor-Leste. In response to Bishop Belo's letter to the UN, Dom Manuel da Silva Martins, the Bishop of Setubal in Portugal collected the signatures of 160 Bishops in a letter of support to the UN. Cardinal Casaroli forbade him to send the letter and also prohibited him from speaking publicly about the issue. He did not concur, and the ban was relaxed after the Santa Cruz massacre in 1991.† Bishop Soma of Japan, who collected 1,257 Church signatures for a similar letter of support to the UN, was also cautioned by the Vatican. Sister Monica Nakamura told the Commission:

> Bishop Soma told me one day that after he started expressing his solidarity with Timor-Leste, he had gotten a letter from a Vatican official asking him just who had given him permission to do this sort of thing. Bishop Soma said with a broad smile that there is absolutely no need to ask permission to do the right thing.[190]

336. In Australia Bishop Hilton Deakin also declined to refrain from making public statements.

Pope John Paul II's visit to Timor-Leste in 1989

337. Many expected that Pope John Paul II's visit to Timor-Leste in 1989 would clear up ambiguities in the Vatican's policy on the territory and establish unequivocally where the Holy See stood. Though appreciated, the Pope's previous expressions of concern were limited to recognition of the suffering in Timor-Leste, prayerful support and admonitions to the Indonesian Government and others to respect the identity of the East Timorese people.‡ Aware of his role in bringing about political change in Poland, East Timorese hoped the Pope would use the visit to support political self-determination but feared it would sanction Indonesian sovereignty. The visit did neither. The Pope acknowledged the conflict and articulated principles for a solution, but stressed the pastoral nature of his visit and stated that a political solution was a matter for the United Nations, not the Vatican.

338. In an interview on Portuguese radio in 1991, he reflected on the visit:

> I went to Timor-Leste, not as a politician but as Pope and bishop, as pastor of the Church visiting the various Catholic communities…what

* Bishop Belo commented that Cardinal Etchegaray's visit had "boosted confidence in the Vatican". CIIR Timor Link, March 1996.

† The Papal Nuncio barred all reference to Timor-Leste in the Portuguese hierarchy's five-yearly ad limina reports to the Vatican on the grounds that the Diocese of Dili was no longer Portugal's responsibility. Smythe, p. 91.

‡ For example, Pope John Paul II's Mass at Fatima in 1982 was translated into Tetum.

> I wish for that community – which I also said during my visit to Timor – is that it should be able to live in accord with its own principles and customs, its language and its own culture, its own tradition and religion. The political problem is a problem to be taken up in another place: the United Nations. And I hope – I said this there and I must say it again now – that the problem of Timor-Leste will be resolved in accord with the principles of justice and human and national rights…I have maintained contact with their Bishop, Monsignor Belo. I have also there given special homage to the victims…But one thing must be stressed: If you talk about forgetting Timor, then that does not correspond with my true feelings, because I say a prayer for that island every day.[191]

339. The East Timorese people deeply appreciated the Pope's visit. What mattered most was that he came. Alex Gusmão, one of the students who demonstrated at the close of the Papal Mass at Tacitolu, told the Commission:

> We felt very proud. If he'd only come to Indonesia it would have meant he accepted East Timor as part of Indonesia, but he singled us out. It gave us a lot of hope.[192]

340. East Timorese differentiated the Pope from the Vatican bureaucracy about whom they remained highly critical. The then leader of the Resistance, Xanana Gusmão, who welcomed the Papal visit, said in 1991 in response to a question about the Vatican:

> We all know about the expulsion of Monsignor Lopes and the expulsion of the Portuguese priests, and we expect that one day Monsignor Belo will also be expelled. I think that it's an immoral attitude on the Vatican's part and that they're acting in their own political interests. The statement by Father Tucci who came to prepare the Pope's visit is very revealing. He stated that the Vatican shouldn't sacrifice its interests for the sake of a few hundred thousand Catholics. I don't think that is a correct attitude. We continue to feel Jakarta's influence on the Vatican and, in consequence the influence the Vatican exerts on the Church of Timor-Leste.[193]

341. Following the visit, John Paul II placed more emphasis on the need for a peaceful and just resolution of the conflict. In keeping with this, the Vatican mission to the UN became more active and made continuous representations in favour of troop reductions, human rights and dialogue. In 1998, the Pope and the Secretary of State, Cardinal Angelo Sardono, met with the UN Secretary-General on the issue and gave their support to the UN process. The violence after the August 1999 Popular Consultation filled the Pope with disgust:

> I cannot keep quiet my profound bitterness for yet another defeat of any sense of humanity when, at the dawn of the Third Millennium, fratricidal hands are raised once more to kill and destroy without mercy…in the > vain attempt to wipe out the desire expressed by the population and their legitimate aspirations…[194]

The Vatican's position on Timor-Leste and its relationship with Indonesia

342. The Vatican stopped short of mobilising its global resources in support of the political self-determination considered by the local Church and its Apostolic Administrator to be the key to peace. This was dictated by three related considerations: the Vatican's concept of the Church's mission, concern for the Catholic Church in Indonesia, and the Vatican's diplomatic modus operandi.

343. The Church's mission was spelled out by the Second Vatican Council (1962-65). In brief, it committed the modern church to both a spiritual and a social mission in the world, independent of any political system. The Vatican and the Church of Timor-Leste differed, however, in their interpretation of this mission in the context of the crisis in Timor-Leste. The local Church, which had been part of the Portuguese colonial system, now emphasised its community basis, independence from the state and prophetic role.* The Vatican preferred a more conciliatory approach and stressed principles without being direct or specific. It also considered that policy and management of the question was primarily its prerogative, not that of its local representative.

344. The Vatican's response was also shaped by its responsibilities for the welfare and mission of the Church in Indonesia and sensitivity to its situation as a minority in the world's most populous Muslim nation. At their first meeting in 1985, the Pope told Bishop Belo:

> I understand your position. I pray for Timor. I suffer for Timor. But, on the other hand, the Church in Indonesia also needs our attention.[195]

345. Church-state relations have been generally positive in Indonesia since Indonesian independence. As happened in Timor-Leste, independence was actively supported by many in the Catholic Church and resulted in the establishment of a secular, not an Islamic, state. This relationship deepened after General Soeharto came to power in 1965. The Church, aligned with the military and Soeharto, played a part in 'immunising' the community against communism and joined the New Order as a partner in nation-building through, inter alia, its respected network of health and educational institutions.†

---

* In a press release in 1996, Bishop Belo said: "I am fully aware of the norms of the Catholic Church which demands a religious leader to stay away from the concrete political practices specific to the field of politicians. But as a bishop I have a moral duty to speak for the voice of the poor and the simple people who, when intimidated or terrorized, cannot defend themselves or make their suffering voiced." 25 November 1996. The Indonesian Catholic priest Fr Mangunwijaya supported Bishop Belo's approach and said that the Indonesian Pancasila also obliged him to speak out in the public interest.

† The role of the Catholic Church at the time of the purge of the Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) is not well documented. The Bishops were dismayed by the number of killings and asked pardon for any irresponsibility on their part that may have contributed to the bloodbath. The Catholic activists Harry Tjan and Yusuf Wanandi, who advised President Soeharto on the takeover of Timor-Leste, were actively involved in anti-communist activity and forged close links with the military.

Catholics gained a number of influential positions in the Soeharto Government which served to protect the Church against militant Islam. Like the Indonesian Church itself, the Vatican was reluctant to risk destabilising these relationships by identifying too closely or publicly with the Timor-Leste issue.* It also appreciated the benefits of harmonious relations with Indonesia for its dealings throughout the Islamic world and preferred Timor-Leste to be seen as a political, not a religious, issue which it feared might happen if the wider Church became too involved. The Indonesian Church was not insensitive to the suffering in Timor-Leste and the pleas of the local Church, but acknowledged its political constraints and restricted support to practical forms of aid and assistance. In a letter to Monsignor Belo on 17 November 1983, written after he had briefed the Bishops at their assembly, the Indonesian Bishops Conference wrote:

> The Catholic Church in Indonesia…in spite of all restrictions, has made every possible effort to express its solidarity and friendship with the Faithful and the people of Timor-Leste who are being deluged by the most bitter trials, both physically and spiritually.†

346. Some individual Indonesian priests urged a stronger stand which, if taken, may have allowed the Vatican more options.

347. As already mentioned, the Vatican does not engage in public diplomacy as a matter of policy on the grounds that confrontation limits strategic options, closes the door to dialogue and is less productive than private representation. Accordingly, its statements on Timor-Leste were general, rather than informative, in character; it did not publicise its activities or criticise the Indonesian military directly, and it sought to restrain those who did. This policy extended to other states in relation to Timor-Leste. There is no evidence, for example, that the Vatican challenged the international arms trade with Indonesia, although the Church opposes arms proliferation. This low-key policy also protected its relationship with Indonesia. On the basis of his research, Father Patrick Smythe concluded:

> Overall the Church gave limited coverage to the subject of East Timor in its own broadcasting or printed publications, thereby falling short of its proclaimed responsibility "to furnish the missing information to those deprived of it and to give a voice to the voiceless".‡

348. Transparency and accountability were not hallmarks of Vatican diplomacy on Timor-Leste. In the absence of other indicators normally used to measure official positions, such as voting behaviour, media scrutiny, aid and trade, the lack of information makes it difficult to evaluate Vatican claims of actions undertaken on behalf of Timor-Leste and

* An outbreak of sectarian attacks on Christian churches occurred following the fall of Soeharto.

† This letter is signed by Monsignor F X Hadisumarta, O.Carm and Monsignor Leo Soekoto SJ on behalf of the Indonesian Bishops Conference (Majelis Agung Waligereja Indonesia, MAWI).

‡ Smythe, p. 19. There were many local exceptions to this, particularly by Catholic peace, justice and development agencies in several countries and by some diocesan papers and television programmes.

their effectiveness. The Commission hopes the Vatican will help settle these issues by opening its archives to independent research.

Conclusion

349. The Vatican contributed to the search for self-determination in Timor-Leste and the Commission acknowledges the value of this contribution, especially during the years when Timor-Leste had few influential allies. The Vatican did not desert the Church in Timor-Leste.

350. The Vatican's contribution, however, was limited. It lay more in what it did not do than in what it did. It upheld the principle of self-determination by not determining the status of the local Church until the people of Timor-Leste had freely decided on their political future and by not giving in to pressure for integration from both the Church and Government in Indonesia. In 1989, Pope John Paul II, in a deeply appreciated gesture, included Timor-Leste in his visit to Indonesia as a guest of the Indonesian Government, but he did not sanction integration with Indonesia, as many Timorese feared he might.

351. On the other hand, the Vatican stopped short of advocating self-determination or urging others to do so and, at times, counselled integration. This was done even though the international community agreed in principle on the relevance of this right and that it had been denied in Timor-Leste and even though self-determination was the clear aspiration of the East Timorese Church and the only principled and practical way both to resolve the conflict and to regularise the affairs of the local Church. This approach enabled it to balance its responsibilities to the Church in Indonesia, but weakened its potential contribution, particularly during the early years when it was uniquely well-informed and the crisis was deepest. When others did speak out it sought to silence them. This included many in the Church, like Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes the first indigenous leader of the Church in Timor-Leste, whose loyalty to the Church, the Pope and the Timorese people was total and whose commitment was forged in the crucible of suffering and prayer, not a political party. Having discredited him, the Vatican should now acknowledge his service, both as a true son of the Church and as a representative of others in the Church, particularly those priests and nuns in Timor-Leste who stood by their people in their darkest hours, and their Church colleagues elsewhere.

The diplomacy of the resistance

352. Timor-Leste conducted its campaign for self-determination and independence on three fronts: military, diplomatic, and clandestine. This section deals with the diplomatic campaign and documents the contribution made by: (1) the political parties, including the Resistance umbrella organisations, and (2) the Timor-Leste diaspora. The work of East Timorese activists in Indonesia is documented elsewhere in the report.

Political parties and umbrella bodies

353. Of the five historic parties established in Timor-Leste after Portugal's Carnation Revolution in April 1974, only UDT and Fretilin engaged in a long-term international campaign for self-determination and independence. The three minor parties – Apodeti, KOTA, and Trabalhista – did not have the capacity to function abroad and, with the exception of Trabalhista, advocated integration with Indonesia.* However, on 25 July 1998, all five parties united in opposing the Habibie autonomy proposal and called for a referendum.[196].

354. UDT was the first, and initially the largest, party in Timor-Leste. In a statement of principles prepared in 1974, UDT committed the party to "self-determination of the Timorese people aimed at a federation with Portugal as a way to reach independence".[197] It developed a foreign policy, entrusted João Carrascalão with its foreign relations portfolio and, with the assistance of the Christian Democrat Party, established a base (Gabinete de Timor) in Central Lisbon in 1974. It published a newsletter and engaged in some international activity, but did not set out systematically to build international support for itself or self-determination until much later.†

355. UDT's work in Lisbon owed much to the dedication of several individuals including Moises do Amaral, Paulo Pires and, later, Vicente Guterres. Like others, it had few links with Timor-Leste, but in the early years, when communications were most difficult, it benefited from intermittent secret contact with UDT sympathisers in the occupied territory, including Mario Carrascalão, Bishop José Joaquim Ribeiro and Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes.[198] The party did not attract significant community support in Portugal where civil society was more focused on Fretilin, but its pro-Portugal orientation and presence in Lisbon was helpful to the East Timorese cause in the 1980s when Portugal increased its attention on the issue.

356. UDT's defeat in the 1975 civil war with Fretilin had a devastating impact on the party politically and organisationally. It never completely recovered, and this seriously weakened its contribution to self-determination for Timor-Leste. The war resulted in the dispersal of the party's leadership and members and its marginalisation in Timor-Leste. It deepened and entrenched the rift with Fretilin, with whom it shared the goal of independence and had been in coalition‡. After the invasion, representatives of the party took opposing positions internationally with party officials in Portugal

* Partido Trabalhista (Timor Labour Party) supported independence, but Indonesia used it for propaganda advantage and its leaders were widely seen to co-operate with Indonesia after the takeover. Pat Walsh, East Timor's Political Parties and Groupings, Australian Council for Overseas Aid, Canberra, April 2001, p. 22.

† For example, James Dunn reports that UDT had a strong interest in Australia in 1974-75, but "Horta had made several visits to Australia before the UDT leaders got around to it". East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, Longueville Books, NSW, 2003, p. 50.

‡ Domingos de Oliveira testified to the Commission about the bad relations with Fretilin that already existed before the civil war and were worsened by the conflict and its aftermath (CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004). Following the Indonesian invasion, a number of UDT members were executed by members of Fretilin in Aileu, Maubisse, and Same (see Ch. 7.2: Extrajudicial Executions and Enforced Disappearances).

advocating independence while colleagues in Timor-Leste advocated integration in testimony to the UN and the US Congress. This damaged the party's credibility and caused considerable confusion and mistrust internationally.*

357. UDT became more active in the mid-1980s and from 1993, after being reorganised on democratic lines, was an effective advocate for Timor-Leste. However, the diplomacy of the Resistance during the first decade after the Indonesian invasion was mainly conducted by Fretilin.

358. Fretilin made two historic policy decisions early in its existence that had a fundamental impact on the outcome of Timor-Leste's international campaign for independence. Both decisions were born out of a realistic appreciation of Timor-Leste's weakness and vulnerability, and succeeded because they employed the strengths of others to Timor-Leste's advantage. They were the decision to engage in international diplomacy and the decision to utilise international law.

Fretilin's policy of internationalisation

359. Fretilin engaged in systematic international lobbying and networking from the beginning. From mid-1974, Fretilin representatives based at the Casa de Timor in Lisbon worked to win support from European politicians, governments and the public. Australian missions as far afield as Stockholm reported requests at this time from host governments, following Fretilin visits, for information about the situation in Timor-Leste.[199] Xavier do Amaral, Nicolau Lobato, Mari Alkatiri and Roque Rodrigues attended Mozambique's independence celebrations in June 1975. Following a statement of support for Fretilin by a conference of 49 Afro-Asian states in Mozambique in September 1975, Mari Alkatiri conducted a successful tour of several African states in November. Fretilin representatives in Timor-Leste focused on the region. Alarico Fernandes visited Australia. José Ramos-Horta visited Indonesia, New Zealand, Fiji and Australia – the latter more than once at this time. In return, civil society groups and journalists visited Timor-Leste, particularly from Australia but also from Portugal.

360. Foreign policy was, however, the subject of debate by the Fretilin leadership in 1975. Some considered that Western-style diplomacy was futile and believed Timor-Leste

* Mario Carrascalão, President of the UDT founding committee, defended integration with Indonesia on behalf of UDT in the first UN Security Council debate on Timor-Leste after the Indonesian invasion. In 1977 he testified to the US Congress as leader of UDT. In this testimony he attacked James Dunn's report about Indonesian atrocities at the time of the invasion as "blatant lies", accused Australians of "smuggling arms", denied there had been any "airborne invasion", claimed that many new weapons circulating in Dili were "Russian-manufactured", attacked Fretilin and stated that Timor-Leste had "gained much from our integration with Indonesia" ("Statement of Mario Carascalao [sic], Leader of Uniao Deocratica Timorese Political Party of East Timor" in Human Rights in East Timor and the Question of the Use of U.S. Equipment by the Indonesian Armed Forces - Hearing before the Subcommittees on International Organizations and on Asian and Pacific Affairs of the Committee on International Relations, House of Representatives, 95th Congress, First Session, 23 March 1977, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, 1977, pp. 47-58.). Francisco Lopes da Cruz, the first President of UDT, signed the Balibó Declaration and the Declaration of 17 December 1975 that established the Indonesian Provincial Government in Timor-Leste. Indonesia sent João Carrascalão to Africa and Paulo Pires to the Netherlands, but both were withdrawn when it was learned they used the opportunity to speak about the real situation in Timor-Leste.

should focus on self-reliance and armed struggle. Others favoured forming a front with other liberation movements in the region, including secessionist movements within Indonesia. Fretilin's official policy, however, remained pro-ASEAN and approaches from Irian Jaya and the South Moluccas were turned down.[200]

361. Following the Declaration of Independence in November 1975, the party opted to internationalise the struggle for liberation. One of the first decisions of the newly formed Cabinet of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste was to open a diplomatic front by dispatching a high-level mission overseas. This delegation comprised Mari Alkatiri, minister for political affairs, Rogerio Lobato, defence minister, and José Ramos-Horta, minister for external relations and information. Timor-Leste's diplomatic fate may well have been very different if their hurried departure ahead of the advancing Indonesian army had not happened.[201] They joined three other Fretilin representatives who were already overseas: Abilio Araújo, minister for economic and social affairs, Guilhermina Araújo, deputy minister for economic relations, and Roque Rodriques, ambassador designate to Mozambique. None of this group was able to return to Timor-Leste for at least 24 years allowing Indonesia to claim repeatedly that they did not represent the real situation there.

362. Though primarily intended to establish Fretilin and the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste internationally, their activity laid the foundations for the future campaign for self-determination. They opened key diplomatic fronts in Europe, Africa, the United States and the UN. Strong and lasting links were also fostered with civil society organisations in many countries. This network was to be a critically important asset for a remote, poor country with almost no resources of its own and few state allies.

363. Led by Mari Alkatiri, the Fretilin External Delegation established its headquarters in Maputo, Mozambique. The Government of Mozambique gave Timor-Leste staunch support throughout the conflict. In addition to providing an operational base, this included giving funds, passports, diplomatic support at the UN and study opportunities.* Missions were also established in Portugal (Abilio Araújo), Angola (Roque Rodrigues, following a period as Ambassador to Mozambique), and the United Nations (José Ramos-Horta). Their task was to represent Timor-Leste abroad and to promote the struggle for liberation, both in their countries of residence and elsewhere. The solid support given to Timor-Leste in the UN by many African states owes much to this Mozambique-based diplomacy. Fretilin women members based in Mozambique were also active diplomatically and represented Timor-Leste further afield, including to the Middle East.†

364. Due to Indonesia's influence, Fretilin was not welcome in most of the Asia-Pacific region and the Australian Government banned visits by Fretilin officials from about

* Most of the Fretilin leaders and the students who joined them from Lisbon completed their tertiary education in Mozambique in disciplines such as agriculture, law and international relations. Most returned to Timor-Leste after 1999 and are using their education to serve the new nation. CAVR interview with Harold Moucho, 19 March 2005. Fretilin's official bank account was in Mozambique.

† Women members of Fretilin in Mozambique included Ana Pessoa, Filomena de Almeida, Adelina Tilman, Marina Ribeiro, Madalena Boavida. Adelina Tilman was part of the Fretilin team at the UN.

April 1976.[*] Socialist governments in East Asia which recognised the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste were an exception. The People's Republic of China initially provided some diplomatic and financial support to Fretilin.[†] Visits were made to the Democratic Republic of Kampuchea and fraternal contact was maintained with the People's Democratic Republic of Korea and the People's Democratic Republic of Laos[‡]. The Republic of Vanuatu after independence in 1980 was an isolated exception in the South Pacific. Its leaders, Walter Lini and Barak Sope, supported Timor-Leste at the UN and sanctioned the establishment of an economic venture by Abilio Araújo in Vanuatu to fund Fretilin's diplomatic activities.[§]

365. Australia's denial of access to Fretilin officials was offset by the presence of Fretilin cadres and solidarity groups who represented Fretilin de facto. Their activities included operating the Darwin-based radio link which, until its closure in 1978, was the only direct two-way link between the Fretilin Resistance inside Timor-Leste and the diplomatic front. However, Fretilin members were slow to set up publicly. They were a minority in a mainly UDT community and, as refugees, the community feared being expelled if they sided overtly with Fretilin against Indonesia. The first demonstration at which Fretilin and RDTL flags were displayed, was held in Sydney in 1981. The political situation relaxed after the election of the Hawke Labour Government in 1983. Many East Timorese, including Fretilin organisers such as Lay Kuon Nhen, Abel Guterres and others, took part in a large public rally in Melbourne addressed by Abilio Araújo and Roque Rodriques, and attended a demonstration at the Labour Party conference in Canberra that year. The first official Fretilin Committee was established in Sydney in 1986 with as co-ordinator. By the late 1980s Fretilin was well established in many parts of Australia, including Darwin, Sydney, Melbourne and Perth and had good contact with the Resistance in Timor-Leste. Agio Pereira was the first Fretilin representative in Australia. Others were Alfredo Ferreira Borges, Estanislau da Silva and Francisco Carlos. They had responsibilities for various parts of Australia and the region, and worked hard at building links with political parties, the Church, civil society and the media in support of Timor-Leste. The Party held an Extraordinary Conference in Sydney, 14–20 August 1998.

* The Australian Prime Minister, Malcolm Fraser, informed President Soeharto in November 1975 that his Government would not receive Ramos-Horta or other Fretilin representatives if they came to Australia. Document 344, Jakarta, 25 November 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, pp. 580-81. The ban was lifted in 1983 by the Hawke Labour Government.

† China recognised the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste and spoke strongly in its defence in the UN Security Council. Mari Alkatiri and José Ramos-Horta visited China early in the conflict. Mari Alkatiri's testimony to CAVR Hearing on Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

‡ Rogério Lobato, Commander-in-Chief, Revolutionary Army of East Timor, to Ieng Sary, Deputy Prime Minister for Foreign Affairs, Democratic Republic of Kampuchea, 21 December 1977.

§ Vanuatu's representative at the UN, Robert van Lierop, actively supported Timor-Leste in many forums. The economic venture failed but is evidence of the effort and creativity that was required to meet the costs of an international campaign.

Use of international law

366. Fretilin's early campaign was based on the Unilateral Declaration of Independence (UDI) of 28 November 1975 and the establishment of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste (RDTL). When they arrived at the United Nations in New York on 11 December 1975, Abilio Araújo and José Ramos-Horta presented themselves as RDTL ministers. In his speech to the Security Council on 15 December, José Ramos-Horta denounced UDT, described the UDI of 28 November as "a heroic act of self-determination", and called on the Council to condemn Indonesia's invasion as an act of aggression against a sovereign nation that was being recognised "by an ever-increasing number of countries."[202] On 12 April 1976, he told the Security Council that Fretilin "no longer recognises Portuguese sovereignty over East Timor", thereby rejecting the UN position that Portugal remained the administering power in Timor-Leste. RDTL, he said, was prepared to deal with both Indonesia and Portugal only "as between government and government, state and state".[203]

367. It soon became clear, however, that, in José Ramos-Horta's words, "recognition of the Democratic Republic of East Timor was a non-starter" because few countries were prepared to endorse the new creation. José Ramos-Horta told the Commission:

> Of course in the first few weeks after the invasion, I and everybody else argued very energetically about the Democratic Republic of East Timor. But by 1976-77, we decided to change tack and concentrate on East Timor (as) a non-self-governing territory with a right to self-determination… We were in a stronger legal position if we argued on the basis of self-determination for a non-self-governing territory.

368. At the time, a colleague who was unhappy with the decision suggested that they retain their titles of minister so that when governments received them it would mean they recognized RDTL. Ramos-Horta said he replied: "The only problem with that demand is you might never get an invitation to go anywhere!"* Though not formally revoked,† the 1975 policy was quietly put to one side.

369. Fretilin's decision to utilise the international system rather than fight it was based on a pragmatic assessment of the political realities. This strategic backdown did not yield rapid political results and it took time to translate into practicalities, but it worked to Timor-Leste's advantage in the long-term. Self-determination focused attention on the fundamental principle at stake, rather than the claims of one interest group. This enhanced the legitimacy and appeal of the issue and sharpened focus on

* CAVR interview with José Ramos-Horta, Dili, 26 May 2004. Some 20 states, mostly in Africa, recognised RDTL.

† In its judgement, the Fretilin-sponsored Permanent People's Tribunal, held in Lisbon in June 1981, recognised the legitimacy and legal validity of the formation of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste (Sessão Sobre Timor-Leste, Lisboa, 19/21 Junho 1981, Sentenca), pp. 29-30. However, invoking RDTL did not help legally. In 1980, Fretilin's case against the Dutch government over the sale of corvettes to Indonesia was rejected by the court on the grounds that neither RDTL nor Fretilin had any legal status. Krieger, p. 298.

the responsibilities of the international community, Portugal and the United Nations in particular. Over time, it made possible the building of broad partnerships – with Portugal, East Timorese who were not Fretilin, the church and civil society – and turned the struggle into a moral and human rights issue which worked against Indonesia and its principal allies, particularly Western democracies who espoused respect for the rule of law and human rights.

Diplomacy at the UN

370. As the world body responsible for upholding the right of self-determination, the UN was the principal arena for Resistance diplomacy. This work fell principally to Fretilin as UDT and independent Timorese activists did not become involved at this level until the mid-1980s. Fretilin entrusted this critical task to José Ramos-Horta who represented the party in New York for 13 years until he resigned his membership of Fretilin in 1988.

371. The work was exacting and demanded a high level of skill, creativity, commitment and resilience. "The Indonesians", José Ramos-Horta told the Commission, "were very, very much on top of it all the time".[204] It was essential to understand the workings of the UN itself and to cultivate through study and discussion a knowledge of world affairs and the politics of key member states. On a day-to-day basis, it involved constant lobbying, vigilance, monitoring of information, and the building and maintenance of links with a large number of countries, officials, journalists and members of civil society. The work was more intense at certain points in the UN calendar, particularly when a lot was at stake for Timor-Leste. Other members of the External Delegation joined José Ramos-Horta on these occasions. To ensure complementarity and consistency, this work at the centre also had to be co-ordinated with Resistance diplomacy in particular countries which also required similar skills but on a smaller and usually less intense scale.

372. Apart from the monumental scale of the assignment in political terms, José Ramos-Horta and his Fretilin colleagues had to contend with many practical and organisational challenges. The delegation had few human and financial resources. At the beginning, the Guinea-Bissau mission had to make room in its office for the Fretilin representatives, and staff support, never adequate, was provided by volunteers.* Contact with Timor-Leste was indirect and intermittent. The delegation was not given recognition as a government or observer status as a liberation movement.† It had nothing to offer by way of votes, aid or trade in return for support. It depended on the goodwill of a handful of friendly states, in particular Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau and the other former Portuguese African colonies, themselves newly independent. This was supplemented in the early period by support from Tanzania's Ambassador to the UN, Salim A Salim, Chair of the Special Committee on Decolonisation and Huang Hua, the People's Republic of China representative.

* David Scott helped establish the mission with assistance from the UN Methodist Women's Centre. One of the last Australians to leave Timor-Leste on the eve of the Indonesian invasion, he went almost immediately to New York on behalf of the Australia East Timor Association to help Fretilin lobby the Security Council. Testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.

† Unlike Palestine and the South African organisations ANC and PAC, Fretilin was not given observer status at the UN. However, it was acknowledged by name in the preamble of General Assembly resolutions between 1976 and 1982. In the 1981 Resolution 36/50, Fretilin was described as "the liberation movement of East Timor" (Krieger, p. 27).

373. Portugal was supportive in UN debates but not otherwise active. Indonesia, on the other hand, had available to it the resources of a fully established embassy, and regardless of voting patterns on the floor of the UN, the diplomatic support of most Western, Muslim and Asian countries, plus significant Western economic and military assistance. James Dunn commented: "In the United Nations it was a constant struggle of a Timorese David against an Indonesian Goliath."* Coordination with other Fretilin diplomats was expensive and difficult, and the delegation was handicapped by internal ideological differences and the damaging perception, sometimes confirmed by its rhetoric and alliances, that it had taken sides in the Cold War against the West.† In addition, Fretilin had to counter systematic attempts to undermine its credibility by Indonesia and by East Timorese who testified to the United Nations in support of integration. They told the Security Council that Fretilin was unrepresentative of majority opinion in Timor-Leste, arguing that it was the only one of Timor's five parties that opposed integration, and that it had engaged in terrorism in Timor-Leste.‡

374. Voting in the Security Council and General Assembly initially favoured Timor-Leste and upheld the right to self-determination by solid majorities. But the numbers did not reflect the reality of Indonesia's political and economic strength or the growing belief that the occupation of Timor-Leste was irreversible. Despite Fretilin's efforts, the text of resolutions gradually weakened between 1975 and 1981 and the number of member states either voting against or abstaining, grew. In 1981 member states voting for Timor-Leste numbered 54, those against 42 and abstentions 46, that is, only 34% of the world body supported Timor-Leste's case.

375. Different strategies were tried, with varying degrees of success. Fretilin succeeded in having a UN fact-finding mission sent to Timor-Leste in 1976, but Indonesia blocked

* José Ramos-Horta, Foreword in Towards a Peaceful Solution in East Timor, East Timor Relief Association (ETRA), NSW, Australia, 1996, p. 7. The Biblical story of David and Goliath (1 Samuel, 17:1-58) is a fitting image for Timor-Leste. David learned his courage and fighting skills as a shepherd boy defending his flocks from wild animals, including lions and bears. In his free time, he developed two other skills – music and poetry. He took on Goliath, the Philistine giant, on his own and overcame Goliath's superior strength with a sling.

† David Scott wrote: "Abilio Araújo saw the struggle in the Marxist-Leninist context he had acquired in Lisbon. He and José Ramos-Horta discussed and argued in Portuguese over policy approaches and terminology. Abilio wanted us to use Marxist language in media statements; José preferred to use a more politically neutral, factually focused approach." Unpublished manuscript, 2004.

‡ Indonesia's first statement to the UN Security Council on Timor-Leste, delivered by Anwar Sani on 15 December 1975, included several accusations of terrorism by Fretilin (Krieger, p. 60). East Timorese who testified on Indonesia's behalf to this session of the Security Council were Mario Carrascalão (UDT), José Gonçalves (Independenti) and José Martins (KOTA). Their statements, which included attacks on Fretilin and José Ramos-Horta, worked against Fretilin's credibility and advocacy within the UN and strengthened the international perception that Timor-Leste society was deeply divided and unstable (Krieger, pp. 70-77). José Martins formally "defected" in March 1976 and presented the United Nations with a confidential report detailing Indonesia's designs on Timor-Leste.

the envoy, Vittorio Winspeare Guicciardi, from meeting Fretilin Resistance leaders and the visit was inconclusive. UN Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim, did not follow up and Timor-Leste did not return to the agenda of the Security Council until 1999. To buy time and strengthen Timor-Leste's legal position, José Ramos-Horta proposed that the General Assembly be persuaded to request an Advisory Opinion from the International Court of Justice on whether or not a proper act of self-determination had been conducted as claimed by Indonesia. Portugal, however, did not agree and the idea was abandoned.* With the assistance of Francesc Vendrell in the UN Secretariat, José Ramos-Horta succeeded in having the General Assembly make reference to the humanitarian situation in Timor-Leste in resolutions adopted in 1979-81. These resolutions included calls for access by UNICEF, UNHCR and the WFP to provide assistance and, indirectly, served to alert the international community to the negative impact of Indonesia's occupation and to challenge its embargo on access. Indonesia, however, permitted access only to UNICEF.†

376. One way of measuring the success of Resistance diplomacy, both in-country and at the UN, was to count references to Timor-Leste in UN debates. José Ramos-Horta told the Commission that he sat through countless sessions of the UN General Assembly hoping to hear mention of the issue, particularly by a senior government figure, but was often disappointed.

> You count what you hear in the General Assembly. When a head of state, a prime minister or foreign minister, brings an issue to the plenary of the General Assembly it is significant. Each year I would be sitting there, listening, counting, and every time I heard even a small reference – wow, that's it! But there were very few.[205]

377. Fretilin's external delegation experienced serious ideological and leadership struggles during this period. These coincided with purges within Fretilin in Timor-Leste and were exacerbated by military setbacks, including the death of the Fretilin leader, Nicolau Lobato, and Timor-Leste's difficult diplomatic situation. They came to a head in 1978 in Maputo when Mari Alkatiri, Marina Ribeiro, José Ramos-Horta and Ana Pessoa were placed under house arrest by Fretilin colleagues. Ramos-Horta was charged with "capitulationism" and describes the affair as "ugly and violent".[206] He told the Commission:

> I was accused of wanting to negotiate with Indonesia, simply because I did not agree with the slogan in Timor at that time…from the Central Committee, that 'Negotiations Never'.[207]

* Portugal believed that Timor-Leste had not exercised its right and that it should not put this conviction in question by asking the ICJ for an opinion. In a separate action in 1991, Portugal took Australia to the ICJ for violating, inter alia, Timor-Leste's right of self-determination through its treaty with Indonesia to jointly exploit oil and gas resources in a section of the Timor Sea.

† In June 1982, UNICEF commenced a programme with the Indonesian Red Cross for children, mothers and their families. As part of the programme, UNICEF taught Indonesian to East Timorese women on the grounds that they needed to know Indonesian to understand feeding and other health information. The use of Indonesian attracted strong criticism from José Ramos-Horta. CAVR interview, 26 May 2004. UNHCR contributed financially to some repatriations to Portugal and Cape Verde.

378. He said that he argued that flexibility to enter dialogue, including with Indonesia, should not be equated with surrender and was essential to end the conflict. He said that Abilio Araújo orchestrated the affair with support from Rogério Lobato and the Australian activist Denis Freney, who was also present at the meetings.* The issue was resolved with assistance from Frelimo representatives.

379. The affair damaged Fretilin internally and set back its international campaign, though it was not widely publicised. Tied up in Mozambique from September 1978 to February 1979, José Ramos-Horta had to cancel a visit to New Zealand, which solidarity groups had succeeded in organising after a public struggle with their government, and was unable to represent Timor-Leste during the UN General Assembly debate that year. Eight countries deserted Timor-Leste during that session. The downward trend was marginally reversed the following year when, after much hard work by the Fretilin delegation, Timor-Leste regained three lost votes.

The 1982 vote at the UN

380. The 1982 UN General Assembly session was a test of strength for the main protagonists and a critical moment for Timor-Leste. Under Prime Minister Pinto Balsemão, Portugal showed some signs of re-engagement with the issue following a Council of Ministers statement in 1980 in favour of self-determination for Timor-Leste and a diplomatic initiative. For its part, Indonesia gained, inter alia, further support from Australia. Several days before the General Assembly vote, the former Australian Prime Minister, Gough Whitlam, told the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation:

> It is high time that the question of East Timor was voted off the United Nations agenda and ceased to preoccupy and distract the nations of South-east Asia and the Pacific.[208]

381. In response, José Ramos-Horta proposed that the issue be referred to the "good offices" of the UN Secretary-General, then Javier Perez de Cuellar (1982-91). He prepared a draft resolution along these lines in his small basement apartment on East 55th Street, New York, and hoped that member states would accept it because they could not be seen to say no to talks. He believes that his drafting of this resolution was his "greatest contribution" to the Timor-Leste cause.†

382. Indonesia worked hard in opposition. With the support of Roque Rodriques, José Luis Guterres, and Timor-Leste's main allies – Angola, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, São Tomé and Principe, Portugal, Brazil, Vanuatu, Zimbabwe, Benin and Algeria – the Resolution was carried by a mere four votes. Ramos-Horta told the

* José Ramos-Horta acknowledged Denis Freney's contribution to Timor-Leste in his Nobel Peace Prize Acceptance Speech in Oslo on 10 December 1996. However, he was critical of Denis Freney's "destructive" behaviour at this time and described him as "very dedicated to Timor, but dedicated through his own ideological beliefs and Abilio was the real trusted ideological comrade". CAVR interview, 26 May 2004.

† General Assembly Resolution 37/30, 23 November 1982. CAVR interview with José Ramos-Horta, Dili, 29 July 2004.

Commission that "the Timor cause would never have recovered if that vote had been lost".[209] Over half of the votes for Timor-Leste came from countries in Africa where the Fretilin delegation was based.*

383. Operationally, the Resolution was a gamble because it involved entrusting Timor-Leste's fate to two institutions in which Fretilin had had little confidence to that point: the Government of Portugal and the UN Secretary-General.† The reference in the Ramos-Horta draft to consulting Fretilin and other Timorese was replaced with a vague reference in the final text to "all parties directly concerned" which left it to the Secretary-General, Javier Perez de Cuellar, to decide whom he would consult and to Portugal to ensure that Timorese views were heard in the process.

384. The first signs gave little cause for optimism. Nearly 12 months after the issue had been referred to the Secretary-General, José Ramos-Horta publicly accused Portugal of indifference, apathy and betrayal.[210] And a further 12 months on, in August 1984, Lord Avebury, Chair of the British Parliamentary Human Rights Group, felt compelled to point out to the Secretary-General that his Progress Report referred only to contacts with Portugal and Indonesia and contained "no indication that any attempt was made to consult with the Revolutionary Front for the Independence of East Timor (Fretilin) or any other Timorese parties".[211]

385. The decision to use the system, however, was to prove correct. The issue was kept on the UN agenda, but spared a potentially fatal vote in the General Assembly, and some hope of a diplomatic solution was kept alive until the winds of change finally turned in Timor-Leste's direction in the 1990s. The Resistance kept the focus clearly on the UN and gave increased attention to other UN forums, particularly the annual meetings of the UN Commission on Human Rights in Geneva and the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation in New York, both of which allowed for debate on self-determination. In addition to lobbying and making its own statements, the Resistance encouraged civil society participation to considerable effect (see section on international civil society below, paragraph 429-526).

Rebuilding the parties

386. From the 1980s, Fretilin and UDT underwent a series of changes that affected their international diplomacy and, step by step, contributed to the building of at least a partial new coalition to promote self-determination.

387. In 1981, following near annihilation, Fretilin established the Revolutionary Council of National Resistance (Conselho Revolucionária de Resistência Nacional, CRRN). The Council was set up inside Timor-Leste with input from Abilio Araújo in Lisbon. From the point of view of the diplomatic campaign, the important contribution of the

* 27 countries in Africa voted for Timor-Leste, 6 against and 13 abstained.

† José Ramos-Horta believes that the UN Secretary-General, Kurt Waldheim (1972-81), must share the blame for the failure of the Security Council to follow up its 1976 resolution on Timor-Leste. The Security Council did not address the issue again until 1999 (Funu: The Unfinished Saga of East Timor, The Red Sea Press, 1987, p. 122).

new body was that it demonstrated the resurgence of Fretilin and that the Resistance inside was reconnected with its external representatives after several years of enforced mutual isolation. Little was known about CRRN itself outside Timor-Leste, but Xanana Gusmão's meeting with the Indonesian commander, Colonel Purwanto, in March 1983 at Lariguto, facilitated by Mario Carrascalão, was well publicised internationally and did much to rejuvenate support for Timor-Leste.* Fretilin's Peace Plan, launched internationally by José Ramos-Horta in June 1984 on the basis of initiatives from inside Timor-Leste, gave a new focus to international solidarity work with the specific objective of having Timor-Leste directly represented in the UN-sponsored search for a comprehensive settlement. The demand to be included in the UN process alongside Portugal and Indonesia as the party most "directly concerned" became a major focus of Resistance and civil society advocacy and was made in numerous documents and forums by Timorese leaders.†

388. The rebuilding of UDT took place principally outside Timor-Leste and initially involved building up the party in Australia. The party established a national presence in Australia after João Carrascalão migrated to Sydney from Portugal in 1978 and joined many UDT members and supporters who had settled in Australia as refugees following the civil war. Supported by Domingos de Oliveira, Lucio Encarnacão, António Nascimento, Fausto Soares and others, the UDT leadership had to overcome many individual and political challenges. João Carrascalão informed the Commission that life in Australia was very hard to start with and that his first job in Sydney was in a plastic factory, working 12 hours a day on a rotating shift and that later he had to take a second job cleaning buses and offices to save money to travel abroad on behalf of Timor-Leste. Other UDT refugees in Australia had similar experiences. He also had to contend with mistrust of UDT by civil society organisations and sections of the diaspora.

> I was very much involved with the Resistance outside. At the beginning a lot of people didn't believe that I was not pro-integrationist. Because my brother was the Governor and UDT was suffering the effects of the original propaganda saying that UDT wanted integration…So it was not very easy, many people didn't believe. Probably even my colleagues from the leadership of the Resistance didn't believe that I had never sided with the Indonesians.[212]

389. Once established, UDT added its voice to calls for self-determination. In 1982, João Carrascalão was one of two East Timorese to testify to an Australian Senate Hearing on

* An audience of 1500 people attended a public meeting in Melbourne in 1983 to welcome Abilio Araújo and Roque Rodrigues on Fretilin's first official visit to Australia after the lifting of a ban by the Australian Government and to hear their report on the Lariguto peace talks between Fretilin and Indonesia.

† For example, Xanana Gusmão's letter to the UN Secretary-General, 7 August 1985, transmitted by the São Tomé mission (UN document S/17592); his letter to Boutros Boutros Ghali (31 January 1992) and to Nelson Mandela (15 May 1992). Xanana Gusmão's first address to the UN on behalf of CRRN was dated 14 October 1982, but was a defiant situation report rather than a direct appeal for UN action.

Timor-Leste.* In November 1987, he represented UDT at the first Christian Consultative Conference for Asia and the Pacific on Timor-Leste, held in Manila. The conference called for direct East Timorese participation in talks to resolve the conflict.

390. Attempts to make the party a more effective and credible vehicle for East Timorese aspirations were handicapped by internal disagreements between UDT leaders in Lisbon and Australia. These were finally resolved in 1993 when the party, assisted by a younger generation of UDT leaders committed to democratic reform, held a congress in Portugal, the first such gathering since the civil war.[213] The congress elected João Carrascalão as President and expelled Francisco Lopes da Cruz, UDT's first president, for the "crime of high treason against the party, the people and the fatherland".[214] A number of regional committees were established to put the campaign for Timor-Leste on a more organised basis. Zacarias da Costa was placed in charge of international relations and for the next five years UDT took the case for self-determination to all UN forums and major international civil society gatherings. This work was particularly effective in Europe where, inter alia, it combined with lobbying by Portugal, Fretilin and civil society organisations to generate increasingly strong opposition by the European Parliament to Indonesian rule in Timor-Leste.

391. In 1993 Fretilin also addressed the long-running power struggle between the leaders of the external delegation: Mari Alkatiri, Abilio Araújo and José Ramos-Horta. Timorese activists were highly critical of the infighting and made constant appeals for its resolution. They believed it factionalised Fretilin abroad, distracted the leaders from their main role, and created confusion within the Resistance inside Timor-Leste when the information they received from outside was often of one member discrediting another. They were also critical of inactivity on the part of Abilio Araújo and Guilhermina Araújo.[215] José Ramos-Horta's resignation from Fretilin in 1988 and appointment as the Special Representative of CNRM, followed by Abilio Araújo's decision to assume the leadership of Fretilin, brought the issue to a head. In August 1993, at the initiative of Mari Alkatiri, then deputy leader, the Fretilin External Delegation removed Abilio Araújo as head of the delegation and as Fretilin representative for Europe and Portugal.†

Divergence to convergence: the search for unity and peace

392. UDT and Fretilin recognised that, in the interests of Timor-Leste, a modus vivendi was imperative. João Carrascalão told the Commission that the relationship in the early years was "very, very bad", particularly at the community level. He and Mari Alkatiri met secretly in Portugal in 1976 to discuss the problem but decided "it was

* The other witness was João Gonçalves, Social Welfare Officer for the Timor-Leste community.

† Abilio Araújo was expelled from Fretilin for collaboration with Indonesia. He is now President of the Timorese Nationalist Party (Partido Nacionalista Timorense) which was founded in Dili on 15 July 1999 to promote broad autonomy within Indonesia based on a "third way policy" that would offer a choice that involved neither CNRT "dictatorship" nor full integration with Indonesia. PNT accepted the results of the 1999 ballot and UNTAET's role as the legal authority in Timor-Leste during the transition to independence. An accomplished musician, Abilio Araújo composed the music for the national anthem Pátria, Pátria and the well known East Timorese songs Foho Ramelau and Funu nain Falintil.

very difficult now to work together". He observed that "it took a long time for people to realise that the struggle could not be conducted separately".[216]

393. The establishment of the Nationalist Convergence (Convergencia Nacionalista) in 1986 was a step forward in this direction. The idea originated in informal discussions between José Ramos-Horta and João Carrascalão, but was given impetus by Anacoreto Correia, a Portuguese parliamentarian who had visited Timor-Leste in July 1986. The Convergence was external to Timor-Leste and did not enjoy broad or enduring support from either party,* but its signatories – Moises do Amaral (Chair of UDT's Political Commission) and Abilio Araújo (Head of Fretilin's External Delegation) – believed that a demonstration of unity was essential to offset reversals in international support for Timor-Leste and to win more support in Portugal and Europe.† José Ramos-Horta believes it did assist:

> It did help because the Portuguese at the time were using the divergences between Fretilin and UDT to justify doing nothing. It did help, but it was always an eternal battle to keep it together.[217]

394. Fretilin made the first of a number of concessions to UDT. It acknowledged UDT as an equal partner and agreed to a future multi-party system. Convergence statements described UDT and Fretilin as the "legitimate" and the "two most important nationalist organisations of Timor-Leste"[218] and called on Portugal to finance the diplomatic work of both parties. In 1987, Fretilin and UDT delegations testified to the UN Decolonisation Committee in New York in support of self-determination. UDT acknowledged its long silence and absence from the UN. It rejected Indonesian claims that UDT supported integration and called for independence stating that "we want our people to make such sovereign choice through a due democratic process under the supervision of the UN".[219]

395. In December 1988, a new nationalist umbrella organisation was formed: the National Council of Maubere Resistance (CNRM). CNRM represented a radical revision of doctrine and strategy which had been foreshadowed 12 months earlier when Xanana Gusmão issued a statement in which he rejected Marxism, declared Falintil a politically neutral army and resigned from Fretilin.[220] What inspired the struggle, he stated, was the wish to live free of foreign occupation, not revolution, pointing out that the Eastern bloc had been unresponsive to Timor-Leste's plight. The word "revolutionary" was replaced with "Maubere" as CNRM replaced CRRN, signifying that political ideology was to be subordinated to the cause of national independence and an inclusive, non-partisan approach. These changes had a powerful impact in Timor-Leste. Mario Carrascalão observed:

---

* João Carrascalão told the Commission that the Convergencia Nacionalista "was not taken seriously at the time by either UDT or Fretilin" and that there were suspicions of Indonesian involvement. CAVR interview, Dili, 30 July 2004.

† Convergence communications urged Portugal to step up its advocacy for Timor-Leste in its UN-sponsored talks with Indonesia and to develop a "dynamic plan of action" for implementation when it joined the European Union in 1987 (Krieger, p. 279).

When Xanana said that he wasn't Fretilin, only the commander of Falintil, that's when the war started to be won. Apodeti and UDT people who had been enemies of Fretilin could also join the movement.[221]

396. UDT, however, still felt that the term "Maubere" was not inclusive enough and formally withheld membership from the CNRM, though it was cooperative in practice.*

397. These changes also laid the foundation for an effective new diplomatic campaign. Coming towards the end of the Cold War, they were a timely challenge to the entrenched international perception that the independence movement was an extreme left-wing project and a threat to Indonesia and regional stability. The language of human rights and democracy replaced the militant rhetoric of the past. The CNRM, Xanana Gusmão declared, was:

> committed to building a free and democratic nation, based on respect for the freedoms of thought, association and expression, as well as complete respect of Universal Human Rights. A multi-party system and a market economy will be foundations of an independent Timor-Leste…It will be a free and non-aligned state with the firm purpose of becoming a member of ASEAN, in order to contribute to regional stability.†

398. This new approach was projected internationally by the appointment of José Ramos-Horta as Xanana Gusmão's personal representative and CNRM's special representative abroad. Identifying the Resistance with Ramos-Horta, whose social democrat and human rights credentials were more acceptable internationally than the Marxist image of Abilio Araújo, demonstrated the extent of the reforms. His appointment was not initially welcomed by UDT and Fretilin, who feared it would weaken their role.‡ The new strategy required them to play a less central role by subordinating party interests to the nationalist cause and sharing the campaign with a growing number of Timorese activists from outside their ranks.

399. As part of its new diplomatic offensive, the Resistance launched another peace plan developed by José Ramos-Horta in consultation with Fretilin's External Delegation and Xanana Gusmão. Ramos-Horta put the plan on paper in Dharamsala, the headquarters

* João Carrascalão told the Commission the word "Maubere" was not known in some parts of Timor-Leste and was not accurate: "We are not all Maubere". CAVR interview, Dili, 30 July 2004 (see Part 3: History of the Conflict for a discussion of the origins of the term).

† Barbedo de Magalhães, East Timor: Indonesian Occupation and Genocide, Oporto University, Portugal, 1992, p. 43. The significance of these changes, both in style and substance, can be gained from a comparison with Nicolau Lobato's vitriolic denunciation of Xavier do Amaral in 1977 for revolutionary crimes. Statement of Fretilin Central Committee on "The High Treason of Xavier do Amaral", Radio Maubere, 14 September 1977.

‡ CAVR interview with José Ramos-Horta, Dili, 26 May 2004. The Communiqué of the Nationalist Convergence of Timor, 10 November 1989, refers to the "irreplaceable role" of Fretilin and UDT as representatives of the people of Timor-Leste (Krieger, p. 282).

of the Dalai Lama, and presented it for the first time in Brussels in April 1992. The plan incorporated the main features of both CNRM's new approach and a peace plan issued by Xanana Gusmão on 5 October 1989, which the UDT and Fretilin Nationalist Convergence had endorsed.[222]

400. The plan was divided into three phases. In the first phase, lasting about two years, Indonesia would remain in control but introduce a number of confidence-building measures including troop withdrawals and a UN human rights monitoring presence. In the second phase, Timor-Leste would be given full autonomy extendable to ten years. In phase three, the definitive status of Timor-Leste would be decided in an act of self-determination. The plan was intended to put the Soeharto Government under pressure by offering an honourable way out and to present the Resistance as the more constructive of the two protagonists. José Ramos-Horta said:

> It was also meant for the Indonesian society in general and the international community, to show the sense of responsibility, maturity and moderation of the East Timorese Resistance leaders.[223]

401. Reactions within the parties, international civil society and the Timorese diaspora were initially negative. José Ramos-Horta told the Commission:

> I had to defend it so many times both in Portugal and the Timorese community, with Fretilin and UDT. It was very controversial in the beginning because the word 'autonomy' was taboo at the time, but then most people went along with it.[224]

402. The Indonesian Government was also deeply suspicious. José Ramos-Horta told the Commission:

> I remember talking with Ali Alatas in New York on 18 October 1994, our first formal meeting in New York. Alatas said, "Your peace plan is a stepping stone to independence."

403. Ramos-Horta told the Commission that the Minister was "absolutely right", but that he explained to him that it could work to Indonesia's advantage if they used the opportunity constructively and the people were satisfied with autonomy after ten years.

404. An international network of CNRM representatives and contacts was put in place to promote the plan in Portugal, Canada, the European Community, the USA, Japan, and Australia and its region. They included a new generation of diplomats such as José Amorim Dias, the CNRM's representative to the European Union from 1993, and Constancio Pinto,* the CNRM representative to the USA and Canada from 1994. Their work was backed up by the East Timor International Support Centre (ETISC) established in Darwin by Juan Federer who also undertook fund-raising and provided personal assistance to José Ramos-Horta. At the same time, José Ramos-Horta continued to work directly with Fretilin and UDT, respecting their role but ensuring co-ordination. For this purpose, a Coordinating Committee for the Diplomatic Front was established in 1995 (replacing the Nationalist Convergence) and responsibilities were divided between the two parties.

* Before leaving Timor-Leste in 1991, Constancio Pinto had been responsible on behalf of CNRM for co-ordinating all clandestine activities in the towns and villages. See Constancio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle: Inside the Timorese Resistance, South End Press, Boston, 1997.

405. Building on the growth in international awareness following the Santa Cruz massacre, José Ramos-Horta used the plan to broaden the campaign. It enabled him to gain a hearing for Timor-Leste in mainstream bodies such as the European Parliament, the US Council for Foreign Relations, the Royal Institute of International Affairs in London and press clubs in Thailand and Australia and to portray the Resistance in a new and positive light.

406. This culminated in the award of the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Belo and José Ramos-Horta in 1996. The inclusion of José Ramos-Horta was a ringing endorsement of Resistance diplomacy and its peace plan by one of the world's most prestigious bodies. The award recognised the legitimacy of Timor-Leste's cause and marked a new phase in the struggle. Ramos-Horta promoted the plan in his acceptance speech. In its announcement, the Norwegian Nobel Committee expressed the hope "that this award will spur efforts to find a diplomatic solution to the conflict in East Timor based on the people's right to self-determination."[225] The UN Secretary-General expressed similar sentiments in a congratulatory statement about the award and a few weeks later, in February 1997, Kofi Annan, the new Secretary-General, appointed Jamsheed Marker his personal representative for Timor-Leste to activate the stagnant UN process.

407. In 1998 CNRM held a convention of some 200 East Timorese in Peniche, Portugal, with the assistance of the Portuguese Government. The gathering was held overseas to take advantage of Timor-Leste's new international momentum and, in Agio Pereira's words, "to project a front of national unity and Xanana Gusmão as leader".[226] The convention strengthened unity by dropping, at Xanana Gusmão's explicit instruction, the word "Maubere" from its title in deference to UDT, thereby changing its name to Concelho Nacional da Resistência Timorense (National Council of Timorese Resistance, CNRT), welcoming Timorese who had previously collaborated with Indonesia and acknowledging the role of the Church.* It also confirmed the Resistance's commitment to democracy and pluralism by adopting a Magna Carta of human rights. The convention was hailed universally as a singular achievement. In the words of the Australian Government, it brought together "the former civil war adversaries UDT and Fretilin into a single coalition – not achieved in earlier resistance umbrellas" and achieved agreement "on the choice of gaoled Falintil commander Xanana Gusmão as CNRT President and paramount leader of the resistance".[227]

408. The Resistance joined the UN-sponsored All-Inclusive Intra-East Timorese Dialogue (AIIETD), that began in 1995, in a position of strength and used them to advantage. At the fourth AIIETD in 1998, José Ramos-Horta, with support from UDT and Fretilin, gained majority Timorese support for direct participation in UN-sponsored talks between Portugal and Indonesia. Jamsheed Marker reported that, at the same time, Western and UN diplomats began to engage in direct consultation with Xanana Gusmão in prison and with other Resistance representatives.[228] The "right to dialogue" had finally been conquered.*

* The internal Resistance and Xanana Gusmão, who was in prison in Jakarta, were represented at the convention by Fr Filomeno Jacob SJ and Fr Domingos Maubere Soares.

409. In April 1999, the CNRT held a forward-planning conference in Melbourne. Initiatives like this and CNRT's decision to canton Falintil and to conduct a disciplined campaign for independence that avoided provocation of the pro-autonomy militia[229] deepened international confidence in the Resistance in the period leading to the August ballot. Agio Pereira told the Commission:

> It would have been difficult for the UN to negotiate the 5 May 1999 Agreement with Indonesia if the Timorese Resistance was seen to be divided or at least disorganised.[230]

410. It was a matter of great satisfaction and pride to have the UN recognise the legitimacy of the Resistance by using CNRT's name and flag on the 30 August 1999 ballot paper. The ultimate accolade, however, came from the people of Timor-Leste who gave the Resistance, including its political components, their overwhelming support that unforgettable day.

The diaspora

411. The East Timorese diaspora was, generally speaking, not part of the formal Resistance diplomatic campaign for self-determination. However, the presence and activities of Timorese communities significantly lifted the profile of the issue in many countries and provided the formal campaign with vital additional human resources and skills. The diaspora increasingly came to play a role in its own right, the effectiveness of which was recognised by Timor-Leste's political leaders, and many of its key members returned to Timor-Leste during and after 1999 to help build the new nation.

412. At its peak, the diaspora comprised about 20,000 East Timorese in Australia, some 10,000 in Portugal and a scattering in Macau, Mozambique, Canada, the US, the UK, Ireland and some other countries. The majority of the original diaspora were refugees from the 1975 civil war between UDT and Fretilin who either came directly to Australia or who found their way to Portugal via West Timor. Many who went to Portugal eventually came to Australia to join relatives, to be closer to Timor-Leste and to improve their opportunities. Their numbers were augmented over the years by family members, whose passage from Timor-Leste was sometimes officially sanctioned through the International Red Cross, and by political refugees and others, who escaped through Indonesia, either secretly as individuals using complex channels including bribery of Indonesian officials or publicly through asylum bids at foreign embassies in Jakarta.* Those who exited through the foreign embassies from 1993 on, or who left at other times after 1975, made a particularly important contribution because they were politically highly motivated, could speak from personal knowledge of the occupation and were not constrained by 1975 political affiliations. They quickly and easily joined the CNRM and solidarity organisations and activities in the UK, Ireland, Europe, Canada, the US, Portugal and Australia. A further 1600 arrived in Australia in 1995, the largest number since the civil war. Since 1999, the trend has been generally in the other direction. Though most of the general community remains overseas, a majority of the key diaspora leaders have returned to Timor-Leste or maintain a presence in both worlds.†

* This is a reference to the Fretilin report on Xanana Gusmão's short-lived talks with Colonel Purwanto in 1983 which was entitled Fretilin conquers the right to dialogue, The FRETILIN External Delegation, Lisbon, 1983.

413. The diaspora was small, politically divided, scattered and impoverished. Many started their new lives in refugee camps and carried in their luggage scars and antipathies from the civil war and the Indonesian invasion. In Portugal newly arrived East Timorese were outnumbered by large numbers of people from the former Portuguese colonies in Africa and had difficulties finding accommodation and work. Many East Timorese lived in camps in Lisbon for several years.

414. In Australia, East Timorese were totally unfamiliar with the language, culture and structure of the host country. Abel Guterres told the Commission:

> Our friends in Portugal spoke Portuguese, but we in Australia had a huge problem: we didn't know the language…The first word we learned was 'yes'. We would go to a friend's house, they'd ask: 'Do you want coffee or tea?' We'd all say 'yes' and so they would bring us coffee and tea all at once.[231]

415. They settled primarily in the working class areas of big cities and found employment where they could – in factories, as casual workers and in the public transport system. These factors made the building of communities and political organisations slow and difficult. They were assisted in this demanding process by welfare organisations, community and church groups and by outstanding men and women patriots within their own ranks.

416. The successful building of these communities and the transmission of a nationalist political culture to the next generation was a remarkable achievement. In Portugal, Macau and Australia the communities established political, cultural and sporting organisations, hosted meetings, and kept their members informed through the production of their own radio programmes and newsletters. The Catholic Church played an important role as a neutral meeting place and source of spiritual, cultural

* The Campaign to Reunite in Australia the Families of Timor (RAFT) raised many thousands of dollars from Australian NGOs and established a revolving loan fund to help East Timorese families, regardless of their political affiliation, to pay for relatives to join them in Australia.

† For a study of the East Timorese diaspora community in Sydney, see Amanda Wise No Longer in Exile? Shifting Experiences of Home, Homeland and Identity for the East Timorese Refugee Diaspora in Australia in the Light of East Timor's Independence, University of Western Sydney, 2002. See also Pascoela Barreto's dissertation about Timor-Leste's diaspora in Portugal.

and pastoral care, particularly where East Timorese priests were available. The building of these communities was itself a defiant act of East Timorese self-determination in an alien environment, and gave birth to a new resource that added significantly to Timor-Leste's diplomatic capacity and outreach.

417. Though often substantially handicapped by the legacy of the civil war, the diaspora made an impact in the countries where their communities were strongest. In some cases, this paralleled other solidarity work. Luisa Teotonio Pereira told the Commission:

> The Timorese community in Portugal always maintained its own autonomous organisations (and was only) sporadically invited to participate in Portuguese structures. There was probably only one occasion when they joined forces as equals with Portuguese citizens: in the case of the Freedom for Xanana, Freedom for Timor Commission (Comissão Liberdade para Xanana, Liberdade para Timor) created in 1993.[232]

418. This was also true for sections of the East Timorese community in Australia. Although slow to start, others formed alliances with civil society groups and supported each other through joint protests, lobbying, information dissemination, fund-raising, and cultural, religious and political activities. In later years, these activities included concerts and the co-production of music compact discs, exhibitions and professional theatre pieces. This was not always straightforward. Abel Guterres told the Commission:

> When we conducted demonstrations at the Department of Foreign Affairs or Indonesian Embassy some people would tell their boss at work they were sick, but then show up on the television in the demonstration. If the boss understood the situation they would allow people to take time off but some got sacked and once you're sacked, how do you get food?[233]

419. Some learned trade and business skills and took courses at post-secondary level and university to equip themselves to serve Timor-Leste after independence. Abel Guterres told the Commission:

> Some people gave one per cent, some ten per cent, twenty, thirty, forty to a hundred per cent of their life to work for Timor-Leste. Everybody did something. It might have been only really small things, but they did something.[234]

420. East Timorese also engaged in international outreach supplementing the advocacy of official diplomats by supporting them in international forums or, as time went by and confidence grew, themselves representing Timor-Leste in approaches to foreign governments or international conferences.* In addition to the formation

* In Europe, for example, this included tours by Portugal-based Timorese who campaigned through Europe dancing, singing and displaying the culture of Timor-Leste. Other examples are the participation of East Timorese diaspora women in the World Conference on Women held in Nairobi in 1985, the follow-up conference in Beijing, the UN Commission on Human Rights, Asian church gatherings, and advocacy to the Australian, New Zealand and other governments.

and administration of organisations to maintain their community identity and solidarity, diaspora East Timorese also formed effective organisations to provide direct humanitarian, advocacy, human rights and other support to Timor-Leste.*

421. Timor-Leste's leaders recognised and encouraged the contribution of the diaspora. José Ramos-Horta lived amongst and interacted frequently with the community in Australia and, with an eye to the future, increasingly included the younger generation in his missions. After his capture, Xanana Gusmão addressed frequent letters to the diaspora, confirming his belief and theirs that diaspora East Timorese were as much a part of the Resistance as those in Timor-Leste. In a letter to Xana Bernades, dated 9 June 1992, he wrote:

> I know that you are "independent" (of the political parties) but nevertheless you are united to us. You are part of us. And we, as the older fighters of the nation, are proud of you.†

422. Xanana Gusmão repeated this view after his liberation. He told a press conference in Lisbon in 2000 that the world may never have known the truth but for those who fled Timor-Leste and devoted a large part of their lives to the cause of self-determination. At the Commission's National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, Commissioner Olandina Caeiro asked Abel Guterres to identify one really special moment in his life since he left Timor-Leste in 1975. He replied:

> There were lots of really good moments, but one stands out. In 1999 when I came to Lecidere, I saw the CNRT flag being hoisted. I thought: 'Wow, this is fantastic'. This is something I'd always dreamed of. It was like being in heaven. It's impossible to describe the feelings I had at that moment. I saw everybody dance a tebe-tebe around the flag. It was just something amazing.[235]

Conclusion

423. Timor-Leste's traumatic 25-year struggle for self-determination should not have been necessary. Like other small island states in the region, Timor-Leste's internationally recognised right to make its own decisions should have been respected, celebrated and facilitated peacefully, not suppressed by violence.

424. Among the various factors that account for Timor-Leste's independence, the contribution of the Resistance was the most fundamental.

* Two notable examples were the East Timor Relief Association (ETRA), formed in Sydney in 1992, and the East Timor Human Rights Centre (ETHRC), formed in Melbourne in 1995. Like some other diaspora organisations that were focused on liberation, they dissolved after 1999.

† The letter to Xana Bernardes, a young East Timorese woman living in Australia, was in response to a letter from her along with funds raised from a solidarity cricket match and festival in Melbourne (Sarah Niner (Ed.), To Resist is To Win: The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, Aurora Books, Victoria, 2000, pp. 170-71).

425. To achieve its goals, the Resistance had to contend with an array of formidable problems, both external and of its own making, including the disastrous civil war. Despite the clear legitimacy of its cause, the diplomatic front had to operate in an environment that was hostile to its ideology and objectives and that favoured the occupying power rather than the legal administering power. The external Resistance was also divided and effectively operated on one lung. Fretilin had to carry the burden on its own for many years while UDT reconstituted its organisation and credibility following the civil war and the collaboration of some its main personalities with Indonesia.

426. The Resistance countered these challenges by utilising its strengths and by adapting itself without compromising its goal of self-determination and independence. Though not sufficient to halt the deterioration in its diplomatic fortunes, Fretilin's early policy decisions were fundamentally important and contributed significantly in the long-term. They included the decisions to open a diplomatic front, to focus on the UN and Timor-Leste's internationally recognised right of self-determination, to work with Portugal, to build support in Africa with the five former Portuguese colonies and the large bloc of UN votes, to build links with first world civil society and many of its key institutions, and to appoint José Ramos-Horta to represent Timor-Leste at the UN. His contribution to building civil society support and world consciousness about Timor-Leste was outstanding, and his policy and strategic input to the Resistance, based on his extensive diplomatic experience and knowledge, was decisive – both inside and outside the country.

427. The most important contribution to the diplomacy of the Resistance came from the inside when the Resistance was reconstructed as an all-inclusive movement based not on party-affiliation or political ideology, but on nationalism and commitment to pluralist democracy and human rights. This policy change helped turn Timor-Leste's fortunes around. José Ramos-Horta was entrusted to lead its implementation outside. It took time to translate into practice, but its diplomatic impact was profound. In one stroke as it were, it negated claims that resistance was confined to Fretilin and only external, it swelled the ranks of the Resistance inside and outside Timor-Leste, including among the diaspora, it accommodated a number of significant UDT policies, and it finally put to rest fears that Timor-Leste was a "South-east Asian Cuba" in the making. Though rejected in some quarters, it also shaped the previously fragmented Resistance into a more coherent, integrated movement under the authority of Xanana Gusmão and José Ramos-Horta, the joint architects of these far-reaching reforms.

428. The Resistance, both internal and external, learned from bitter experience and reinvented itself in the crucible of war and international politics. The result, in partnership with civil society, was one of the 20th century's most successful movements of people's diplomacy.

Civil society

Preface

429. This section focuses on the contribution of international civil society to the struggle of the East Timorese people for self-determination. Civil society accompanied the East Timorese people every step of their long journey to freedom, but its efforts are commonly ignored in accounts from official sources or rate only passing mention.* This section is intended to acknowledge this remarkable gift of solidarity and to inform the East Timorese people, the majority of whom remained in Timor-Leste during the war cut off from the outside world, of the activity undertaken outside Timor-Leste in defence of their fundamental human right to decide their fate. Due to limitations of space, it is not possible to tell the story in detail or to do complete justice to the many thousands of individuals and organisations who were involved over the 25-year period 1974-99. Each country is a study in its own right. It focuses on the seminal early years about which less is generally known today. Indonesian civil society is singled out for special mention because its involvement demanded exceptional courage. The contribution of international civil society in other important fields such as aid, refugees, and humanitarian need is not included, though it is recognised that these services were often essential to survival and that without them self-determination would have been meaningless for many East Timorese.

Terminology

430. The Commission has chosen the term civil society for four reasons. First, the term differentiates this sector from the other key sectors that make up democratic society, namely government and business. The term acknowledges the emergence and independent role of the 'third sector' in its own right in the affairs of the world. This is particularly relevant in the context of Timor-Leste because, for most of the period 1974-99, civil society played a discrete role and was generally in opposition to government and business over Timor-Leste.† Second, the term is more comprehensive than labels such as "non-government organisation" (NGO) and "solidarity group", which are often

* The Australian Government's official account of Australia's role in resolving the Timor-Leste question does not include civil society's role. See East Timor in Transition 1998–2000: An Australian Policy Challenge, Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade, Canberra, 2001. Jamsheed Marker makes a passing reference to NGOs in East Timor: A Memoir of the Negotiations for Independence, McFarland & Company, Inc., London, 2003. In his account of the 1999 ballot, Ian Martin, the head of UNAMET, pays generous tribute to NGOs but acknowledges their story is not the subject of his book (Self-determination in East Timor, p. 13).

† As Luisa Teotonio Pereira testified to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Conflict, Portugal was an exception to this general rule, at least in later years. The confrontation that characterised relationships between government and civil society in most other countries only changed in 1999 after Indonesia and the international community agreed on the conduct of an act of self-determination in Timor-Leste. The private or business sector generally did not become publicly involved on either side of the issue, though it profited from commercial relations with Indonesia which grew dramatically under the Soeharto Government. There was no citizens' movement in support of Timor-Leste in countries such as the former USSR and China because the existence of a "third sector" is not recognised in socialist systems.

used in this context, but are not broad enough to encompass the breadth and diversity of the individuals, groups and organisations that were involved in supporting self-determination for Timor-Leste. Third, the term "civil society", unlike "non-government organisation" (NGO), has positive content and represents commitment to building a civil or civilised society based on the values of peace, human rights and democracy. The term is appropriate here because international civil society earned legitimacy and respect in its advocacy for Timor-Leste by promoting core values and generally operating non-violently within the law and through the law.* Lastly, the term civil society recommends itself because it has been officially adopted by the United Nations and marks an important shift in international thinking. There is a growing recognition in official circles that civil society has a role to play in global governance and that the work of the United Nations is no longer the sole domain of governments.† Timor-Leste's experience bears out the wisdom of not leaving everything to government. As the UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan acknowledged in Dili in May 2002, the contribution of civil society was critical to the UN's role in resolving the Timor-Leste conflict.

International civil society

431. The following account of the role of international civil society in support of Timor-Leste's political rights is divided into five phases. Like the story of Timor-Leste, it begins and ends on a high point and plumbs the depths of failure and despair in between.

Phase one: Beginnings and early challenges, 1974–1978

432. Although the decolonisation of Timor-Leste began in principle in 1960,‡ international civil society did not show any significant interest in the issue until 1974, when it responded to media coverage and lobbying by East Timorese activists and Fretilin representatives in particular. International civil society can be justly criticised for not taking up the Timor-Leste issue sooner in response both to the UN's initiative and the deplorable state of affairs in Portuguese Timor under the Salazar-Caetano regimes. At the same time, its belated response means it cannot be accused of manufacturing the issue for ulterior political motives as has often been claimed. It developed and acted in response to East Timorese initiatives, not the opposite.

433. The Indonesian invasion was condemned by individuals and organisations in a number of countries, including Canada, Japan,§ New Zealand, France, Germany and the United States. At this point, however, the main centres of organised civil society activity were Portugal, Australia and the United Kingdom.

* A controversial exception was the disarming of a British Hawk fighter jet by four women activists in January 1996. They were released by the court afterwards (see Turning points 1991-98, par. 478 ff below).

† While the UN encourages partnership, it remains essentially a forum for states. It is not planning to grant civil society organisations a seat or vote in the General Assembly.

‡ The United Nations first recognised Timor-Leste's status as a colony with a right to independence in 1960.

§ For example, protests were held outside Indonesian government offices in Tokyo and Osaka (Sister Monica Nakamura, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004).

434. Portuguese civil society welcomed the 1974 Carnation Revolution and the decision of the Movement of the Armed Forces (Movimento das Forças Armadas, MFA,) to decolonise, democratise and develop both Portuguese society and the overseas provinces. Civil society itself was a beneficiary of these political changes after decades of marginalisation under successive dictatorships. For many, democracy and decolonisation were interlinked. "A nation cannot be free while oppressing other nations" was a common slogan before and after the 25th of April. Portuguese who had lived and worked in Timor-Leste, and those who had worked to end Portuguese dictatorship and colonialism, felt a strong sense of responsibility to the East Timorese people. CIDAC (The Centro de Informação e Documentação Anti-colonial, Anti-colonial Information and Documentation Centre) was founded in September 1974 to promote decolonisation, including self-determination and independence for Timor-Leste. CIDAC contributed to the creation of the short-lived Associação de Amizade Portugal-Timor Leste (Portugal and Timor-Leste Friendship Association) and, in 1981, to the establishment of the CDPM (Comissão para os Direitos do Povo Maubere, Commission for the Rights of the Maubere People) which became Portugal's main solidarity organisation until its dissolution in 2002.

435. However, despite links with Timor-Leste going back 400 years, a common language and the presence of East Timorese in Portugal, civil society faced many challenges at both government and community levels in relation to Timor-Leste during this early period. These included general public ignorance about Timor-Leste, turmoil in Portugal resulting from radical political change after 48 years of dictatorship, a preoccupation with Portugal's African colonies and divisions of opinion over Timor-Leste's future compounded by differences between Fretilin and UDT. Luisa Teotonio Pereira, the Coordinator of CDPM for 19 years, testified to the Commission:

> Real ignorance of Timorese history and culture, the geo-strategic context of the territory and its remoteness from the metropolis, as well as the secrecy of negotiations between Portugal and Indonesia, helped keep the discussion about Timor on a lower, mainly ideological plane with little practical value. Portuguese citizens who were interested in the rights of the Timorese people were incapable of imposing on the political powers of the time the fundamental strategic changes that could eventually have changed events, such as reinforcement of the Portuguese presence and action, and the internationalisation of the issue.[236]

436. Conscious of a special responsibility because they shared a common language with the East Timorese Resistance, civil society groups invested heavily in information dissemination based on Timorese and other sources, including the work of outstanding Portuguese journalists like Adelino Gomes. However, due to the substantial challenges referred to, it took several years for Portuguese civil society to maximise its contribution.

437. Australia was the principal centre of international civil society support for Timor-Leste during this period. As Timor-Leste's largest democratic neighbour, Australia was targeted from 1974 by East Timorese political parties, particularly Fretilin, seeking both official and civil society support for their respective parties and programmes. By the time of the Indonesian invasion, Timor-Leste was on the agenda of a range of organisations and individuals in Australia, including academics, human rights activists, journalists, politicians, aid agencies, churches, returned soldiers,* students and trade unionists, a good number of whom had already visited the territory.

438. The foundation of Australian civil society's diverse and enduring commitment to Timor-Leste was laid at this time. This can be seen from a brief survey of some of these first associations, many of which also contributed to the building of long-term regional and international support for Timor-Leste.

439. Australian parliamentarians visited Timor-Leste twice in 1975 and formed a small but solid caucus of support for Timor-Leste in Canberra, challenging the anti-Timor policies of successive governments. One of these, the Labour Party MP Ken Fry, testified to the UN Security Council in April 1976 and was the leading supporter of Timor-Leste in the national Parliament. His colleague, Gordon McIntosh, was similarly active in the Australian Senate and instrumental in mobilising New Zealand civil society. The US Congressional Hearings into Timor-Leste in 1977 were prompted by Australian parliamentarians, led by Tom Uren who served in West Timor during World War II.

440. Australian aid agencies delivered humanitarian assistance in response to the civil war in 1975. They included the Australian Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA), an association of some 70 national NGOs, which was to advocate publicly for self-determination for the next 24 years at home and abroad. Fr Mark Raper SJ, one of the ACFOA delegation, fostered support for Timor-Leste in social justice networks in Australia and Asia, adding to the strong support for self-determination advocated by the Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace. Australian aid agencies, including Australian Catholic Relief and Community Aid Abroad, funded James Dunn's visit to Portugal in January 1977, where he debriefed refugees who had left Timor-Leste after August 1976. His report was critical to confirming Fretilin claims of human rights violations by the Indonesian military.

441. Australia was the destination for the first East Timorese refugees from the civil war, a development which in time greatly strengthened the campaign for Timor-Leste in Australia and the region. The five foreign observers at Fretilin's Declaration of Independence in November 1975 were Australians: journalists Michael Richardson, Jill Jolliffe, and Roger East; David Scott, chair of Community Aid Abroad, and Sam Kruger, a former soldier. Jill Jolliffe became an international authority on Timor-Leste and her reports appeared in the international media throughout the occupation. Three of the six Australian-based journalists killed in Timor-Leste before the end of 1975 were Australian nationals. Their fate became a cause célèbre in Australia. The wife of one of the journalists, Shirley Shackleton, and the brother of another, Paul Stewart, made excellent use of the media and became nationally identified with the Timor-Leste cause. The Timor issue gained support in union circles and led to bans on goods destined for Indonesia and a visit to Jakarta in April 1976 by the President of the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU), Bob Hawke, and his colleague, the committed Timor activist, Jim Roulston, to urge a full inquiry into the deaths of the journalists in Balibó. Australia's longest-serving solidarity groups, CIET (the Campaign for an Independent Timor-Leste) and AETA (the Australia Timor-Leste Association), were established at this time following visits by their founders to Timor-Leste. CIET was established in Sydney in November 1974 by Denis Freney (1936-95) and had counterparts in Britain, several Australian cities (Adelaide, Canberra, Darwin, Newcastle, Wollongong) and later in New Zealand. AETA, through David Scott, helped establish Fretilin's first mission at the UN in December 1975. Following the Indonesian invasion, CIET was the main channel of information about the occupation and resistance through the Fretilin radio link based in Darwin* and Timor-Leste News Agency publications. It was also responsible for "Isle of Fear, Isle of Hope", the first English-language film on Timor-Leste's struggle, made in 1975. The Commission heard testimony from David Scott of desperate attempts to break the embargo on Timor-Leste in 1976, including a foiled attempt by Australians to land by boat from Darwin.†

* Some former Australian soldiers who fought Japan in Timor-Leste and were protected and supported by East Timorese during the Second World War strongly believed that Australia owed the East Timorese a moral debt for their sacrifices on Australia's behalf and should support self-determination. Ex-commandos Cliff Morris and Paddy Kenneally were among those who publicly espoused this point of view, but, concerned about the spread of communism, not all their colleagues agreed with them.

442. Civil society activity in Britain was smaller than in Portugal or Australia. Britain's links with Timor-Leste were non-existent compared to Australia and Portugal, the territory was remote and there was no East Timorese community in the United Kingdom to witness to events. In addition, although two British citizens were among the five Australian-based journalists killed at Balibó in October 1975, it was British Government policy from the outset to distance itself from the Timor-Leste issue in order to reduce the possibility of public pressure to condemn Indonesia. Based on its ancient relationship with Portugal, it had adopted a similar low profile on the issue during the latter years of Portugal's administration of the territory. (See pars 221-244 on the British Government, above).

443. Despite this difficult environment, two civil society organisations took up the issue. Their work and that of other later church agencies made Britain, in time, a key

* Radio Maubere was the Resistance's only direct link to the outside world after the Indonesian military sealed off the territory. Fretilin broadcasts about the war in Timor-Leste were picked up in Darwin and disseminated by CIET to Fretilin representatives abroad, the UN, support groups, the media and governments. Transmission from the Darwin end was carried out with skill and tenacity by Fretilin members Tony Belo and Estanislau da Silva and their Australian supporters, led by Brian Manning, despite periodic seizures of their equipment by the Australian authorities. Secret Fretilin communications had to be decoded before being passed on. The link was shut down in November 1978 after the Indonesian military gained control of the Fretilin radio from Alarico Fernandes in Timor-Leste. It was restored in 1985 for a brief period. Brian Manning's account of this activity can be found in A Few Rough Reds, Hal Alexander and Phil Griffiths (Eds.), Australian Society for the Study of Labour History, Canberra, 2003. Rob Wesley-Smith's account can be found in Free East Timor, Jim Aubrey (Ed.), Random House Australia, Milsons Point, NSW, 1998.

† The Australian government confiscated the boat and charged the crew with breaches of customs laws. The trial lasted 12 days (David Scott, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004).

international support centre for Timor-Leste. The pioneers were BCIET (the British Campaign for an Independent East Timor) and Tapol, the British Campaign for the Release of Indonesian Political Prisoners.* BCIET was formed in 1974 as part of Denis Freney's CIET network and spearheaded the solidarity movement in the UK until 1979. One of its main roles was to disseminate in Britain information received from Fretilin through Denis Freney. John Taylor and Dave Macey, who were key members, worked closely with Tapol and built important and lasting links with church, academic and political circles. John Taylor later wrote two books on Timor-Leste and contributed to several others.

444. Tapol was established in June 1973 and carried regular reports on Timor-Leste from 1974. After BCIET became defunct, Tapol helped keep the issue alive in Britain until it was joined by a number of church-based organisations and the British Coalition for East Timor was established in the early 1980s. Tapol campaigned primarily through the publication of its newsletter, whose regularity, longevity and professionalism was the envy of other activists, and whose distinctive contribution was its reportage based on Indonesian sources. Tapol and its newsletter owed much to the initiative and dedication of Carmel Budiardjo, herself a former political prisoner in Indonesia, and Liem Soei Liong, an Indonesian living in exile in the Netherlands. They reached a wide international network through the newsletter and speaking tours abroad, including later to the UN. They also built a solid support network in Britain comprising a cross section of distinguished patrons, including dignitaries like Lord Avebury who was a persuasive advocate for the cause in many elite circles throughout Timor-Leste's struggle.

445. Civil society adopted two broadly different approaches to the Timor-Leste question during this period. Most in the first category were solidarity groups who campaigned in support of independence and Fretilin. The first solidarity group to be established was called the Campaign for an Independent East Timor (CIET). This group accepted the reality of Fretilin control and that Timor-Leste had already determined its political status, identified enthusiastically with Fretilin's reform programme which fitted progressive development and political agendas,† and rejected the notion that the territory would be better off under the Soeharto regime. This alignment continued during the early years of occupation when Fretilin maintained control of territory and radio contact with the outside world but broadened to include support for self-determination when Fretilin made this strategic change. This solidarity was not weakened by real or alleged Fretilin violations of human rights. Most did not know of these excesses at the time or believed that claims by Indonesians and their East Timorese supporters were exaggerated or politically inspired.

* In response to Timor-Leste and the changing situation in Indonesia, Tapol broadened its name to British Campaign for the Defence of Political Prisoners and Human Rights in Indonesia and, from 1986, to The Indonesia Human Rights Campaign.

† Examples of academics who promoted Fretilin and its policies in relation to education, economic and other reforms are António Barbedo de Magalhaes, Helen Hill and John Taylor. Helen Hill, who visited Timor-Leste prior to the Indonesian takeover, wrote her doctoral thesis on Fretilin, which remains the only study of the party. Her other contributions included Timor Story, published in 1976 by Timor Information Service.

446. Others in civil society preferred an approach based more on the human rights principle of self-determination than on party politics. In policy terms at least, they were open to Timor-Leste's future integration with Indonesia, if this were the outcome of due process, and distanced themselves from Fretilin and the solidarity movement. Most in this category were established development, church and human rights NGOs who were governed by set policies. They were less flexible than solidarity groups but often had a keener appreciation of how to manage the politics of the issue, particularly during this period when the Cold War was at its height. Their independence also spared them involvement in the bitter ideological battles and organisational problems experienced in some parts of the solidarity movement in the early years. Although independent, they were not opposed to Fretilin or those in solidarity with Fretilin and often co-operated with both and looked to them for information.

447. Typical of this approach was the former Australian consul to Timor-Leste, James Dunn, whose authoritative views on Timor-Leste had a strong influence on public perceptions of the issue in many circles. He spoke for many when he wrote as follows to José Ramos-Horta (Fretilin) and Domingos de Oliveira (UDT) on 18 September 1974:

> I am writing a brief note to you – and also to Domingos Oliveira – to dissociate myself from the reports that Australia favours the integration of Timor into Indonesia. I do not wish to comment on this report or on whatever might be the policy of the Australian government on this question. But I wish to make it clear that, in my opinion, it is for the Timorese people to decide on what the future course of their country should be, without hindrance or pressure from any external quarter. On the question of integration with Indonesia I can only say that, at the time of my visit, I had the impression that very few of your people favoured this course as a solution to their destiny. If this situation were to change and the Timorese were to decide in favour of joining with Indonesia I would, of course, accept and welcome such a decision. Equally, should the Timorese decide in favour of independence, their decision would be very welcome to me personally and I would like to assist the emergence of the new state in any way possible. I would also respect the decision of your people to continue a relationship with Portugal, if that is what your people desire to do. The challenge is yours: it is for Australia not to coerce you into any direction against your natural and justly expressed wishes.*

448. This approach made it possible to appeal to a wide public. It was adopted with considerable effect by AWD (Action for World Development), led by Bill Armstrong.

* A copy of this letter is in the CAVR archives. James Dunn was Australian Consul to Portuguese Timor 1962-64. He visited the territory on behalf of the Australian Government from 17–27 June 1974 and on behalf of ACFOA after the civil war. He was a tireless and highly credible advocate for Timor-Leste throughout the occupation and is the author of East Timor: A Rough Passage to Independence, Longueville Books, 2003. In 2001 he was given the Order of Australia and in 2002 made a Grande Official of the Order of Prince Henry by Dr Jorge Sampaio, the President of Portugal.

An ecumenical Australian church-based movement, AWD used its connections with aid agencies, social justice activists and churches in Australia and overseas, including the World Council of Churches, to promote Timor-Leste as a human rights issue, not a pro-Fretilin or anti-Indonesia issue.

449. AWD supported the publication of the Timor Information Service (TIS), edited by John Waddingham, one of Australia's most knowledgeable Timor-Leste activists, which provided credible information and analysis based on a range of sources, not only Fretilin. This approach drew a sharp distinction between the Indonesian military and the Indonesian people, whose situation many were concerned to improve, and left the door open to building links with Indonesian civil society which happened in due course. It also made possible the gradual building of relations with diaspora East Timorese in Macau, Portugal and Australia, including senior members of UDT* who left Timor-Leste as refugees following Fretilin's victory in the civil war and were resentful, but misunderstanding, of those they regarded as pro-Fretilin.

450. AWD also supported Pat Walsh who worked on Timor-Leste with John Waddingham before joining the Australian Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA) and serving as its principal researcher and advocate on human rights until 2000. This work was diverse and included promoting human rights in Indonesia and Australia-Indonesia relations. In relation to Timor-Leste, it focussed on self-determination but also included work on refugees, humanitarian aid, human rights, and involved extensive networking and lobbying in Australia and internationally.

451. The variation in approach, however, made no impact on the Indonesian government and its allies. Many in government, the media, business† and civil society dismissed all who were vocal in defence of Timor-Leste, regardless of their alignment, as pro-Fretilin and anti-Indonesian. The leading role in support of Fretilin played by the Communist Party of Australia compounded the view, promoted by Indonesia and some in the East Timorese Catholic Church, that Fretilin was communist.‡ This issue, plus debates over the viability of an independent Timor-Leste and the importance of good relations with Indonesia, divided opinion and impeded the Timor cause for many years. On the one hand, Government and those who supported official policies, or who were silent, were

* Australian officials reported a comment by General Benny Moerdani on 1 December 1975 that "there was hostility towards Australians, especially ACFOA and media representatives and to a certain extent towards the Red Cross on the part of UDT. Any foreigners in Dili would run the risk of being lumped together as pro-Fretilin by UDT forces", Document 354, Canberra, 2 December 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 593, n. 4.

† The Australia-Indonesia Business Co-operation Committee (AIBCC) was pressing the Australian Government less than 12 months after the invasion to grant full recognition of Indonesian sovereignty in Timor-Leste in the interests of regional security. The Committee, which represented 153 Australian companies including the ANZ Bank, the Bank of NSW, Blue Metal Industries, the Australian Wheat and Dairy Boards, and the major sugar company CSR, argued that continued opposition to Indonesia's incorporation of Timor-Leste could damage Australia's relations with Indonesia. "Recognise Takeover: Companies in Approach to Canberra", The Age, 23 October 1976.

‡ In Australia, Bob Santamaria, leader of the strongly anti-communist National Civic Council, used every opportunity to attack Fretilin and those he portrayed, often wrongly, as communist fellow-travellers. His views were very influential in conservative political and church circles, and damaging for Timor-Leste.

accused of having blood on their hands. On the other hand, civil society was, in David Scott's words, "patronised as 'attention seekers', 'do-gooders', 'communists', 'fellow travellers', 'bleeding hearts', 'pinkos', 'un-Australian' and, the cruellest of all 'naïve'".[237]

Phase two: Crisis and new beginnings, 1978–1983

452. This period was the most difficult and challenging for the East Timorese people and its international supporters. 1978 was a year of deep crisis. By the end of that year Indonesia had made significant military gains, Fretilin's ranks had been decimated, Fretilin had lost its revered leader, Nicolau Lobato, and radio contact with the outside world had ceased. Tens of thousands of East Timorese had died from hunger or surrendered after being forced from the mountains and Fretilin territory by an intense military offensive and famine. In 1983, Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes, the head of the Catholic Church and a leading defender of the East Timorese community, resigned under pressure and left Timor-Leste. Timor-Leste's diplomatic situation fared equally badly during this same period. The external wing of Fretilin was wracked by serious internal divisions and Timor-Leste's fortunes at the UN declined year by year. In 1982, Timor-Leste suffered "a devastating blow", in José Ramos-Horta's words, when a mildly-worded UN resolution was carried by only four votes. A jubilant Ali Alatas, Indonesia's Foreign Minister, told the UN the result was gratifying and that Indonesia hoped the UN would strike the issue from its agenda the following year, once and for all.

453. These critical developments had a major impact on the morale and momentum of civil society support for Timor-Leste. The ending of Fretilin radio transmissions coupled with Indonesia's restrictions on independent access to the territory made it very difficult to sustain public and media interest in the issue, and the sense of defeat in the face of overwhelming odds was profoundly demoralising. Governments sought to weaken civil society commitment further by repeatedly declaring that the situation was a "lost cause" and "irreversible".* Many also argued that continuing support for the issue was irresponsible because it encouraged resistance and this contributed to further loss of life and repression in Timor-Leste.

454. Though weakened, particularly in its capacity to mobilise public opinion, civil society maintained its commitment. It was decided that, even if nothing else was possible, the issue should at least be kept alive. This was based on the conviction that the cause was morally and legally principled and that sustainable peace in Timor-Leste could only be guaranteed through a genuine process of self-determination.† The attitude of the East Timorese people was also a decisive factor. Luisa Teotonio Pereira told the Commission:

* The New Zealand Foreign Minister, B E Talboys, provides a typical example. In a memo to Cabinet following a visit to Timor-Leste in 1978 by Ambassador Roger Peren and Defence Attaché Colonel Macfarlane, the Minister wrote: "Their main conclusion is that the integration of East Timor with Indonesia is irreversible. This squares with my own feelings on the matter. While the Government has had reservations about the actions of Indonesia in Timor, I believe that there is nothing to be gained, least of all for the Timorese people, by dwelling on the past." ("Memorandum for Cabinet", Office of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Wellington, 8 February 1978, in NZ…OIA Material, Vol. 1).

† For example, ACFOA acknowledged in its Development Dossier, July 1980, that Timor-Leste "is only rarely mentioned in the Australian media", but that "the right of the East Timorese to self-determination must remain the basic quest…"

> Whenever (in Portugal) the more sceptical, particularly at the government level, would try to justify so-called "realistic measures", in order to "end the suffering of the Timorese people", their answer would be: "As long as the people of Timor-Leste continue to struggle, does it make sense for us to give in to threats and pressure?"[238]

455. Solidarity work continued. In New Zealand in 1978, CIET ran a high profile 'Let Horta Speak' campaign and forced the Government to back down on its original denial of a visa.* In the Netherlands in 1980, civil society collaborated with Fretilin to take court action against the Dutch Government for exporting military goods (corvettes) to Indonesia. The court ruled in favour of the Government on the grounds that neither the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste nor Fretilin had legal status. Other groups in Europe and Scandinavia sought to publicise Timor-Leste's plight and to protest government inaction. This included activity by Michel Robert through Association de Solidarité avec Timor-Oriental in France, Torben Retboll's work in Denmark including through the International Working Group on Indigenous Affairs (IWGIA) and the work of Klemens Ludwig on behalf of the Society for Threatened Peoples in Germany. In 1985, German activists got over 100 Members of Parliament to urge the German Defence Minister to raise Timor-Leste with President Soeharto during a visit to Jakarta. He refused and, like the Netherlands, Sweden, France and Britain, Germany continued to sell arms to Indonesia. There was progress, however, in the European Parliament. It adopted a number of resolutions on Timor-Leste and in 1994 called for recognition of Timor-Leste's right to self-determination and independence and a halt to all military aid and arms sales to Indonesia.

456. In 1981, Asia's first Timor-Leste solidarity group was started in Japan by women in Hiroshima, led by Jean Inglis. The group published a Japanese-language newsletter devoted to self-determination for Timor-Leste called Higashi Chimoru Tsuchin (East Timor Newsletter). In the USA, Arnold Kohen, who commenced his involvement with Timor-Leste after hearing José Ramos-Horta in 1975, focused his work on key people in three strategically important institutions, mainly in Washington: the Congress, the media, and the Catholic Church. He worked with sympathetic members of Congress and their aides to have a new set of Congressional Hearings, this time focused on America's response to the 1978-79 famine.† He and Fr Reinaldo Cardoso, with Noam Chomsky's assistance, were successful in getting the New York Times to publish hard-hitting editorials critical of the Carter Administration. In 1980, the Times called on the

* Ramos-Horta did not make the trip because of the Fretilin crisis in Maputo. Key New Zealand activists during this period were Colin Isles, Harry Bruhns and John Compton.

† In his testimony to the Commission, the former UN official, Francesc Vendrell, paid tribute to Arnold Kohen's outstanding success in getting US Congressional support for Timor-Leste which continued till 1999. Testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, Dili, 15–17 March 2004.

US to support self-determination and continued to do so. Noam Chomsky testified in support of Timor-Leste to the UN Committee on Decolonisation in 1978. He wrote widely on Timor-Leste, particularly criticising the US press for its lack of attention. Arnold Kohen told the Commission:

> Chomsky's words on this matter had a real influence, sometimes indirect, and history should record it, because it was of vital importance in helping alter the state of widespread ignorance about East Timor that then existed in the United States and elsewhere.[239]

457. Arnold Kohen also acknowledged the contribution during "this dark time" of the late Edward Doherty, a foreign policy adviser to the American Bishops, of David Hinkley, chair of the American Section of Amnesty International, and of Michael Chamberlain, one of a small handful of grassroots activists during this time and founder of the East Timor Human Rights Committee that functioned 1979-84.

458. In Australia, civil society groups initiated a public inquiry by the Australian Parliament in 1982-83. The process brought together representatives from the East Timorese community, church, Amnesty International, aid agencies, universities and solidarity groups from seven cities. Carmel Budiardjo, secretary of Tapol in London, and Professor Roger Clark of Rutgers University in the US also testified. The inquiry forced the government to send an Australian Parliamentary delegation to Timor-Leste in a bid to neutralise evidence from witnesses.*

459. Friends of Timor-Leste also produced several publications at this time. Jill Jolliffe's pioneering work East Timor: Nationalism and Colonialism was published in 1978 and was for some years the main English-language reference on Timor-Leste. Working from Portugal, she also published Timor Newsletter from 1980-83. In 1979, Tapol filled a gap in the UK and US by publishing An Act of Genocide: Indonesia's Invasion of East Timor by Arnold Kohen and John Taylor. In 1980, the Yale Journal of World Public Order published Professor Roger Clark's important monograph, "The 'decolonisation' of East Timor and the United Nations norms of self-determination and aggression". A New Zealander by birth, Clark was distinguished Professor of Law at Rutgers University in the USA. His scholarly demolition of Indonesia's claims to have complied with international law was the first expert contribution in this area. Clark also testified to the UN and other bodies on Timor-Leste. In 1981, the Swedish Osttimor-Kommitten in Stockholm published Det Glomda Kriget (East Timor: The Forgotten War) by Ollie Tornquist and H. Amahorseja.

460. This period of crisis forced civil society to be more creative and to diversify its focus and networking in order to keep the issue alive. It was felt that protest and focus on self-determination alone was not enough, particularly as a response to the shocking famine of 1978-79, and that concerned citizens and organisations should be encouraged to relate to Timor-Leste in new ways through issues such as human rights, refugee reunions and resettlement, development and emergency relief. The intervention of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), Catholic Relief Services (CRS), World Vision and Oxfam-UK in response to the famine was therefore welcomed, though guardedly, for humanitarian and other reasons, despite serious reservations about the way CRS in particular went about its work. (See Vol. II, Part. 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). Photos of famine victims and other information were also used to demonstrate the impact of the war and to mobilise public opinion. As already mentioned, Congressional and Parliamentary Inquiries were conducted on the issue in the USA and Australia.

* This delegation was led by W L Morrison MP and visited Timor-Leste in July–August 1983.

461. Three new beginnings occurred during this period. Each had positive, long-term consequences and was a source of hope amidst the gloom.

462. First, the East Timorese diaspora, having become more settled in Portugal, Macau and Australia, became more active. The organisations they established challenged perceptions that only a minority of East Timorese were nationalists and eventually became an important source of inspiration and information to the wider community in their countries of residence and abroad.

463. Second, this period witnessed the beginnings of international collaboration. This phenomenon peaked in the nineties but its foundations were laid at this time. A notable example was the Permanent People's Tribunal session on Timor-Leste held in Lisbon, 19–21 June 1981. Convened to lift Timor-Leste's profile during this lean period, particularly in Portugal, the session brought together Fretilin leaders, lawyers, academics, politicians, journalists, church representatives and Indonesians, from fifteen countries. The Portuguese solidarity organisation, Commission for the Rights of the Maubere People (Comissão para os Direitos do Povo Maubere, CDPM) was established at this time.

464. Third, the Catholic Church in Timor-Leste emerged as a public critic of Indonesian military behaviour. This was a development of immense political importance for Timor-Leste, both domestically and internationally. Previously an unrepresentative body that had uneasy relations with Fretilin, the church grew in numbers after the Indonesian invasion* and became a political force despite differences within the ranks of the clergy and pressures from the Vatican. Its intervention offset military gains against Fretilin and was a serious blow to Indonesian expectations that church and state would work as partners in developing the new province. The Church also enjoyed useful international links through its religious congregations and special relationship with the Vatican. The Church was criticised in some quarters,† but international supporters could point to its

* For details, see section on The Vatican above, pars. 310-51. According to an unpublished Indonesian Church report, baptised Catholics were about a third of the population, but as early as late 1976 most East Timorese were already claiming Catholic affiliation. Notes on East Timor, 2 November 1976.

† Roger Peren, the New Zealand Ambassador to Indonesia, reported on his visit to Timor-Leste in 1978: "Only members of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy, from the Bishop down, were openly critical of the administration but as time went by we found ourselves placing less and less reliance on their views." He claimed later in the report that the negative views of the clergy may be due in part to "a certain natural disgruntlement as they no longer enjoy the privileged position they had under the Portuguese regime" (para 8 and para 86, 13 January 1978, New Zealand East Timor OIA Material, Vol. 1). statements as evidence that the Timor-Leste issue was not resolved and that resistance was not confined to Fretilin. The involvement of the Church also legitimised the issue for many who had previously been undecided or concerned about claims of communist links.

465. The individual witness of several priests who had worked in Timor-Leste confirmed these developments. They included the former Portuguese missionaries Father Leoneto do Rego and Father Reinaldo Cardoso, and East Timorese priests Father Francisco Fernandes and Father Apolinario Guterres. Their testimony in a number of international fora was reinforced by the international visits made by Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes to Oceania, North America, Japan and Europe after his departure from Timor-Leste, organised and funded by civil society groups, in which he emphasised self-determination. Following his visit to Japan, Bishop Aloisius Soma put Timor-Leste on the agenda of the Japanese Catholic Council for Justice and Peace and in 1987 appointed Sister Monica Nakamura the desk officer for Timor-Leste. John Taylor and Arnold Kohen told the Commission that the Monsignor's visits to Britain and the USA "were extremely effective" because they showed that Indonesia had failed to win over most Timorese and confirmed that its diplomats were broadly representative of mainstream opinion in the territory.[240] The net effect was that after several years of hesitancy, the international church moved to join the Timor-Leste church in a joint programme of advocacy. This was further strengthened by the involvement of some in important Protestant bodies in Europe, North America, Asia and Oceania despite differences over the issue with the Indonesian Protestant Church.

Phase three: Rebuilding civil society support, 1983–1991

466. Despite its near-death experience, the Resistance survived Indonesia's Anschluss.[*] The principal feature of this phase was the rebuilding of resistance inside Timor-Leste by Xanana Gusmão, his emergence as its leader and its gradual transformation into a broad nationalist movement in which all segments of society, not only Fretilin and the military, had a role. Another leader also appeared during this phase: Dom Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo was appointed head of the Catholic Church in 1983 and became a strong advocate for self-determination and inspiration to international civil society. Three developments towards the end of the period also indirectly favoured Timor-Leste's quest for self-determination. These were President Soeharto's decision to open up the territory, the end of the Cold War, and the visit by Pope John Paul II, the only world leader to visit Timor-Leste during the conflict.

467. The changes brought about by Xanana Gusmão took time to mature, but the net result was a strengthening not only of the internal resistance but also of the diplomatic front, the East Timorese diaspora and international civil society. In 1983, following a ban by the Australian government, a delegation of Fretilin leaders made a successful visit to Australia and addressed a gathering of 1,500 people from all walks

* Kurt Waldheim, the Austrian Secretary-General of the UN, used the term to describe Indonesia's actions in Timor-Leste. It refers to Adolf Hitler's invasion of Austria in World War II. See British Foreign Office memo, 15 May 1976 (CAVR Archives).

of life in Melbourne organised by the Australia East Timor Association. José Ramos-Horta continued to travel frequently, stimulating support in each country he visited.* Supported and sometimes mentored by civil society groups, other East Timorese also undertook international lobbying.†

468. As the new head of the now mainstream Catholic Church, Bishop Belo's views were influential in international civil society circles. He continued Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes' policy of expressing public concern for human rights but focused more clearly on the need for a long-term solution. His conviction that self-determination was essential to end the conflict and human rights violations was encouraging to many Timor-Leste supporters abroad, who disagreed with their governments that the human rights of the East Timorese people could be advanced in the absence of a political settlement.

469. This phase was notable for the strengthening and growth of a number of new international and national networks. Victor Scheffers (Netherlands Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace) and Robert Archer (Catholic Institute for International Relations in London) established the Christian Consultation on East Timor which became a major annual forum for churches and civil society organisations, particularly in Europe. Citizens groups in Japan worked to challenge the silence on Timor-Leste in the Japanese media, academic, parliamentary, faith and official circles. They brought José Ramos-Horta to Japan in 1985 and Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes the following year. They worked with Japanese Parliamentarians, led by Satsuki Eda, to form the Diet Members Forum on East Timor in 1987, visited Timor-Leste and petitioned the United Nations. Through the work of activists such as Aki Matsuno and Kiyoko Fukusawa, a Free East Timor Coalition was formed in 1988 and grew to include some 40 groups across Japan. In 1995 civil society helped move Japan from its rigid pro-Indonesia position to one of support for the UN process on Timor-Leste.

470. In November 1987, Christians in Solidarity with East Timor (CISET) organised the first Asia-Pacific civil society consultation on Timor-Leste. Held in the Philippines, it stressed the need for East Timorese participation in the search for a political settlement. In Canada, following the earlier work of the Canada Asia Working Group and Indonesia East Timor Program, the East Timor Alert Network (ETAN) was set up in 1986 on the initiative of Elaine Brière. It was one of the few organisations to address the responsibility of the private sector towards human rights in Timor-Leste. In 1997 it produced a video, The Sellout of East Timor, which included a hard-hitting critique of Canadian business links with Indonesia. Brière's striking photographs of Timor-Leste taken in 1974 were used by organisations in many countries.‡ Solidarity groups

* For example, José Ramos-Horta visited Japan in March 1985 at the invitation of Japanese citizen's groups, making him the first East Timorese to introduce the issue of Timor-Leste directly to the Japanese public (Sister Monica Nakamura, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, Dili, 15–17 March 2004).

† Examples are visits to the Pacific region by Agio Pereira, Abel Guterres and Mimi Ferreira and, in 1985, to the World Conference of Women in Nairobi by Emilia Pires and Ines de Almeida.

‡ East Timorese activists Abe Barreto and Bella Galhos added an important East Timorese dimension to solidarity work in Canada when they defected from a Canada world youth program and joined ETAN's campaign from 1994-99.

in Europe added another dimension to their campaign by extending their network to include the Campaign Against Arms Trade (CAAT).* In 1988 the international network Parliamentarians for East Timor (PET) was established. At full strength it comprised 900 parliamentarians in 40 countries. PET undertook a number of initiatives including making representations to the UN Secretary-General about the fate of Timor-Leste and recommending East Timorese for the Nobel Peace Prize.†

471. A number of new information resources appeared during this time adding significantly to the limited materials available on Timor-Leste. They included Timor-Leste: Mensagem aos vivos by António Barbedo de Magalhães (Portugal, 1983); Timor: A People Betrayed by James Dunn (Australia, 1983); Em Timor-Leste, a paz é possível (Portuguese newsletter produced by Jean Pierre Catry, 1983-91); East Timor: The Struggle Continues edited by Torben Retboll (Copenhagen, 1984); Timor: Past and Present by Finngeir Hiorth (Norway, 1985); The War Against East Timor by Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong (Britain, 1984); Funu: The Unfinished Saga of East Timor by José Ramos-Horta (USA, 1987); Timor Link, a quarterly journal produced by the Catholic Institute for International Relations (CIIR), founded in 1985 by Robert Archer, it was subsequently edited by John Taylor and Catherine Scott; The Shadow over East Timor, a video by Denis Freney, James Kesterven and Mandy King (Sydney, 1987); Buried Alive: The Story of East Timor, a video by Gil Scrine, Fabio Cavadini and Rob Hibberd (Sydney, 1989); Descolonização de Timor: Missão impossível by Mário Lemos Pires (Portugal, 1991); Timor-Est, le genocide oublié by Gabriel Defert (Paris, 1992). Amnesty International and the newly established, New York-based organisation Human Rights Watch also published a series of reports on Timor-Leste during this period. Both organisations were neutral on the issue of self-determination, though they testified to the UN Decolonisation Committee. Their independent, authoritative reports on human rights were regarded as more credible than official Indonesian denials and confirmed for many in civil society the need for a proper settlement of the conflict through a genuine process of self-determination.‡

472. Civil society gave increased attention to the UN during this period. Worried about Timor-Leste's fate in the UN following the close 1982 vote in the General Assembly,

* CAAT was established in London in 1974 to end the international arms trade, in particular government subsidies and support for arms exports to oppressive regimes engaged in armed conflict. It sought to expose Western military relations with Indonesia which enabled the Soeharto government to stay in power and to deny self-determination in Timor-Leste.

† Parliamentarians for East Timor (PET) was initially chaired by Lord Avebury, who was also chair of the all-Party Parliamentary Human Rights Group in the British Parliament. Secretarial support was provided by Sharon Scharfe in Canada.

‡ In his testimony to the Commission, Ian Martin acknowledged the Amnesty International researchers who worked on Timor-Leste during the Indonesian occupation, viz Anthony Goldstone, Sidney Jones, Geoff Robinson and Kerry Brogan (Testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004). Sidney Jones later worked for Human Rights Watch and produced a number of important reports on Timor-Leste. The importance of the work of these organisations can be seen from Indonesian Government accusations that their claims were false and politically motivated (see letter by Indonesian Department of Foreign Affairs to UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, 2 November 1994, in Krieger, p. 231).

20 to 25 international NGOs made an annual pilgrimage to New York to petition the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation in support of self-determination.* Few, if any, other issues on the Committee agenda received comparable civil society attention. Petitioners to the 1986 meeting included the Indonesia expert Professor Benedict Anderson of Cornell University and Elizabeth Traube, an expert on East Timorese culture, and ranged from large NGOs like Asia Watch to cash-strapped, but deeply committed solidarity groups like the Hobart East Timor Committee from Australia.

473. NGOs also increased their input to the UN Commission on Human Rights in Geneva, both its Sub-commission on Minorities and its annual debate on self-determination. This was often thankless as few governments referred to Timor-Leste in their statements or welcomed being approached in the Commission coffee lounge. In addition, civil society advocates had to endure being criticised by the Indonesian Government before the world body for making unfounded claims based on political objectives. Civil society representation varied from year to year. NGOs who spoke up for Timor-Leste at the 1987 session of the Sub-commission on Minorities were Pax Romana, Pax Christi International, National Aboriginal and Islander Legal Service, and Human Rights Advocates. Civil society interventions were often collaborative exercises based on inputs from NGOs in various parts of the world. International NGOs accredited to the UN sometimes sacrificed their speaking rights to allow East Timorese representatives to speak in their name or provided funding. Community Aid Abroad (CAA) and the Australian Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA) funded José Ramos-Horta's participation in the UN Sub-commission in August 1991. It resulted in a visit to Timor-Leste by the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture that year.

474. Mainstream institutions began to question Soeharto's rule during this period. Reports critical of Soeharto's wealth and anti-democratic policies appeared in the Western press ahead of US President Ronald Reagan's "Winds of Freedom" visit to Asia in 1986. Indonesia retaliated by banning the media responsible which generated further controversy and strengthened the critics' case. At the same time, over 100 US Members of Congress pressed President Ronald Reagan to raise Timor-Leste with President Soeharto. This was an important sign of things to come and followed years of advocacy by civil society, both inside and outside Indonesia.†

475. In 1989, several windows of opportunity opened for Timor-Leste and its expanding international support network. From 1 January, President Soeharto allowed Timor-Leste to be opened up for the first time since December 1975. Concerned individuals and

* Francesc Vendrell, a former UN official, testified to the Commission that he instigated the idea of encouraging international NGOs to petition the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation (Testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004). The practice was encouraged by José Ramos-Horta and by 1991 was co-ordinated by the International Federation for East Timor (IFET) which was conceived by Mr Kan Akatani, a retired Japanese diplomat and representative of the Japanese Catholic Council for Justice and Peace.

† The press articles were David Jenkins, "After Marcos, now for the Soeharto billions", Sydney Morning Herald, 10 April 1986 and a piece by A. M. Rosenthal in the New York Times on repression in Indonesia. The Sydney Morning Herald report caused particular controversy because it compared Soeharto to the disgraced Philippines dictator, Ferdinand Marcos.

organisations from civil society seized the opportunity to visit and, despite restrictions and danger, to make contact with the Resistance, provide material support, act as couriers both ways and to kindle renewed interest in their respective countries. Some 3000 foreigners are estimated to have visited 1989-91.* To facilitate communication, the Australia East Timor Association published the first Tetum-English dictionary, written by Cliff Morris, an ex-Second World War, Timor veteran.

476. A notable example of civil society use of this window was the daring interview conducted in September 1990 by lawyer and unionist Robert Domm with the resistance leader Xanana Gusmão in his mountain hideout. The interview was the first direct interview with the guerrilla leader. It was broadcast by the Australian Broadcasting Commission and significantly increased Xanana Gusmão's international profile and status.† The number of East Timorese studying and working in Indonesia also increased as a consequence of opening up Timor-Leste. This enabled nationalists in their ranks to build links with both Indonesian civil society and with internationals whether working in or visiting Jakarta, including media representatives.

477. Timor-Leste's most important guest after Timor-Leste was opened was Pope John Paul II, who visited in October 1989. His acknowledgment of the existence of conflict in Timor-Leste and the need for a peaceful settlement was at odds with most governments and an inspiration to East Timorese and their international supporters alike. The impact of his visit was further magnified internationally when a demonstration at the conclusion of his Mass at Tacitolu, the first of its kind since the Indonesian invasion, was reported by the world media. On 9 November 1989, the Berlin Wall fell marking the symbolic end of the Cold War. Its fall resonated powerfully in pro-Timor-Leste civil society circles across the world and undercut two of the principal dogmas used to counter their advocacy for self-determination: that Indonesia's incorporation of Timor-Leste was necessary to contain the spread of communism and that its hold on Timor-Leste was irreversible.

Phase four: Turning points, 1991–1998

478. This was a decisive phase in Timor-Leste's struggle for self-determination. The period commenced with a monumental public relations disaster for the Indonesian military in the form of the Santa Cruz massacre, followed 12 months later by Xanana Gusmão's capture. In 1996, the Nobel Peace Prize was awarded to Timor-Leste's most prominent advocates of self-determination, Bishop Belo dan José Ramos-Horta, and in

* Aid to the resistance was non-military and included items such as medicine, video cameras and telephones. On departing, visitors carried documents, taped interviews, photos and the like for use outside including for resistance leaders abroad. Some accounts can be found in Kirsty Sword and Pat Walsh (Eds.) "Opening Up", Travellers Impressions of East Timor 1989–1991, Australia Timor-Leste Association (AETA), Melbourne, 1991.

† The interview also publicised Xanana Gusmão's offer to talk to Indonesia without preconditions under UN auspices. Indonesia rejected the offer, but it was promoted by the Timor-Leste Talks Campaign which published a newsletter The Missing Peace. The story of Domm's hazardous trek into the mountains with Timorese guides and text of the interview can be found in East Timor: Keeping the Flame of Freedom Alive, ACFOA Development Dossier, No 29, February 1991.

1997 Kofi Annan, the new UN Secretary-General, decided to intensify UN diplomacy. The period ended with the collapse of the Soeharto government in May 1998. Civil society contributed to each of these turning points and used them to advance self-determination. The new communications technology also became available during this period and considerably increased civil society's capacity and impact.

479. Unlike other atrocities suffered in Timor-Leste, the Santa Cruz massacre on 12 November 1991 was a turning point in world opinion on the territory. This was due to the presence of international observers on that fateful day and their projection of the tragedy through print, radio and television to the world. The inclusion of one international amongst those gunned down, Kamal Bamadhaj, added to the public outrage, particularly in New Zealand, Australia and Malaysia.* Video of the shooting and terror filmed at great personal risk by Max Stahl was courageously smuggled out of Timor-Leste to Amsterdam by a Dutch reporter, Saskia Kouwenberg.† This powerful evidence, supplemented by graphic photos shot by British photographer Steve Cox who was badly beaten,[241] confirmed what civil society supporters had long claimed, viz that Timor-Leste was a society in stress, that military repression was a reality and that a genuine act of self-determination was the key to peace.

480. International civil society involvement rose sharply in response to the Santa Cruz tragedy. On 19 November 1991, Portugal held a national day of mourning. Leading civil society figures signed an open letter to the US President protesting that America had accepted Indonesian sovereignty over Timor-Leste although no proper act of self-determination had taken place. Portuguese students linked with Forum Estudante and Missao Paz por Timor raised funds to charter the Portuguese ferry Lusitania Expresso to protest the situation by sailing to Timor-Leste. Immediately following the massacre, the East Timor Action Network (ETAN) was established in the US by Charles Scheiner, John Miller and others with the objective of changing US foreign policy to support self-determination for Timor-Leste. US journalists Alan Nairn and Amy Goodman, who narrowly survived the Santa Cruz massacre, campaigned throughout the United States contributing to the growth of ETAN. By 2000, ETAN was supported by 10,000 members with 27 local groups across the US. Also in November, the International Platform of Jurists for East Timor (IPJET) was constituted in the Netherlands headed by Pedro Pinto Leite. IPJET's aim was to mobilise international legal expertise in support of self-determination. This was done through conferences, publications and submissions, including to the UN and the European Union. By 1995, IPJET had 250 members in

* Kamal Bamadhaj's parents were from New Zealand and Malaysia; he was studying in Australia at the time and was active in supporting human rights for Timor-Leste. On 12 November he was working as an interpreter for Bob Muntz of Oxfam-Community Aid Abroad. Muntz was nearly killed and on his return to Australia gave tireless eyewitness testimony about the atrocity. In 1994, in the case of Todd v Panjaitan, the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights (CCR) successfully sued Major-General Sintong Panjaitan for his role in the Santa Cruz massacre. He was ordered to pay US$14m in damages to Helen Todd, the mother of Kamal Bamadhaj. Payment was never made (Helen Todd, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003).

† Saskia Kouwenberg smuggled out some of the tapes in her clothing. Max Stahl himself took some tapes out and at least one tape was unable to be retrieved from his hiding place in Santa Cruz cemetery.

over 50 countries. Public support was mobilised in Ireland by the East Timor Ireland Solidarity Campaign (ETISC) established by Tom Hyland in Dublin after the Yorkshire Television film In Cold Blood: The Massacre of East Timor was screened in January 1992 using Stahl's compelling images of the massacre. The work of ETISC was the other example, in addition to Portugal, where the solidarity movement was able to work effectively with its government. Providing critical information and mobilising the energy of the Irish community, ETISC supported the Irish Government's leading role on the question of Timor-Leste in the European Union in the 1990s. In Scotland, the Glasgow University East Timor and Indonesia Support Group was formed in the mid-1990s.

481. The Indonesian military's capture of Xanana Gusmão on 20 November 1992 initially plunged the Timorese diaspora and civil society alike into depression. It was quickly realised, however, that the best way to protect the resistance leader was to promote his international profile, building on the publicity already generated by civil society, and that his detention and trial presented a new campaign opportunity. Human rights organisations took a close interest in his trial, which was conducted in Dili in May 1993. The Indonesian Government refused a visa to Rodney Lewis, who asked to observe the trial on behalf of the International Bar Association and the Law Council of Australia. Protest grew louder when the trial judge stopped Gusmão from reading his Defence after only three pages, claiming it was "irrelevant", and suppressed the document. From their side, civil society groups considered it was highly relevant. They translated and published a smuggled copy of the Defence, presenting it more as an indictment of Indonesia and its allies than a defence, and the trial as a miscarriage of justice analogous to that suffered by Timor-Leste itself.[242] Portugal and Amnesty International, inter alia, condemned the trial. The defiant fighting spirit of the Defence also inspired supporters and came as a relief following reports after Gusmão's capture that he had accepted Indonesian sovereignty and called on his followers to surrender.

482. Solidarity groups promoted Xanana-in-detention as a potent symbol of occupied Timor-Leste and linked his fate to Timor-Leste's fate. Stickers declaring "Free Xanana, Free East Timor" appeared in the conference hall of the 1993 World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna, including the backs of toilet doors likely to be used by Indonesian government delegates to the Conference. Postcard campaigns, vigils, demonstrations and writings about Gusmão multiplied. In September 1994 the United Nations Association of Australia honoured him in absentia with a human rights award. His birthday became a rallying point each year, marking the slow passage of his life sentence but also his supporters' personal solidarity and commitment to what he advocated, including a referendum.

483. Ironically, Xanana Gusmão's imprisonment in Jakarta allowed him to interact with civil society and the international community more than was possible from the remote mountains of Timor-Leste. Kirsty Sword Gusmão was critical to making this happen, particularly during the years 1992-96 when she was based in Jakarta. In addition to her regular job, she served as a clandestine secretary to the Resistance and was assisted by, amongst others, Victoria Markwick-Smith, who was experienced in the conduct of Timor work in shadowy Jakarta, and was backed from abroad by her family and a small network of trusted friends. Demanding and risky, this work made possible two-way high-level communication between Xanana Gusmão in his prison cell and his principal ambassador at large, José Ramos-Horta, and many others. It also made possible many exchanges, both personal and official, between Xanana Gusmão and civil society organisations around the world and even the auctioning of his prison paintings abroad to raise money for the Resistance.*

484. John Pilger's film, Death of a Nation, did much to strengthen further involvement with Timor-Leste around the world following its screening in Geneva during the annual meeting of the UN Commission of Human Rights early in 1994. After it was shown on national television in New Zealand, for example, parliamentarians launched a petition and the government dropped its policy that Timor-Leste's status was irreversible.

485. In 1994, the Asia-Pacific Coalition for East Timor (APCET) was formed in the Philippines. It held a series of conferences organized by its secretariat, Initiatives for International Dialogue, led by Gus Miclat. Civil society had been active in several Asian countries for many years, but this was the beginning of on-going, co-ordinated solidarity for Timor-Leste across Asia. Successive APCET conferences in the Philippines, Malaysia and Thailand provoked hostile responses from Indonesia and these close ASEAN allies. They also challenged the contention of some Asian governments that human rights were not universal and the Western contention that Timor-Leste had no support in the Asian region. Two Indonesian civil society organisations were represented at the 1995 APCET conference in Kuala Lumpur, and not long after Indonesian Solidarity for Peace in East Timor (Solidaritas Indonesia untuk Perdamaian Timor Timur, Solidamor) was founded in Jakarta. One of the features of APCET's work on Timor-Leste was the bringing together of peoples from a range of oppressed communities in the Asian region. Timorese participants of APCET met with activists from Burma, Sri Lanka, Mindanao, Aceh and West Papua, fostering relationships that continue to this day. The Hong Kong-based Asia Students Association (ASA) was an important affiliate of APCET. Its secretariat worked hard to bring the issue of Timor-Leste to student movements in countries across the region.

486. The use of Western-supplied weapons in the Santa Cruz massacre prompted civil society to increase calls for an arms embargo against Indonesia.† This campaign was particularly vocal in the US and in the UK, supported by the Campaign Against Arms Trade. In January 1996 four women from Ploughshares for Peace entered a British aerospace site and used hammers to disarm a British Hawk fighter jet that was being prepared for delivery to Indonesia. Hawks had reportedly been used against the * Kirsty Sword Gusmão visited Timor-Leste in 1991 to assist Yorkshire Television with the filming of In Cold Blood. Her work for self-determination is recounted in Kirsty Sword Gusmão with Rowena Lennox, A Woman of Independence, Macmillan, Sydney, 2003. Examples of Xanana Gusmão's communications to civil society, including messages to the East Timor Talks Campaign, H J C Princen and the Ploughshares for Peace women can be found in his autobiography, To Resist is To Win.

† Allan Nairn testified that US-supplied M-16s were used in the massacre. Testimony to US Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 27 February 1992.

Resistance in Timor-Leste and the women had been calling for their cancellation for three years during which time Britain had become Indonesia's second largest arms supplier. The women – Andrea Needham, Lotta Kronlid, Joanna Wilson and Angie Zelter – informed the company of their action and were arrested. Their trial in 1996 made legal history: they were acquitted by a jury in Liverpool who found that they had acted in order to prevent the greater crime of genocide.[243] However, the campaign failed to change British and US policy on military assistance to Indonesia at this point.*

487. Another important initiative during this period was a series of seminars organised during the 1990s by the Portuguese professor, Dr António Barbedo de Magalhães.† The seminars, most of which were held in Portugal, brought together activists and academics, including from Indonesia, to share information and develop policy and strategies on Timor-Leste. In Australia, new organisations and initiatives continued to emerge. These included Australians for a Free East Timor (AFFET), established in Darwin by long time activist Rob Wesley-Smith around the time of the Santa Cruz massacre; a Sydney branch of the Australia East Timor Association in 1992;‡ Perth-based Friends of East Timor; the Mary McKillop Institute of East Timorese Studies (MMIETS) established in Sydney in 1993 by the Sisters of St Joseph; the East Timor International Support Centre in Darwin, headed by Juan Federer which set up Timor Aid in 1998; in Melbourne the University Students for East Timor and the East Timor Human Rights Centre, chaired by Bishop Hilton Deakin. Action in Solidarity with Indonesia and East Timor (ASIET) was also established at this time and, led by Max Lane, promoted links between East Timorese student underground groups and socialist organisations working for change in Indonesia. The Australian Coalition for East Timor (ACET) provided some co-ordination, but most groups preferred to consult informally. The International Federation for East Timor (IFET), which was established during this period, had a similar experience. IFET achieved a membership of 30 organisations from 18 countries but many in the now large and diverse constellation of pro-Timor organisations, although supportive of self-determination, did not sign up.

488. The right of Timorese to cultural self-determination was strengthened by initiatives such as the Japanese-sponsored school for Timorese children in Darwin and the production of the ground-breaking Tetum lesson book Mai Koalia Tetum by Professor Geoffrey Hull at a time when Tetum was banned from schools and official use in Timor-Leste. Assisted by Professor Hull and the Timorese linguist, Manuel Viegas, the Mary McKillop Institute developed attractive primary school books in Tetum which assisted

* The British Government resisted public pressure and defended continued arms sales to Indonesia on the grounds that Indonesia had a right to defend itself, the equipment was not being used against the East Timorese and that British military training would improve the Indonesian military's respect for human rights and democracy. See Baroness Trumpington, House of Lords, 10 July 1992 (Krieger, p. 302).

† Barbedo de Magalhães first visited Timor-Leste in 1975 and took a special interest in Fretilin's education policy. He is the author of East Timor: Indonesian Occupation and Genocide, Oporto University, Portugal, 1992, and other publications including Timor-Leste na encruzilhada da transição Indonésia, Gradiva, 1999.

‡ Timor-Leste film-maker Gil Scrine was the first convenor. Under Jefferson Lee and Andrew McNaughtan, Australia – East Timor Association (AETA) Sydney developed an international profile and, through visits by McNughtan, established direct links with the Resistance in Timor-Leste.

Bishop Belo when, in defiance of official policy, he decided to have Tetum taught in Catholic schools in Timor-Leste.

489. While this period was notable for the impact of the video image on public awareness, the growth of new organisations and their co-ordination owes much to the advent of the internet age. The general availability of the internet in the 1990s more or less coincided with Indonesia's decision to partially relax access to Timor-Leste. This timing was not only a happy coincidence; the internet also perfectly suited the requirements of human rights activists. It was fast, cheap, secure, user-friendly, interactive and had significant carrying capacity and global reach. Information, a scarce commodity on Timor-Leste for the previous 15 years, was now widely available through the internet thanks to the skills and commitment of civil society members. John MacDougall's pioneering apakabar, a free electronic mailing list which covered both Indonesia and Timor-Leste, was followed by reg.easttimor which became the main clearing house and channel for rapid communication on Timor-Leste across the globe. Established in 1994 and co-ordinated by ETAN/US, reg.easttimor enabled the public and civil society organisations in the Asia-Pacific, Europe and North America to have interactive conferences and to access reports on Timor-Leste and translations from wire services and the Indonesian, Portuguese and other media as well as official documents from the UN, governments and other sources. The relatively few books available on Timor-Leste were now supplemented by publicly accessible websites. TimorNet at the University of Coimbra in Portugal provided links to information on the history, geography and culture of Timor-Leste, key UN documents, human rights violations, articles, publications and suggestions for action. Activists used email to proliferate information and to co-ordinate and organise. Colin Renwick set up Minihub to help small, vulnerable NGOs in Indonesia and Timor-Leste establish cheap, accessible and secure internet access and also gave training to selected East Timorese activists,* increasing the underground's effectiveness. With these skills, East Timorese supporting Xanana Gusmão in Jakarta could send encrypted email messages to colleagues abroad, including to José Ramos-Horta.

490. The internet was also used for direct action. In 1997, an Irish internet service provider provoked a public protest by the Indonesian government after it registered Timor-Leste's own domain in preparation for political independence. The same year, Portuguese Hackers Against Indonesia breached the Indonesian military's website and scrawled "propaganda" across it. This followed breaches of sites in the Indonesian Department of Foreign Affairs and elsewhere which provoked revenge attacks on Portuguese sites by Indonesian hackers. Cyber warfare over Timor-Leste continued to 1999. In August 1998, 45 Indonesian domains were hacked followed by Indonesian sabotage of Connect Ireland, the creators of the Timor domain. It ended with President Habibie's change of policy on Timor-Leste. Nevertheless, the sense that Indonesia – unlike Timor-Leste – was vulnerable in this area inspired José Ramos-Horta to threaten in August 1999 that he would unleash a "desperate and ferocious" internet campaign if Indonesia refused to respect the outcome of the 30 August referendum.[244]

* Father Domingos Soares, aka Fr Maubere, was one of those trained by Colin Renwick.

491. The decision of the Norwegian Nobel Committee to award the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo and José Ramos-Horta on International Human Rights Day, 10 December 1996, was an enormous moral, political and organisational boost to civil society's work for self-determination. The prize was given independently by the Nobel Committee and thoroughly earned by the two awardees, Bishop Belo and José Ramos-Horta, but the nomination owed much to civil society's initiative, and particularly to old friends of Timor-Leste working behind the scenes in the United States. The prestigious award confirmed the moral correctness of civil society's work and further weakened the case advanced by the Indonesian government and its co-defenders, including Indonesia's version of the history of the conflict. It was also politically helpful in that it highlighted the necessity of self-determination to resolve the conflict – the centrepiece of civil society advocacy for 20 years – and identified this as the key issue.* The Prize was a bonus to civil society organising. The global media coverage it attracted, which continued as José Ramos-Horta travelled the world in his new role, generated new public interest and support for the civil society campaign in many countries.

492. The end of Soeharto's rule came suddenly. It was triggered by the East Asian financial crisis, which struck like a tsunami in July 1997 and exposed the vulnerability of the New Order behind its veneer of indestructibility. For Timor-Leste, it was a piece of what Bernard Williams calls "moral luck".[245] Some in civil society circles had argued that change had to be achieved while Soeharto was still in power because only he had the power to override the military.† Others believed that independence would depend on democratisation in Indonesia, or at least a leadership change. Yeni Rosa Damayanti testified to the Commission:

> I heard from the East Timorese students in Java that Xanana himself said that the independence of Timor-Leste would depend on the Indonesian process of democratisation. It would be hard to gain independence without democracy in Indonesia (meaning that Soeharto would have to fall).[246]

493. The latter proved to be correct. Soeharto remained intransigent to the last, refusing to grant even limited autonomy to Timor-Leste. Civil society pressure increased. Soeharto was the target of mass demonstrations in Vancouver when he attended the Asia Pacific Economic Co-operation (APEC) summit in November 1997.‡ At home,

* The Norwegian Nobel Committee's official press release stated: "The Nobel Committee hopes that this award will spur efforts to find a diplomatic solution to the conflict in East Timor based on the people's right to self-determination." The Committee believed this happened. Reflecting some years later on the award to Timor-Leste, Geir Lundestad, Secretary of the Committee, observed: "Many similar (positive) effects can be seen to have resulted from the award of the Peace Prize in 1996 to Bishop Carlos Belo and José Ramos-Horta for their struggle for East Timor's right of self-determination" ("Reflections on the Nobel Peace Prize", 10 June 2004, Nobelprize.org).

† Soeharto's advancing age and health problems were a likely factor in the timing of the Nobel Peace Prize. In Australia, NGOs met with Abdurrahman Wahid, a progressive Muslim leader who later became Indonesia's fourth president, to discuss a possible approach to Soeharto by David Lange, the former New Zealand Prime Minister. The plan was overtaken by events.

‡ For ten days prior to APEC, 13 exiled East Timorese and several Indonesians toured Canada calling on the authorities to "bar Soeharto or put him behind bars" for crimes in Timor-Leste and Indonesia.

students won increasing support from the middle class for total reform and mounted massive demonstrations. Soeharto resigned and handed over the presidency to the Vice-President, B.J. Habibie on 21 May 1998.

Phase five: Self-determination, 1998–1999

494. This period marked the end of Indonesia's rule of Timor-Leste and was a time of intense drama for all involved, including civil society. Like its arrival 24 years previously, Indonesia's departure was violent and chaotic but this time its objective, though not the manner of its execution, was in compliance with international policy and applauded by civil society. Indonesia reversed its position step by step. In June 1998, President Habibie proposed limited autonomy for Timor-Leste within Indonesia. Seven months later, in January 1999, he offered a proper act of self-determination under UN auspices. The ballot was held on 30 August 1999 and resulted in a clear choice for independence. On 20 October 1999, Indonesia's MPR recognised the result and revoked its 1976 decree incorporating Timor-Leste into Indonesia. On 1 November 1999, the last TNI troops left the territory.

495. Civil society was initially incredulous at B. J. Habibie's accession to the presidency. Nothing was expected of a man who was widely regarded as an eccentric and who had shown no interest in Timor-Leste during his long and close association with Soeharto. However, civil society benefited significantly from his brief rule. He conceded what civil society had long demanded, viz a genuine act of self-determination in Timor-Leste. He also substantially opened up democratic space, giving civil society in both Indonesia and Timor-Leste freedom to organise and campaign for self-determination, an opening they used to full advantage.*

496. The Habibie policy reversal also dramatically altered the dynamics surrounding the Timor issue internationally. Governments which had recognised Indonesian sovereignty over Timor and strongly supported the New Order now realigned their policy in favour of self-determination. For the first time since 1975, governments and civil society – with the notable exception of Portugal where broad consensus was already in place – put an end to their differences, at least on substantial policy matters, and began to work together for self-determination in Timor-Leste, rather than in opposition to each other.

497. Coupled with unprecedented media access and reporting on Timor-Leste, these developments invigorated civil society like never before. Even countries that had a long-term involvement with the issue witnessed a dramatic growth in both the volume and breadth of public support. Jean Pierre Catry informed the Commission that in Portugal alone groups numbered "hundreds, from parliament to schools, municipalities, parishes, professional associations, trade unions… to name them all

* Habibie undertook a number of reforms that directly benefited civil society. He recognised the right to assembly and the formation of political parties, reduced restrictions on the press, freed political prisoners and oversaw the signing or ratification of important international human rights and labour conventions.

would be impossible".[247] Australia had a similar experience.[*] The Australian Foreign Minister, Alexander Downer, acknowledged this phenomenon: "During my time as Foreign Minister, no foreign policy issue has captured the public interest in Australia more than East Timor…"[248] The Government also acknowledged the role of Australian civil society in achieving self-determination for Timor-Leste by inviting two civil society representatives to join the official delegation to observe the August 1999 ballot.[†]

498. Most of the nearly 2,300 ballot observers accredited by the UN came from NGOs. Regarding their role, Ian Martin observed:

> Many came from solidarity groups with a commitment to self-determination or independence for East Timor, but the observer code of conduct they accepted on accreditation required them to behave in a neutral manner.[249]

499. The majority of these, some 1,700, were Indonesian and East Timorese. In a memorable display of international organisation and solidarity, they were supported by colleagues from around the world, co-ordinated mainly by the ETAN/US-based International Federation for East Timor (IFET), the Thailand-based Asian Network for Free Elections (ANFREL) and the Philippines-based Asia-Pacific Coalition for East Timor (APCET). They, in turn, represented a multitude of citizens in many countries for whom the ballot, as for the East Timorese people, climaxed a struggle of epic proportions and demonstrated again the importance and capacity of principled people's power in world affairs.

Indonesian civil society

500. Indonesian civil society added Timor-Leste to its formidable list of pressing social, human rights and environmental issues in the 1990s. Though small and isolated, significant sections of the pro-Timor movement went to the heart of the issue and advocated self-determination. This policy orientation owed much to the influence of Indonesians living abroad and to East Timorese studying in Java and Bali. Its advocacy in Soeharto's Indonesia required rare courage. Though its Constitution requires Indonesia to fight colonialism and uphold the right of all peoples to independence,[250] in the eyes of the regime to support self-determination in Timor-Leste (after 1976) amounted to subversion of the central dogma of national unity, which underpinned state and military policy. Those who supported it or who collaborated with its Timorese advocates were harassed and risked being labelled traitors. Only in Timor-Leste itself was such activity more dangerous. But by daring to speak out, Indonesian civil society groups broke the taboo of fear and silence and, against great odds, mobilised support

* The breadth of Australian public concern is evident from the wide range of civil society groups and individuals who testified to the 1999 Australian Parliament inquiry into Timor-Leste.

† The two observers were Pat Walsh of ACFOA and Anne Wigglesworth of Caritas Australia.

that climaxed in hundreds of Indonesian citizens standing alongside East Timorese as they exercised their right of self-determination in August 1999.

The early years

501. Timor-Leste did not become a significant NGO issue in Indonesia until the 1990s, but some individuals and organisations were active earlier. For some, this involvement was part of their professional duties which, though often sensitive and difficult, did not involve direct political activity. These included George Aditjondro who visited Timor-Leste in May 1974 as a Tempo correspondent and shared information after the invasion with Church contacts abroad;* individuals associated with the Protestant Church like Yopie Lasut, Gustaf Dupe, Asmara Nababan and Ade Sitompul who cared for East Timorese political prisoners held in Indonesian gaols; and members of the Catholic Church agency LPPS, Father Gerry Zegwaard MSC, Father Hardoputranto SJ and Ms Immaculata Mardani who channelled humanitarian aid to Timor-Leste and were a discreet source of information about Timor-Leste to contacts outside Indonesia.†

502. Some Indonesians living abroad were also active in support of Timor-Leste before 1990, particularly amongst those who left Indonesia to escape the PKI purge following the Soeharto takeover in 1965.‡ In Europe they joined support groups in Germany, France, Belgium, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and the Netherlands (Komite Indonesia), but generally remained anonymous because of the sensitivity of the issue and their vulnerability as political exiles. Kusni Sulang was active in Paris and Hendrik Amahorseja in Sweden. In Australia, Siauw Tiong Djin, Goei Hok Gie (Andrew Gunawan); and Ernst Utrecht in the Netherlands were sympathetic. In 1981, Jusfiq Hadjar and Liem Soei Liong became the first Indonesians to openly oppose the invasion and support independence for Timor-Leste when they testified to the Permanent People's Tribunal in Lisbon. In retaliation, the Soeharto Government declared both persona non grata and blacklisted them from returning to Indonesia. Other exiles never publicised their support and were eventually allowed to return home safely to Indonesia. Some members

* George Aditjondro was part of a group of young Indonesian Catholics who in 1974 sought to formulate a democratic and non-military policy on Timor-Leste for the Indonesian Bishops Council. Their document is found as Appendix 1 in East Timor: An Indonesian Intellectual Speaks Out edited by Herb Feith, Emma Baulch and Pat Walsh, Australian Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA) Development Dossier No. 33, May 1994. Aditjondro is believed to have written the first non-government report from inside Indonesia after the invasion in the form of a letter to Father Mark Raper, SJ received at Asian Bureau Australia on 21 April 1976 (CAVR archives).

† LPPS was supported by and in regular contact with Catholic agencies throughout the world through the Hong Kong- based Asia Partnership for Human Development (APHD). Though not directly relevant to this account, the selfless humanitarian contribution made by many Indonesians to Timor-Leste during the Indonesian occupation must be acknowledged. For an account of their experiences during the upheaval in 1999, see Yohanes Sukandar, Sigit Wijayanto and Martinus Manggo (Eds.), Selamat Tinggal Timor Timur, Insist Press, Yogyakarta, 2000.

‡ The Indonesian Communist Party (Partai Komunis Indonesia, PKI) was the first communist party in Asia and by 1966 one of the largest. The New Order came into being in 1966 after a military takeover, the banning of the PKI and the liquidation of up to a million of its members and alleged supporters. of the Indonesian diaspora may have supported Timor-Leste to advance the interests of the proscribed Indonesian Communist Party (PKI). Liem Soei Liong denies that his or Carmel Budiardjo's work in Tapol was driven by such a double agenda.*

503. Diaspora Indonesians in Europe fostered pro-Timor activity in Indonesia. They provided alternative information on Timor-Leste, for example, by sending the Tapol newsletter to Indonesia and making secret visits.† Indonesian journalists working in Radio Netherlands, such as Tossy Santoso and Yoss Wibisono, broadcast news and interviews on Timor-Leste which was received in Indonesia. Tossy Santoso also wrote several books on Timor-Leste in Indonesian. Another productive strategy was to put East Timorese and Indonesian activists in touch with each other and their international counterparts. Activists such as Max Lane in Australia and António Barbedo de Magalhães in Portugal had a similar networking strategy. These international initiatives contributed to the formation and direction of Indonesian NGOs such as Infight, Solidamor and Indonesian People's Struggle for Solidarity with the Maubere People (Solidaritas Perjuangan Rakyat Indonesia untuk Maubere, SPRIM). Indonesians abroad became more active on Timor-Leste in the late 1980s and 1990s. Two Indonesians living in Holland, Aeri Harapan and Reza Muharram, joined the Portuguese Lusitania Expresso protest ship in March 1992. In punishment, both had their passports cancelled by the Indonesian government. Yeni Rosa Damayanti also had her passport cancelled after participating in an anti-Soeharto demonstration in Germany in 1996. Their citizenship was restored in the post-Soeharto period.

504. Indonesians who lived overseas on temporary work or study permits or who travelled abroad were often confronted with the Timor-Leste issue through the media or colleagues. Civil society leaders like Abdurrahman Wahid, Todung Mulya Lubis, Adnan Buyung Nasution and Abdul Hakim Garuda Nusantara sometimes took such opportunities to discuss the issue and to meet privately with senior East Timorese. However, they were subject to surveillance and in view of their responsibilities at home could not afford to risk trouble from the authorities for themselves or their organisations by speaking out.

The 1990s

505. There are several reasons why civil society in Indonesia was largely silent on Timor-Leste until the 1990s. Civil society was almost non-existent in Soeharto's Indonesia prior to this period. The New Order system was authoritarian verging on totalitarian. Civil society had no formal place in the corporatist, top-down political structure that

* Communication to CAVR, 28 February 2005. In a sensitive gesture during her public testimony to CAVR, Yeni Rosa Damayanti included the British activist Carmel Budiardjo in her list of Indonesians who were active abroad (testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2003). Carmel Budiardjo was imprisoned in Indonesia after 1965 and, after her release and return to Britain, devoted her life to the defence of human rights in Indonesia.

† Liem Soei Liong made several secret visits while he was banned and on each occasion gave lectures on Timor-Leste to Indonesian activists. Communication to CAVR, 28 February 2005. The Indonesian activist Nugroho Katjasungkana confirmed the influence of Indonesian diaspora on the solidarity work of Indonesian activists (testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March, 2003).

restricted civil and political rights in favour of national unity, development and stability. When civil society organisations did emerge they were overwhelmed with land, labour, environmental and other issues, and had few of the freedoms and resources enjoyed by community organisations in democratic countries.

506. In addition to being marginalised, civil society was also kept ignorant of the reality in Timor-Leste. The Soeharto Government restricted all access to the territory, including by Indonesian media and civil society, and kept very tight control of information about Timor-Leste allowing only its official version to circulate, namely that integration was positive and followed an act of self-determination. In her public testimony to the Commission, Yeni Rosa Damayanti asked rhetorically: "Where were the people of Indonesia when people in Timor-Leste were suffering?" She replied: "The answer is, we didn't know what was happening here."[251]

507. A second major factor was the climate of fear in Indonesia created by the violent military takeover in 1965 and institutionalised legally and operationally throughout the Soeharto years. In Liem Soei Liong's judgement, "Timor-Leste was always a delicate issue and probably in the early eighties arguably more touchy than the PKI/1965 issue."[252] Yeni Rosa Damayanti illustrated what this meant in practice when she told the Commission of her interrogation by a Bakorstanas Major in 1991 following a protest against the Gulf War, which Indonesian activists boldly linked to Indonesia's invasion of Timor-Leste. She testified:

> The Major put his gun down in front of me and said: "You can talk about anything you want, but you cannot talk about East Timor. Thousands of soldiers have died in Timor-Leste and I won't allow even one Indonesian to talk about Timor-Leste. Thousands have died and you're just one more person, and one Indonesian life means nothing…"[253]

508. Nugroho Katjasungkana testified to the Commission that in the 1980s Indonesians interested in alternative education, health and co-operatives had their interest sparked in Timor-Leste when they learned that Fretilin had similar interests in 1975.[254] The beginnings of sustained political support for Timor-Leste, however, began in the early 1990s with organisations such as Infight (Saleh Abdullah), Institute for the Defense of Human Rights (Lembaga Pembela Hak-hak Asasi Manusia, LPHAM; H J C Princen*) and New Life (Hidup Baru; Yopie Lasut). In addition to international input from Indonesians abroad, contact with East Timorese students studying in Java following the opening up of the province in 1989 contributed to this awakening. Yeni Rosa Damayanti told the Commission:

> I was introduced to the case of Timor-Leste when fellow East Timorese students who studied in Java started coming to us. There were several people at that time, Fernando de Araújo and others…East Timorese

* Born in Holland, Haji Princen was a celebrated pioneer of human rights in Indonesia from the time of Independence for which he fought on the Indonesian side. He protected many East Timorese, including those seeking asylum abroad. East Timorese held a memorial in Borja da Costa Park, Dili, to mark his death in 2002.

students came to our place and it was there that I heard for the first time what was happening in Timor-Leste. Imagine, after so many years.[255]

509. This also explains why the support movement was strongest amongst students mainly in Java and Bali. As in many other countries, the 1991 Santa Cruz massacre was also a turning point for many Indonesians. Many felt that the true nature of the Indonesian state was being exposed in Timor-Leste and that the system itself was wrong, not just its activities in the territory. Members of Infight, LPHAM and Hidup Baru joined East Timorese youth to protest the massacre in front of the UN Office on Jalan Thamrin on 19 November 1991, resulting in their arrest and interrogation. On 23 November, following an initiative by the Yogyakarta Students Association, 12 student councils signed a petition in Bandung demanding the withdrawal of Indonesian troops from Timor-Leste and the "full and free right of self-determination to the people of Timor-Leste".[256]

510. Pokastim, the East Timor Communications Forum, provided loose co-ordination. Dedicated to providing humanitarian assistance to Timor-Leste, it became the first to stage a public meeting in Jakarta on the question of self-determination in Timor-Leste, held at a university in late 1997. The Indonesian solidarity groups Solidarity for the People of East Timor (Fortilos) and Indonesian Solidarity for East Timor Peace (Solidamor) grew out of the Forum.[257] Both explicitly backed self-determination. Solidamor played a central role in disseminating information in Indonesia,* monitored the August 1999 ballot and that same month was made the Jakarta liaison office for the East Timorese resistance (CNRT). In May 2000, about 50 pro-integration East Timorese ransacked the Solidamor office, stole files and money, and injured several activists, including Bonar Tigor (Coki) Naipospos, the Solidamor chairperson. The authorities did little in response.

511. Pro-Timor groups set out to inform and mobilise young activists by publishing alternative information on Timor-Leste. Early examples included Robert Domm's interview with Xanana Gusmão and East Timor: Indonesian Occupation and Genocide by Professor Barbedo de Magalhães. In 1995, Pijar, an Indonesian NGO, published Indonesian translations of the report of the UN Special Rapporteur, Bacre Waly Ndiaye, Michele Turner's interviews with East Timorese refugees called Telling East Timor: Personal Testimonies 1942–1992, and the defence plea of the underground Renetil leader, Fernando de Araújo. In Salatiga, Geni (Gemi Nastiti Foundation) published articles critical of development in Timor-Leste and anti-Bishop Belo demonstrations in Java. In Semarang, Diponegoro University students published Xanana Gusmão's defence plea and criticism by George Aditjondro of Indonesia's occupation of Timor-Leste.

512. East Timorese and Indonesian activists also engaged in joint direct action, particularly through SPRIM, a member of the People's Democratic Party (Partai Rakyat

* In 1986, Solidamor translated and published José Ramos-Horta's Funu: The Unfinished Saga of East Timor. Solidamor's creative public relations for Timor included the publication of a pocket-sized reference book, Mengenal Timor Timur Dulu dan Sekarang (Getting to Know East Timor, Then and Now), Solidamor, Jakarta, September 1998.

Demokratik, PRD). PRD members, who also comprised students, workers, peasants and artists, always included the party's demand for a referendum in Timor-Leste alongside their advocacy for a minimum wage, clean elections and a new president. SPRIM held public rallies and, in 1995, joined East Timorese to occupy the Dutch and Russian Embassies in Jakarta.

513. Indonesian activists also linked up with like-minded civil society organisations in the Asia-Pacific region. Pijar leaders Rachland Nashidik and Tri Agus Susanto Siswowiharjo attended the first conference of the Asia-Pacific Coalition for East Timor (APCET) held in Manila in 1994. Indonesians were also present at APCET II in Kuala Lumpur in 1995 and APCET III in Bangkok in 1998. Links were also maintained with Australia through a diverse network that included Action in Solidarity with Indonesia and East Timor (ASIET) and the Indonesia Australia Program for Co-operation with Indonesia (IAPC).* The Australian quarterly magazine, Inside Indonesia, established in 1983, was a respected medium of exchange and another source of alternative information on Timor-Leste for Indonesian readers.

514. Other NGOs provided legal aid and pastoral care to East Timorese political prisoners in both Timor-Leste and Indonesia who had been gaoled for promoting self-determination. When large numbers of East Timorese were detained after the Santa Cruz massacre in 1991, Indonesian lawyers and others travelled to Timor-Leste to assist with legal defence. Ms Ade Sitompul testified to the Commission of the personal risk they took to assist Timorese prisoners in Dili at this time:

> It wasn't an easy job because the security apparatus was very repressive and everywhere we went we were always followed…The lawyers, such as Pak Luhut (Pangaribuan), were terrorised at Hotel Turismo…We received calls telling us to go home or be killed and I was very scared.[258]

